THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has been drawn to the case referred to in the Question. Legislation would be necessary to empower a Board of Guardians to retain, against the will of the parent, the custody of his child, although in consequence of destitution the child had been chargeable to the rates. No doubt, there are some instances in which the interests of children are prejudiced by their parents claiming them from the Guardians; but I should not be prepared to propose legislation which would enable a Board of Guardians to withhold a child from its parent when claimed by him. If, after a child has been taken charge of by its parent, there are any circumstances which would bring the case under the provisions of the Industrial Schools Acts, proceedings might be taken for sending the child to an industrial school.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN GUARDIANS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has any objection to state from whom he received the information relating to threatened evictions in Monaghan that the Guardians reported that there was ample accommodation for tenants in the workhouse independent of the portion occupied by the Militia; if this Report was furnished by the authority of the Board, when was the meeting held, and if supplied by individual Guardians, whether he will give their names, and state whether they were elected or ex-officio Guardians; whether it is true that the Master of the workhouse reported to the last meeting of the Board that the Militia had smashed the windows of one wing of the building, and that fever had broken out in one of the wings occupied by the Militia; and whether considering that a considerable time will be required to repair the damage done, and for disinfecting the building, before evicted tenants could be with safety received, he will refuse to place Forces of the Crown at the service of Miss Rose, Mr. Dacre Hamilton, and Colonel Forster, for the purpose of evicting those 60 families, until the Militia are disbanded, and the workhouse put in order to receive them?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the information was received from the Clerk of the Union. The Master reported that a number of panes of glass had been broken in the windows of the wing occupied by the Militia. There had been no outbreak of fever among the Militia during the present training. The Government did not see any reason to interfere with the pending evictions, should it be unhappily necessary to carry them out.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF JOSEPH COMERFORD — BELFAST POLICE COURT.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Joseph Comerford, who was sentenced by the magistrates at Belfast Police Court, on 31st May, 1886, to upwards of 21 months' imprisonment with hard labour for assaults committed on the one occasion; whether the extreme penalty which, according to the law in England, can be inflicted for such an offence is six months' imprisonment; whether Comerford has now been in gaol for double that period; and whether he will, under the circumstances, bring this case under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the facts appeared to be substantially stated in the Question. The assaults were, however, of a most serious character. They were five in number, and spread over two different periods of one day, the prisoner on the first occasion having effected his escape, on which occasion he seized the baton of a policeman, and with that weapon attacked the police, striking three of them on the head, and wounding one of them so seriously that he was unfit for duty. The prisoner was of previous bad character, there being 20 previous convictions recorded against him. The Lords Justices had had this case fully under review, and had decided that the law must take its course.

WAR OFFICE — THE FIRST ARMY CORPS — THE HORSES OF THE CAVALRY REGIMENTS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether 20 horses have been taken from all Cavalry Regiments in the First Army Corps in order to make up the number required for the Ammunition Column; and, if so, how the deficiency will be made up?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No Cavalry regiment has had its horses reduced in order to provide horses for the Ammunition Column. It is true that six Cavalry regiments which, in 1886-7, had 400 horses, have, in the present Estimates, only 380. The Cavalry, however, does not lose these 120 horses, as 80 of them have been added to the establishment of a seventh regiment, and 40 to that of the Cavalry Depot, Canterbury.

Mr M^cCartan

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— FRANCIS COOK, DRUMSNA.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any steps will be taken by the police to prosecute Francis Cook for riotous conduct at Drumsna on the 2nd of March, and for presenting a revolver at Mr. Veich Simpson and a number of persons drawn together by Francis Cook's riotous conduct; Whether this Francis Cook is the same man who some time ago was arrested for shooting a child in Mohill; and, whether an inquiry will be ordered into the conduct of the police in not prosecuting Cook for disturbing the public peace?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, at the trial of the case the witnesses produced by Mr. Veich Simpson charged Cook neither with presenting a revolver at him or at anybody else. The police stated that no disturbance took place on the occasion referred to, and the sergeant at Drumsna said he did everything to facilitate the prosecution. It was the same Francis Cook who, five years ago, was arrested for shooting at a child in Mohill. He was not put on his trial at the ensuing Assizes, as the Grand Jury ignored the Bill sent up against him. The Irish Government did not consider it necessary to interfere further in the matter, as they considered that the constabulary had done their duty in the matter.

MR. O'KELLY asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was aware that the Judge before whom this case was brought stated that the man had produced a revolver, but he was not sure that he pointed it at this particular man; but he was sure that he had produced it and presented it at the crowd.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had answered the Question put before him—whether he was charged with presenting a revolver at Mr. Veich Simpson?

THE MARRIAGE LAWS—THE RECTOR OF MUCH WOOLTON, LIVERPOOL.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that there is being circulated by the authority of the Rector of Much Woolton, Liverpool, the following statement:—

"Marriages. All persons residing in the parish of Much Woolton must be married at the parish church, unless one of the parties to be married has been residing for 15 days prior to the granting of the licence or the publication of the banns in the parish or district belonging to the church in which they wish to be married. When one (or both) of the parties to be married is (or are) residing in this parish, unless the marriage be by licence, the banns must be published on three successive Sundays in this church; and when the parties reside in different parishes the banns must be published in both churches. Note.—persons infringing the Marriage Laws are liable to heavy penalties."

whether there are in the parish Non-conformist places of worship, as well as a Registrar's Office, at which marriages may be legally performed; and whether steps will be taken to prevent the continued circulation of the above quoted statement?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State has received a letter from the Rector of the parish, who has explained to him that the statement circulated by him, and quoted in the Question, was intended to give information as to the marriage law to members of the Church of England only. The Circular is only issued to members of the Church of England, and by the parochial visitors of the church. In order, however, to prevent any misunderstanding in the future, the Rector informs the Secretary of State that he will in re-printing the Circular so modify its opening words as to make it perfectly clear to everybody what is meant, and to what class of persons the statement applies. There are in the parish Non-conformist places of worship, as well as a Registrar's Office.

BRITISH GUIANA—ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CROSSLEY (York, W.R., Sowerby) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Court of Policy of British Guiana has passed an Ordinance for the establishment of a town at Bartika; whether it provides that one-third of the sums received for the lands formerly held at the pleasure of the Crown by the Bishop of Guiana shall be paid to the Bishop and his successors absolutely, for ecclesiastical purposes; whether the effect of this will be to convert a grant to the Church Missionary Society, held at the pleasure of the Crown, into a permanent endowment of the Bishopric; whether the Ordinance has been transmitted for the approval of the Crown; whether the Governor has also forwarded a Petition from the Congregational Union of British Guiana opposing such Ordinances; and whether he will advise a modification of the Ordinance, to meet the objection of the unendowed Religious Bodies in the Colony?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I have received no official information from the Governor on the subject; but it appears from the Colonial newspapers that such an Ordinance has been passed by the Colonial Legislature, and that it contains practically the provision mentioned in the second part of the Question. The Ordinance has not yet been transmitted for the approval of the Crown. I am not prepared, therefore, to express an opinion as to the effect of that provision, or to consider whether I will advise a modification of the Ordinance until I have received the Ordinance itself, and the Report from the Governor and Attorney General upon it. The Petition referred to in the fifth part of the Question has not been forwarded to me.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—

"KEVIL v. KING-HARMAN."

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Has his attention been called to the decision of the Queen's Bench in the case of "Kevil v. King-Harman," on 9th May, in which Thomas Kevil, who had been summoned by Colonel King-Harman for cutting turf on his own holding and fined therefore by the Boyle Bench, although a question of title was raised at Petty Sessions by his solicitor, Mr. M'Morrow, obtained a quashing of the conviction on certiorari; is it the fact that Kevil, in his affidavit, swore, in reference to Mr. Charles Webb, J.P., the agent of Colonel King-Harman, when his solicitor filed an affidavit that he applied for a conditional order by Kevil's authority, as follows:—

"Beirne (Colonel King-Harman's bailiff came to me in Boyle, and informed me that said Charles Webb required me to attend in the estate office. I thereupon went to said office. Said Charles Webb said to me, 'We have been served with an order from the Queen's Bench; we have only a few days to send in a return; and what I want you to do is to make an affidavit that you did not instruct Mr. M'Morrow for this Law.' I replied, I would do no such thing, and immediately left the office; " that a further affidavit was made by Mr. M'Morrow, that he had asked Mr. Webb, J.P., by letter, if this were true, and it was not denied in the answer sent, nor in the counter affidavits filed on Colonel King-Harman's behalf; and will the Government call the Lord Chancellor's attention to this sworn allegation against a magistrate, that he had endeavoured to tamper with a client of a solicitor?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, that perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow him to answer the Question. He was informed the statements in the first, second, and third paragraphs of the Question were substantially correct. He was also informed, with respect to the subject of the second paragraph of the Question, that Kevil informed the estate surveyor that he did not want law, and that he did not instruct his solicitor, whereupon he was naturally asked to verify this statement by affidavit. This Kevil declined to do. Under these circumstances, there was no intention of calling the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say if it was true that this man Kevil had filed an affidavit swearing as was set forth in the Question? He wished also to ask whether that sworn statement remained uncontradicted by this magistrate, who was the agent of Colonel King-Harman?

MR. HOLMES said, he had answered the Question already.

MR. T. M. HEALY gave Notice that on the Estimates he would call attention to this attempt on the part of an official Member of the Government to put pressure upon a tenant to make a statement in order to make it appear that his solicitor was a perjurer.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT— GRANARD GUARDIANS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Mr. T. M. Healy

Lieutenant of Ireland, Has the attention of the Local Government Board been drawn to the Resolution of the Granard Guardians protesting against the delay in making a Provisional Order for the scheme of labourers' cottages in that Union, inquired into by the Local Government Board Inspector nearly six months ago; and will attention now be given to the matter, as the summer is the best time for building?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the Local Government Board had received the Resolution referred to, and the delay was owing to the extent of the scheme, and to the fact that further local inquiry was necessitated as a question of a change of site arose, and a Supplementary Report was required from the Inspector.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— QUARTER AND LAND SESSIONS AT GRANARD.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the cause of the delay in replying to the Memorial sent three months since to the Lord Lieutenant from Granard, County Longford, asking that the Quarter and Land Sessions should be held in that town; and, what determination have the Government come to?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, that before this Memorial could be considered some preliminary steps were necessary. These were duly carried out, and the matter was laid before the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and the decision of the Privy Council, to which it was referred, had not been come to.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could say when it would come to a decision on the matter?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the meeting of the Privy Council was to be fixed by the Lord Chancellor, and he had not yet fixed it.

POST OFFICE CONTRACTS (IRELAND)— MAIL BETWEEN BUNDORAN AND BUNDORAN JUNCTION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) (for Mr. MAC NEILL) (Donegal,

S.) asked the Postmaster General, If he would have any objection to state the terms of the contract, and the amount paid, for the conveyance of the mails by car between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction (or Ballinamallard); and, whether the Post Office Authorities consider the present arrangements adequate or satisfactory?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The mail car in question works in connection with the night mail between Omagh and Enniskillen. It conveys the correspondence for 10 sub-post offices, and the districts dependent thereon. It runs at the rate of seven miles an hour, and the present payment is £320 a-year. The contractor has, however, given notice terminating the contract, and the new tenders are at the present time under consideration. The present arrangements are the best of which the circumstances admit.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—VACANT BUILDING LAND IN VICTORIA STREET, WESTMINSTER.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is a fact that the valuable site of building land in Victoria Street, belonging to the United Westminster and the Grey Coat Schools, has been for years occupied simply by hoardings with advertisements; whether it is true that several applications have been made for the site for building purposes; and, whether he can say what rent the Charity receives for the hoardings, and at what amount they are assessed for local and Imperial taxation?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): I have no information upon the points raised in my hon. Friend's Question; but I would suggest to him the advantage of addressing himself to the Governors of the Institutions named, several of whom are Members of this House.

INLAND REVENUE—PENSIONS IN THE SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, owing to changes in the Secretary's Department of the Inland Revenue, nine clerks are to be placed on ^{new} ^{reduced} ¹⁸⁸⁷ ¹⁸⁸³, the majority of whom have less than 40 years' service; whether they, or any of them, are to receive pensions based on full 40 years' service; whether also a new class of clerks, with salaries from £725 to £800 a-year, has been arranged, in addition to the existing class of principal clerks, whose salaries range from £600 to £700; whether the Treasury Authorities have satisfied themselves that the Service could not be more economically provided for; and, why such large establishment changes are being carried out in anticipation of the inquiry by the Royal Commission now sitting?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The Treasury have recently sanctioned a re-organization of the Secretary's Department of the Inland Revenue on the basis of seven hours' work a-day instead of six. The principle which underlies the change is that the duties of the Department are in future to be discharged by fewer men with harder work and better pay, but at a reduced total cost to the State. I am glad to think that, acting on my suggestion, the Inland Revenue Department have been able to introduce a reform which will set an example that I hope may be followed with great advantage in other branches of that and other Offices. The staff of clerks has been reduced by nine, and consequently nine clerks retire. One of these has already earned his full pension, the other eight will receive the customary abolition terms, their vacancies not being filled. Five of them will receive pensions based on 40 years' service. Of these five one will have actually served 42 years, one 39½ years, and the remaining three upwards of 30 years. A new class of Committee clerks, at the scale of salary named in the Question, forms a part of the scheme. The salaries involved in the new organization include duty pay, or, as it has been defined, special extra rates of payment attached to superior duties and work of a special character. This system, which has not been found to work well, will be entirely abolished under the present scheme. The Treasury is satisfied with the economies to be effected under this scheme. The new effective staff of the Office will cost less than the old effective staff by £4,300. The immediate saving, after deducting the whole of the pensions of the retiring clerks, is £460; but if we deduct, as it is more correct to do, only that portion of them which is not already earned, the saving amounts to £3,300. In view of the greatness of the saving, and the obviously desirable character of the reform in all respects, I have not thought it well to postpone its introduction pending the Report of the Royal Commission.

IRELAND—LAND COMMISSION COURT
—JOHN SMITH, OF CURREMBLA, CO.
SLIGO.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that John Smith, of Currembra, County Sligo, tenant of Mr. Arthur Ormsby, Glen Lodge, County Sligo, applied to the Land Commission Court, on the 14th of November, 1885, to have a fair rent fixed for his farm, and, on the 31st of January, 1887, when the case was heard, a reduction was made from £70 9s., old rent, to £40, judicial rent; whether the said Mr. Ormsby, since the service of the originating notice for the fixing of a fair rent, has levied three separate distresses on this tenant; whether the last distraint was made on the 13th of May, with £3 costs, without any previous notice or demand for payment of rent; whether this last distraint for the old rent was for the gale falling due on the 1st of May last, thereby (as there is allowed in this case no running gale) distraining without notice, and with costs, for rent falling due only 12 days previously; whether the Parliamentary Secretary will take steps to prevent a repetition of such like distrains by withholding the services of the constabulary; and, whether the following (publicly posted) is a true copy of the "distraining notice":—

"Copy of distraining notice.

"To John Smith, and to whom it may concern.

"Take notice, that I, John Gillespie, of Carramore, in the County of Mayo, have this day, as bailiff to, and upon the authority of, Arthur Ormsby, esquire, of Glen Lodge, in the County of Sligo, distrained on the lands of Currembra, North County of Sligo, which you hold as tenant to the said Arthur Ormsby, the several cattle, goods, and chattels found upon the said lands for the sum of £35 4s. 6d., being rent due for the said lands and premises to the 1st May, 1887, as particulars at foot hereof, and that unless you pay the said rent and arrears, with all legal costs and charges, within 14 days from the date hereof, the said cattle, goods, and chattels will be sold according to Law. Dated this 13th day of May, 1887.

"Half-year's rent to the 1st May, 1887, £35 4s. 6d.

"Signed for above, 29 sheep, 12 lambs, John Gillespie?"

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the Land Commissioners stated that the application to fix a fair rent in this case was made in the end of December, 1885, and the case was heard in January, 1887. The old rent was £70 9s., and it was reduced to £45. An appeal was lodged by the landlord, which was still pending. The policy of the Government in affording protection to Sheriffs and their officers in the execution of processes of Courts of Law had been already fully explained. The Government had no knowledge as to the distrains.

MR. P. M'DONALD said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not answered the paragraph inquiring whether the levies were put in only 12 days after the rent fell due?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had no information as to that.

METROPOLITAN POLICE — EXTRA DUTY OF THE "A" DIVISION.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether on Monday, 9th May, the constables of the "A" Division, who had been on duty all night from 9.45 p.m. on Sunday till 6.15 a.m. on Monday, were compelled to attend parade at Buckingham Palace for two hours on Monday afternoon, when the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London presented an address to Her Majesty the Queen, and that the same men had to go on night duty again at 9.45 p.m. on Monday; whether, on Friday, 13th May, the night duty men of the same Division had to turn out during the day for an hour's drill at Wellington Barracks; that they went on duty again at 9.45 p.m. on Friday, to 6.15 a.m. on Saturday; that they had to parade again in another suit of clothes at 12 midday, march to the line of route on the occasion of Her Majesty the Queen's visit to the East End of London; and that they were again on duty for eight hours, on Saturday night, from 9.45 p.m. on Saturday; what marked on the original document: "marked on the original document" and "JUN 1 1887".

Mr. Goschen

Regulations for the Police Force as to extra hours of duty and extra pay for such duty; and, whether, in view of the health of the men and the necessity for night duty being efficiently carried out in the Metropolis, he will recommend any alterations in the Regulations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State is informed that the statement as to duty done by the police in question is substantially correct, at least so far as a portion of the night duty men are concerned. The extra duty on the 9th and 14th was on exceptional occasions; and on such occasions extra duty must necessarily be undergone, and, as the Secretary of State believes, always has been undergone by members of the Metropolitan Police Force without any complaint. The drill of Friday, May 13, was fixed entirely to suit the comfort and convenience of the men. There are no Regulations as to extra pay for extra duty. Constables are liable to be called upon for duty at any time; but if a constable gets extra duty one day he is compensated by getting less duty another day. The Secretary of State has no reason to believe that the health of the men is impaired, or that the night duty is inefficiently carried out.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE IN IRELAND—TRANSFER OF CLERKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Walter Hare, a supernumerary clerk in the Land Judges' Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, has been appointed a junior clerk in the Chancery Division of the said High Court, without passing the competitive examination prescribed for such clerks in the Irish Judicature Act of 1877; whether the attention of the Treasury has been directed to the appointment by nomination of clerks in those Divisions of the High Court, where the patronage reserved to the Judges by said Act has not yet lapsed, and the subsequent transfer of these clerks, as vacancies occur, to the Divisions of the High Court where such patronage has lapsed, in connection with the provisions of the 73rd section of the Irish Judicature Act of 1877; and, why the course adopted in 1883 and 1885, in filling up vacancies in the Chancery Division, was not followed in the present case?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: I understand that the question of the validity of the transfer of a clerk from one Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland to fill a vacancy in another Division has been submitted for the opinion of the Irish Law Officers, who have advised that the requirement as to open competition relates only to the appointment of a person for the first time to an office in Court, and does not exclude promotion among the existing offices.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether the Treasury Authorities had considered whether this system was not practically an evasion of the Judicature Act; and why the course adopted in 1883 and 1885 on a similar occasion had been departed from on the present occasion?

MR. JACKSON said, the Treasury had no power in the matter. The appointment did not rest with them, and the legal validity of it had been decided by the Law Officers.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR gave Notice that he would call attention to this subject on the Vote for Law Charges in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, was it the view of the Treasury that when a clerk was appointed temporarily he could then be transferred afterwards over the heads of the others without passing any competitive examination? He wished to know if the English Law Officers had been consulted on the subject, and if they concurred with their Irish brethren?

MR. JACKSON said, he was not aware that the question had arisen.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is the question.

MR. JACKSON said, this related to the appointment of a special person over whom they had no control. If the hon. and learned Member put a Question on the Paper he would be very glad to answer it.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—LOSS OF THE S.S. "CARMONA."

MR. EDWARDS-MOSS (Lancashire, S.W., Widnes) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the S.S. Carmona, 3,714 tons gross register, a vessel built especially for cotton, and classed 100 A 1 at Lloyd's, which sailed from Barrow on February 23rd last, with a cargo of pig iron for America, and has lately been posted at Lloyd's as missing; and, whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to institute a full inquiry into the loss of this vessel?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Board of Trade have ordered a formal inquiry to be held into the case of the steamship Carmona, which is reported as missing. I may add that a letter has been received from the owners stating that it is not the fact that the Carmona was a vessel built especially for cotton.

POST OFFICE—RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH CLERKS—COMPENSATION.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has yet settled the amount of compensation to be paid to the railway and telegraph clerks who have been deprived of their commission on the sale of stamps?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to be able to state that the terms of compensation have been settled with several Railway Companies, and are in progress with the others.

NORTH BORNEO—OPERATIONS AGAINST THE NATIVES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attack by the Governors of British North Borneo on the natives of Darvel Bay, in June last, was reported by the authorities of the North Borneo Company to the Secretary of State, and was approved by him, especially the burning of villages, and destruction of paddy, &c.; whether the authorities of the North Borneo Company have power to requisition Her Majesty's Navy to assist them in wars in which they may engage without the previous consent of Her Majesty's Government; and, whether there is any systematic control over the Political and Military operations of the North Borneo and Royal Niger Companies, such as was exercised by the Board of Control over the East India Company?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The proceedings of the British North Borneo Company authorities in Darvel Bay last June were reported to Her Majesty's Government and approved by them, but not "especially the burning of villages and destruction of paddy, &c." I presume that the etcetera refers to the arms and war canoes. A Report of the proceedings was presented to Parliament and printed on April 29. Her Majesty's naval officers are directed to give aid to the Company in cases of emergency without referring to the Admiralty for orders. On the occasion in question prompt action was considered to be justified. The circumstances were that—

"A lawless tribe, several thousands in number, notorious for their acts of kidnapping, piracy, and slave-dealing, attacked a settlement of the British North Borneo Company, which they kept in a state of siege and terror. They refused to parley, and proceeded to attack Her Majesty's ships. Commander Hope's prompt action will probably result in the cessation of piracy and kidnapping in those waters."

There is a systematic control over the political and military operations of the North Borneo and Royal Niger Companies; but these are not yet of such dimensions as to require a separate Department of Her Majesty's Government.

ADMIRALTY—SPECIAL NAVAL PENSION TO WIDOW OF STAFF COMMANDER W. M. SAVAGE.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will state why the Special Naval Pension of £140 per annum is not awarded to Mrs. Savage, the widow of Staff Commander W. M. Savage, instead of the ordinary pension of £80 per annum; whether this officer, although serving under the Board of Trade at the time of his death, had not, before consenting to take the appointment, stipulated for and obtained official sanction, that such service should be considered as "Full Naval Service," counting towards increase of full pay, half-pay, and retirement; whether the Admiralty requested the Treasury, on 14th December, 1882, also to sanction such arrangement, and whether the Treasury granted such request by Treasury Letter of 8th January, 1883; and, if the non-award to Mrs. Savage of the Special Naval Pension of £140 a-year will be reconsidered?

Mr. Edwards-Moss

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): A widow is only entitled to a special pension upon proof that her husband's death was directly attributable to extraordinary exposure or exertion on service. The circumstances attending Staff Commander Savage's death do not come within that category. I cannot re-open the question.

CURRENCY—THE SILVER COINAGE.

MR. E. HARDCASTLE (Salford, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of Exchequer, Whether his attention has been drawn to the great inconvenience arising from the insufficient supply of small silver coin now in circulation; and, whether he will take into consideration the practicability of largely increasing the issue of shillings and sixpences, instead of adding to the already excessive supply of large coins, especially florins, by the issue of double florin pieces?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The issue of shillings and sixpences can be largely increased at once if the public will but ask for them of their bankers. Employers of labour, tradesmen, and other persons constantly requiring change can at once get what they want, and will assist their customers by insisting on having as many shillings and sixpences as they require. The additional trouble of counting the smaller coins and of sorting appears to have acted as a deterrent to the free issue of shillings and sixpences; but there is no reason why it should be so. Silver coin is not issued by the Mint direct to the public, but is passed into circulation in England and Wales through banks. Every country banker has a banker who is his agent in London, and every London banker has an account at the Bank of England. If in any district there is a deficiency of silver coin, the bankers of the district are the first to find it out. They write to their London agents, who obtain what silver coin is required from the Bank of England, and send it to the country bankers. If there is a deficiency in London, the London bankers can, of course, make direct application to the Bank of England for the amounts they themselves require. When the stock in the Bank of England becomes diminished, it makes application to the Mint, and supplies of coin of any denomination can be obtained. At the present moment there is a good supply of both shillings and sixpences awaiting issue, and perfectly ready to perform their duty. The following are the amounts of each coin held by the Mint and the Bank of England respectively:—Shillings.—In the Mint, £34,413 worth; in the Bank of England, £264,600 worth; total, £299,013 worth. Sixpences.—In the Mint, £31,004 worth; in the Bank of England, £10,900 worth; total, £41,904 worth. So that there are shillings of the value of nearly £300,000, or 6,000,000 pieces, and sixpences of the value of £42,000, or 1,680,000 pieces, ready for immediate issue. The existence of this large stock at the Bank of England is due to a part of these coins in circulation having been returned. It would seem, from the above figures, that the public should have no difficulty in obtaining as much coin of each denomination as they may require. It may be, however, that the practice of bankers not to sort the silver coin which they receive, but to pay it out again in bags containing certain amounts without reference to the denominations of the individual coins, may be an inconvenience to the public, who may, in this way, not receive the amounts of shillings and sixpences which they require. The remedy for this evil is, of course, in the hands of the public themselves, who should call upon their bankers to give them precisely the coins which they require; but communications will be at once made to the Chairman of the Committee of London Bankers, and to the President of the Country Bankers' Association, asking them to co-operate in meeting the legitimate wants of bank customers. With regard to the action of the Government, it is unnecessary to point out that in the case of a token coinage, like that of silver in this country, on the issue of which the State makes a large profit, and which cannot be used for payments of more than 40s., it is the imperative duty of the Government not to permit issues to be made in excess of the bond fide requirements of the public, lest the coins should become depreciated. It is obviously prudent, therefore, that silver coin should only be issued through bankers, who are best able to judge what those requirements really are.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) inquired whether there was not an immense number of foreign silver pieces in circulation in the country?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not think it was true that there was an immense number of foreign coins in circulation; but he had heard of the appearance of certain false coins, though not to any great extent. Of course, it was a matter that required to be carefully watched.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CONVICTIONS FOR ASSAULT.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Constables John Goold and William Crawford, Hospital, County Limerick, and John Barry, Elton, same County, were convicted, on 16th April last, at Limerick Quarter Sessions, by a jury, of an assault on three members of the Kiltelly fife and drum band; whether the jury awarded the plaintiffs £10 damages against the constables; whether these men are still in the force; and, whether the Constabulary authorities have inflicted any punishment on them for their violation of the law; and, if not, what course do Government intend to take in the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the facts were substantially stated in the Question. These men were still in the Constabulary. Bills would be presented against them at the forthcoming Assizes. No action had been taken by the Constabulary authorities, as the matter was still sub judice.

CIVIL SERVICE—THE LOWER DIVISION—EXAMINATIONS IN DUBLIN.

MR. TUTE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the examinations for Men Clerkships, Lower Division, Civil Service, usually held in Dublin during the current month, have been postponed; and, whether, having regard to the inconvenience and loss which the delay will inflict upon candidates, an early date will be fixed for the examinations?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): The examinations for Lower Division Clerkships at other centres as well as Dublin were postponed owing to the small number of the probable vacancies as compared with the number of clerks waiting for employment. I am sorry for the inconvenience caused to intending candidates; but it is obvious that the time for holding examinations can be determined only by the requirements of the Service.

MR. TUTE asked, if the hon. Gentleman could give the probable date of the next examination?

MR. JACKSON said, he did not like to fix the date, for the very obvious reason that that date must be determined very largely by the number of vacancies. But, without pledging himself, he thought he might be justified in stating that it was intended in the ordinary course to hold one about August.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE RECENT DISTURBANCES AT EXETER TRAINING COLLEGE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, What was the result of the inquiry instituted by the Education Department, through Her Majesty's Inspector of Training Colleges, into the disturbances which lately took place at Exeter College; whether it appeared that the complaints of the second year students respecting the instruction in mathematics were well founded; whether the Principal was justified in rustivating two students; and, whether any subsistence allowance has been made to these students during their enforced absence from the College?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): Apart altogether from the question of the capacity of a mathematical lecturer, there is no doubt that gross acts of insubordination were committed by students of the College. The Principal, in my opinion, was justified in rustivating two students, who have, so far as I can judge, no claim to a subsistence allowance. The Inspector, after holding his inquiry, has suggested a re-arrangement in regard to the lecturers at the College, and we have written in support of the suggestion to the authorities.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DENIS LYNCH, AN "EMERGENCY MAN."

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any affidavits to sustain the allegation that an emergency man named Denis Lynch, engaged at the eviction of a tenant named Barrett, at Monkstown, County Cork, while under the influence of drink, presented a revolver at a number of women in Barrett's house, though no resistance was being offered to the eviction; and, if so, what steps the Executive will order in the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, that no such affidavits had been received by the Irish Government.

MR. HOOPER asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not received that evening four or five affidavits addressed by himself to the Chief Secretary for Ireland?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was sorry to say he had not. He saw a note addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland just now, and possibly it contained these affidavits. But perhaps he might be permitted to add that if these affidavits were made or forwarded it hardly made much difference; because in a matter of this kind the proper course for aggrieved persons to adopt was to make informations, and proceed by summons or warrants.

MR. HOOPER: Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman state that the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be in his place and answer the Question?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I cannot say that.

MADAGASCAR—CAPTURE OF NATIVES BY THE FRENCH AND TRANSPORT TO REUNION.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has reached him that, as stated in public newspapers, Natives are captured and shipped from the port which the French hold on the Western Coast of Madagascar to a French Colony on the Island of Réunion; and, if not, whether he will make inquiry as to the truth of the statement; and, in case the report is true, will Her Majesty's Government make representations against such re-opening of the Slave Trade?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I stated about three months ago that grave abuses of the sort had occurred. The forced shipment of Natives did not, however, take place from a port in French occupation. As I then informed the House, energetic measures had been taken by the British and French Authorities; a British man-of-war has since visited the port in question, and it is believed that a stop has been put to the practice.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1886—EVICTION OF ALEXANDER TAYLOR, CO. ELGIN.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government are aware that Alexander Taylor is about to be evicted, at Whitsuntide, from his croft and house, at Lake of Moy, in the County of Elgin, the land having been enclosed, and the house built, by and at the expense of the father-in-law of Taylor 50 years ago; that Taylor has occupied the croft for several years, and has fulfilled all the conditions required by "The Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886;" whether, having regard to the fact that such an eviction could not take place in the adjoining County of Inverness by reason of the provisions of the Crofters Holdings Act, the Government will endeavour to prevent the threatened eviction being carried out on the 25th May, by means similar to those recently used in Ireland by Sir Redvers Buller; and, whether the Government will consider the expediency of extending the Crofters' Holdings Act to the crofters and cottars in the Counties of Elgin and Nairn.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute) (who replied) said: The Lord Advocate has been informed that Alexander Taylor is removing from the Lake of Moy at Whitsun Day on an arrangement by which he receives a gratuity, and he is to occupy other premises on the same property. The Government have no intention of interfering in the matter, and are not prepared to make any proposal to extend the Crofters' Holdings Act to any other parts of Scotland. The matter was debated when the Crofters' Act was before the House last year, and an Amendment to that effect was negatived.

"THE BOARD OF TRADE JOURNAL"— CONTRACT FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, What precedents exist for the insertion of advertisements in Government periodical newspapers; whether he is aware that advertisements were at one time inserted in The Postal Guide, but were withdrawn after representations were made by the trade; whether the Treasury was consulted, and gave its authority for the insertion of advertisements in The Board of Trade Journal; and, whether the contract for advertisements in The Board of Trade Journal, made by the Stationery Office, was put up to tender or competition; and, if not, on whose authority was the contract given to the present holders?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Advertisements appear in the Army and Navy Lists and the Customs Bill of Entry. The Board of Trade have no information as to the statements contained in the Question with regard to The Postal Guide. The contract for advertisements in The Board of Trade Journal was not put up to tender; but was, as is usual, made by the Stationery Office, with the authority of the Treasury, and, in this case, with the concurrence of the Board of Trade.

ARMY — AUXILIARY FORCES — THE VOLUNTEER CORPS — THE NEW REGULATIONS AS TO SHOOTING.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough) asked the Secretary of State for War, What will be the position of those Volunteer Corps which have commenced their musketry course on the old system, in consequence of the delay in the issue of the New Regulations?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): For the present year Volunteers will shoot under three different conditions. First, individual Volunteers who have completed their musketry course under the old Regulations will be classified for efficiency according to those Regulations; secondly, individual Volunteers who have commenced, but not finished, their course under the old Regulations may complete their course and be classified for efficiency according to either the old or new standard, at the discretion of the Commanding Officer; thirdly, individual Volunteers who had not commenced their practice before the issue of the New Regulations must carry out their musketry course according to the New Regulations. The full grant of 35s. will be given to men who qualify in any of the above ways.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—DUTY AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, How many hours constitute a day's work for constables; will he recommend that each man engaged in and about the House of Commons be paid for any overtime; and, whether he will say the reason given by Sir Charles Warren for refusing to pay for overtime (with one exception) for the last six months?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The hon. Member seems to be under an entire misapprehension as to the position and duties of a police constable. Like a soldier or a sailor, a police constable is at all times liable to duty. The Commissioner tries to arrange the duties of his force in such a way that no man shall, as a rule, have more than eight hours' continuous work. The Secretary of State has nothing to add to his reply of Friday, except that all the constables at the House of Commons have now been asked if they would prefer to be paid as other constables are, and receive refreshment allowance for overtime, and each man prefers the present arrangement.

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)—FISHERMEN'S COTTAGES ON THE EAST COAST.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Secretary for Scotland has yet considered the subject of dealing with the present unsatisfactory tenure and other conditions of fishermen's houses on the East Coast of Scotland; and, if so, how the Government propose to deal with the subject?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute) (who replied) said, that the matter was at present under consideration; and it was not yet settled whether the question could be dealt with by the Government, and, if so, in what manner it could be dealt with to the best advantage.

NORTH BORNEO—OPERATIONS AGAINST THE NATIVES — H.M.S.
"ZEPHYR."

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the Return just laid upon the Table relating to the "recent operations of H.M.S. Zephyr against the Natives of North Borneo;" whether the operations referred to have arisen out of a dispute in reference to the collection of edible birds' nests by the Natives, and were taken under the advice of Governor Treacher, the Assistant President of Silam, and two officers of the North Borneo Company; whether it is a fact that an armed party from the Zephyr, "with Governor Treacher at their head," destroyed the boats, burnt the villages, and destroyed the arms and food, having first shelled the Natives out of their houses, and driven men, women, and children into the jungle; whether he has noticed the following passage in the Report of the Commander of the Zephyr :—

"I trust my action in this matter will meet with your approval and that of the Commander-in-Chief;"

and, whether Her Majesty's Government has expressed approval of such action?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): I am acquainted with the contents of the letter in question, from which the hon. Gentleman correctly quotes certain extracts. He has omitted to notice that the Report in question concludes as follows :—

"From what I heard at Silam, I certainly consider that any delay would have caused much loss of life, while at present the loss on our side is nil, and I imagine the pirates are more frightened than hurt."

The Government approve Commander Hope's action.

BURMAH—LICENSING AND REGULATION OF IMMORALITY.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that arrangements are made in Burmah, with a view of protecting the health of soldiers, by which prostitution is regulated; if he would inquire whether such regulations may not act as a temptation to vice to young soldiers; and, if he would state by what department such regulations are instituted and maintained?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Full information respecting the arrangements referred to was laid before Parliament in a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Shoreditch. The regulations are instituted and maintained by the Governor General and the Governors in Council under the authority of the Indian Law. The Secretary of State has no reason to believe that the regulations are such as to act as a temptation to vice; but, out of regard to the wishes of the hon. Member, he has referred the question to the Government of India for report.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—RICHMOND DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Under what authority the Governors or Resident Medical Superintendent of the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum refuse to admit into that Institution poor persons properly certified as insane unless certified as dangerous lunatics by Divisional Magistrates of the City of Dublin; whether he is aware that there are at present in the wards of the North Dublin Union 66 female and 27 male lunatics, for whose proper treatment no arrangements exist within the union, or under the existing state of things can be made; and whether he will direct the Governors of the Richmond Asylum to receive, as far as accommodation will permit, all lunatics properly certified as such, whether violent, or dangerous, or otherwise?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: The practice with regard to Richmond Asylum appears to be to receive all lunatics, so far as accommodation permits, who, in the opinion of the Governors, are properly certified, and suitable cases, whether violent, dangerous, or otherwise. One of the Inspectors of Lunatics reports, with respect to the lunatics in the North Dublin Union, that they are, for the most part, aged and inoffensive persons, who can with due care be satisfactorily treated there, and that when necessity arises they are transferred to the Richmond Asylum.

DR. KENNY asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could say whether the Governors of the Richmond Lunatic Asylum actually refused to receive lunatics from the North Union, though they had been properly certified as lunatics by himself?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN could not say; but he would deal with the Question if the hon. Member put it down.

DR. KENNY gave Notice that, on going into Committee of Supply, he would call attention to the subject.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—DUTIES OF THE POLICE SERVING IN THIS HOUSE.

MR. GENT-DAVIS (Lambeth, Kennington) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is a fact that the police employed in the House of Commons, and doing such long hours, are sent on Sunday to do duty in Hyde Park; whether they do on an average some 16 hours' overtime per week; and, whether Chief Commissioner Warren has any claim whatever upon their services, the men being paid for by the Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: It is a fact that constables employed in the House have occasionally been sent to do duty in Hyde Park, if their services are required there. It is not a fact that they do an average of anything like 16 hours' overtime per week, although, no doubt, the protracted Sittings of the House, and the repeated meetings in the Parks, have of late thrown some extra duty on the police. All police-constables in the Metropolis are directly under the orders of the Commissioner of Police, and are liable to do any duty which he considers requisite.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACTS—GUARDIANS OF THE CARRICKMACROSS UNION.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can explain the delay of the Local Government Board in sending their Inspector to inquire into and report upon the improvement scheme for the erection of labourers' cottages adopted by the Board of Guardians of the Carrickmacross Union; whether he will cause the Local Government Board to attend to this matter without further delay; and, whether he can name the date upon which the inquiry will be held?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, there did not appear to be any unnecessary delay in this case. All the documents in connection with the case were not in the hands of the Local Government Board until the 14th instant. They hoped soon to be able to make arrangements for holding an inquiry, having due regard to the claims of other Boards of Guardians.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had any objection, during the Recess, to look into the question of the delay in making Provisional Orders by the Local Government Board, and ascertain whether that was owing to a want of Inspectors, or to the fact that the legal preliminaries took an unnecessarily long time, in consequence of the fact that there was only one gentleman in charge of the Legal Department?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he would make inquiry into the matter, and pointed out that in this case there was no unnecessary delay, as the necessary Papers were not in the hands of the Local Government Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that what he asked was that there should be an inquiry into the subject generally, because almost every Board of Guardians in Ireland was complaining of the delay.

MR. P. O'BRIEN asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could now say when the inquiry would be held?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he thought it would be held at the end of the month; but he could not absolutely fix the date.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1889.

MR. H. T. DAVENPORT (Staffordshire; Leek) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What are the facilities which this Government are prepared to afford at the coming Paris Exhibition to English exhibitors; and, whether he is aware of the importance which they attach to the appointment by their Government of some person to assist and advise them and to protect their interests?

Colonel King-Harman

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The particular facilities to be afforded will depend chiefly upon the number and the wishes of intending exhibitors from this country; and steps will be taken to ascertain these when the arrangements for the Exhibition proposed to be held in 1889 shall have assumed a formal shape.

ADMIRALTY—SHEERS AT PEMBROKE DOCKYARD.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has yet had time to consider and decide upon the Estimate for erecting sheers at Pembroke, which was officially sent in to the Admiralty on the 31st March; whether, in view of the small sum for which the present obsolete sheers can be replaced by efficient ones, he still intends to run the risk, which must to some extent exist, of sending the Aurora and Nile to another port without their engines; and, whether sending vessels built at one port to be engined and boilered at another causes delay in their completion, and consequent additional expense to the country?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It has been decided not to erect the sheers at Pembroke at present. It is believed that arrangements can be made for putting in the engines and boilers of the Nile at Pembroke, and that it will only be necessary to send the Aurora elsewhere. As a matter of economy, there is no practical difference in the cost as between vessels sent from Pembroke to another yard before they are engined, or retained at Pembroke till the stage of progress is reached at which they could have their engines placed on board.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—INTERFERENCE OF THE POLICE AT DUNGANNON.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, By what right, and under what authority, a party of constables, under the command of a Resident Magistrate named Mayne, broke into the private grounds of Mr. W. Moffett, of Dungannon House, on Thursday 19th instant, and attacked with batons a number of persons assembled therein; if, at the same time, and notwithstanding a proclamation signed by certain magistrates and publicly posted up, which warned people not to assemble in Dungannon on that day, an organized crowd gathered at the Railway Station to receive the Rev. Dr. Kane, a prominent Orangeman, who came from Belfast to address a public meeting at Dungannon, and carried out his intention without interference from the police or magistrates; and, if he will state why the measure of toleration extended to Orangemen in the town of Dungannon was refused to Nationalists, who met in a private place a mile distant?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, he had nothing to add to what the Chief Secretary for Ireland had already said with regard to the prohibition of this meeting at Dungannon. The reason for the interference of the Resident Magistrate was because one of the meetings was being held out-of-doors, on the ground of Mr. Moffett, in defiance of the Proclamation. There was really no attack by batons on the persons assembled, and the meeting was subsequently held in a building without being interfered with. There was no attempt to hold the other meeting outside. It was held in a building, and there addressed by Dr. Kane. Practically, the same course was adopted with regard to both meetings.

MR. M. J. KENNY asked, did the Orangemen not proceed in procession from the railway station to the Town Hall, and why was not that prohibited?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the Question on the Paper had only reference to public meetings, and he had answered it.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was aware that Mr. Moffett had commenced proceedings against the Resident Magistrate for the recovery of £500 for damage done to him on the occasion?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was not aware of it.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) asked, whether it was not a fact that, although they had been informed that Dungannon was to be proclaimed for both parties, the Orangemen were allowed to assemble and walk in procession through the street, while the Nationalists were prevented from doing so?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that both parties had a sort of procession, but one party held their meeting in a building; but the other attempted to hold a meeting in the open, which was prohibited.

SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND)
—TRAWLING IN DONEGAL BAY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) (for Mr. MAC NEILL) (Donegal, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any formal order as to the result of their investigation has been promulgated by the Fishery Commissioners who held inquiries last year in the towns of Donegal and Killybegs, on the question of permitting trawling in Donegal Bay; and, whether he is aware that in consequence of the absence of any authoritative pronouncement on the subject the peace is likely to be endangered, in consequence of disputes between the ordinary fishermen and the trawlers?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: No such order has been issued, as the case of Donegal Bay can only be dealt with in connection with the general question of trawling on the Coast of Ireland, which will be considered when the necessary inquiries have been completed. The Government are not aware that the peace is likely to be endangered.

In reply to Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.),

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was informed that the Fishery Commissioners had not the facilities afforded by the presence of a steamer.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had any information to the effect that, owing to the hostile action of the fishermen against the trawlers, the revenue cutter had been invited to protect the trawlers?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had no information as to that. The only information he had received was that some of the linesmen would oppose by every Constitutional means the course of action of one of the trawling vessels.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked why the Fishery Commissioners had not issued an order announcing their decision on the subject of the inquiry held by them?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had already stated that they did not intend to issue a special order with regard to Donegal Bay until they issued an order with regard to all the bays on the West of Ireland.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—
LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS AND THEIR FAMILIES.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If Regulations have been lately issued by the Irish Board of Lights forbidding lighthouse keepers to retain boats at their stations; and, if so, could he so modify the Regulation as to afford the families of the lighthouse men reasonable opportunities of attending Divine Service, attending school, and calling for medical assistance in cases of emergency?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Commissioners of Irish Lights, some years ago, found that the habit of lighthouse keepers absenting themselves from their station in boats was often the cause of interruption to the service and of danger to the men themselves. They, therefore, decided to prohibit the keeping of boats at lighthouse stations. The matter was again under consideration in 1885, when the Commissioners saw no reason to alter their former decision. To meet cases of emergency, a system has been arranged by which keepers can communicate by signal with the shore.

COLONEL NOLAN asked if there was any provision made to enable them to attend Divine Service and school?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, the only opportunity that could be afforded would be the one which arose when a steamer called at the lighthouse bringing provisions and other necessities. The Commissioners could not alter the Regulations they had made prohibiting boats being constantly at lighthouses for the reasons he had stated.

COLONEL NOLAN: Am I to understand that they are to have no opportunity of attending Divine Service or school?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, these Regulations related to the time when the men were on duty.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—CARRIAGE OF MAILS TO KILMALLOCK.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Postmaster General, Is there a day mail from Bruff and Kilfinnane, two of the most important towns in East Limerick, to Kilmallock; if so, is there a despatch of such mails from Kilmallock to Limerick, the capital of the county; and, if not, could one be despatched; does a day mail to Limerick pass by Bruree Railway Station, which is convenient to Kilmallock; and, has a car owner at Kilmallock proposed to carry the mails to Bruree on reasonable terms; and, if so, will some such arrangement be made, to establish a day mail between Limerick and the above-mentioned towns?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): There are day mails from Bruff and Kilfinnane to Kilmallock. These mails do not at present reach Kilmallock in time for the despatch by the day mail to Limerick, which is sent by way of Charleville. The train which conveys this day mail to Limerick passes Bruree Station, which is about four miles from Kilmallock. No offer for the conveyance of mails from Kilmallock to Bruree Station by car has been received. A later despatch to Limerick might be afforded, which would include the day mail letters from Kilfinnane and Bruff if the bag were sent by car to Bruree to catch the train at that point; but a still better service might be afforded by despatching a bag from Kilmallock by the up day mail train via Limerick Junction, from which point there is now a train to Limerick, reaching Limerick at 4.30 P.M. The question of making this arrangement is under consideration.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—NATIONALIST MEETINGS IN ULSTER.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the meetings lately convened by Protestant Home Rulers at Armagh and Caledon were proclaimed by the Government, after the announcement of counter demonstrations, to be held at the same time and place, by so-called Loyalists; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to proclaim all meetings of Nationalists in Ulster whenever other persons thus threaten to hold counter demonstrations at same time and place, in opposition to the Constitutional rights of peaceable citizens?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: These meetings were prohibited by the local magistrates. The Government have nothing to add to the statement of policy made on their behalf by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary during the debate on the subject on Friday last.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew that the magistrates alleged that any illegality or breach of the peace had been committed prior to the proclamation of these meetings?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he presumed not. He presumed the magistrates acted for the purpose of preventing a breach of the peace.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF TWO CONSTABLES, CO. LIMERICK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) (for Mr. FINUCANE) (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that on the night of the 29th of last March two policemen, who are on protection duty in Limerick in an evicted farm of Major Hares, Chester, entered the house of Mrs. Ryan, of Cloonlusk, Doon, County Limerick, in a state of intoxication, and after abuse of herself and family broke her windows; if Mrs. Ryan and her son followed the policemen to their barrack, and found both so helplessly drunk that she believes they mistook her house for their barrack; if Mrs. Ryan reported the occurrence to District Inspector Dunne, Newpallas; and, if the Constabulary Authorities have ordered an investigation; and, if not, will the Government direct them to do so?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: The only foundation for this Question appeared to be that Mrs. Ryan reported at the police station that about 10 o'clock on that night she heard a knocking at the window, and that a small pane of glass was broken. She got up, and she alleged she saw two policemen at the window, and she subsequently pointed them out in the barracks. She also alleged they were not sober, though she declined to say that they were drunk. Several witnesses declared that these policemen were sober both when they left and returned to their quarters that night. The Inspector General had instituted a further inquiry into the case.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.) asked, whether the witnesses who declared the policemen to be sober were policemen themselves?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: They probably were. I cannot say.

VACCINATION LAWS — ASSAULT ON THE POLICE AT LEICESTER.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Joseph Wright, carpenter, Leicester, and George Butler, labourer, Belgrave, were convicted, on Saturday 14th May, before the Leicester County Magistrates, of throwing, the former a stone, and the latter a rotten egg, at policemen engaged in protecting the auctioneer at the sale of goods belonging to Mr. King, of Mere Road, New Evington, and distrained in enforcement of a fine inflicted for the non-vaccination of a child dead more than a year ago; whether Joseph Wright was fined £10 18s., including costs, and George Butler £3 3s. 6d.; whether the evidence against the accused was given solely by police officers, and was contradicted, in the former case by three and in the latter case by four bystanders; and, whether the Government will consider the advisability of modifying or remitting the sentence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: Wright and Butler were convicted, to the perfect satisfaction of the Justices, of assaulting the police in the execution of their duty. This assault was part of an organized attempt made in the locality to prevent the law from taking its course by threats of violence to the auctioneer and by riotous proceedings at the auction. The Secretary of State sees no reason for interfering with the sentence.

Colonel King-Harman

PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT, 1874—THE REV. J. BELL COX.

MR. HOARE (Norwich) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the Resolutions unanimously passed by both Houses of the Convocation of Canterbury, and also by the House of Laymen, regarding—and, whether, taking into consideration that a clergyman, the Rev. J. Bell Cox, is at present undergoing such imprisonment, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to consider such alteration of the Law as may be necessary to abolish the penalty of imprisonment in the case of “prosecutions concerning Ritual?” The hon. Member, in putting his Question, expressed his pleasure at the altered circumstances brought about by the release of the Rev. J. Bell Cox.

“the inappropriateness of imprisonments as a penalty ensuing on a prosecution concerning Ritual;”

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) also asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been called to the imprisonment for contumacy of the Rev. James Bell Cox, Vicar of St. Margaret's Church, Prince's Road, Liverpool; whether he is aware that the Ritual adopted by Mr. Cox in the services of his church was approved by the large majority of the congregation; and, whether, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of introducing in this House, or in “another place,” a measure to amend “The Public Worship Act, 1874,” and other Acts on the same subject, with a view to restrict the opportunities now existing of instituting prosecutions not supported by a majority of the parishioners or congregations directly affected?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I rejoice, Sir, in common, I think, with everyone, that the circumstances under which this Question is put have been changed by the release of Mr. Bell Cox from prison. The facts, I believe, are generally correctly stated, although I have no official information as to the Resolutions passed either by the Houses of Convocation or the House of Laymen. I regret very much that imprisonment should be inflicted as a penalty under circumstances of this character; but the hon. Gentleman must be aware that legislation affecting the Church is always attended with great difficulties in this House. Therefore, I am not at liberty to enter into any engagements of the kind suggested in the Question.

LONDON CORPORATION (CHARGES OF MALVERSATION).

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will afford facilities for the discussion of the Report of the Select Committee on the Charges against the Corporation of the City of London?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): If the hon. Member will place on the Paper the terms of any Motion he may desire to make on the subject I will consider them, and see if it is possible for the Government to afford him facilities for their discussion; but, as the hon. Member is aware, very much will depend on the progress made with Public Business.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that I shall put upon the Order Book of the House the following Notice:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the conduct of Gabriel Prior Goldney, City Remembrancer; Sir John B. Monckton, knight, Town Clerk; of the members of 'the Special Committee' of the Corporation; and of other members and officials of the City of London, as disclosed in the Report of the Select Committee on London Corporation (Charges of Malversation), is derogatory to the dignity, and deserves the reprobation, of this House."

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT AND THE CHANNEL ISLANDS AND ISLE OF MAN.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is anywhere to be found an authoritative statement of the relation of the British Parliament to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man; particulars of the powers of the British Parliament and the Man Parliament respectively in Man; whether any authority is exercised by the British Parliament in the Channel Islands; whether the Channel Islands are in any sense a dependence of this country; whether the Island authorities claim that England is a dependence of the Channel Islands, representing Old Normandy; whether each is independent of the other; and, generally, the conditions and limitations of Home Rule as exercised in the Channel Islands and Man?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It would be better to refer the hon. Member to the available sources of information; and I am unable to express any opinion with regard to the relations between these Islands and the Imperial Legislature, as that relation appears uncertain. For particulars of the powers of the British Parliament and the Man Parliament respectively, I must refer the hon. Member to the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Isle of Man in 1792 (not numbered), also to Stephen's New Commentaries on the Laws of England, p. 98 of eighth edition of 1880, and to Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 89 of edition of 1857. As regards the Channel Islands, Stephen's Commentaries (p. 100 of same edition) may be consulted, and Blackstone (p. 95, same edition). A Royal Commission was appointed in 1846 to inquire into the Criminal Law in the Channel Islands, and reported fully as to Jersey and Guernsey in 1847. As regards Jersey, questions of civil organization of government are better elucidated by the Report of the later Royal Commission in 1857.

PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—RETURNS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What were the undermentioned sums in connection with "The Purchase of Land Act (Ireland) 1885" up to 30th April, 1887:—Total advance; sum applied for and refused; sum applied for respecting which no decision had been arrived at; sum sanctioned after modification of terms of purchase, with amount of such modification?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The total advance sanctioned is £2,456,525; the total advances issued, £1,093,652; the sum applied for and refused, £358,123; the sum applied for respecting which no decision had been arrived at, £475,265. Of the sums applied for and refused, the amount of £69,045 was subsequently sanctioned, the sum originally applied for having been £82,669. I have only received this information by telegraph.

WALES—ANTI-TITHE LEAGUE.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD (London) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the renewed agitation in Wales against the recovery of tithe rent-charge, and of the violent resistance opposed to officials fulfilling their lawful duty, by bands of men organized and directed by the "Anti-Tithe League," the Government will issue Proclamations in Welsh and English, declaring the illegality of these tumultuous proceedings, and will also direct prosecutions to be instituted against the leaders of this criminal conspiracy?

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Sir, I rise to a point of Order; and wish to ask whether your attention has been directed to the form of this Question? It is a Question about the agitation against tithes in Wales; and I would direct your attention to the latter part of the Question—

"Declaring the illegality of these tumultuous proceedings, and will also direct prosecutions to be instituted against the leaders of this criminal conspiracy."

I wish to know whether the House should keep upon its records a Question which assumes that the agitation which these persons are engaged in is a "criminal conspiracy?"

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that the assumption to which the hon. and learned Gentleman alludes ought not to be made in the Question.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In replying to the Question which has been put to me, I will omit all reference to the character of the agitation. I am very glad to say I am informed that the agitation is subsiding in Wales with regard to the tithe rent-charge, and that people there are beginning to see the necessity of complying with the existing law.

WALES—INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE.

Mr. CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to offer the same measure of assistance to Wales as is given for educational purposes to Scotland and Ireland, by an annual grant of money for intermediate education, including Training Colleges for teachers in the event of a Bill dealing with this subject, and commanding the general support of Welsh Representatives, being submitted to Parliament?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): University Colleges of Wales now receive grants of £12,000 a-year, as against £16,000 paid to the Scotch Universities as Teaching Colleges, and about £5,000 to the Queen's Colleges in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government, while recognizing the importance of this subject, are not prepared, for obvious reasons, to pledge themselves as to the nature and amount of the financial assistance that could be looked for from the State in the event of any Bill being brought forward.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) — ISSUE OF DEFECTIVE WEAPONS — THE RESPONSIBLE OFFICIALS.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, as seven high officials, one of whom is still a member of the Ordnance Committee, and another is the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, have been named by the Secretary of State for War as being between them responsible for the manufacture or issue to almost the whole of the men of Her Majesty's Navy of arms, described by a Special Committee as "absolutely inefficient, untrustworthy, and unfit for service;" and, as Notice has been given of a Motion to give effect to the statement of the Secretary of State for War, by stopping or reducing the pay and pensions of such officials, if, after proper discussion, this House should be of opinion that they have failed in their duty, he will, under these circumstances, arrange that the Votes for such pay and pensions shall, in the Army and Navy Estimates respectively, be taken on an early day, and be brought forward at such a time as to allow of ample discussion, and of a Division being taken upon each of them?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am informed by my right hon. Friend that letters have been written by his direction from the War Office to the Army officials mentioned by him as responsible for the issue of inefficient arms, calling their attention to the Report of the Special Committee, and asking for any observations they may have to offer. No replies have yet been received. The Admiralty deny that their officers are in any way responsible for the defects in strength or material of the weapons alluded to, their responsibility being confined to reporting upon the pattern, so far as its weight, size, and handiness were concerned. The responsibility for the quality of warlike stores has always rested with the manufacturer or issuer of such stores, and not with the user. I understand that my hon. Friend wishes to raise a debate and take a Division upon the subject generally. I shall be very glad to confer with him, and to arrange that an early day shall be fixed for the discussion of an Estimate or Estimates which will give him the opportunity of raising the question which he desires to bring before the House.

THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—RULE 2 (SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE).

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When he intends to move the Resolution relating to Sittings of the House, which is the next in order of the New Procedure Rules?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, the hon. Member must see that in the present state of the Business of the House it was not possible to give any information as to the renewal of the discussion upon the Rules of Procedure.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)—CROFTERS AND COTTARS FISHING BOATS—LOANS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government are aware that the average cost of a suitable fishing boat and nets is about £400; whether, in view of the evidence contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Crofters and Cottars, as to the inability of crofters and cottars to furnish such a sum of money, it is the intention of the Government to continue to impose the conditions stated in the Memorandum of the Secretary for Scotland in January last, by which crofters and cottars, who desire to borrow money from the Fishery Board for the purchase of fishing boats and nets, are compelled to pay down one-third or one-fourth of the cost of fishing boats; and whether any money has yet been lent to crofters and cottars under the Crofters Act; and if the present conditions are found to be prohibitory, will the Government re-consider the matter?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The average cost of a fishing boat and nets suitable for fishermen in crofting parishes is about £350. Of this sum only one-fourth, or about £88, need be found by the fishermen, while the Fishery Board advances the remaining £262. As from six to eight men are required as a crew for boats of this kind, the sum to be provided by each fisherman would not exceed about £12. These terms are more liberal than those recommended by the Royal Commission referred to by the hon. Member. A very large number of applications have been received by the Fishery Board for loans on the present terms; but no money has been actually advanced as yet. As the present conditions have not yet had a fair trial, the Government are not now prepared to reconsider them.

AGRARIAN CRIME (IRELAND).

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to put a Question to Her Majesty's Government, of which I have not been able to give either public or private Notice, and as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is not in his place, perhaps I might ask the kind attention of the Attorney General for Ireland. [At this point Mr. A. J. BALFOUR entered the House from behind the Speaker's Chair.] The Question is simply to this effect. It appears to me that it would be very desirable for the House to be in possession, during the remaining discussion on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, of the latest information in regard to agrarian outrages in Ireland; and I wish to know whether the Government will be so good as to arrange that, as the month of May will have expired before the House meets again, the agrarian offences reported to the Constabulary in May shall be made known to the House when it meets again.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Yes; I shall be very happy to lay the information before the House; but

I can now give the House the satisfactory information that since the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill has been introduced there has been a marked decrease of crime.

EGYPT—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he could now inform the House if the Convention which had been negotiated with the Porte with regard to Egypt had been forwarded, and what were its provisions; and if his right hon. Friend could not inform the House now when he would be in a position to give the House full information with regard to it, and lay a copy of it upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The telegrams received this morning from Constantinople are somewhat confused, and therefore I am unable to give any definite answer as regards the conclusion of the Convention; and, naturally, until we have received positive intelligence I cannot name a time for informing the House of it. But, as I have already told the House, the Government will take the earliest possible opportunity of giving full information on the subject.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—THE NAVAL REVIEW.

In reply to Sir WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, that the Indian troopships which it was proposed to place at the disposal of the Houses of Parliament on the occasion of the Naval Review afforded the best accommodation of any vessels over which the Admiralty had control. Their draught, however, was not such that they could enter Portsmouth Harbour at all states of the tide; but arrangements would be made by which tugs would be in attendance for the accommodation of those who may wish to return early.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—THE BUDGET SUBSIDY.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether any decision had been arrived at as to the local expenditure of the £50,000 in Ireland; and whether the Government would provide for the carrying out of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Public Works in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square), in reply, said, no final decision had been arrived at as to the disposal of the £50,000. The Government intended to act upon the Report of the Royal Commission by beginning the necessary surveys which had to be taken in hand with a view of carrying out the recommendations of the Commission; but they did not pledge themselves to the adoption of the whole of these recommendations. They intended, however, to proceed at once with the survey of important works of arterial drainage.

THE ADMIRALTY—DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON THE CLERICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

In reply to Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, it was the fact that a small Departmental Committee had been appointed to inquire into the clerical establishments of the Admiralty. When he was preparing the Estimates last year, he found that considerable reductions could be made in certain establishments if the Treasury would give the Admiralty a free hand for the purpose of pensioning those who had not sufficient work. Certain correspondence ensued, and a short time ago the approval of the Treasury was obtained, so far as to justify the Admiralty in making inquiry; and it was for the purpose of ascertaining how far reductions could be made that this Committee had been appointed. He did not suppose it would interfere at all with the Report of the Royal Commission.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR inquired, whether the First Lord would lay on the Table a statement showing what, in the opinion of the Admiralty Authorities, would be an adequate allowance for the Admiralty establishment?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It is for that object the Committee was appointed.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND — CHURCH BUILDING IN PITSLIGO, ABER-DEENSHIRE.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) wished to ask the Solicitor General for Scotland a Question of which he had given private Notice. Perhaps the House would allow him to explain that that arose out of a misunderstanding in an answer given to a Question by the Lord Advocate, on account of insufficient information. It was, whether in Pitaligo parish there was not a church to be erected by an old Statute, which was beyond all the requirements of the circumstances, at least double the size required practically for the whole parish; and, whether an assessment of 10 l. 10s. in the pound was levied on the whole parish to erect this unnecessary building?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute): The question of re-building this church has, I understand, been brought before the Court of Session on an appeal by the heritors against the decision of the Presbytery, and the Court affirmed that decision, the law being that a new church must be of sufficient size to accommodate two-thirds of the examinable population of the parish. It is not, therefore, possible for the Government to interfere to prevent this expenditure, which does not, however, fall on the public, but on the heritors.

MR. ESSLEMONT asked, as arising out of the same Question, whether the Government would take any steps in regard to powers such as those which seemed to be quite unnecessary, and not desired by anyone in the parish to remedy the law on the subject?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give Notice of that, which is a somewhat large question.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)
—THE COURT OF APPEAL — THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question regarding the relative positions of the English and Irish Lord Chancellors. He wished to know whether the English Lord Chancellor ever sat in the Court of Appeal? At present the Irish Lord Chancellor, who was an active politician and a Member of the Cabinet, sat in the Irish Court of Appeal and had recently given a judgment with reference to a political question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) said, Irish Lord Chancellors had always sat in the Court of Appeal, and continued to do so. In England, until a comparatively recent time, the Lord Chancellor was in the habit of hearing appeals, sometimes sitting with the Lords Justices, and sometimes alone. The reason he did not do so now was that the duty of presiding in the Appellate Court of the House of Lords was sufficient to occupy his time. He was not aware that there was any difference regarding the judicial duties of the two Lord Chancellors.

MR. T. M. HEALY inquired, whether there was any instance of any previous Lord Chancellor of Ireland sitting in the Court of Appeal, when, at the same time, he was a Member of the Cabinet and an active politician?

MR. HOLMES said, he was not aware that there was any instance, at all events in recent times, of an Irish Lord Chancellor being a Member of the Cabinet; but he presumed the Lord Chancellor, being always a Member of the Government, was also a politician.

MR. T. M. HEALY gave Notice that on the Motion for the adjournment, he would call attention to the position of Lord Ashbourne, and contrast it with the position of Lord Halsbury and other previous Irish Lord Chancellors.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUN HOLIDAYS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it was absolutely necessary they should all be brought down here to-morrow simply to move the adjournment of the House; and whether some convenient arrangement might not be made at the close of to-day's proceedings to move the adjournment over the holidays?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), said, he was in the hands of the House on a question of that character. It had been usual to meet on the day of the adjournment for the purpose of adjourning the House; but if the House thought proper the adjournment should be moved at the close of the evening, he should be exceedingly glad to agree to it.

Subsequently,

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N. asked, at what hour the Government would consent to report Progress with the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland Bill)? If the House was to adjourn this night, it would be impossible to discuss important Motions and Orders which stood upon the Paper, unless the debate in Committee on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill were adjourned at a reasonably early hour.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, that he could not enter into an engagement to adjourn at any particular hour. They ought, he thought, to make considerable progress with the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill that evening. It was not the desire of the Government to take any other contentious matter after the first Order of the Day. If the second clause were passed to-night he would be exceedingly glad to move the adjournment of the House. He wished to point out that he acceded to the demand of the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in the belief that it was in harmony with the views of hon. Members opposite. The suggestion did not come from the Government.

ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES—THE COMMITTEE.

Mr. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked, when the Committee on the Army and Navy Estimates would be nominated?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, the Motion would be made after Progress was reported on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. If the hon. Gentleman could give him any information as to when it would be, then he would be glad to answer him.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE IMPRISONMENT OF FATHER KELLER.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if his attention had been called to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Dublin on Saturday, in which it was decided that the warrant under which

Mr. W. H. Smith

Father Keller was arrested was an illegal warrant, and the rev. gentleman was released; whether Father Keller had suffered two months' imprisonment under this illegal warrant; whether he was aware that this gentleman had been put to an expense of close on £100 in obtaining his release; and whether under all these circumstances, and in view of the charges which had been made in connection with this case, the Government would have an inquiry instituted into the circumstances attending it?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, that the only information which the Irish Government had on the subject was that which they obtained from the newspapers. It was a matter with which the Government had nothing whatever to do. It was not one into which the Government could inquire, as it was a question which had been decided by successive Law Courts in the ordinary course of legal procedure.

Mr. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary, Whether they were to take the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answer as final, that the Government would give no redress, or even inquire into the merits of the case, in which a gentleman had been detained in prison for two months under an illegal warrant, and put to an enormous expense to obtain his release?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, that it would be impossible for the Government to inquire into the merits of the case. It had never been under their consideration at all; and he did not know what further answer the hon. Gentleman thought that this or any other Government could give.

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked, Whether the Government did not send a number of policemen to arrest this gentleman under this warrant; and whether of the four Judges the three permanent Irish Judges declared the warrant to be illegal, and only one Judge—the Irish Lord Chancellor—held the warrant to be valid?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he believed the Court of Queen's Bench had previously declared the warrant to be legal; but they had nothing to do with that. As regarded the police, all the Government did was to send down the police to protect the officers of the Court in the execution of their duty.

MR. DILLON said, that, under these circumstances, he begged to give Notice that at the earliest opportunity he would call attention to the conduct of the Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy in Dublin in this particular case; and if he was not permitted to call attention to the conduct of the Judge, he would call attention to the conduct of the Official Assignees and other officials of that Court.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE IRISH MILITIA.

In reply to Lord CLAUD HAMILTON (Liverpool, West Derby),

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) said, that the issue of Martini-Henry rifles to the Irish Militia would be commenced almost immediately.

THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE, 1886—THE CLOSURE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to put a question to you, Sir, upon a point of Order—namely, whether an hon. Member who in the course of a debate has spoken on the Main Question can move the closure, having regard to the fact that a Member who has spoken on the Main Question cannot move an Amendment? I also wish to know whether entries cannot be made in the Journals of the House, or in the index of Hansard, showing whenever the closure was applied the original amount of time occupied by the House on the Original Motion, and the number of speeches made upon it?

MR. SPEAKER: It is quite competent for an hon. Member to move the closure in the circumstances specified by the hon. and learned Member. With reference to the hon. Member's second question as to a record being kept of the time occupied in discussion before the closure is moved, or of the number of speakers who have had an opportunity of speaking before the closure was applied, I do not think that it would be advisable to accede to the suggestion which the hon. and learned Member made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would like to ask whether the Government, who, I presume, find the funds for the publication of Hansard, will instruct the managers of Hansard to record exactly in future volumes the number of speeches on every question that is closed, and the time occupied in the discussion? It may, I think, form a useful precedent for Members of the Conservative Party to refer to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the hon. and learned Member can hardly be in earnest. I do not feel able to give the hon. and learned Member an answer that would be satisfactory to him.

MOTIONS.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) moved—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider what means shall be adopted for the attendance of this House at the Jubilee Thanksgiving Service in Westminster Abbey on the 21st day of June; and that Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Childers, Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Viscount Lewisham, Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Sir Frederick Mappin, and Mr. Craig Sellar be Members of the said Committee; Five to be the quorum.”

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he had no objection to the names, but asked why there was no representation of the Irish Members?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS) (Kent, St. Augustine's) explained that the hon. Member for South Meath (Mr. Sheil) had requested him not to nominate upon the Committee any Member from the ranks of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. The name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had been withdrawn from the list of the proposed Committee by special request. His name had been withdrawn on the ground that hon. Members below the Gangway opposite did not want to be placed upon the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

JUBILEE SERVICE IN ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I desire to submit a Motion to the House which will, I am sure, command the support of all hon.

Members who were in St. Margaret's Church yesterday. It is—"That the Thanks of this House be given to the Right Reverend William Boyd Carpenter, D.D. Lord Bishop of Ripon, for the Sermon preached by him on Sunday before this House, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and that he be desired to print the same; and, that Mr. William Henry Smith and Mr. Secretary Matthews do acquaint him therewith."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I have great satisfaction in seconding that Resolution, which I believe to be both reasonable in itself and in conformity with the usage of the House on such occasion.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th May.]

[TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

Clause 2 (Extension of summary jurisdiction).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It may be for the convenience of the House if I were to state the views of the Government with reference to the remaining Amendments to be considered by the Committee to this clause. The Government are anxious that their views should be known to the Committee, with the object of advancing Public Business as far as it is possible to do so. Therefore, we have carefully considered the Amendments on the Paper, so far as they involve any question of principle. If hon. Members will look at the Amendments they will see that from the Amendment numbered 60 down to No. 69 all the Amendments upon the Paper refer either to questions which have been already adequately discussed and virtually decided upon Clause 1, or the earlier sections of this clause, or are Amendments which have no very substantial character. In saying this, I have no wish to speak with any disrespect of any hon. Members whose names are attached to them; but I simply draw attention to the fact that the Amendments No. 60 to No. 69, inclusive, involve no principle which has not been dealt with by the House. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] At all events, that is the opinion of the Government, and hon. Gentlemen, as I understood, wished to know the view which the Government take of the questions which are still to be discussed in Committee. The Amendments Nos. 70 and 72 appear to me to refer to questions which deserve some consideration, and if the hon. Members in charge of those Amendments desire that the opinion of the Committee should be taken upon them no objection can be raised. The Amendments from 72 to 84, again, are not of a very serious character. [Cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen, I understand, had no desire to provoke unnecessary opposition on their part, and we desire to give full consideration to every Amendment which raises a question of principle. The Amendment numbered 85, on the other hand, does involve a principle. The right hon. Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) proposes to leave out the words "unlawful assembly," and obviously that is a very proper matter to submit to the consideration of the Committee. There is also another question raised by the hon. Member for South Cork (Dr. Kenny), to leave out that part of the sub-section which relates to "wrongfully take or hold forcible possession of a house or land." The Government propose, at present, to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), No. 105, for the omission of Sub-section 4, which relates to offences under the Whiteboy Acts. We consider that it may be right to specify the offences included in the Whiteboy Acts, which we desire to bring under the operation of this Bill, rather than to include them by a reference to the Whiteboy Acts generally. That is a question which is now under the consideration of the Government, and therefore in withdrawing the sub-section at the present time we reserve to ourselves full right and power to reconsider it on the Report if it should appear desirable to do so; either to include offences in the Whiteboy Acts generally, or, as we wish to be able to do, to specify the particular offences in the Whiteboy Acts which will come under the operation of this Bill. After the Amendment 105, there is nothing of consequence until we come to 110, which is also an Amendment in the name of the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney, and it is obviously a question which may fairly be considered by the Committee. Then the Amendment numbered 112, in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), is also of some importance. But when those Amendments are disposed of there is nothing of importance until we come to 114, in the name of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy), which may, perhaps, receive some consideration. I refer to these Amendments with a view of assisting the Committee to arrive at an early decision on the clause itself. They are the only Amendments which raise any question of principle, and I venture to hope that we can be allowed to get the clause passed this evening after the very long consideration which has been given to the early parts of it.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The Whiteboy Acts are of an extremely long, vague, and involved character; and I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury proposes to have the matter discussed on the Report stage with the Speaker in the Chair, or whether he proposes to recommit the Bill with respect to this subject? I must say that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is most unsatisfactory.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): We in no case propose to embody the Whiteboy Acts in the Bill. What the Government reserve to themselves a right to do is to enumerate the offences not already in the Bill, but to embody them from the Whiteboy Acts.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it intended to consider this enumeration with the Speaker in the Chair or with the Bill in Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With the Speaker in the Chair, I apprehend, on the Report.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, in that case, I shall raise the entire question on the Motion to omit the sub-section.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.): I have now to move, in page 2, line 22, after the word "Law" insert—

"Provided also, That, for the purposes of this section, every offence of criminal conspiracy shall be deemed to be 'a case of difficulty,' within the meaning of the inhibiting proviso of the Commissions of the Peace of Justices, and in that regard the chairman of the county shall be deemed to be as of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law."

The object of this Proviso is to secure that criminal conspiracy cases which, I believe, will be very infrequent, should go before a Judge of a Superior Court to be tried in Dublin in accordance with ancient precedent, and not by a Resident Magistrate. The inhibiting Proviso of the Commissions of the Peace of Justices forms the subject-matter of the Amendment, and defines the mode of procedure in regard to important trials—such as treason, murder, and criminal conspiracy. It states that such cases shall be heard before two or more magistrates, but that no judgment shall be given except in the presence of one of the Judges, or by a counsel learned in the law. The Commission provides all through that if cases of this kind are brought before the ordinary Justices, such Justices shall not act upon them except in the presence of some person learned in the law. Am I to be told that conspiracies of such a serious character involving political matters—such as "the Queen v. O'Connell," or "the Queen v. Parnell," or "the Queen v. Dillon," each of which was tried in a Superior Court, are not very serious offences and worthy of being considered by a Superior Court. That is the object of my Amendment, and my contention is, that if you allow Boycotting and the lower class of offences to be tried under the summary jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrates, the more serious offences shall not be tried by summary jurisdiction. I should like to know whether any hon. Member, knowing that a Resident Magistrate possesses his authority by virtue of a Commission which contains words ordering them not to act in cases of difficulty, can have the hardihood to say that conspiracy and matters concerning criminal conspiracy are not cases of great difficulty? In the Statute referred to in the Amendment the expression used is "conspiracy now punishable by law," and formerly "the law" dated from the first day of the Session in which a particular Act of Parliament was passed; but by an Act passed in the 33rd of Geo. III. there is a direction to the Clerk of Parliament to insert the exact date on which an Act passed. When this Bill passes and becomes an Act, the Act itself will date from the period put down in that way by the Clerk of Parliament, and it may be argued that the words "now punishable by law" refers to the entire Act, and will include within them not merely conspiracies according to Common Law, but conspiracies under the Act itself, so that intimidation will be governed by the Definition Clause which includes intimidation—what may be called technical and constructive intimidation. In other words, a man may be brought under the summary jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrate in regard to matters which amount to nothing beyond a civil inquiry. Take the case of a temperance meeting. A licensed victualler might suffer injury by the adoption of temperance principles, and he might summon the persons who held a temperance meeting before a Resident Magistrate, declaring that he was intimidated, and the word "intimidation" would cover everything calculated to put him in fear, so far as his trade or business was concerned, and in that way the case might be held to amount to an offence against the law and to a criminal conspiracy. I give that as an illustration to show the nature of "a case of difficulty" which the Resident Magistrate might be called upon to determine as being a case of criminal conspiracy or not. Take the case of the land which, under the clauses of this Bill, will be a fruitful subject for putting the law in motion. The question will arise in this way. A combination of two or more tenants not to pay more than a certain amount of rent upon a particular farm will be held to be a conspiracy, and no doubt it would be provided the tenant occupying the land took no part in it. If he were included it would be illegal, and would amount to a criminal conspiracy. I only mention this to show the kind of cases which will come before the Resident Magistrates, none of whom are bound to belong to the Legal Profession. Questions of the utmost nicety will have to be dealt with. Let me take a very ordinary case. In the latter part of the clause it is made a criminal conspiracy to interfere with the administration of the law. In the case of "the Queen v. O'Connell," one of the counts of the indictment charged O'Connell with attempting to supersede the Courts of Law. No doubt, that was an indictable offence; no doubt it was conspiracy; but, at the same time, allow me to quote three or four lines from the judgment delivered on that occasion to show the great delicacy and difficulty of the matters which these Resident Magistrates may have to determine. The learned Judge—Lord Denman—dealing with the eight counts of the case of "the Queen v. O'Connell" said—

"I am by no means clear that there is anything illegal in exciting disapprobation of a Court of Law, for the purpose of having other Courts substituted more cheap, efficient, and satisfactory."

Another learned Judge said—

"I have entertained some doubt whether the eight counts show more than one thing—namely, a desire to prove the inefficiency of certain tribunals, and to point out that others more efficient may be substituted for them by the Legislature."

That is a very nice question of law, and yet it is one which may come before a Resident Magistrate for decision, as well as other questions which are at present tried before the puisne Judges and at bar in Ireland. Questions which now engage the attention of special juries may be dealt with in the same way, and am I to be told that the summary jurisdiction of two Resident Magistrates is quite sufficient to deal with them, especially when such delicate issues as are involved in charges of conspiracy and other serious offences are at stake. In a multiplicity of matters which may arise under this clause, I contend it is absolutely essential that they should be dealt with by the Judges of the Superior Courts. The proposal of the Government is to enlarge enormously the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrates, and there can be no doubt that, under the provisions of this Bill, cases of conspiracy must frequently arise which would be well worth the presence of the Judges of the Superior Courts, in accordance with the ancient traditions of the law. That is the object of my Amendment, and it coincides with the results of my own personal experience. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that it is not my intention to say anything disrespectful of, or offensive to, the Resident Magistrates of Ireland. I have been associated with them for many years, and it would ill become me to say a word against them; but I speak with knowledge when I assure the Committee that it will be necessary to act with extreme caution in entrusting them with such extreme powers in delicate and difficult cases. In 1883, when the Crimes Prevention Act was in operation, there was a case in which a clergyman was summoned to give bail for his good behaviour before the Petty Sessions. I was in the habit of attending as a magistrate. When I reached the Court I found two Resident Magistrates there, one of whom I had never seen before. The regular Resident Magistrate did not attend. It was proved by a policeman that the defendant had issued a "No-rent manifesto" in the case of certain tenants of Lord Castletown. The rev. gentleman, who was not defended by counsel, denied the charge made against him, and proposed to give evidence himself either by affidavit or orally. I stated to those Resident Magistrates my own opinion—which was afterwards justified in the case of "the Queen v. Dillon"—that that evidence ought to be received; but those two gentlemen would not accept my view of the law, and they absolutely refused to receive it, although the summons was in the form of requiring the defendant to show cause why he should not be bound over to be of good behaviour. They refused to hear him either orally or by counsel. I said I thought it was desirable that the rev. gentleman should be allowed to come forward and say that he repudiated the offence with which he was charged; but the Resident Magistrates ruled against me, and decided that the rev. gentleman should enter into bail to the extent of £500 for his good behaviour, or go to prison for six months. The rev. gentleman objected to enter into any bail at all, and I proposed to give him some time for consideration. Since then, the ruling in the case of "the Queen v. Dillon" has shown that I was right even in requesting that he should have time to deliberate whether he would give bail or not. That, however, was also refused by the Resident Magistrates, and the rev. gentleman was sent to the common gaol. The town was filled with military at the time, a side car was procured, and I saw this rev. gentleman placed upon it, and alongside of him was one of the Resident Magistrates, who, acting in a judicial capacity, had ruled as I have stated. He was taken 14 miles through the country in the custody of that magistrate, who, notwithstanding the fact that he had just been acting in a judicial capacity, was now acting in an executive capacity. I believe the right hon. and learned Attorney General (Mr. Holmes) has told us that the Government desire to sever the judicial from the executive capacity. I think that is a most desirable thing; but the circumstance I have mentioned actually occurred, and side by side on this car was the Resident Magistrate with a revolver slung around him, and policemen on either side, and in that fashion this rev. gentleman was carried 14 miles across the country to a common gaol. I saw the whole circumstance with extreme pain, and I sympathized very much with the magistrate who found himself placed in that painful position. It is not against the act of that gentleman that I protest, but against the system which requires him to perform such an odious duty. I have only mentioned the circumstance, in order to show how it has been the case in the past—that a person performing an important function has been required subsequently to act in an executive capacity—almost in the capacity of a gaoler in reference to a man whom he had previously tried and sentenced. I trust the Government will be prepared to accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 22, after "Law," insert "Provided also, That, for the purposes of this section, every offence of criminal conspiracy shall be deemed to be 'a case of difficulty' within the meaning of the inhibiting proviso of the Commission of Peace of Justices, and in that regard the chairman of the county shall be deemed to be as of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): There has been no subject in connection with the Bill which has been more fully discussed than the question whether Resident Magistrates should be entrusted with the jurisdiction given them by the 1st sub-section of the 2nd clause. A few days ago, the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) moved an Amendment to provide that these questions should be referred to a special tribunal of Judges. That Amendment was discussed at considerable length, and was ultimately withdrawn. The right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) pointed out, upon that occasion, that the same question would arise at a subsequent and more appropriate stage, and that view was conceded by the Committee. Therefore, under the circumstances, the hon. and learned Gentleman must excuse me from following him through his argument. I will simply point out to the Committee that it is impossible to accept this Amendment. I am quite sure that no lawyer would be able to understand it. The Commission of the Peace stands now, I believe, in the form in which it has stood for some 400 or 500 years. It gives power to the magistrates to deal generally with every sort of crime. I need only call attention to the fact that the magistrates have simply summary jurisdiction expressly given to them, and no outside jurisdiction whatever. If the Amendment were accepted, where are you to get your Queen's Counsel, or your County Court Judge, or your barrister learned in the law? The suggestion made by the hon. and learned Member is not a practical one at all, and the question raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman is one which will be more appropriately met at a later stage of the Bill. I therefore trust that the hon. and learned Member will not press the Amendment.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General is reasonable in the request he now makes for the postponement of the general discussion, inasmuch as the Government have made no concession whatever with respect to the tribunal when it comes on for discussion at a later stage. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman were prepared to make some concession of that kind, his appeal would come with great weight; but in the absence of some engagement or promise of that kind, I hardly think the request the right hon. and learned Gentleman makes to us is reasonable. In discussing the Amendment, we are bound to assume that the rest of the Bill will remain in the position in which it now stands; otherwise, we should never know where we were exactly. If the Government will give us a promise that they are prepared to make a concession on this particular point, no doubt that would modify our opposition. Otherwise, we must take the Bill as it stands, and we must now discuss the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Kilkenny on the assumption that the Government do not intend to make any concession on the question at all. That being so, I think the right hon. and learned Attorney General was called on to give some better reply to my hon. and learned Friend's Amendment than he has done. As I have already pointed out, he has contented himself by refusing to discuss the Amendment. Now, it appears to me that the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend is one of a most reasonable character. The right hon. and learned Attorney General sneered at that remark, and he has taken exception to the document from which the Amendment is taken—namely, the Commission of the Peace issued to magistrates, on the ground that that Commission is of a venerable character. He should have remembered that this is not the first time the Executive of Ireland have referred to enactments of a venerable character to enable them to carry on the government of Ireland. In one case the Executive of Ireland found itself compelled to go back to an enactment of the Reign of Edward III., and that being so, surely we are justified in taking up this old Statute which regulates the jurisdiction of the magistrates, providing that we can find anything in it which is calculated to mitigate the ferocity of this Bill. On the question of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend I will only say this, that I cannot imagine a more dangerous precedent than that which is stated in this Bill, in handing over to any Court of Summary Jurisdiction the power of dealing with questions of criminal conspiracy. It is the first time—as far as I know—that Parliament has ever placed in the hands of the Resident Magistrates a summary jurisdiction on the question of conspiracy. We have had numerous Coercion Bills before, some of them so varied in their provisions that they were capable of being applied almost to anything. From time to time the Government have not hesitated to pass provisions to enable them to vindicate what they call law and order; but this is the first time in which the Government have handed over to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction powers of this kind to enable Resident Magistrates to deal with difficult cases of conspiracy. That being so, I think my hon. and learned Friend has acted in a very reasonable manner in suggesting that when the Government get this extraordinary and unprecedented clause, they should fence the enactment around with the protection which in ordinary cases of summary jurisdiction exercised by unprofessional persons has always been adopted hitherto. When officials of this character, who are not learned in the law, are called upon to decide difficult and delicate questions which may arise in regard to the Law of Conspiracy it should be, at any rate, incumbent upon them to seek the advice of the ordinary legal tribunals of the country, or to have associated with them some competent person learned in the law. I certainly think that my hon. and learned Friend was entitled to some better reply than that which he has received from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. Let us consider what the various difficulties are which may possibly arise under this clause. I do not intend to discuss them in detail, but in order to show the difficulty of the task the Court of Summary Jurisdiction will be required to perform under this Bill. I think the argument founded on that difficulty perfectly relevant and proper. The sub-section of this clause, which is now under discussion, practically includes offences of three kinds. First, offences arising from the letting, hiring, and selling of land; secondly, conspiring to Boycott; and thirdly, offences, described in the very vague language of the sub-section as to "interfering with the administration of the law." Let me point out to the Committee that hardly any two lawyers who have spoken on this subject—and we have had a great many legal speakers—have agreed in opinion in regard to this question of conspiracy. One of the public journals, speaking of the Plan of Campaign, pointed out that at least a dozen judgments upon similar questions have been delivered by the English Courts, all of which are of the most conflicting character, and the whole net result is to show that the law itself is in a state of doubt and uncertainty. The question, hitherto, has never been properly settled, and the difficulties which have arisen in declaring what the law really is have arisen from the fact that the English Judges have never yet come to an agreement as to what the real nature of a conspiracy is. So far as one very limited branch of the subject is concerned the law is perfectly clear—namely, that if a person conspires to commit an act which in itself is an offence, or which is intended to effect an illegal object, he is guilty of a criminal conspiracy.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise to Order. Is the hon. Member confining himself to the question raised by the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: The argument of the hon. Member is certainly wider than the special argument involved in the question.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I beg to move, "That the words down to the word 'violence,' in line 24, stand part of the Bill," be now put.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know if it is competent for the right hon. Gentleman to interrupt an hon. Member in the middle of his speech for the purpose of moving the closure, or, indeed, to make any other Motion in the middle of an Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: That course has already been adopted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, Sir; but an opinion was expressed that it was a most inconvenient course, and that it ought not to be followed as a matter of practice.

THE CHAIRMAN: All I can say is, that it has been followed as a matter of practice, and has been construed to be within the Rule.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is it competent to move the closure with regard to a particular portion of a clause until the Amendment under discussion has been disposed of?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Rule runs in this way—

"That if a clause be then under discussion, a Motion may be made that certain words defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause."

It is obvious, therefore, that when the clause is under consideration, there must be some previous Motion before the Committee, or about to be proposed, which will be over-ridden by applying the Motion for closure.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: May I point out that the word "then" in the Rule provides that the closure shall only be applied to the particular Motion before the House. In my view, the use of the word "then" means that the closure may be applied to the Motion then before the House, and to nothing further.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member is right upon that point. It is necessary to apply the closure to the special Amendment under discussion.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Then I presume I shall be in Order in resuming my speech?

MR. W. H. SMITH (who rose amid cries of "Order!") said: I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 125: Majority 106. [7.40 P.M.]

AYES.

Agg-Gardner, J. T. Brown, A. H.
Ainslie, W. G. Bruce, Lord H.
Ambrose, W. Burghlev, Lord
Amherst, W. A. T. Caine, W. S.
Anstruther, Colonel R. Caldwell, J.
H. L. Campbell, J. A.
Anstruther, H. T. Campbell, R. F. F.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E. Charrington, S.
Atkinson, H. J. Churchill, rt. hn. Lord
Baggallay, E. R. H. S.
Bailey, Sir J. R. Clarke, Sir E. G.
Baird, J. G. A. Coddington, W.
Barclay, J. W. Coghill, D. H.
Baring, Viscount Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.
Bartley, G. C. T. Corry, Sir J. P.
Bates, Sir E. Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Baumann, A. A. Cross, H. S.
Beach, W. W. B. Crossley, Sir S. B.
Beadel, W. J. Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Beaumont, H. F. Cubitt, right hon. G.
Beckett, W. Curzon, Viscount
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C. Dalrymple, C.
Beresford, Lord C. W. Davenport, H. T.
De la Poer De Cobain, E. S. W.
Bethell, Commander G. De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
R. De Worms, Baron H.
Biddulph, M. Dimsdale, Baron R.
Bigwood, J. Dixon, G.
Birkbeck, Sir E. Dugdale, J. S.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H. Duncan, Colonel F.
Bond, G. H. Dyke, right hon. Sir
Boord, T. W. W. H.
Bridgeman, Col. hon. Eaton, H. W.
F. O. Ebrington, Viscount
Bristowe, T. L. Edwards-Moss, T. C.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
J. F. Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Brookfield, A. M. Elliot, hon. A. R. D.

Elliot, G. W. Holmes, rt. hon. H.
Elton, C. I. Hornby, W. H.
Evelyn, W. J. Howard, J.
Ewart, W. Hozier, J. H. C.
Eyre, Colonel H. Hubbard, rt. hn. J. G.
Farquharson, H. R. Hughes, Colonel E.
Feilden, Lieut.-Gen. Hulse, E. H.
R. J. Hunt, F. S.
Fergusson, right hon. Hunter, Sir G.
Sir J. Jackson, W. L.
Field, Admiral E. Jennings, L. J.
Fielden, T. Kelly, J. R.
Finch, G. H. Kenyon, hon. G. T.
Finch-Hatton, hon. Kerans, F. H.
M. E. G. Kimber, H.
Finlay, R. B. King-Harman, right
Fisher, W. H. hon. Colonel E. R.
Fitzgerald, R. U. P. Knatchbull-Hugessen,
Fitzwilliam, hon. W. H. T.
J. W. Knowles, L.
Fitz-Wygram, General Lafone, A.
Sir F. W. Lambert, C.
Fletcher, Sir H. Laurie, Colonel R. P.
Folkestone, right hon. Lawrence, W. F.
Viscount Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
Forwood, A. B. Lees, E.
Fraser, General C. C. Legh, T. W.
Fry, L. Lethbridge, Sir R.
Fulton, J. F. Lewis, Sir C. E.
Gathorne-Hardy, hon. Lewisham, right hon.
A. E. Viscount
Gathorne-Hardy, hon. Llewellyn, E. H.
J. S. Low, M.
Gedge, S. Lowther, hon. W.
Gibson, J. G. Mackintosh, C. F.
Giles, A. Maclean, F. W.
Gilliat, J. S. Maclean, J. M.
Goldamid, Sir J. Maclure, J. W.
Goldaworthy, Major- Mallock, R.
General W. T. March, Earl of Goschen, rt. hon. G. J. Marriott, right hon.
Green, Sir E. W. T.
Greene, E. Matthews, rt. hon. H.
Grimston, Viscount Maxwell, Sir H. E.
Grove, Sir T. F. Mildmay, F. B.
Gurdon, R. T. Milvain, T.
Hall, A. W. More, R. J.
Hall, C. Morrison, W.
Halsey, T. F. Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir
Hambro, Col. C. J. T. J. R.
Hamilton, right hon. Mowbray, R. G. C.
Lord G. F. Mulholland, H. L.
Hamilton, Lord C. J. Murdoch, C. T.
Hamilton, Lord E. Noble, W.
Hamilton, Col. C. E. Norris, E. S.
Hanbury, R. W. Northcote, hon. H. S.
Hankey, F. A. Paget, Sir R. H.
Hardcastle, E. Parker, hon. F.
Hardcastle, F. Pearce, W.
Hartington, Marq. of Pitt-Lewis, G.
Hastings, G. W. Plunket, right hon.
Heathcote, Capt. J. H. D. R.
Edwards- Powell, F. S.
Heaton, J. H. Puleston, J. H.
Heneage, right hon. E. Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
Herbert, hon. S. Rasch, Major F. C.
Hill, right hon. Lord Reed, H. B.
A. W. Richardson, T.
Hill, A. S. Ridley, Sir M. W.
Hoare, S. Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
Holland, rt. hon. Sir Robertson, J. P. B.
H. T. Robertson, W. T.
Holloway, G. Robinson, B.

The Chairman

Ross, A. H.
 Russell, T. W.
 Sandys, Lieut.-Col. T. M.
 Sellar, A. C.
 Selwyn, Capt. C. W.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sinclair, W. P.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Townsend, F.
 Trotter, H. J.
 Tyler, Sir H. W.

Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Waring, Colonel T.
 Webster, R. G.
 West, Colonel W. C.
 Wharton, J. L.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Wilson, Sir S.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Yerburgh, R. A.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)
 Acland, C. T. D.
 Allison, R. A.
 Anderson, C. H.
 Asquith, H. H.
 Austin, J.
 Barran, J.
 Barry, J.
 Blake, T.
 Blane, A.
 Bradlaugh, C.
 Bright, Jacob
 Broadhurst, H.
 Brown, A. L.
 Buxton, S. C.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Cameron, C.
 Campbell, Sir G.
 Campbell, H.
 Carew, J. L.
 Chance, P. A.
 Channing, F. A.
 Clancy, J. J.
 Clark, Dr. G. B.
 Cobb, H. P.
 Coleridge, hon. B.
 Connolly, L.
 Conway, M.
 Conybeare, C. A. V.
 Corbet, W. J.
 Cosham, H.
 Cox, J. R.
 Craig, J.
 Craven, J.
 Cremer, W. R.
 Dillon, J.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Dodds, J.
 Esmonde, Sir T. H. G.
 Esslemont, P.
 Farquharson, Dr. R.
 Flower, C.
 Flynn, J. C.
 Foley, P. J.
 Fox, Dr. J. F.
 Gane, J. L.
 Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
 Gilhooly, J.
 Gill, T. P.

Haldane, R. B.
 Harrington, E.
 Hayden, L. P.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Healy, M.
 Healy, T. M.
 Hooper, J.
 Howell, G.
 Hoyle, I.
 Hunter, W. A.
 Illingworth, A.
 James, C. H.
 Kenny, C. S.
 Kenny, J. E.
 Kenny, M. J.
 Lalor, R.
 Lawson, Sir W.
 Lawson, H. L. W.
 Leahy, J.
 Lyell, L.
 Macdonald, W. A.
 McCartan, M.
 McDonald, P.
 McDonald, Dr. R.
 McKenna, Sir J. N.
 McLaren, W. S. B.
 Mahony, P.
 Mappin, Sir F. T.
 Marum, E. M.
 Mason, S.
 Molloy, B. C.
 Morgan, rt. hon. G. O.
 Morgan, O. V.
 Morley, A.
 Nolan, Colonel J. P.
 Nolan, J.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Brien, P. J.
 O'Connor, A.
 O'Connor, J. (Kerry)
 O'Connor, T. P.
 O'Hea, P.
 O'Kelly, J.
 Paulton, J. M.
 Pickard, B.
 Pickersgill, E. H.
 Pictou, J. A.
 Power, R.
 Priestley, B.
 Pyne, J. D.

Quinn, T.
 Redmond, W. H. K.
 Reid, R. T.
 Roberts, J.
 Rowlands, J.
 Rowlands, W. B.
 Rowntree, J.
 Russell, E. R.
 Schwann, C. E.
 Sexton, T.
 Smith, S.
 Spencer, hon. C. R.
 Stack, J.
 Stanhope, hon. P. J.
 Stuart, J.

Summers, W.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Tuite, J.
 Waddy, S. D.
 Wallace, R.
 Warmington, C. M.
 Wayman, T.
 Will, J. S.
 Wilson, O. H.
 Wilson, H. J.
 Yeo, F. A.

TELLERS.

Biggar, J. G.
 Sullivan, D.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126;
 Noes 217: Majority 91.—(Div. List,
 No. 170.) [7.55 P.M.]

MR. W. H. SMITH: I claim now to move that the Question, "That the words 'any person who shall wrongfully, and without legal authority, use violence or,' stand part of the Clause, be now put."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask the Government whether a number of Gentlemen who have paired did not vote in the last Division?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of Order.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not a breach of the practice of this House for a number of Gentlemen who have paired to vote in a Division?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a question upon which I can rule.

Question put accordingly.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 212;
 Noes 122: Majority 90.—(Div. List,
 No. 171.) [8.15 P.M.]

Question put, "That the words 'any person who shall wrongfully, and without legal authority, use violence or,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 190;
 Noes 116: Majority 74.—(Div. List,
 No. 172.) [8.30 P.M.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The Amendment which I rise to move is to substitute the word "threats" for the word "intimidation" which is now in the clause, and which is very vague in its meaning. I am of opinion that the Resident Magistrates may be inclined to give the word a meaning which it might not be intended to bear, and that, therefore, it may be used as an instrument of great tyranny and oppression. It seems to me that if the Government accept this Amendment, that the words "violence" and "threats" will be sufficient for bringing to bear upon the offences specified the penalties of this Bill, and that the offence which is popularly known as intimidation is one which ought not to be admitted into an Act of Parliament under that vague designation. Suppose a man takes an animal to a fair for the purpose of selling it, and suppose the people at the fair do not fancy the animal he has for sale, of course, whatever may be the defects of the animal he is offering, he may go to the Resident Magistrate and allege that he has not been able to sell his animal, and that, although no actual threats have been used to him, he believes there is intimidation in the air. I do not think that when a man makes a complaint of that kind, and is not able to show some substantial grievance—namely, that violence or threats have been used towards him, any Resident Magistrate should have it in his power to imprison a person or persons upon such an allegation. And I want the Government, if they intend that intimidation is to cover something beyond violence or threats, to tell us what other act is to be included under this term. Let them tell us what they have in view, and what is the mischief at which they wish to strike. If there is any definition in any Act of Parliament which describes what it is the Government intend to reach by this clause, let them put it into the Bill; but I do urge upon them not to place such enormous power in the hands of the Resident Magistrates by the use of so vague a term as "intimidation," which, as I have said, may be applied by them in a very improper manner. I will instance two cases which happened under the recent Coercion Act. At the time when the Act generally associated with the name of the late Mr. Forster was in force, a number of tenants were evicted; the Land League, which was then in existence, erected some huts on the roadside for the use of these persons, and for that purpose they sent down a common carpenter from Dublin. This man was not a politician; he knew nothing about the state of affairs, and was simply employed as an ordinary artizan to do the work. But what did Mr. Clifford Loyd do? He argued that the huts might in some way be used to intimidate the landlord; he arrested the carpenter who was doing the work, put him into gaol, and the man was bound over to be of good behaviour. Now, it is against acts of this kind that we wish to provide in seeking to have this Amendment put into the Bill. It seems to me monstrous that this constructive intimidation should be imported into the legal process in Ireland. We say that if the Executive can find any actual violence or threats, let those acts be punished; but we say, also, that acts of constructive intimidation ought not to be struck at. I will now refer to another case, which occurred, I think, in the County of Limerick. In this instance, a policeman summoned a boy who, he said, had whistled at him as he was passing along the street; he alleged that this little boy had intimidated him—that he was whistling at him in derision. I do not know what the result of this case was. I think a good deal of fun was made of it at the time, and I only use it as a specimen of the manner in which we may expect that an Act of Parliament of this kind will be used, if we import into it words which, although they may have a meaning in the dictionary, have no legal meaning.

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 24, after "or," leave out "intimidation," and insert "threats."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman either asks us to limit the operation of this clause by the words he proposes, or he does not. If, in his opinion, the terms "threats" and "intimidation" are synonymous, his Amendment is frivolous. If the hon. Gentleman will turn to Clause 19, he will see that the expression "intimidation" includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of property, business, employment, or means of living. Now, the hon. Gentleman has not told us which of the clauses of that definition he objects to, and which he thinks would be struck out by substituting "threats" for "intimidation," for the Government are of opinion that there is not one of the acts or objects specified in that definition that we can afford to part with from this Bill. We cannot afford to restrict by one iota the words of the clause, and the hon. Member will, therefore, understand that it is impossible for us to accept his Amendment.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): On the return to this House of my late Friend, Mr. Miall, there was, during his candidature, a good deal of exclusive dealing. I want to know whether, if exclusive dealing occurred in Ireland, it would bring the unfortunate person who was the cause of it within the meshes of this Bill?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland seems to suppose that we on these Benches do not know the meaning of words. He says that the definition of intimidation is in this Bill. Now, I say there is nothing of the kind. He refers us to the Definition Clause, and he says this is the definition of intimidation—and so on. "The expression 'intimidation' includes"—exactly; but where is the definition? It includes, you say, certain things; but what does it exclude? It may mean anything in addition to what it includes. This is no definition at all; but the Government who bring in the Bill call it a definition—because you say that a gallon of water includes a glass; that is a definition of what a glass or gallon is. Will the Government put in, instead of the word "includes," the word "means?" If they do, then they will have defined intimidation; but, until then, they tell us nothing as to the meaning of the word. I ask the Solicitor General for England if it is a definition of intimidation to say what it includes without saying what it excludes? I venture to say there is no lawyer on that Bench, unless he is a fool—

"The expression 'intimidation' includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of property,"

THE CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. and learned Member will pay a little more respect to the dignity of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall observe your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I wish to point out the way in which this clause has been worked. And as an instance, I will refer to a case which occurred on the 7th of October, 1883. On that day a man was charged before the magistrates with having used threatening language. The words complained of were used towards another man at an auction, and they were—"Leave it to me." The magistrate said that the man had a good character, but that, as he had used threats, he should send him to prison for seven days. That is one instance of what the definition "includes." Here is another instance of intimidation. On the 22nd December, 1882, three respectable tenant farmers were sentenced to 14 days' hard labour for stopping a hunt, the Resident Magistrate who sentenced them being himself one of the huntsmen on the occasion—that is to say, we have a number of tenant farmers who object to hunting; one of the magistrates is a member of the hunt, and he says that the gathering of these people means intimidation, and he gives them each 14 days' hard labour. Besides this, 10 respectable young men were sent to prison for not dispersing. The magistrate is described in your own list as a man without any qualification. Again, on another occasion, a number of tenant farmers and labourers protested against the Marquess of Waterford's hunt at Curraghmore; all that was established against them was that they shouted—they used no threats—and yet they were sentenced to a month's imprisonment with hard labour. Will anyone tell me that there is anything in this Act to warrant this? And yet it was done, and I say it will be done again under your definition "includes." We object to "intimidation" as a word; it is not an English word, and it has no precise meaning. If you said "frightens," you would make the matter more clear; but you will not do that. You put in "intimidation," which means nothing. I say that so long as you have no definition of this word in the Bill—of words which are of that vague character that no one can understand them—so long will you leave to the Resident Magistrates an enormous amount of salvage over and above the wording of the Bill. I appeal to the Solicitor General, the Home Secretary, or the First Lord of the Treasury, to say whether the word "includes" has any value at all as a definition?

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I challenge the Solicitor General to say that any definition of intimidation is given in the Bill. Will the hon. and learned Gentleman deny that any act that may be complained of by any person will be sufficient to get a decision against a person charged with intimidation? The wording is, beyond expression, vague—and so on. I will undertake to say that if I speak at the next election disparagingly of the person opposed to me, and in such a way as tended to the loss of his seat, I should come under this clause. You do not define anything here, and yet the right hon. Gentleman points to these vague words as a justification for refusing this Amendment. Surely the Government do not intend that this word shall be used in the same way as my hon. Friends have pointed out the word "intimidation" has been hitherto used. If the Government do not intend that, what is the use of their retaining the word? Why does not the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to meet our views, either by suggesting another expression, or giving us a definition? It is clear that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has some object in retaining "intimidation," although I presume his object is not to retain it for the purpose referred to by my hon. Friend; but if he has a definite purpose, why can he not, in the interest of fair play, meet our views? We have given him the reasons why we object to the term "intimidation." We have shown, from what has happened in Ireland, how absurd this word is; we have given the case of the prosecution of a little boy of 11 or 12 years of age for having whistled a tune to intimidate the police, and which boy was kept in prison for one day at least. No doubt, the Government do not want the clause to be used in that way; but it has been so used, and I see no reason why it should not be used in this way again, considering the fact that the magistrates who so used it are still on the bench. We appeal to the right hon.

"The expression 'intimidation' includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself,"

Gentleman to accept this Amendment, and if he does not do so, it will be difficult to believe that the object is to use the Bill for other purposes than the word "intimidation" implies.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I think there is a great distinction to be drawn between the two words "includes" and "means;" much more so than the Government acknowledge. I should like to know whether this section includes public meetings at which it is easy to imagine that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) and others will address their constituents, and give them advice generally? When we have this word interpreted by the Resident Magistrates, I am inclined to think that it will be very hard to escape the charge of intimidation under those circumstances. I am, also, curious to know whether it is to include aid and assistance which it may be necessary to give to evicted tenants? We know that the landlords are engaged largely in issuing notices to quit; we have heard how a certain tradesman who went down to a locality to erect huts was charged with intimidation; we have heard that the erection of huts is an act of intimidation in itself, and that if it had not been for the action of a labourer who seized the reins of the Lord Lieutenant's horse in the streets of Dublin, those huts would not have been erected, and the tenants would have been to this day devoid of shelter. We think that the Resident Magistrates will consider it an act of intimidation for anyone to bring aid and assistance to tenants who have been evicted, and a person engaged in what the whole world regards as an act of charity will be subjected to the very severest punishment provided by the Bill. I remember that either the Solicitor General, or the hon. and learned Gentleman now Secretary of State for India, made an eloquent speech against the arrest of a young lady who was engaged in this work, and who was sent 14 miles by road to gaol in charge of policemen, for having brought assistance to evicted tenants. These necessary charitable acts have been and will be performed again, if not by the ladies in Ireland, by gentlemen, and I want to know whether those engaged in them will be liable to the very severe penalties provided against the offence of intimidation? I do not, of course, presume to argue this question from a legal point of view; but I am rather inclined to think that if this Act becomes law it will not be long before I and others, whom I know well, will come under its operation. I can scarcely conceive, unless this Amendment be admitted, that a man will be able to turn upon his heel in Ireland without coming under its provisions. I know the Resident Magistrates; I know the conduct of the men who are engaged in these political movements in Ireland, and I know it is impossible for them to avoid this, having regard to the interpretation that will be put on the word "intimidation" by the Resident Magistrates, and I am, therefore, anxious that there should be some clear definition of the term. I should like the word proposed by the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Mr. M. Healy) to be inserted, rather than that which we have in the clause, in order that we might know our position so far as to be able to avoid offending against the Act in the future, because, if I can possibly avoid it, I do not desire again to see the inside of one of Her Majesty's prisons.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland thinks that by referring to the Definition Clause he is giving a clear idea of what the Government intend by the word "intimidation." That word has a historical existence. In O'Connell's case it was declared that the word did not import any very bad meaning; but it has since been recognized to import a harmful meaning. The Definition Clause of the Government explains the term "intimidation" as covering that which it never covered before. The extent of ground which it is now made to cover ought to have been in the mind of the draftsman of this Bill, because in the preceding Definition Clause you have a saving clause for trade unions, and that saving clause is that the crime of combination, which the Trade Unions Acts of 1871 and 1875 dealt with, is legal. That being so, in order to ascertain what the draftsman of the Bill meant to include by the word "intimidation" you must go back to the Act of 1875. The 7th section of that Act provides penalties for intimidation, for the offence of violence or otherwise; and it sets forth that every person who by intimidation endeavours to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which such person has a right to do or abstain from doing rightly or wrongly shall, on conviction, be liable to the penalties in the Act. What are the things made legal intimidation by the Act? They are—using violence to or intimidating another person, his wife, or children, or injuring his property, persistently following such other person about from place to place, or hiding any tools or clothes, interfering with him in his work, watching or besetting the house where he carries on work, or approaching such place, and the following of any such person by two or more persons in a disorderly manner in any street or road. That is the definition in the Act of 1875, and, as I mentioned before, Section 18 says that no act which is not an offence of intimidation under that Act shall be an offence of intimidation under this Bill. What is the effect of the Definition Clause if it remains in the phraseology to which we have been referred by the Chief Secretary for Ireland? It is to include any word or act calculated to put any person in fear of injury or danger to himself, or any person of his family, or person in his employment, and so on. Now, when you have extended the meaning of intimidation in such a manner as that, what will it not come to? Every form of language which the person to whom it is addressed may not like—words conveying only advice—may be considered to be intimidation. A caution or intimation that if such and such a course is followed certain results will take place—everything of this sort, however bond fide it may be, will be intimidation; and when we consider who are the men to administer the clause, it appears against reason to place such an elastic form of words at their disposal. There was one of that body who said—"We will fight the Nationalists down to Hell; and if Hell is frozen over we will fight them on the ice." Men who are capable of using such language as that are not those to whom the interests of the Nationalists should be confided, and yet, under this Bill, you will enable them to construe as intimidation what is simply meant as advice. I ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the construction I have put upon the clause is not perfectly correct, and whether the definition of "intimidation" is not so wide that no Nationalist can reasonably be held to be safe before any Resident Member for Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) calls on me to say whether think it right that the administration of the Act should be left in the hands of a gentleman who is alleged to have used some very strong language with reference to the Nationalists. But I would point out that hon. Members who have asked these questions have all left the House without waiting for any answer to be given, and that the questions are no such as lead in the slightest degree to the elucidation of the question before the Committee. With regard to the Amendment, I have only to repeat what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, that in this Amendment is intended in any way to limit the meaning of the word "intimidation" the Government could not accept it.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The hon. and learned Gentleman says that Members on these Benches have not waited for replies to their questions; but I point out that this is the result of our having fallen into the habit of not expecting to get any answers from the Government. What we complain of is that the definition "includes" is no definition at all; that it simply stretches the meaning of the word without telling us what it does mean, and that the additional meaning given in the Definition Clause is of such a character that it leaves the Government open to punish anybody in Ireland—everyone who differs from the Government will probably fall under one or the other of the meanings given. It seems to us that a man who has built a house for you, which falls down afterwards, could be brought under this Bill. I contend that this clause, as now worded, places the liberty of every man in Ireland in the hands of the Executive, and that the only security we get is the assurance that the clause will be used with discretion; and we know by that that it will be used for political purposes. If a man goes into a shop and buys something, and tells a friend that what he bought there is bad, that will bring him under the clause; but, as I have said, by its means the Government will be able to punish every man in Ireland. We have endeavoured to argue this matter with the Government, but the only reply we have received is that the Government like the word "intimidation," and that if they were to substitute the word "threats" it would mean the handing over of the Bill to be redrafted by Members on these Benches. That means nothing more than that they will stick to everything in the Bill. I want to point out to the Committee the gross and unjust way in which the people of Ireland are treated in this matter. I have always maintained that where there is a free Parliament, and the people are able to govern their own affairs, intimidation of the kind you are aiming at has existed, and always will exist, whenever the people have before it questions of interest. I maintain there never was a Bill of such a character as this driven through Committee so indecently by any Government; and if the promoters of this Bill are met with prolonged and angry opposition, it is entirely due to the heartless and unfeeling way in which they force these provisions through the House by means of an ignorant and mistaken majority. I do not believe there are 10 men on the opposite Benches who have read the Bill from beginning to end; and, if that is so, can they wonder that we resist it on behalf of our people to the utmost of our power?

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): I beg, Sir, to support the Amendment. Such a change will not involve, on the part of the Government, any sacrifice as to the scope of the powers included in the clause, if the Government really honestly mean to limit the operation of the Act to the means that are defined in the Definition Clause. Now, I find in the Definition Clause that the word "includes" occurs three times, and the word "means" seven times amongst the paragraphs. We have this example—

"The expression 'Lord Lieutenant' means the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or any Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland for the time being."

Then, again, we have—

"The expression 'aggravated crime of violence against a person' means an assault which causes actual bodily harm," &c.

But when we come to the expression "intimidation" we find it set down in the clause—

Sir Edward Clarke

"The expression 'intimidation' includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself,"

and so on. If the Government, instead of the word "includes," would put in word "means," it would be limiting the clause to the offence specially defined, and would not be leaving a wide margin for the discretion of the Resident Magistrates as to the class of offence that they may deem intimidation when they come to work this Act. As to the discretion of the Resident Magistrates in this matter, when an hon. Friend of mine awhile ago was describing certain cases—for example, the boy who was punished for whistling in the street—I saw one or two hon. and learned Gentlemen sitting on the Front Bench opposite scoff at it as if it were an incredulous matter. I can quite understand their scoffing at it. I can quite understand the Solicitor General for England asking whether, in the case of that boy, there was a conviction or not. I do not know what happened in the case of the boy referred to; but there is a case here in which there is a conviction—a case in which a person summoned was sentenced to find sureties in £40, and to enter into his own recognizances, or in default to go to prison for two calendar months. His name was James M'Clusky, and he was summoned before Major Traill, the Resident Magistrate, who is rather notorious, and what was his offence? Why, it was that he, on several occasions, in the public streets of Armagh, had put out his tongue in a "threatening manner" at the Sub-Inspector of Police. This James M'Clusky, by putting out his tongue, threatened and succeeded in intimidating a gentleman who had at his hand a large force of Constabulary armed with rifles and bayonets and other weapons of war. The complainant, in course of his examination, said that this man was in the habit of intimidating him in the streets in this way; and the result was, as I have stated, that the man was sentenced to go to prison for two calendar months in default of finding sureties. This was a case in which a monstrous and ridiculous charge was made against a man as a matter of intimidation, and the Resident Magistrate who sentenced this young fellow to prison for two months in this absurd way will be one of the gentlemen who will have the administration of this Bill intrusted to them. Then there is another case brought up, where the Resident Magistrate appeared to be of a more sensible and a less tyrannical frame of mind, and reprimanded the police for bringing up the defendant. It was the case of Martin Ryan, who was summoned in Westmeath for calling Patrick Welsh "a rogue, a robber, and a welsher," and for threatening to blow out his brains with a stone. That case was dismissed; but it is a matter in the discretion of the Resident Magistrates how they shall deal with these cases, and we see that it is possible for one of them, in a case so trivial that it should never have been brought before the magistrates, to sentence a man to two months' hard labour in default of finding sureties to be of good behaviour. An enormous number of these cases could be brought before the Committee; but I am sure the Government would continue to treat them with the contempt they have already manifested towards those which have been mentioned in the course of this debate. This discussion has gone on for some time, and I think we may venture to appeal to any impartial witness—to yourself, Sir, for example—as to whether the statement made from this quarter of the House of the case made out for an improvement of this definition of "intimidation" is not one which well deserves the attention of the Government, or well deserves the attention of any Party in the House to whom this argument might be addressed? I think, if this discussion may be deemed by anybody to have gone on at a length which in these days of curtailment of debate is unusual, that the fault lies with the Government, who will not answer one of the statements or one of the arguments made on this side of the House, but simply get up and tell us that we are trifling with the House, or are assuming to re-draft the Bill for the benefit of the Government; and the Government merely scoff at our statements, as if they were unfounded, instead of replying, and instead of making some endeavour to carry out, by the acceptance of a reasonable Amendment such as this, their first declared intention as to the method in which they intend the Act to be administered. Sir, I would recommend to the right hon. and learned Gentleman who now represents the Government (the Attorney General for Ireland) the suggestion I have made—namely, that in Clause 19 we should go so far—though no one will be able to say it is going very far—as to leave out the word “includes,” so as not to leave a margin to the Resident Magistrates to take any cases such as that of a person putting out his tongue in a threatening manner, and to put in the word “means,” which, goodness knows, is sufficiently wide in its construction. I would ask the Government whether they intend to use this clause and this definition of the word “intimidation,” as against the action of landlords who do what the Land Commission, through Judge M’Carthy, recently declared the landlords were in the habit of doing—namely, intimidating their tenants by means of eviction, and holding over their heads the species of terrorism that the Irish landlords are able to hold over the heads of their tenants—whether, I say, they intend to include acts of intimidation like that in the action they propose to take under this measure which they are now passing? I should like to have an answer to that question. Is it within their intention to do so, or do they only wish to bring charges of intimidation against the tenants? I would call your attention, Sir, to the fact that one of the Amendments which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House stated to-night he considered to be of no importance is one which is moved by an hon. Friend of mine on this Bench, and which refers to that very portion of the definition of intimidation; and I hope that when we come to this Amendment you will consider it of sufficient importance to permit a discussion to take place upon it. It opens up a question which is a most important one—namely, the question of intimidation on the part of the landlords, which is a question that has not yet come before this Committee for discussion. I maintain it is intimidation of a far more serious character than anything which is done by the people in defence of their rights.

[Twelfth Night.]

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): It is a curious thing that none of the many lawyers who obtained seats at the last General Election in the Tory interest have addressed the Committee in defence of a single word of this Bill, with the exception of hon. and learned and right hon. and learned Gentlemen who sit on the Front Bench, and who are, therefore, more or less pecuniarily interested in the fate of the measure and the fate of the Government, which is bound up with it. I think it is a significant circumstance that, with so many lawyers in the House, every one of whom is burning to distinguish himself in the interests of the Government, and probably with a view to his own ultimate interest, we should not have had a single word from any of them in defence of this Bill. When people were talking very large through the country on the introduction of this measure, when they were speaking about agrarian crime in Ireland, about the atrocities of the tenantry cutting off cows’ tails and so on, no doubt many of the Gentlemen to whom I refer did speak; but when we come to the details of the Bill they do not appear to take the slightest part in what is going on, except this—that they now and then come in for the purpose of intimidating us and to vote for the Motion, “That the Question be now put.” It seems to me that this word “intimidation” in this clause cannot be justified even on grammatical grounds, and ought not to be retained. It seems that intimidation to be effectual requires that someone should be affected by it—that, to use a legal phrase, there should be a grantor and a grantee. You cannot be said to intimidate the world in general; you must intimidate somebody. When you look at the next few words you see that the intimidation is intimidation “of or towards,” and I confess I do not know what that means. You cannot intimidate towards a person—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, in the observations he is now making, is anticipating an Amendment lower down on the Paper in his own name.

Mr. CHANCE: Well, Sir, I was simply saying this—that intimidation is an offence which requires to be absolutely complete. I do not know what was in the mind of the draftsman when he put down the words as we find them in the Bill, because lower down we see a number of acts described incompletely, and I do not see how intimidation can possibly be used in their regard. When we turn to the Definition Clause—Clause 19—I find a similar difficulty in understanding it, because I there see—and I must point out that it is quite a new departure to use the word "intimidate" in that manner. If you look at the Trades Union Act of 1875 you there find intimidation dealt with. In that Act there is an offence clearly defined, but there is no question of "using intimidation towards," and so forth. And if you look at the definition of what may be reasonably termed intimidation or force—take, for instance, intimidation or an assault that may be a constructive assault—you find that an act that is to be constructively an assault must be an act giving to the person towards whom it is used reasonable ground to believe that the person using it means to apply actual force; but in this Bill there is no such limit or safeguard. Under this Bill, if any person, even the fool of the parish, chooses to say that he is put in fear by an act which is perfectly innocent, it will be a criminal offence, and I must say that is absurdly unreasonable. You should not say it is an offence unless the act done is calculated to put in fear a person of reasonable mind and of sound common sense; but I understand why the Bill is framed in its present shape. Of course, most of these acts of so-called intimidation will be alleged against Nationalists in Ireland, and it is desired on the part of the landlord class to have the widest means of alleging acts against these people which can be construed by the Resident Magistrates into acts calculated to produce fear. The whole thing is utterly unreasonable. I suppose, however, it will be passed by the usual majority, who stalk in at the beck of that living danger signal, the First Lord of the Treasury, when he desires to put the closure on. I do not see that it is any use arguing the matter, since I have no one to argue with.

"The expression 'intimidation' includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment," &c. ;

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I would like to point out to the Committee that it is not what the Government mean which will be taken into consideration in Ireland by the gentlemen who will have entrusted to them the administration of this measure when it becomes an Act of Parliament; but they will take into consideration what course is most acceptable to the powers that be. It is necessary that it should be impressed upon the Government that they should have this clause framed in definite language—in language as precise as that of the English law. As has been frequently pointed out, not only are the gentlemen who will administer this measure removable at pleasure, but they are always filled with gratitude, and gratitude we know, in the Parliamentary acceptance of the phrase, is a lively expectation of favours to come. These Resident Magistrates are always looking forward to get some fresh expression of consideration and approval from the Government; and, as persons who find themselves in that situation always do, it will be found that they go far beyond what the Government wish them to do. They will inevitably go beyond the length of their tether. Under these circumstances, I ask the Government to say what they mean by "intimidation." If they mean what we mean by the word "threats," why do not they say so at once, and accept our Amendment? This word "threats" would go much better with the previous words of the section. "Wrongfully intimidated" seems to have a contradiction in it. If you put in the word "threats," instead of "intimidation," you will facilitate the passage of the Bill, and the Resident Magistrates will find themselves with a very necessary curb put upon them.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 168; Noes 111: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 173.) [9.50 P.M.]

MR. CHANCE: I beg to move, in page 2, line 25, to leave out the words "or towards." I am glad to be able to announce to the Committee on this occasion that I speak by the leave and full concurrence of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. I hope, therefore, that the discussion on the Amendment will be a short one. We have already passed without discussion the most serious points. We have decided that amongst the criminals who are enumerated in this section shall be found any person who, wrongfully and without legal authority, uses violence or intimidation; and now we come to the words "to or towards." I confess it puzzles me how we can use the words "to or towards any person or persons" in reference to such an offence as intimidation. Intimidation is distinct from violence, and it is used here as something by which you produce an effect on the mind of someone. You cannot be said, therefore, to use it "towards" some one. People's minds do not reside outside them. To have intimidation you must produce an effect on the mind of some solitary individual; and, that being so, I cannot conceive what is the meaning of "intimidation towards." Intimidation is not like a shot gun, which you can fire off in the air. This is an example of the latitude which it is intended to give the Resident Magistrates—an example of the free hand you give them to enable them to put anyone they like into gaol. I hope the Government will not be unreasonable enough to insist upon the use of these words. In the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act of 1875 you used the word "intimidation;" but you did not say "intimidation towards a person," as if intimidation was a weapon held up and brandished. Perhaps it meant that though you may not intimidate a person himself, you may do something to some member of his family and thereby intimidate him; but that does not justify the use of words which are puerile; and, therefore, I trust the Government will leave them out.

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, leave out "or towards."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Holmes) (Dublin University): The hon. Gentleman has referred to the Act of 1875, and he points out that it differs from the wording of the clause which we are now considering. That Act is liable to be evaded. If the hon. Gentleman were to read the debates which took place in this House in 1882 he would find it there stated by hon. Gentlemen who have had considerable experience in Ireland that though the section of the Act of 1875 to which he refers was a good one, so far as it went, it did not meet the difficulty in Ireland at that time. It does not meet the difficulty which exists now. The provision of that section, which forms, to some extent, the basis of this section of the Bill we are now considering, is not sufficient to deal with every form of intimidation in Ireland which has existed since 1881, more or less extensively, down to the present time. The hon. Gentleman asks, what is the meaning of introducing these words? The meaning of introducing the words is, as I explained in the House hours ago, that intimidation might not be directed to the individual himself—that is, that it might not be intimidation used by the person using it in the presence of the person against whom it is used—they might not be together—but it may be directed against a man through other channels, and by being directed through other channels may prevent that person from doing a great number of things which he has a legal right to do, by reason of this intimidation being brought to bear upon him. There might be discussion as to the best way of framing the clause to meet that point; but it has been considered before that the phrase we here use does meet the difficulty. It has been clearly shown that there are many cases where the condition of things would not have been reached if it had not been for the adoption of these words. Under the circumstances, the Government do not see their way to the acceptance of the hon. Member's Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: I understand that the case of the Government is a very short and simple one. They admit that "intimidation" is the production of an effect by one person upon the mind of another person, but they wish to punish intimidation, while they are unable to point out a single individual on whose mind this effect has been produced. I leave the Committee to judge of that position. I ask the Government if they have any other reason to advance for the retention of these words? If what I have stated is their admission it is a very grave one. It is that they mean that "intimidation in the air" is an illegal act, and that they wish to punish, by six months' imprisonment, people for doing acts which do not involve violence, and by which no single individual has been restricted in his action.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The next Amendment which is in my name is in line 30, after "persons," to insert

Mr. Chance

"specified." The point involved in this Amendment has already, in an indirect way, formed the subject of discussion. There is the example of a number of cases in which prosecutions were instituted under the corresponding provisions of the Crimes Act. A number of parties were charged with intimidating persons unknown, and summonses were issued making a charge of intimidation, but without specifying the persons intimidated. It is needless to point out that that is a very unsatisfactory and improper course to take. In one of these cases an appeal was taken to the County Court Judge, and the County Court Judge decided that such a summons was bad in law, and refused to confirm the conviction of the magistrates, on the ground that the persons intimidated ought to have been stated. But in another case, where a number of appeals were made to the County Court Judge, where the same course had been taken by those issuing the summonses, the County Court Judge declined to take that view, and decided that the summonses were good in law. Whether or not such a course as that is good in law, the Bill ought to be made clear and precise on the point. I do not know what the intention of the Government is; but, at any rate, the matter should be here debated and clearly decided. I may give, as a sample of the improper way in which the clause, as framed, may work, this fact. An hon. Friend of mine went down to Westmeath and made a speech there. At that time there was a great deal of agitation in the country with reference to the question of the labourers of Ireland, and the action taken under the Labourers' Act by the Poor Law Guardians. A favourite allegation of the landlords was that, however anxious they themselves might be to make concessions, the tenants were not disposed to accept them. Well, my hon. Friend, in making a speech in Westmeath, discussed this view of the matter, and urged the County Authorities to treat their labourers properly, and said that if they did not take a proper view of the situation and treat their labourers as they ought to be treated, there was a danger that the force of the agitation would be turned against themselves. For using these words he was brought up before two Resident Magistrates, charged with intimidating the farmers of Westmeath, and those two magistrates sentenced him to two months' imprisonment, an imprisonment that was confirmed on appeal by the County Court Judge—an individual who had himself got at variance with my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. Harrington) in local politics in the County of Kerry. I think that is a very unsatisfactory state of things, and we have reason to believe that a similar state of things will arise under this Act unless precautions are taken. A clause against intimidation, general in its character, may be abused by the Resident Magistrates. Therefore, when the Government are re-enacting a provision of this sort, we have a right to ask them to insert some safeguard against an improper use of the section.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 30, after "persons," insert "specified."
—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'specified' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. Member who has moved this Amendment has himself stated, in the course of his observations, what must be in the recollection of the Committee—namely, that this subject has already been discussed at considerable length. The discussion took place on one of the Amendments on Wednesday, I think, on a previous portion of the clause. An Amendment was discussed on the same basis as that on which the hon. Gentleman is now discussing this proposal.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): It was not on the same point.

MR. HOLMES: Practically it was the same point. The very instances the hon. Member who moved the Amendment were then quoted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But not on the same point.

MR. HOLMES: That may be; but, as I say, the same instances were used. Our object in framing the clause as it stands is a very simple one. If intimidation is charged against certain persons, or against a certain class of persons, it may be utterly impossible to have it stated on the face of the summons what the names of the persons so intimidated are. Intimidation in Ireland is constantly being directed not against a particular individual who can be named, but against several individuals—a class of individuals residing in a particular place or district; and we conceive that form of intimidation should be punished, and therefore it would be impossible to limit the clause as suggested. The hon. Member refers to action which was taken under a previous Act. It would be impossible for us to check the difficulties the hon. Member referred to, because they are not in our knowledge; but this I do know—that under the Act of 1882 proceedings were frequently taken, and taken with success, against persons who intimidated a number of individuals, none of whom could be named, or none of whom it was possible to name at the time. The Government must insist on retaining the clause as it is drawn for the reasons that we urged when the matter was discussed for three hours on Wednesday last. It is not necessary for me, neither do I intend to reiterate the arguments then used.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has entirely mistaken the case of the previous Amendment to which he has referred; and I am surprised that, with his legal acumen, he should have attempted to debauch the Committee with his legal opinion in a sense contrary to the fact. What was the previous Amendment? Why, that you should compel the individuals intimidated to take out the summonses themselves. That is a very different thing to the point involved in this Amendment. It would be a reflection on the Chairman of Committees to suppose that he would allow a discussion to take place on an Amendment identical with one already disposed of. The object of the present Amendment is that when you take out a summons against a person for conspiracy, the person intimidated shall not be a person in the air, but a real individual. The Amendment really proceeds from the Conservative side of the House. The Conservative Party will have a great respect for Mr. Cross, now Lord Cross, especially as he is a Peer. What my hon. Friend asks for was inserted in the Act of 1875, because in that Act the persons complaining of intimidation were bound to nominate, so to speak, the individuals whose conduct they complained of. That Act said—

“Any person who with the view of preventing any other person from doing or abstaining from doing.”

Mr. Holmes

[Interruption.] I do not complain. I rejoice at interruptions which we can understand, and can deal with in fragment. If the hon. Gentleman will again favour me with his interruption I shall be delighted to deal with him. But he will not. The section of the Act I referred to goes on to say—

“Uses violence to or intimidates such other person, or his wife or children,”

thereby showing that these persons to be intimidated must be particular persons, or their wives or children. They must be intelligible, individual persons, such as John Smith, or W. H. Smith, or anyone else. That being so, so long as you are able to deal with them as individuals of flesh and blood, it is possible for a defendant to rebut the charges. The Judges in all these actions pro and con must depend, to a large extent, upon your proofs; but if you say you are “intimidated in the air,” how is it possible that you can rebut the charges? If I am charged with intimidating a spirit—I will not say the spirit of any hon. Gentleman opposite—but of a person unknown—I cannot bring up that person unknown to prove that the charge is false, or I cannot cross-examine that person in proof of my position. But if I am accused of intimidating John Smith—I will not mention anybody else, I will stick to John Smith—I could bring up John Smith, and could show whether he was a person intimidated or not. That is a material point, and I will put that case to the hon. and learned Solicitor General, who always attends intelligently to what takes place in Committee, and does not give that perfunctory attention to what has taken place which some hon. Members upon that Bench do. If you are accused of intimidating A or B, you can bring up evidence to disprove that accusation; but if you are accused of intimidating Julius Cæsar, or some person who is dead, or some person who is unknown, how is it possible for you to defend yourself? I maintain that it is in that view that this Amendment ought to be pressed. Suppose I am accused of intimidating a person unknown, how can I prove a negative? But you look about for certain classes of persons, and you say this class of individuals has been intimidated. I say, produce one specimen. You do nothing of the kind; and I do put it to the Committee whether that is a reasonable and a proper Code that is to exist for all time? I myself have intimidated people in speeches that I have made over and over again, and I am happy to say that I have brought them in that way into courses which are right. Lord Salisbury endeavours to intimidate the Conservative Members, and successfully, to go against that which they believe to be a right and just course. We say to the people of Ireland, if you grab land you are doing wrong, and certain regrettable consequences will follow. You say that is intimidating a person unknown; and, being the master of legions, you say it is wrong, and it shall be punished. I ask you again to re-clothe yourselves in your Conservative mind as it existed in Anno Domini 1875, when you had no Liberal Unionists with you, when you were purely Conservative—before, so to speak, the primrose had been crossed by the orchid. I do ask in these circumstances, if simply on the ground of defence, that you should allow us to defend ourselves. I have defended a good many men, and most of them unsuccessfully, I must confess, because most of the juries have been “rigged.” It may have been my fault. I do beseech the Committee to allow us to have some opportunity of defending ourselves; but if we are to be accused of intimidating persons who are unknown, I say it will be wholly impossible to have any line of defence under the circumstances. I therefore do hope that the Government will say that the Conservative Act of 1875, which was the intelligence and the wisdom of Parliament of that day, and which is not yet out of date, shall guide them on the present occasion. And I do hope that the Government will see their way either to accept this Amendment, or to effect its object in some way more suitable to themselves.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I regret that the Attorney General is not here, as he might infuse a little common sense into the arguments from the other side of the House. If the Attorney General for Ireland had resisted the addition of this word on the ground that it was not necessary I could have understood him, though I could hardly agree with him; but when he contends that an intimidation which intimidates nobody is to be a crime and a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment with hard labour, it is, to my mind, maintaining a very reductio ad absurdum of law. No one is injured. If anyone is injured he can be specified. No one is intimidated. If anyone is intimidated he can be named. It is intimidation in the abstract, and intimidation that intimidates nobody, no human being being injured. No human being being produced, that is what you call applying English law to Ireland. I was glad to hear, a few moments ago, that the last Amendment was passed on the ground that English law was not strong enough for Ireland, and yet previously we were told that the Government were relying on the application of English law to Ireland. This is not the law of England or of Ireland, or of any rational country at all, and I hope hon. Members will go to a Division on the Amendment.

MR. CLANCY: I rise to reply to the remarks of the Irish Attorney General. I may say, as many were not here a while ago, that some evidence was given of the working of the Intimidation Clause of the Act of 1882. We then instanced several cases of a most extraordinary character, and no answer whatever was attempted to be given to these illustrations. The illustrations which we have given have been taken from the reports in the public newspapers of Ireland, including the Tory papers of Dublin—the organs of Dublin Castle. They are perfectly impartial newspaper reports. This collection of cases has been before the Irish public for several years, and so far as I know no effective criticism has been directed against their truth or accuracy. These reports show that the most preposterous use—the most extravagant use—has been made of the Intimidation Clause of the Act of 1882, persons being prosecuted who really committed no offence at all; and now we have, for the first time, a defence suggested—namely, that these cases probably do not exist at all. If that is the only answer that can be given I am afraid it is a very insufficient one.

MR. T. P. GILL: I think this is one of the most important Amendments that has yet been moved. It touches a very vital principle in this Bill; and that the Government should sit down so quietly, and not merely refuse to accept the Amendment, but refuse to give a reason for not accepting it, and say that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House should include this Amendment in what he considers trivial and not worthy of attention, is, I think, a very remarkable fact, and a very striking illustration of the spirit in which the Government are regarding the attempt we are making to modify the severity of this Bill. It is a principle new to English law that a person is to be charged with a specific offence when a charge of violence or intimidation towards another person is made, and when the person alleged to be intimidated or to be injured is not to be named in the summons. The effect of the clause as it stands, and if unamended, will be that persons and prisoners charged with intimidation under this Act will be absolutely deprived of anything like a tangible defence; because if you charge a man with intimidation, and do not mention the person whom he is alleged to have intimidated, I really do not see how a man can defend himself, and the framing of the clause in this fashion through the rejection of this Amendment, at any rate, simply means that the Government deliberately undertake to strike away from the persons to be charged with intimidation under this Act their only possible and proper method of defence. I really think that this is one of the Amendments which, if this Bill is to be anything like an honest adherence to the pretensions that the Government put forward in support of their Bill, should meet with acceptance from the other side of the House. We should like to hear from any English Law Officer who is familiar with instances which are occurring every day in England, and whose mind is not demoralized with familiarity with the freedom with which Irish magistrates and Judges and Law Officers deal with the law which they have to administer in Ireland—I should like to ask one of those Gentlemen to get up and either persuade his Colleagues on the Tory Benches to accept the Amendment, or else give us good reason why he thinks this very simple, but, at the same time, very important Amendment is to be rejected without a word of explanation.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): I quite agree with the observations of my hon. Friend, and I consider with him that this is a very important Amendment.

Mr. T. P. Gill

I would go further, and would say that it would be more candid on the part of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that they object to the retention of this word "intimidation," and to be ready to substitute for it a more intelligible and less drastic word.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is speaking to an Amendment which has been disposed of.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): There is something to be said with regard to the word proposed to be inserted, which I have had occasion to say before. We have often come to turning points in these debates. Everyone fancies he sees a turning point, and I fancy I see a turning point between the punishment of bond fide intimidation practised on individuals, and the condemnation which may be put by Resident Magistrates on public speeches or published articles in newspapers. I do think that this is not too much to ask that persons should be specified, either the individuals or those classes that are intimidated. I base my argument in this way. I think it would be impossible for the Government to prove their case, if they do not allege that some person or class of persons were intimidated. I suppose it is only a waste of time, as usual, to try and impress these facts on the Government. To my mind the position of the Government is logically clear enough; they want, or affect to want, to punish in Ireland, not merely criminals by act, but also criminals by word—that inconvenient class of persons who may stand up on public platforms and denounce individuals to their possible hurt. I quite agree that those who direct their speeches at individuals, either to intimidate or threaten them, ought to be punished; but, at the same time, I think that the Government ought consistently with that to safeguard the right of free speech and the right of free writing in the public Press. Unless this Amendment is made, the Government, through their underlings, the Resident Magistrates, will have the right to bring up any newspaper writer or public speaker—in fact, any man who may venture to think aloud in Ireland—and to allege that he has been guilty of intimidation, while they need not specify the intimidation.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I hope the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) will not suspect me of being intimidated by Lord Salisbury, or of having the least desire to dissent from the view the hon. Member has expressed of his sense of the importance of the insertion of the word "specify." But I hold that in the stand which the Government have, wisely or unwisely, taken—unwisely, as I think—it is not profitably taking up the time of the Committee to dwell any further upon this Amendment. I respectfully suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he should withdraw this proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Mr. Courtney, I desire to submit to the Government and the Committee the reasonableness of making a slight verbal alteration in the first words of the 26th line. As the clause at present runs—

"Any person who shall wrongfully, and without legal authority, use violence or intimidation to, or towards any person or persons with the view to cause any person or persons either to do," &c.

The alteration I suggest is that instead of the last "any" there should be inserted the word "such," so that it will read "with the view to cause such person or persons to do," &c. It may appear that that is open to the objection urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland some time ago in regard to another Amendment—namely, that it is restrictive of the clause as it is at present drafted. It is clear that the present wording of the clause is open to very serious objection. The idea of a man intimidating one person with a view to cause another person to do something or other is a little too far fetched. I dare say the Government will be prepared to adopt the Amendment; if so, I will not dwell upon it at any length. But what I want to point out is this—that at present, as the clause stands, you may have A summoned for intimidating B with the view not to cause B to do a thing, but with the view of causing C to induce D to do a thing. With a telescopic clause of this kind, it is impossible to say what a man may not be charged with in reference to the effect of his action on three or four parties of whose very existence he may not have had any more information than the man in the moon. I beg to move the substitution of the word "such" for "any."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 26, omit the first "any," and insert "such."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'any' stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I think the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. O'Connor) will see we cannot accept the Amendment, if he reflects that the intimidation directed against a wife to induce the husband not to do that which he has a right to do would be by this Amendment excluded from the purview of this clause.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In that case action could be taken under the Bill against the intimidator.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Moreover, the definition of the word "intimidation" would cover the case the right hon. Gentleman puts. The word "intimidation" includes "any words or acts intended or calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of property, business, employment, or means of living."

I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ought really to master his own Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: It is rather a hopeless task to move Amendment after Amendment; but I do ask the Government to consider the Amendment, No. 76, which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for North Donegal (Mr. O'Doherty). I think that if they do they will see that the words my hon. Friend proposes to insert will not materially weaken the powers given by this section. All the Amendment proposes to do is, that if the act which a party has a legal right to do is an act involving the violation of a contract or honourable obligation, that then persons shall have the right of animadversion.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 27, after "have," insert "without violation of a contract or breach of honourable obligation."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

[Twelfth Night.]

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth): The proposed words are entirely unnecessary, and really throw doubt on the words of the clause as they already stand.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman can have considered the Amendment carefully. The meaning of the Amendment is this—that if the act which it is sought to prevent by intimidation is of such a character that it would itself involve a breach of contract or breach of honourable obligation the Resident Magistrate is not to have the power of giving six months' imprisonment because the party who was injured by the breach of contract or honourable obligation chooses to animadvert upon the breach of contract in a manner which the Resident Magistrate chooses to construe into intimidation. That is the effect of the Amendment, and I really do not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General understands it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Mr. Courtney, Amendment, No. 82, is an Amendment which is designed to protect persons in Ireland who are simply exercising their legal rights. It is greatly to be apprehended that if the clause passes in its present shape Resident Magistrates will use it in a very improper manner, in order to force people to do what there is no obligation on them to do, but the omission of which they will construe into acts of intimidation. It raises in an indirect manner the question of exclusive dealing, on which we have never yet expressly had a decision of the Committee. Now, Sir, what I say is this—that as long as a man keeps within his legal rights no punishment ought to be inflicted upon him, no matter what Resident Magistrates may think about his action. If I, Sir, being a shopkeeper, and not being a licensed victualler or anyone under a legal obligation to supply certain goods, exercise my legal right and choose not to sell my goods to a particular person, I ought to be at liberty to take that course. Again, if I am a buyer at a fair, and choose not to buy of some person who has done something I dislike, surely I am only exercising my legal right if I do not buy from such a man, and ought not to be punished. The Government professes to be anxious to prevent intimidation. This is an Amendment to prevent intimidation by Resident Magistrates and other gentlemen occupying official positions in Ireland. It is an Amendment designed to preserve their legal rights to that vast body of the Queen's subjects in Ireland who take views upon political matters which are, no doubt, very offensive to Government officials in Ireland, but which, notwithstanding, it is perfectly competent for them to take. These persons ought not to be at the mercy of officious constables and Resident Magistrates who may choose to construe very innocent acts as acts of intimidation. I hope the Government, who say there is no freedom in Ireland, and that this Act is brought in to secure liberty for the people, will accept this Amendment, which is designed to preserve to a large class of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland the enjoyment of their legal rights.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 34, after "doing," insert—
"Provided nothing herein contained shall be construed to oblige or compel anybody to do any act which he has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which he has a legal right to do."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): Mr. Courtney, I confess I have difficulty in understanding the meaning of the words which are proposed by the hon. Member. As far as I can see, there is nothing in the Bill which does compel anyone to do anything whatever; certainly there is nothing to "compel anybody to do any act which he has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which he has a legal right to do."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I cannot understand at all the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. The ground upon which the Government cannot condescend to accept the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Maurice Healy) is that there is nothing in this section which compels anyone to do or not to do anything within his legal rights. A few moments ago the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to what took place in 1882; but he need not have gone back so far—it would have been enough had he remembered what took place a few days ago. I recollect distinctly that when we were discussing the 1st sub-section of this clause the case of the Government was that they created no crime whatever by the clause; and yet, later on, the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) moved words limiting the clause, by declaring that nothing shall be punishable except that which is already punishable by law. Under those circumstances, it must be assumed that the Government did intend to alter the law. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Holmes) had difficulty in understanding to what this Amendment would apply. I will give him an instance; suppose you went along a road whistling, it would apply to that. I know you have a perfect right to whistle on the road, yet we know that a boy of 12 years was committed to gaol for whistling at a policeman. I believe his sentence was afterwards commuted on technical grounds; but, at any rate, he was convicted by a Resident Magistrate, or two Resident Magistrates, of the very grave offence of whistling in the public streets. This Amendment would act as an indication to the Resident Magistrates that, although the Government did intend to give them enormous powers, they did not intend that the powers should be used for the purpose of punishing people for doing what they are perfectly entitled to do at present. This Amendment cannot possibly do any harm if the Government are anxious that the Act should be properly and fairly administered.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): The Government now seek to get rid of an Amendment by saying they do not understand it, and they are sure hon. Members opposite do not understand it. That is a very easy form of argument; but I think it has been proved all through these debates that we do understand what we are aiming at. Our object is not to give power to irresponsible tribunals of such a character as will enable them to play ducks and drakes with justice in Ireland. This Amendment is, in our opinion, exceedingly important, for it aims at preventing a grossly improper use of the powers given by this clause to Resident Magistrates. Under this clause, as it stands, there is no doubt in the world that the tenant who refuses to buy from his landlord at some exorbitant rate may be brought up and sentenced by the two gentlemen to whom the power of adjudicating will be entrusted; he may be charged with intimidation or exclusive dealing, because he has refused to do something which his landlord may desire him to do. We are strongly of opinion that we ought to press this Amendment to a Division; and I certainly think our constituents would be very discontented if we did not divide upon this occasion. I hope the Government will come to some reasonable understanding with us upon this very proper proposal of ours.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): It is very refreshing that we can propose Amendments which the Government do not understand. We have hitherto been met by every form of excuse for the non-acceptance of our Amendments; but this is the first time we have had the reason assigned that the Government cannot understand what we propose. We put an intelligent form of words on the Paper, and the Government simply say, "We do not understand it." The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) the other night said that an Amendment did not make the words of the Act any clearer: it seems that you are reduced to two replies; the first is, that the Amendment does not make the Act any clearer; and, secondly, that the Government do not understand what is proposed. This is a very convenient way of voting away the liberties of a people; but I submit that when you are dealing with a tribunal composed of Resident Magistrates the Government ought readily to accept Amendments providing that any acts legal in themselves should not be punishable. That is all this Amendment provides. In the section it is provided that a person who refuses to deal with another shall be penalized. The Government have been stumping the country with the idea that people have been deprived of the necessities of life by reason of what they call "exclusive dealing;" but, under this Bill, persons will be compelled to buy from people as well as to sell to them. I presume that this Amendment deals with that particular direction of affairs. If a man has cows to sell he shall not be able to compel people to buy his cows. I do think that, under the circumstances, the Government might provide a little illumination to their own minds by reading the words of the Amendment. We have reached the most extraordinary pass that the Government propose to get rid of Amendments by reason of the languor, or pretended languor, of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who illustrates his languor by his posture at the present moment, or by the mental languor of the Attorney General for Ireland, who says he will not apply his mind to the understanding of our Amendments. I will not refer to the First Lord of the Treasury, because he understands everything that is said and done in this House; it would be unfair to apply any ordinary rules to the right hon. Gentleman. But I will take as the apex of intelligence on legal points the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), and ask him whether there is anything in this Amendment which the Government can really object to? This is a proposal that nothing in this clause shall be construed to oblige any person to do any act which he has a legal right to abstain from doing. For instance, if land-grabbers can allege they have been prevented from selling their cows by particular people, these people will be sentenced for refusing to buy the cows, because the Resident Magistrates, knowing nothing about the matter, will side with the land-grabbers. I will recall to the English mind a very old maxim, "Do unto others as you would be done by." Would Englishmen propose to apply this section to themselves; if this is so good for Ireland why do you not apply it to England; why do you not provide that the requirements of this section shall be applied to your own dealings in this country? You will not do that. Something may be said in favour of making it penal to refuse to sell to individuals; but, at any rate, why should the refusal to buy be made a penal offence? The Government say they desire nothing that they would not make the law in England. If that is so, I should imagine that when an Amendment is proposed providing that no act legal in itself shall be construed by the Resident Magistrates to be illegal the Government would have jumped at it, if we can conceive the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland indulging in any such activity. The Attorney General for Ireland says he cannot understand the Amendment. I would like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he were in Court, would it be fair to meet an argument by saying he could not understand it? He must understand the Amendment; he is paid to understand it; and I submit that there is nothing clearer to the ordinary mind than to say that if a particular act is legal in itself it shall not be rendered illegal by any construction of law. To refuse to buy from any individual is a perfectly legal proceeding. The Government, only a half-an-hour ago, set forth by adopting a system of exclusive dealing. They said that there are certain Amendments they will exclusively deal with, and that there are other Amendments they will not deal with at all; they really mean to Boycott certain Amendments, and allow me to say that is what we complain about. If you say it is fair, we say, from our point of view, our proceedings are equally fair. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—who is the chief of the tribe of exclusive dealers—I ask him to say whether he does not consider it is a perfectly legal thing to refuse to buy from persons of opposite politics? I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will say that such a thing is perfectly legitimate. Under those circumstances, I ask the Government to reconsider their decision. It is really prolonging debate for the Government to treat us as they are treating us at the present time. Besides, the present system of dealing with Amendments is not a wise one; because all the Amendments they are now passing by can be put down as new clauses. If you treat our Amendments with contempt now, we shall simply be compelled to bring them forward as new clauses upon Report. I trust the Government will see their way to act in a logical manner in regard to the reasonable Amendments we propose.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): If there is anything more likely to occur than another, it is that a hunt in a certain district will be stopped, and there is nothing more certain than that farmers have a perfect right to prevent hunting over land in their possession. The Attorney General for Ireland will not deny that the holder and occupier of land has a perfect right to prevent people from hunting over his ground. Now, what occurred in the County of Waterford in December, 1883? On the 22nd of that month, 34 tenant farmers and labourers were prosecuted for interfering with the meet of the Curraghmore Hunt. The majority were respectable men, but that did not prevent their being prosecuted. The evidence against them simply established the fact that they shouted, but committed no violence, or used any threats. Well, for merely assembling together and shouting, some of these men were sentenced to a month's imprisonment with hard labour, others were sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment, and an application to have the imprisonment increased to a month for the purpose of having an appeal, was actually refused by the Resident Magistrates. On this occasion a rather remarkable incident occurred, and one which is extremely suggestive, and which shows what will happen under the administration of Acts like this. On the table were found printed forms of committal regularly filled up and only awaiting the magistrate's signature, the name of the convicted, and the amount of punishment awarded. It was quite evident the forms were filled up before the conclusion of the case, and immediately after the witnesses for the prosecution had given their evidence. I should like to know what answer the Attorney General for Ireland has for a case like this; he cannot deny it occurred. If he does deny it, I refer him to the public newspapers of the time, December, 1883; he will find the case reported in the Tory Papers as well as in the Nationalist papers. If he denies that this thing has happened, will he deny that it may happen under the present Act, and will he deny that it will be a reasonable thing to prevent such a case recurring. It is perfectly preposterous to imagine that a farmer in Ireland has not a perfect right to prevent any landlord he chooses from hunting over his land; and under this Act, unless this Amendment is adopted, you will have plenty of prosecutions in Ireland of farmers obnoxious to particular landlords for preventing them hunting. All I can say is, that I do not think it will conduce to the peace and good order of Ireland to have a clause like this, capable of being worked in such a fashion. If the Bill of the Government is to produce disorder, their wishes will speedily be realized.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I think that after the speeches which have been addressed to the Committee recently, the Government can scarcely plead obtuseness in regard to this Amendment. I think its scope is clear; it is a protection against an ill use of the clause as it stands. We have had the possible manner in which the clause can be applied fairly illustrated by the case of hunting, and I can endorse everything said by my hon. Friend (Mr. Clancy) in regard to the manner in which this clause will be made to apply in order to compel people to allow hunting to take place over their lands. Unless this Amendment be accepted, the Act will be reduced to an absurdity. The police, in the tyrannous exercise of their discretion, will commit such acts as will reduce the Act of Parliament to an absurdity. The police, I know, will be tempted to compel one labourer to speak to another. We have had the case of a boy being brought up for whistling at a policeman; is it not possible to conceive the case of a man being brought up for not speaking to his neighbour? The police may compel shopkeepers to sell to people whom they have no desire to trade with; they may compel a baker to sell his last loaf of bread to an obnoxious individual, although that loaf may be required for his own family. [Laughter.] It is quite possible that these things may be done in Ireland; it is a very easy matter to laugh at these things, but I can assure hon. Members that they are very likely to occur. After the illustrations we have given, the Government ought to accept the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): Mr. Courtney, I beg to propose the omission of the word "riot," in line 35. No doubt, hon. Members of the Committee understand by "riot" some very serious occurrence. The ordinary idea is that a riot means the breaking of heads and great danger to property; but in point of law it is nothing of the kind; I will give a simple illustration. If two or three persons, one of them believing he has a right to get possession of a farm from which he has been evicted, join together and use violent language or violent gestures and take possession of the farm, that in law is a riot. Now, the Attorney General for Ireland, I am sure, will not contradict that. It is most important when we are dealing with an agrarian question about which there are a great many disputes, that we should not put it in the hands of Resident Magistrates, as is contemplated by this sub-section. If half-a-dozen people, as constantly happens, take possession of a farm, I do not think it ought to be within the power of a Resident Magistrate to punish the people by sentencing them to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. I am sure that is never intended. I do not know whether it is intended by the Government, but I do not think it is intended by the Committee. The Resident Magistrates of Ireland ought not to be entrusted with such power, and, therefore, I move this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 35, leave out "riot or."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'riot or' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I object to the Amendment.

Ms. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think that the Amendment is a perfectly reasonable one. The riots of which the Government complain are generally riots which take place at evictions, and a riot taking place on such an occasion would be quite covered by the 1st sub-section dealing with a conspiracy, or by the sub-head of Sub-section 2 of the clause which deals with assaults committed on officers of the law in administration of the law.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Mr. Courtney, I now rise to move the omission of the words "or unlawful assembly." I think, no doubt, I shall be met with the usual stock argument that these words were included in the Act of 1882. That was so; but we must look at these words in connection with Clause 7 of this Bill, which will carry the matter infinitely further than was ever contemplated in the Act of 1882. In the discussion on the Act of 1882 it was promised by the then Government that that Act should never be put in force for the purpose of putting a stop to political agitation of any kind, and as a matter of fact, it was never so used; and I am informed that there never was a prosecution under this particular section to which we are now referring. In this Bill hon. Members will see, on referring to Clause 7, that it will be possible for the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim and prohibit at any time any association which he believes to be dangerous, and having so declared the association to be a dangerous one, then any meeting of any kind or assembly in connection with that association would become an unlawful meeting, and under the clause now before the Committee, it will be possible for any person taking part in any such meeting, or practically any part in the combination alluded to in Clause 7, will become liable to be imprisoned with hard labour for six months. That appears to me to be a very dangerous power to give to Resident Magistrates. You are practically giving power to the Lord Lieutenant to put an end to every kind of political agitation, or to any combination of an agrarian character. However, I do not propose now to enter fully into a discussion of Clause 7; but I mention it for the purpose of showing that we must scrutinize very closely the section now under consideration. What I want to understand from the Government, in the first place, is what they intend by the words, "unlawful assembly;" and, secondly, what they intend by "take part in any riot or unlawful assembly." It is quite true that there are certain dicta of the Judges which would carry "unlawful assembly" very far, and, I believe, it has been said by some people that the mere assembling together for an unlawful purpose is an unlawful assembly; but, so far as I can make out, that is not the view of the best lawyers on the subject, and that unlawful assembly has a much more, a very much more restricted sense. In the Criminal Code an unlawful assembly is defined as an assembly of three or more persons to carry out any common purpose in such a manner as to disturb the peace or to provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously. What I wish to ascertain from the Attorney General for Ireland, or from the Attorney General for England, is that whether in that restricted sense they understand the words "unlawful assembly," or whether they understand them in the much vaguer and wider sense? What is the meaning of the words "take part in?" I have consulted able lawyers on this question, and many of them believe that the words "take part in" mean merely being present at an assembly. Well, is that the sense in which the Government intend these words to be construed? Do they really mean that persons merely being present at such meetings will be liable to be imprisoned for six months with hard labour? On this point there have been various decisions given in the Law Courts, and although I do not find that any person has ever been indicted for taking part in an unlawful assembly—the indictments generally run for tumultuous and unlawful assembly, which is a very different thing. A very important case arose out of the Gravesend election in 1869, and in that case it was laid down that any persons who were present at a tumultuous and riotous meeting, but did not actually take part in the riot, although they were immediately concerned with persons who did take part in it, were not guilty of any offence. The Court even held that the person who actually employed a number of persons who took part in the riot, was not guilty of any offence. Do the Government mean to convey that persons present at a meeting are to be liable to be indicted? These words are apparently unknown to the law at present, certainly they have never been included in any indictment. At present, I do not wish to do more than raise the question as to what is the real meaning of these words. As they stand, they are words of the very vaguest description, and are not such as can safely be interpreted by that very ignorant class of persons—namely, the Resident Magistrates. At present, there is always the protection of a jury and the higher Judges of the land in such cases, whereas, now, what is proposed is to relegate these cases to inferior Courts. I beg to move the omission of the words.

Mr.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 35 and 36, leave out, "unlawful assembly."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'unlawful assembly' stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I may reassure the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to the first part of his remarks, by reminding him of a fact he will not dispute—namely, that he himself voted for a precisely similar clause in 1882. I cannot agree that this is not a legitimate argument to use; however, I will not refer to the action of previous Parliaments, but will deal with this sub-section on its merits. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of a fact with which, I think, he can hardly be acquainted, though the Attorney General for Ireland has just alluded to it—namely, that last Wednesday the Committee decided to extend this particular sub-section, not merely to proclaimed districts, but to unproclaimed districts. The hon. Member for Cork told us just now that he did not at all believe that the section was good, but that if it were adopted it should be adopted impartially. If the thing is bad in itself it ought to be restricted to the narrowest possible limits. If the Committee decided that it should be extended to the whole of Ireland, whether the whole of Ireland was proclaimed or not, I take it it was the fact that the whole of the Committee were of opinion that the provision is in itself a good one. What we know of recent Irish history is ample ground for thinking that that opinion is correct. Why do hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway desire the provision to be extended to the whole of Ireland? The reason probably is that they think the Government would not proclaim Ulster, where there are likely to be unlawful meetings which should be dealt with summarily.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: No; riots.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member included the whole of the section. The argument was that there might be unlawful assemblies, and that these should be dealt with summarily. Undoubtedly, what we know of judicial proceedings in Ireland confirms that view. What was it that constantly happened at the trials which were held after the Belfast riots? Why, it happened that the Judge frequently instructed the jury that those who were brought up for trial were not guilty of riot, but were guilty of taking part in an unlawful assembly; and it was on that instruction from the Judge that the jury found them guilty. If that course had not been adopted by the Judge these people could not have been found guilty of unlawful assembly. They could have been found guilty of riot; but they would not have been open to summary jurisdiction. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says that in these cases accused persons ought to have the protection of a jury. The right hon. Gentleman cannot be aware that a Royal Commission sat on the Belfast riots and reported on this very question; and, according to the Report of that Royal Commission, one of the things recommended for the prevention of these riots—which are a disgrace to Ireland, and I here speak of Ireland as a whole—was the adoption of a summary mode of dealing with the offenders. If the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman is carried it would be impossible to punish rioters in the North of Ireland by summary conviction. I have not rested my case on the precedent of the Act of 1882, but I have rested myself on facts which are notorious. I have shown the Committee that the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into this question of rioting in the North of Ireland conclusively proves that if this Amendment is carried a blow will be struck against public peace and order in that part of the country; and for this reason, if for no other, I would ask the Committee to reject the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman has asked one or two questions upon legal points which I think he ought not to have asked. He asked what taking part in an assembly was? I would reply to his question that taking part in an assembly is a question of fact, and means, not being present in the neighbourhood of such an assembly, but taking part in it and voting at it. But I am not capable of entering into legal discussions with the right hon. Gentleman upon imaginary cases. Taking part in an assembly, I say, is a question of fact which has consequently to be decided by the tribunals of the country, and the tribunals which exist in Ireland are perfectly competent to determine such cases. The reasons I have given, drawn entirely from the North of Ireland, are quite sufficient, I think, to convince the Committee that whatsoever else we do, we should seriously weaken the strength of the clause if we were to accept this Amendment.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I would press Her Majesty's Government to answer this question as to what the meaning of taking part in an assembly is? Does it mean simply voting at a meeting? The right hon. Gentleman himself has drawn a distinction between taking part in a meeting and taking an "active" part in one.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have done nothing of the kind. I have drawn no distinction; but have said that taking part in an unlawful assembly means taking an active part.

MR. JAMES STUART: Then I ask what taking an active part in a meeting is? This is an important question, and I desire to know who are to be held the persons taking an active part in an unlawful assembly—is it those who are present at the meeting; is it those who summon the meeting; or those who vote at the meeting? Does it include these? The right hon. Gentleman says that it does not mean those who are in the neighbourhood of the meeting and are not taking part in it.

MR. COLERIDGE (Shoffield, Attercliffe): I observe there is another question which has been asked and has not yet been answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It is a most important question, and it is whether or not the Government intend to limit by this Act the definition of "unlawful assembly?" ["No, No!"] If they do not, I presume the "unlawful assembly" which is intended to be meant by this Act is unlawful assembly as known to Common Law in England, and not as known or as defined by this Act, or as known under the heading of an assembly of a dangerous association. I think the Committee can hardly be aware of the extremely vague terms in which "unlawful assembly" under the Common Law of England has been described. I will simply quote one case to show how enormously wide the description of "unlawful assembly," as it has been laid down, is. I will mention the well-known case of the Peterloo massacre, where the Judge laid down and defined the law as to unlawful assemblies in these words—

"All persons assembled to sow sedition and bringing into contempt the Constitution are in an unlawful assembly. All persons assembled in furtherance of this object are unlawfully assembled."

I may mention, also, the fact that persons have been convicted under indictments in this country framed in the following language:—

Mr. A. J. Balfour

"For unlawfully, maliciously, and seditiously meeting for the purpose of exciting discontent and disaffection, and inciting the subjects of the Queen to hatred and contempt of the Government and Constitution of this Realm as by law established."

[Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen cheer that language; but I say that the only thing that has prevented that law from being grossly abused in this country has been the right of trial by jury, and if this law is to be laid down as applicable to Ireland, and if Resident Magistrates are to administer the law as laid down in those terms, I should like to ask whether there is a Resident Magistrate in Ireland who will not consider every political meeting of every sort or kind in Ireland an "unlawful assembly?"

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I think I can describe to the right hon. Gentleman what is meant by taking an active part in a meeting. He first attempted to draw a distinction between taking a part and taking an "active" part. I think I heard him ask whether the reporters who come to attend a meeting or an unlawful assembly would be considered by the Resident Magistrate as taking part in that unlawful assembly and would come under that Act? Would the right hon. Gentleman opposite do me the favour to say whether those people would come under the Act or not? He is silent; but the Resident Magistrates—I am speaking from their recorded action—are not silent upon the point. We have a case where two reporters were sent to prison for four months for attending a meeting in the ordinary course of their duty, just as a French journalist or English journalist might be sent to prison at any moment for doing so.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should like to ask upon what kind of evidence is a person to be convicted? As I have always understood the law in this country, or the practice of this country, people are exceedingly jealous of any punishment on taking part in meetings; and above all things it is required that there should be the fullest proof that a meeting did take place, and that the people refused to disperse when called upon to do so, and that there was violence exercised. I have had a wide experience in these matters, and in many instances I have attended the places where the meetings were proclaimed and forbidden to be held, and there can be no doubt that the mere fact of my presence at those places, in numberless instances, would have been held by the police to constitute in the case of the people gathered there taking active part in an unlawful assembly. In Rosslea, for instance, no meeting took place, and there was not the slightest intention to hold any meeting. The police, however, and the Government reporter stated that a meeting did take place, and the police dispersed some people in the streets. Though I say no meeting was held, and though it was not proposed to hold a public meeting, nevertheless, the police charged the people and scattered them, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that if this section of this Bill had been in force at that time, the people in the streets of Rosslea would have been liable to be brought up and convicted for taking part in an "unlawful assembly" on the evidence of the very policeman who apprehended and batoned them in the streets. If I had been examined under such circumstances my oath would have been to the effect that no meeting took place; but that would not have availed anything, because the people had gathered into the town, and the magistrates would have held that an "unlawful assembly" had taken place, and every one of those thousands of people would have been liable to imprisonment under this clause. A practice of the most scandalous and mischievous character as to meetings of this kind exists in Ireland. What was done in this case? Why a Proclamation was issued on the Saturday subsequent to the publication of the Saturday newspapers, prohibiting the meeting which it had been announced 10 days before was to be held. Under those circumstances, how was it possible that people could be prevented from attending? That kind of thing has been done for 40 years. In the days of the Clontraf meeting, the same thing was done, and unquestionably with the deliberate intent of producing bloodshed. A meeting was proclaimed on Saturday, and messengers had to be on the road all Saturday night in order to do what they could to prevent people from attending. What I have described is the usual practice in Ireland; for no matter what notice the Executive gets of the meeting, they generally proclaim it on a Saturday morning too late for the newspapers.

[Twelfth Night]

and consequently the people do not know of it. It is a fact, then, that even where really and truly an assembly which could not be described as a meeting has taken place, parties may be charged with having taken part in an unlawful assembly when they are seen walking about the town in which a meeting has been proclaimed; and that may be tried by the magistrates, who, probably, may have been the very persons who instructed the police to charge the people.

MR. A. COHEN (Southwark, W.): I would remind the Committee that during the discussion on the Crimes Prevention Act my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) was asked what meaning he gave to "unlawful assembly," and he said that an unlawful assembly, in point of fact, was "an inchoate riot—a meeting called together with the intention of using force. That was an ordinary question which the magistrate was bound to decide." I agree with that opinion; and I am only supporting the Amendment because I want the Government to state what they mean by the words "unlawful assembly." When a magistrate has the power of summary conviction for an offence, the offence ought to be clearly established by Statute, or ought to be so defined that it will be clearly known to the law. I submit that these words "unlawful assembly" have not a legal meaning which is perfectly clear and defined; and if Her Majesty's Government will place in the Definition Clause a definition of "unlawful assembly" similar to that contained in the Draft Code proposed by the late Sir John Holker, who was Attorney General in one of the late Conservative Governments, I, for my part, will not oppose any word in this clause. I am, however, opposed to these words "unlawful assembly," because Her Majesty's Government have not condescended to tell us distinctly what they mean by them. Every lawyer will agree with me that when "unlawful assembly" has been described as an inchoate riot by such an authority it is necessary that some limitation should be observed for the protection of those who may be in the locality. Some of Her Majesty's Judges, in connection with riots, have pronounced dicta which extend the meaning of "unlawful assembly." It is quite true that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General described those dicta as fossil dicta the other day; but it must be remembered that dicta of this kind are respected in every judicial Court and cited. But in face of these dicta it really cannot be said that there is a definite and clearly-ascertained meaning to be given to the words "unlawful assembly." Now, what objection can there be on the part of Her Majesty's Government to giving these words the same definition which is contained in the Draft Code that I have referred to? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland says—"See what the consequences will be." Well, I cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman at all. He spoke about the Belfast riots: Why, if the definition given in the Draft Code had been adopted, undoubtedly those persons who took part in the Belfast riots would have been found guilty of taking part in an "unlawful assembly." If the definition I suggest were adopted by Her Majesty's Government, all persons found guilty under such circumstances would be found guilty in accordance with the definition contained in the Draft Code. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite desires to keep the law as vague and obscure as possible, in order to enable the Resident Magistrates to imprison whom they please, it is well for them not to adopt any definition; but I cannot conceive that, for a moment, to be the intention of the Government. It would be undignified, and would be discreditable to the wisdom of the Legislature, and to the ability and intelligence of the Government as statesmen. I, therefore, appeal to Her Majesty's Government to say whether it is our duty, or whether it is not our duty, to give the Resident Magistrates a clear idea of the offences with which they have to deal. If it is true that there is some obscurity as to the meaning of the words "unlawful assembly," ought we not to clear that obscurity away and give a proper definition? The only thing I ask Her Majesty's Government to do is to put in the Definition Clause some definition of those words, and then I think there can be no objection to the clause. It seems to me that it is our duty to object to these words until we know for certain that there will be some clear definition given to them. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman opposite adopts the definition that was given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, when he was conducting a similar measure through this House. If the right hon. Gentleman adopts that definition, then let it be put in the Definition Clause. If he does not adopt it, then really he ought to tell us what meaning the Government attach to these words. The only object I have in view is, if possible, to take care that the offences contained in this clause are clearly defined, so that the Resident Magistrates may know over what offences they have jurisdiction, and so that innocent persons may not be kept in gaol for long periods.

Mr. Dillon

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down seemed to me, during a portion of his observations, to have forgotten that the Amendment moved and supported by the right hon. Gentleman opposite is an Amendment to omit the words "unlawful assembly." Now, we decline to accede to this Amendment, because we believe that it would materially injure the clause to omit these words. What is an unlawful assembly? A great deal has been stated about words of art, but, so far as I understand words of art, they are to be found in the words "unlawful assembly." These words are to be found again and again in Statutes, and in none of these Statutes is there a definition of the words. I am asked what, then, is the meaning of them? The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has stated what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) when a similar question was put to him in 1882. The right hon. Gentleman replied that the words meant "an inchoate riot." I think that, in a short space, we could not have a better definition than that. But the right hon. Gentleman used one word or two afterwards which did not very well harmonize with our view of the law; but, at any rate, those words which the hon. and learned Gentleman has quoted we agree with. But why did not the hon. and learned Gentleman—for he was a Member of the House at the time—get up and ask the right hon. Gentleman to define the words "unlawful assembly" in his Bill? There is no such definition in the Act of 1882. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not make that speech then, because he was at that time supporting the Government. He takes a different attitude now, because he is in opposition. The Attorney General for England may consider the adoption of some definition; but, whether he takes one view or another, the words "unlawful assembly" are perfectly intelligible to every lawyer in every Assize town in Ireland. The expression "unlawful assembly" is a term of art. It has never been suggested that every collection of people in a town is an "unlawful assembly." The hon. and learned Gentleman speaks as though "unlawful assembly" is an interchangeable term with "public meeting;" but that is not so. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says that this particular provision in the Act of 1882 was never put in force.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said no summary conviction had taken place under it.

Mr. HOLMES: There were summary convictions obtained, both for riots and unlawful assemblies; but they were unlawful assemblies in the ordinary way. As I have already said, those words were a term of art. We can no more attempt to define "lawful assembly" than we can attempt to define "riot." We adopt the term in its usual sense, and in no other way. We ask the Committee to adhere to the words which appear to us to be most important to the North, the South, and, in fact, to every other part of Ireland.

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, of course, has to defend the Bill; and in this case, he objects to the Amendment because, as he says, the words "unlawful assembly" are a term of art, and he very wisely adds, have a definite meaning in English Law. He went on to give us the definite meaning that those words have in English Law. He told us that they meant "an inchoate riot," or a meeting called for the purpose of riot, and that he acquiesced in that opinion. He objected, then, to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House arguing the question as "if unlawful assembly were a term interchangeable with public meeting." Now, allow me to refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the terms of his own Bill. Let me remind him that, under Clause 6, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he deems it to be true that dangerous associations exist in any part of Ireland, may issue a Proclamation merely stating the fact, and putting certain clauses in force, and then under the next clause of the Bill, he is able to use proclamations to show what he considers to be an unlawful association. Having begun upon that foundation he may declare any association to be a dangerous association, and—

"From and after the date of such order, and during the continuance thereof, every assembly or meeting of such association, or of the members of it as such members in the specified district shall be an unlawful assembly."

Now, Sir, I would draw the attention of the Committee to this fact—that the only Proclamation that will come before Parliament is a blind one, stating that, in the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland an unlawful association exists, and under the next clause he would have perfect power, without any control being exercised by this House, to put in force the Act against every meeting of such unlawful association as an unlawful assembly. Well, Sir, in the face of that, is it possible to say that in this Act the term "unlawful assembly" means a meeting called for the purpose of riot? The very moment the Proclamation is issued by the Lord Lieutenant, and before any meetings are called, whatever meetings may in the future be held, are already declared unlawful. Is it possible to argue that the Lord Lieutenant, by some extraordinary prescience, will know a week before a meeting takes place that that meeting will be an inchoate riot? I ask, is it possible that the Committee will allow such an enormous change to be introduced into the law? Up to the present we have had a clear and distinct definition of unlawful assembly in England. You are giving very great despotic power, and, therefore, I trust the Committee will pause before they allow such a definition of unlawful assembly to pass.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Col. N.): I desire to correct a statement which was made by the right hon. Gentleman Mr. Shaw Lefevre who introduced this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said there were no prosecutions for political meetings under the Crimes Act of 1882. As a matter of fact, there were several prosecutions under the Act of 1882, not merely for riots, but for unlawful meetings, and it is very curious that one of the prosecutions was against two gentlemen of the Press who had gone to a meeting for the purpose of reporting the proceedings. A Resident Magistrate named Mr. Perry, a gentleman who is still in the Commission of the Peace, ordered the representatives of the Press off the ground where the meeting was to be held. They protested against the order, saying that they were present in the performance of a duty to the public, and that, in the interest of the public and of the people present, they had a right to be there. The two reporters were summoned and convicted for being present on the occasion. Curiously enough, the Presiding Magistrate on that occasion is one of the very gentlemen who will have the carrying out of the present Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) instanced the case of the Belfast riots; but the case of those riots do not bear out the right hon. Gentleman's argument. He intimated that unless the Belfast rioters could not have been tried on a charge of unlawful assembly, they could not have been convicted. But this section is not only to bring people guilty of unlawful assembly to justice, but it is, also, to transfer the trial of such persons from juries to Resident Magistrates. Now, in the case of the Belfast riots, it is well known—it was said by the Chief Secretary himself—that justice was obtained, for the jury convicted every one of the rioters. It seems to me that that is an argument in favour of the Amendment, and not against it. An hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Anderson who spoke from these Benches a while ago) expressed a doubt as to the intentions of the Government; he said he did not believe the Government intended to give power to Resident Magistrates to ferret out everybody who might be disposed to take possession of farms from which they had been evicted, and send them to prison. If he has any doubts on the subject we have none. We know exactly what they are about to do: we know what they want to do under this Act. They want to put down political agitation altogether in Ireland, and the readiest means of doing that is to entrust the administration of this section to tools of their own, to men who will be completely under their thumb, and who, experience has shown, are capable of being bribed, and will be bribed by special promotion for special services under this Act.

Mr. Clancy

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The difficulty in this case has arisen from the use of words which bear a double meaning. The words "unlawful assembly," as I understand them, have a very different meaning in the popular mind from what they have technically or in indiotments. If you once admit that a riot ought to be punished summarily, it would be absurd to exclude the offence which has been described as "inchoate riot." If the Government mean that the words must be taken in their technical sense, why do they not so express it in their Act? They say there is no necessity for a definition, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) has told us that no lawyers are capable of giving any meaning to the words unlawful assembly. Permit me to remind the Government that this Act will not be administered by lawyers, but by Resident Magistrates; and though it is quite right to say that no lawyer would think for a moment of regarding a public meeting as an unlawful assembly, there is the gravest danger that two Resident Magistrates, unlearned in the law, may take that unreasonable course. And allow me to say also that the definitions of unlawful assembly in the legal text books are sufficiently ambiguous to warrant Resident Magistrates taking that extraordinary course. In Roscoe's Criminal Practice, one of the best legal text books, I find that—

"Any meeting whatsoever of great numbers of people as would endanger the public peace and raise fears and jealousies amongst the Queen's subjects seems properly called an unlawful assembly."

There is hardly a meeting you could hold in Ireland on any subject which two Resident Magistrates would not hold to be a meeting calculated to "raise fears and jealousies amongst the Queen's subjects." I suppose the Irish landlords are not yet excluded from the category of the Queen's subjects; and I suppose, a great number of meetings held in the course of the land agitation were eminently calculated to raise fears and jealousies amongst that class of Her Majesty's subjects. Still it would be a monstrous thing that because meetings were calculated to put terror into landlords' hearts, so far as their rack-rents were concerned, all persons taking part in those meetings should be liable to be sent to gaol for six months with hard labour. The same writer, citing the language of Mr. Justice Bailey, says—

"All persons assembling to sow sedition and bring into contempt the Constitution is an unlawful assembly."

There have been some thousands of meetings held by Nationalists in Ireland during the past half-dozen years; and I venture to say there was not a single one out of the thousands at which language was not used which two Resident Magistrates would not consider was calculated "to sow sedition and bring into contempt the Constitution." That being so, it is really too much to expect us to believe that when this vague language is used in this Act of Parliament, there is no danger that two Resident Magistrates will not misconstrue it in the manner I have mentioned. Then the writer goes on to say—

"If the meeting held is from its general appearances and all the surrounding circumstances, calculated to excite terror, alarm and consternation, it is criminal and unlawful."

Surely, when you have a well-known text-writer describing the offence of unlawful assembly in language so susceptible of misconstruction as that, it is really monstrous to say there is no necessity for a definition of the words. I have only another word to say, and that is in regard to the second point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). He referred to the words "take part in." Hitherto, in order to prove the offence of unlawful assembly, it was necessary to show that the person charged took an active part in whatever was illegal in the assembly. It was not sufficient to show that a man was present; it was necessary to show that he was there concurring in whatever the illegality of the meeting was, and taking part in the illegality. Unless you clearly define the meaning of the words taking part in, there is not the slightest doubt that two Resident Magistrates in Ireland will consider that to be present is to take part in an unlawful assembly. Upon both the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman, we are entitled to hear something more from the Government.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I merely wish to say a word in explanation. When I stated a short time ago that no prosecution took place under a similar clause to this in the Act of 1882, I did so on what I believed very good authority—namely, two or three hon. Members sitting below the Gangway. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Clancy) has quoted three or four cases which took place, but it seems to me they took place under another clause of the Act of 1882—namely, the clause empowering the Lord Lieutenant to suppress meetings which he believed to be dangerous to the public peace. Therefore, I might be quite right in saying that no prosecution took place under the clause of the Act of 1882 dealing with unlawful assemblies. One of the cases mentioned by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Clancy) was certainly very significant as bearing on the other point I referred to—namely, as to the meaning of the words "taking part in." It appears that two reporters were actually prosecuted, and sent to prison for attending to take a report of the proceedings of a meeting. If that is to be taken as the meaning of the clause now under consideration—if reporters who are present for the purpose of taking a report are to be sent to prison with hard labour, I must say, to me this seems a very harsh measure. If the Government will undertake to give a definition of unlawful meeting in the terms of the statement made by the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), I shall be quite content, and shall not divide the Committee; but if they are not prepared to give any such definition, I think the Committee will do wisely to divide.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 263
Noes 145: Majority 118.—(Div. List,
No. 174.) [12.15 A.M.]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): In consequence of the understanding arrived at to-day, I beg now to move that you, Sir, do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. [Interruption.] I wish the right hon. Member opposite would not shake his hoary locks at me in that way. As I understand, it was arranged by all sections of the House that, in order to prevent a sitting of the House to-morrow, we should agree to-night to take those discussions which would otherwise come on to-morrow. I must say I arrived at that determination with great reluctance. If we should meet to-morrow, well and good. We should commence the discussion of those subjects on which we are interested in the afternoon, if we had an Afternoon Sitting, but we should not finish the debate, and we should have to go on with it again afterwards, because I do not see how it would be possible for us to discuss the question, which it is proposed to raise, at an Afternoon Sitting. We should have to meet again in the evening. We should be kept here until 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, we should all lose our trains to-morrow night, and should come down here after dinner, and go on as I say until 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning. It is understood in a proposal emanating not from this, but from the other side of the House—from the Government themselves—that we shall agree to report Progress at an early hour. I may be entirely mistaken in thinking that this is an early hour (1.30 A.M.), and if so I withdraw the expression. But as I understand it, the Government gave an undertaking that at half-past 12 o'clock, the Committee should agree to report Progress. I put it to every Gentleman who has not been present during our debates to-night, whether we have not made substantial progress with the Bill. I put it to those hon. Gentlemen who have not been here to-night, and who now see the amount of work which has been got through in their absence, whether we have not made wonderful progress? They have got nearly the whole clause, or, at any rate, as far as line 36. In order to show that the remainder of the clause will take a long time to discuss, I may point out that the clause lays it down that it shall be unlawful for a person to retake possession of any house or land from which he has been ejected within 12 months' of the writ of ejectment; but in the Bill of 1882, as originally drafted, the period was only six months. Well, Mr. Gibson, now Lord Ashbourne, in 1882, moved to extend the period from six months to nine months, and he did so in the absence of the Irish Members who were suspended. Now, however, the Government propose to extend that period from nine months to 12 months. If we have to meet to-morrow, well, we must meet to-morrow. Nobody will enjoy a meeting to-morrow more than I shall myself; but it seems to me that in view of the Officers of the House, including Mr. Speaker, it is extremely desirable that we should prevent, if possible, another day's debate. In mercy to the Officers of the House I now beg to move that you, Sir, do report Progress.

Mr. Maurice Healy

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith) (Strand, Westminster): I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that there was any understanding that we should report Progress at this hour. For the private convenience of hon. Members, believing it to be the desire of the House generally, we agreed that the adjournment might take place this evening if possible, instead of to-morrow; but I intimated that I thought it only reasonable that this clause should be disposed of to-night; but I do not desire to press hon. Members to carry on subsequent discussions in any way disagreeable to them. I understood it to be their wish that we should complete the Business to-night, so as to render it unnecessary to meet to-morrow. I, however, consider it imperative that we should make some distinct progress. I think the progress we have made to-night has been sufficient to show that with a little more consideration the Committee will be able to dispose of the whole of this clause this evening. I hope the hon. and learned Member will consent to withdraw his Motion, and will allow the Committee to dispose of the very few questions that now remain to be decided.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Government has a right to demand some substantial progress to the clause this evening; but I think the right hon. Gentleman is not correct in saying, or in assuming, that the Government have not already made very substantial progress; and all I can say is that if they compare the amount of progress made to-night with the amount of progress made every other night since this Bill came into Committee, they will find that the progress to-night will bear a most favourable contrast with the progress of other nights. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad that statement receives the assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Then I take it that they quite agree with me in the statement that the First Lord of the Treasury has succeeded in the purpose for which he set out this evening—namely, of making substantial progress in the clauses of this Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not know whether hon. Gentleman opposite, who seem inclined to interrupt, have done us the honour to attend here during the whole of the evening. I think the large majority of them were not in their places during the dinner hour this evening. Let me point out to them—and to the Committee generally—that to-night we have got through a whole sub-section and a portion of another sub-section. [Interruption.] If I am met with this interruption all I can say is this, that hon. Gentlemen will find that on another occasion we shall not be willing to enter into any kind of contract. We shall insist on being listened to with patience and courtesy; or, if not, we will see if those who give an example of discourtesy and impatience can possibly get the better of us. I say we have disposed of a whole sub-section containing some of the most complicated and delicate and, as we think, most oppressive portions of this Bill. ["No, no!"] Well, I should like the First Lord of the Treasury to point to a single instance in reference not only to this Coercion Bill, but any Coercion Bill in which Parliament has ever been engaged, in which so much progress has been made in a single evening. Let me point out a mis-statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He seems to think that in agreeing to an adjournment this evening, instead of to-morrow, he has been merely yielding to an appeal made from this quarter of the House. But that is not the fact. We agreed to the arrangement because we thought it convenient to the right hon. Gentleman and to his Followers and to the Committee generally. So far as we are concerned, we are quite willing that the House should not adjourn to-night, but that it should meet again to-morrow. In point of fact, I may say that in assenting to the adjournment to-night we did so at the sacrifice of what we considered our rights, and at a sacrifice, to a large extent, of our feelings; because we have a strong desire—and I suppose many sections of the House have a similarly strong desire—to discuss some other subjects besides the Coercion Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, from his view of public duties and from his view of the importance of the Coercion Bill, has brought us to such a position that no opportunity has been left to us for independent discussion, or for the discussion of any other topic whatever, no matter how small or how large it may be. Everyone who is acquainted with the House knows that the Motion for Adjournment for a vacation is always seized by Members for bringing before the attention of the Committee generally those topics which they are precluded from discussing at every other period of the Session. Well, we are anxious to take advantage of this opportunity and bring before the attention of the country—and especially before the attention of our own country—certain matters connected with the administration of the government in Ireland. I understand, also, that several Members who represent Scotch constituencies, and who have been precluded from discussing questions of great importance to those constituents, are anxious to take advantage of the Adjournment in order to bring those matters before the attention of Parliament and their country. I suppose there is scarcely a section of this House—with the exception of the Party opposite—who are not anxious to raise a subject which they regard as of importance, and which they have been precluded from debating at all previous periods of the Session. That being the feeling on this side of the House, the right hon. Gentleman would regard it as a concession from him to us, that we should have an opportunity of discussing the present measure, or, perhaps, a concession from us to him, that we should prevent the opportunity we so earnestly desire of discussing these matters which are of interest to us. The right hon. Gentleman should act in the spirit of give and take. We have surrendered to him the opportunity of discussing matters of great importance to our people—that is, of discussing them at a time when those matters can be properly discussed and brought before the notice of the public, at the same time, we ask him to give us an opportunity of taking those discussions before the small hours of the morning, when discussion really becomes farcical. I am astonished that the right hon. Gentleman should have made such a proposal as that we should give him the whole of the clause. He knows that part of the clause is Sub-section 4, and deals with the re enactment of the Whiteboy Acts. [Cries of "No, no!" and "That is to be withdrawn."] I am glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman has agreed to withdraw that part of his Bill at the Report stage; but if he looks at the 5th sub-section which he has not withdrawn, he will find that it raises some questions that we must insist upon having discussed. Under the circumstances, I must say that, seeing the concession we have made to the right hon. Gentleman this evening, and seeing the amount of progress we have made not only in what we have passed, but in the number of Divisions we have avoided, and in having foregone our right to full discussion on the matters we wish to bring forward, I think the right hon. Gentleman might very reasonably now assent to reporting Progress. There is a matter of great interest to the whole House generally—namely, the appointment of the Committee into the Army and Navy Expenditure, and that is to be discussed to-night. The composition of this Committee is a matter of great importance. [Cries of "Question!"] If hon. Members opposite will have patience with me, I will show that I am perfectly in Order. I am showing the importance of the Business that is awaiting discussion. I am showing the right hon. Gentleman that there are many persons deeply interested in these matters, and that they may desire to discuss them at full length. I sympathize with those hon. Members in their view, and, indeed, I desire to help them in their discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Perhaps the Government will allow me to say that I think they are somewhat under a misapprehension as to their powers of getting through the whole of this clause to-night. As I read the Rules, they cannot put the clôtüre on this clause, except when some Amendment has been previously carried. Now, if a Motion to report Progress is moved, I do not think the Government would be in order, in view of the ruling that has been given, to put the whole of the clause. The best way, I think, to bring matters to an issue is to go to the marrow of the powers of the Government. It is no use talking of sentiment; but let us go at once to the root of these powers. That being so, I would impress upon the Government the desirability of considering whether we could not agree to some terms to-night without further imposition of those Rules of Clôture. The Government will remember that in the Act of 1882, when this clause was under discussion, a great many hon. Gentlemen opposite were in the bosoms of their constituencies, and had not been born to Parliamentary life. At the time of which I am speaking, several nights were devoted to the discussion of this clause, which did not possess many of the objectionable trimmings which are now attached to it. If it took six or eight nights to discuss it in its naked character, how many more ought it not to take now? The Conspiracy section, we must remember, gives to Resident Magistrates the powers which hitherto have only been given to juries, and there are two or three of those powers yet remaining to be discussed. They are most important questions, and how, I ask, can they be disposed of at this late hour of the night? [Noise and interruption.] Unless intelligent Gentlemen opposite will abstain from making noises, it is impossible to carry on what really amounts to a legal argument. Hon. Gentlemen get excited at this hour. I do not know why it is. We do not object to what I may call—[Cries of "Order!"—] I am giving a reason why the Government should not press this matter to any further length to-night; but hon. Gentlemen come in to sit in this House, because it is the most pleasant part of the building to sit in, and instead of listening to what is going on, they make noises that are really intolerable. [Cries of "Order!"] I say, that to insist upon continuing the discussion at this late hour of the night is not fair. Hon. Gentlemen opposite do not understand what is going on. [Cries of "Order!"] I am not saying that in an adverse spirit, but am putting it in what I conceive to be a most reasonable way. I think right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite could reasonably concur in the Motion for Progress on the understanding that it was not we who initiated it. It was not we who initiated the proposal to report Progress at an early period of the evening. It came, I assert, without fear of contradiction, from Her Majesty's Government, and from them alone. [Cries of "No!"] What occurred came through the "usual channels," and as the communications that were made were of a private nature, we are always averse to declaring them in the House. But I state the fact that the proposal that the House should adjourn to-night came from Her Majesty's Government. ["No, no!"] I am stating what I am conscious of, and of which I suppose hon. Gentlemen opposite are not. I say this proposal proceeded from Her Majesty's Government. ["No, no!"] I hope hon. Members will allow me to finish without contradiction. I say that the proposal that we should adjourn to-night, instead of to-morrow night, emanated not from this side of the House, but from that. ["No, no!"] I hope Her Majesty's Government will not press us for details; but if they do, we will state the facts, sorry though I should be to have to do so. I say that it was a communication which came from the other side of the House, from the Government Benches and from a Member of Her Majesty's Government, which induced us to assent to the proposal. [An hon. MEMBER: When?] To-day, at Question time. I will put it in this way—a proposal came from a Member of Her Majesty's Government, who is classified as "one of the usual channels," that we should agree not to take discussion to-morrow, but should allow the Adjournment to be taken to-day. We said we agreed to that, with this limitation—provided that there was an understanding that you will agree to report Progress at 11 o'clock. That was met by saying—"We cannot agree to report Progress at 11 o'clock; but we think that it would be reasonable to report Progress about 12.30." Well, we waited until 12.30 before moving to report Progress on the distinct understanding that that would prevent us from meeting to-morrow. If we are to meet to-morrow, let it be at 4 o'clock. ["No, no!"] They will not agree to anything. Let us adjourn until to-morrow, until 4 or 4.30, but do not let us meet at 2, in order to take a discussion which will be talked out at 7 o'clock, and which will necessitate our meeting again at 9 o'clock. Let us meet at 4 o'clock, and discuss the matter in a regular way. If the Government elect to go on to-night, let it not be with the idea of getting this clause passed. Let them discharge that idea from their minds altogether. They may make progress with the Amendments; but I beseech hon. Gentlemen to purge their minds from any idea of getting the whole clause to-night. I speak as an expert in this matter.

[Twelfth Night.]

Dr. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to know if we are to adjourn to-night, or to meet to-morrow? The hon. Member for Ross-shire (Dr. McDonald) rose to bring a matter before the House the other day, when the clôture was moved, and that question we are still anxious to bring before the House. We want to have the question of the manner in which the Crofters Act is administered discussed by the House.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: It is not necessary for me to repeat the proposal which was made. The proposal to adjourn the House to-night came to me from the other side of the House.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: From whom? Mention the name.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I say what I believe to be true. A representation was made to me, and I assented to it on the terms that I have stated in the House. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are, I believe, in the habit of accepting statements that I make in my place in this House. An hon. Member asks me if time will be allowed for discussing certain questions that he desires to raise. I say again, if it is the desire of the House to meet to-morrow, I shall make no difficulty whatever in moving the Adjournment until to-morrow. I wish to meet the wishes of the House on this matter, but I certainly feel that I am entitled to ask that the Committee should make reasonable progress to-night.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I have not the least desire to throw any doubt upon the right hon. Gentleman's account of what happened to-night; but the right hon. Gentleman must be perfectly aware that it is absolutely impossible to get this clause to-night, if on account of nothing else but the 5th sub-section. ["No, no!"] Well, if hon. Gentlemen will take the trouble to look at Sub-section 5, apart from all other matters, they will perceive that it contains much that needs very great improvement, and that it will take a very long time to discuss after we have got through the intervening Amendments. Clearly it is the feeling of the House that we should not meet to-morrow; but as we shall not meet to-morrow, I think the right hon. Gentleman will consider it reasonable that we should not adjourn for the Whitsuntide Recess without any opportunity being given to us for some of those discussions which always take place on a Motion for Adjournment. [Mr. W. H. SMITH: Hear, hear!] I am glad the right hon. Gentleman agrees with that statement. That being the case, and it being impossible to take the whole clause, would it not be more reasonable now.—[Interruption.]—If hon. Gentlemen think they are going to get the clause to-night I can assure them that they are hoping for a physical and moral impossibility. Would it not be more reasonable, I say again, to accede to the Motion to report Progress, and have the discussion on the Motion for Adjournment, which always takes place when that Motion is made, to-night instead of to-morrow afternoon?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am really very sorry not to be able to accept the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, which I am sure was intended to be conciliatory; but I think I am not unreasonable in asking that further progress should be made with this Bill. The Government intend to postpone Sub-section 4, and when we reach Sub-section 5, I do not think it will be necessary to discuss it at very great length, at any rate, to such a length that the Committee would be prevented from coming to any conclusion upon it. At all events, we have gone so far that I think we ought to make some effort on the eve of the holidays to complete at least as much of our work as will satisfy the country. [Laughter.] I say at least so much of our work as will satisfy the country that we are discharging our duty as legislators.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): As I asked a Question at the commencement of the sitting of the House, and as there seems to be some difference of opinion as to the terms in which the proposal for Adjournment was made, I, perhaps, may be allowed to state what took place. Under ordinary circumstances, I should not do so, as it was a private communication; but still, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), which is perfectly correct so far as it goes, and after the statement of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), it is only right that the Committee should know what actually took place. I was sitting in my place this afternoon when I was asked to go out and speak to the Patronage Secretary for the Treasury. He said to me he believed there was a desire—for the sake I believe of the officials of the House—that the Adjournment should take place to-night. He ask me whether I thought Gentlemen on this side of the House would assent to it. I said that they probably had certain observations to make on the Motion for Adjournment; but that if that Motion were made at a reasonable hour, I thought it possible that they would assent. I came back and spoke to the hon. and learned Member for North Longford and the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and they suggested 11 o'clock. I said that that was rather early, under the circumstances, and I further said—"Suppose we say about 12 o'clock." I then went out and spoke to the Patronage Secretary for the Treasury, who seemed to think 12 rather early, and suggested 12.30. I said there was very little difference between us, and therefore we would say between 12 o'clock and 12.30. It was in deference to the wishes of right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Benches and their Supporters that I asked the question. Certainly I am bound to say—when I am challenged in this way—that the proposal did come through the ordinary channels of communication.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Question again proposed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: A distinct statement has been made by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). This involves the good faith of the Government.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise to Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman says this involves the good faith of the Government. I say it does no such thing.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a point of Order; but it is usual to allow any Member of the House to give an explanation.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to recall to the Committee the statement I made when the Question was asked of me at half-past 5 o'clock. I then stated distinctly the conditions upon which I should be prepared to move the Adjournment of the House. I do not call in question any impressions which hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may have entertained; but I am bound by what I say in the House. I am sure it will be for the convenience of Parliament that only such engagements as are made by a Minister in the House should be the only engagements recognized and adhered to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think that when a Member of the Government comes to us and says—"Will you, in the interest of the officers of the House, agree to so and so?" and we say "Yes," faith should be kept with us. We, personally, are really foregoing a great deal. We are foregoing a discussion to-morrow upon the imprisonment of Father Keller, a matter of vital importance to us; and we are also foregoing a discussion as regards Lord Ashbourne sitting in the Court of Appeal. I am very glad that the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas) is now in his place. I have found him invariably courteous, and anxious to deal with his opponents in a most considerate manner; but I must say I knew nothing of this proposal until it was conveyed to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere); and when it was so conveyed, I said—"We will not agree to give you the Adjournment to-night, unless you agree to move to report Progress early." It is perfectly true that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) said—"We must see what progress is made;" but there is nothing inconsistent in that with the facts. I maintain that if the usual channels of communication are to be poisoned at their source, and you cannot rely on private communications made by the Members of one Party to the Members of another Party, you might as well give up altogether all the decencies and amenities of Parliament. [Ironical cheers.] I am not proud of them. I do not care a jot for them. We do not care what you do with your own. But I maintain that you must play a game according to the rules of the game. If in playing the game, you send one of your men to us with a particular proposal, and we accept it, that proposal, good or bad, ought to be respected just as you would respect a flag of truce. We shall hear from the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas) whether we have misunderstood the message conveyed to us. Certainly, we agreed to forego a sitting to-morrow out of consideration for the Officers of the House. We thought that, by sitting a bit late to-night, we could obtain the explanation we wanted, and thus save the Officers of the House coming down to-morrow simply for the Adjournment. At the time this agreement, or disagreement, was made, there was not a single word said about getting the clause to-night.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. W. H. SMITH: When I answered the Question at the commencement of the Sitting I distinctly said that was the condition.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In the language of the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke), the right hon. Gentleman's words have gone to the printer. What we understood the First Lord of the Treasury to convey was, that he hoped the clause would be passed to-night in the regular order of discussion. But surely, Sir, when we have given up the entire belly of the clause—if I may use that expression—the Intimidation Section, which took three or four nights' discussion, if it did not take a week's, in 1882, you ought to call that fair discussion. The Government have got numbers on their side, and I have no doubt we shall be ousted out of what we consider to be an honourable understanding, and the result will be, you will discuss this matter for some time. There will be no satisfaction; you will not get the clause which is the main object of the Government; you will meet to-morrow, and bring down the Speaker, his clerks, and the entire staff of 50 or 60 men; while, perhaps, the Gentlemen who are now howling us down will take the 2 o'clock train to the country.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS) (Kent, St.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Augustine's): As a misunderstanding appears to have arisen in this matter, perhaps I may state what took place. It was represented to me that Members on both sides of the House were desirous not to come down to-morrow simply to vote for the adjournment of the House, as was the case at Easter. I stated that I could make no arrangement with any hon. Members on that point, but that any arrangement which was come to must be come to across the floor of the House. I suggested that a Question upon the point should be addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) from the other side of the House, and I also intimated that I believed the right hon. Gentleman would be perfectly prepared to assent to any such proposal providing fair progress be made to-night with the Bill. I believe I have stated exactly what took place, and I am sorry there should have been any misunderstanding.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he will not bear me out in the statement that I had not made any proposal of any sort or kind to him when he beckoned me out of the House and suggested to me I should ask hon. Gentlemen behind me whether they would agree, on the terms suggested, to the Adjournment being moved to-night?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I was not in the House when the hon. Gentleman spoke upon this subject, and, therefore, I am not quite certain what he said. It was quite correct that he did not come to me and ask me to make this arrangement. I asked him if he could bring out the Leader of the Party below the Gangway, in order that I could ascertain whether the intimation conveyed to me came directly from headquarters.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 263: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 175.) [1.10 A.M.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I now claim to move, "That the Question, 'That the words from "within," in line 37, to the words "any part thereof," in line 39,' be now put."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Mr. Courtney, I rise to a point of Order. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to move that the words—

“Within twelve months after the execution of any writ of possession of any house or land, shall wrongfully take or hold forcible possession of such house or land or any part thereof.”

What I wish to submit to you, Sir, is that this portion of the sub-section has not been discussed—[Cries of “Oh, oh!”—not a single Amendment—[Renewed cries of “Oh, oh!”]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR: That no Amendment has yet been proposed to it, that no discussion has yet taken place upon it, and that, in accordance with the ruling you gave some nights ago, the closure is not to be applied until all Amendments—[Cries of “Order!”]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR: Until all Amendments which raise any point worthy of discussion have been discussed.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask your ruling, Sir, on a point of Order which has been raised to-night—namely, whether it is competent to put the Question that certain words of a clause stand part of the Bill until, first and foremost, the closure has been moved to a substantial Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no point of Order raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O’Connor). The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) has raised a point of Order. What I alluded to at the beginning of the evening was this—When a Motion is before the Committee, the closure could not be applied to a Motion to insert further words lower down until the Motion before the Committee was disposed of. That is what I laid down. There is now no Motion before the Committee; but the closure has been moved immediately after the Motion to report Progress has been disposed of, and I apprehend it is possible to move the closure at this point.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I submit to you, Mr. Courtney, that, on the wording of the Closure Rule, it is not competent for the right hon. Gentleman to make this Motion. Allow me to refer you to the terms of the Rule—

“After a Question has been proposed, a Member rising in his place may claim to move, ‘That the Question be now put;’”

and then it goes on—

“When the Motion ‘That the Question be now put’ has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair; and also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) That the Question That certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put. Such Motions shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate.”

I submit to you, Mr. Courtney, that the words “When the Motion, ‘That the Question be now put’ has been carried,” govern the whole of the paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN: I made my first answer under a wrong impression. created, possibly, in the confusion of the Committee. I thought that the Motion to report Progress had been clôtured. If that had been clôtured, there would be no necessity for hesitation in clôturing the present Motion. I must own, however, that closure cannot be applied to a Motion to add words until it has been applied to a previous Motion. It is not a point which raises any substantial difficulty, as it is very easy to see a way to get over it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move that you do now leave the Chair, and I do so, Mr. Courtney, on the ground that we are confronted by a position of considerable difficulty. I submit to the Government that it is unreasonable to take the next Amendment without discussion, in view of the facts which arose in 1882. I would remind the Government of what took place in 1882. In the clause as it originally stood in the Bill the term was only six months; but when we Irish Members were all expelled from the House, Mr. Gibson—now Lord Ashbourne—moved to make it nine months. Of course, under the circumstances, no discussion was possible upon that proposal. The Government, however, now propose to make it 12 months. I would submit to them that seeing that the term was increased from six to nine months when the majority of the Irish Members were expelled from the House, it is perfectly unreasonable now to seek to make it 12. I would move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member, having moved to report Progress, cannot now move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But I have made a Motion—

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Dr. KENNY (Cork Co., S.).

MR. T. M. HEALY: I say I have made a Motion—

THE CHAIRMAN: And I tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that he cannot make that Motion, for he made the previous Motion that the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Then, Sir, I will move that you do now leave the Chair.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I claim to move that the Question be now put.

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 259; Noes 113: Majority 146.—(Div. List, No. 176.) [1.35 A.M.]

Question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair," put, and negatived.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I claim, Sir, to move—

"That the Question 'That the words—“(b.) Within twelve months after the execution of any writ of possession of any house or land shall wrongfully take or hold forcible possession of such house or land or any part thereof,” stand part of the Clause,’ be now put.”

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 253; Noes 116: Majority 137.—(Div. List, No. 177.) [1.50 A.M.]

Question put,

"That the words—“(b.) Within twelve months after the execution of any writ of possession of any house or land shall wrongfully take or hold forcible possession of such house or land or any part thereof,” stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 253; Noes 119: Majority 134.—(Div. List, No. 178.) [2.0 A.M.]

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for North Donegal (Mr. O'Doherty) I rise to move the Proviso of which he has given Notice. It is to the effect that, in the carrying out of this Bill, before proceedings are instituted against any person for taking possession there must have been an actual riot or an actual assault in connection with the affair. Now, Sir, it may to some appear absolutely unnecessary to insert such a Proviso. To the English, who are accustomed to see laws administered in their own way, it may appear altogether unnecessary. But, Sir, we have experience of somewhat recent date in Ireland which shows that, during the administration of the previous law, it was not deemed necessary that there should be anything in the nature of an actual breach of the peace, or anything in the nature of a riot, or anything in the nature of an assault attended by actual bodily harm, for the purpose of enabling the police to institute prosecutions under a similar section to this. Repeatedly, during the operation of the last Crimes Act, prosecutions were instituted, and convictions were obtained before special magistrates, and men were sentenced to considerable terms of imprisonment with hard labour simply for acts of ordinary trespass. Surely it is monstrous that a mere civil act of trespass, which in this country might give rise to a civil action and to a claim for damage, if any damage was done, should be made a criminal offence in Ireland because it happens to be done in Ireland. There is no reason for that, and if hon. Members who talk about equal laws and equal administration for England and Ireland would set a good example, and show their adherence to their principles by voting in favour of my Amendment, they would do something to justify people in believing that their professions are sincere. Furthermore, the Proviso goes on to state that—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Before the hon. Member proceeds further, I must express the opinion that the latter part of the Proviso is not at all relevant to the clause. The hon. Member proposes a Proviso in these words—

"Provided always, That no prosecution for this offence shall be instituted by the Constabulary unless there has been an assault or rioting in the taking of such forcible possession, nor shall the Constabulary act as caretakers for any evicted house or land left without a caretaker, nor shall they specially patrol in the neighbourhood unless they apprehend some disturbance of the peace other than the mere resumption of possession, nor shall they interrogate occupiers, or in any way take side with the plaintiff or defendant in such writ of possession save to keep the peace between the parties."

The Proviso should stop at the words "forcible possession."

MR. M. J. KENNY: The reason why my hon. Friend put down the remaining portion of his Proviso was this—that the Crimes Act came into force in 1882, and a Circular was issued to the Constabulary ordering them to patrol in the neighbourhood of evicted farms, and watch the proceedings of the tenants.

THE CHAIRMAN: That would be a very good reason to discuss the question on the Constabulary Vote; but it is not relevant here.

MR. M. J. KENNY: Well, I will discuss it on the Constabulary Vote, and I will now move the Proviso down to the word "possession." I have practically stated the reason for moving the Amendment, which is now a very short and simple one. It is simply to provide that something in the nature of a riot or assault must take place before a prosecution can be instituted under the section. It has repeatedly happened under the administration of the Whiteboy Acts that for simply walking about on their own land, for simply walking across their own land, men have been seized, prosecuted, and transported under the Whiteboy Acts. Under the last Coercion Act, they were sentenced to imprisonment for three months or six months. I think that if the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) were here, he would see his way to admit the reasonableness of this Proviso. I do not know what attitude the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) may assume. He may be so enamoured of the Criminal Law of Ireland that he will not let us make any change; but I should, at any rate, like him to explain why an offence which is merely a civil matter in England should be made a crime punishable with six months' imprisonment with hard labour in Ireland. I beg to propose the Proviso standing in the name of my hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 39, after the word "thereof," to insert the words—"Provided always, That no prosecution for this offence shall be instituted by the Constabulary unless there has been an assault or riot in the taking of such forcible possession."—(Mr. M. J. Kenny.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It is not the effect of this clause, nor is it the intention of the Government, to make anything a criminal offence in Ireland which is not a criminal offence in England. The clause refers to holding forcible possession; but if the words which the hon. Gentleman has moved were inserted, they would take out of the operation of the section most of the cases in which forcible possession is taken. As a rule, there is no riot or assault in taking forcible possession. What occurs is this. Eight or ten men may come down and, in a threatening way, take possession. Of course, under such circumstances, it would be impossible for a caretaker to resist. Two men might come down armed, and naturally the unarmed caretaker would run away at once. That is taking forcible possession. Then, suppose a man went down, broke open the doors, and walked in. That is not a riot, or an assault; but, at the same time, it is taking forcible possession. All these, which are typical cases of taking forcible possession, certainly in Ireland, would be excluded from the operation of the clause by the adoption of the hon. Member's Proviso.

MR. M. J. KENNY: What about holding possession?

MR. HOLMES: That is precisely the same thing.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): If hon. Gentlemen opposite and some hon. Members above the Gangway on this side of the House would carefully study the clause, they would come to the conclusion that, as it at present stands, the pains and penalties which will be attached to anybody—to any evicted tenant, or to any number of tenants—are simply alarming. Take the case of a tenant who is evicted in the very depth of winter, at a time when, possibly, he has no other protection against the inclemency of the weather except the cabin from which he has been evicted. We will assume the case of this man taking "forcible possession" by getting in through the window or through the roof. Would it not be monstrous, under such circumstances, to decide that that man had taken "forcible possession?" I contend that if the Committee pass this clause without examining it very closely, and accepting a safeguard such as this Amendment would provide, they will act very harshly. I am perfectly certain the Committee would be slow to pass such a clause as this if they could trace it to its real and logical conclusion. It is all very well to be told by Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench that the law is the same in England as is proposed for Ireland under this clause. But what cases of eviction have you in England? In Ireland the chronic condition of the people alternates between eviction and the workhouse. It is very possible that, under the present condition of things, evictions will be largely increased; and you propose to put it into the power of two Resident Magistrates, who have no sympathy with the people, whose training and entire surroundings make them look upon the smallest infraction of the landlords' rights as monstrous crimes—you put it in the power of these men to treat the smallest and most trivial offences as forcible possession punishable by six months' imprisonment. If, however, you accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, the Constabulary will not be able to institute a prosecution unless there has been an assault or riot. I appeal to the Committee not to vote on these technical definitions of legal Gentlemen on the Front Bench, but to apply their own common sense to this sub-section. If they will only do that, they will find there is nothing in this Amendment which really takes away the strength of the clause—there is nothing which will prevent the magistrate or the law punishing men who have taken forcible possession, and who have by violent means assisted the Sheriff and his officers. By the Amendment you only interpose a safeguard to prevent unfortunate people—the poorest of their class—who in many cases have been treated with exceptional cruelty and barbarity for what, after all, is a most trivial offence.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I have personal cognizance of cases which are totally opposed to the statements of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes). I had occasion, some time ago, to mention one case in this House. It was a case in which on a certain stormy night, a man got up in the cabin in which he was sheltering himself, and when he saw the house from which he had been evicted, and which he had hoped would be his own—when he saw that house suffering from the storm, he forgot for the moment that the police caretakers were located near, went to the house, and put some stones on the roof to prevent the thatch being blown away. Now, that man was actually brought before the Resident Magistrate, under this clause, for taking forcible possession, and he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. He actually served a month's imprisonment in Tralee Gaol. In another case, an old man named Boyd, over 72 years of age, was evicted, and after his eviction, and before the nine months' term had expired, he went to Listowel, and, on the faith of a settlement, went back to his cabin without having received in writing a formal permission to do so. The police found him in possession of his house. He was prosecuted, and sentenced to a month's imprisonment for it. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) talks to the Committee about bodies of armed men coming down and forcing people into possession. But no man in his senses would maintain for a moment that the case I have mentioned was a case of anything like forcible possession. I could cite cases like that by the hundred to show that there is some need for such protection as is now proposed in regard to these miserable wretches who are turned out of house and home, and to show that there is not the least necessity for visiting with the utmost severity of the law those men who merely seek their old cabins for shelter. A man who goes back into his dwelling can be summoned and fined. He can be fined every time he goes there, and every time his wife or children are found there. Surely it is sufficient punishment for those miserable creatures to be summoned and to have cumulative fines imposed upon them. The law, as it stands, is what I call coercion made easy. Surely the operation of the ordinary law is enough for the Government in such cases as these.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I had thought, Sir, that if we were to have expressions of humanity from any

Mr. Flynn

Members of the Tory Party at any time, this would have been the occasion upon which we should have heard them. I should like to put in plain language to Tory Members what they are now going to vote for if they reject this Amendment. When unfortunate wretches are turned out on the roadside with their wives and children, if the inclemency of the weather renders it absolutely necessary to take shelter in their old huts, no other shelter being obtainable, the mere fact of their taking the hasp off the door and going back, if it is only to put the women back, renders them liable to severe punishment. Cases have occurred in which, for the sake of sheltering shivering women and children from the winter's snow, an old hut has been re-entered, and the police have taken up the man and sent him to gaol and to the plank bed. Is it too much to expect that, under such circumstances as these, miserable people, with no place under which to lay their heads, should have the poor protection we now seek to obtain for them? I ask you, who are comfortable in your beds at night, is it too much to ask that you should accept this Amendment? And when they go back you call it taking forcible possession. In God's name, is this a House of human beings? Are we in Ireland to be treated like dogs? If, in our poverty, we are unable to pay the miserable rents exacted of us, is the mere fact of taking the hasp off the door of the house that we have ourselves built, or that has been built by our fathers—is the mere fact of taking the hasp off the door in order to put back a shivering wife or a shivering child out of the winter's snow, to subject us to the punishment you would inflict under this clause of 12 months' hard labour? What was done by Lord Ashbourne in 1882, when we Irish Members were out of the House, was one of the most miserable things ever perpetrated in this House. When we were out, Lord Ashbourne, behind our backs, moved to make it nine months' imprisonment instead of six months'. And now what does this Tory Government do? They say they are acting in accordance with the precedent of 1882, and yet they make it 12 months. You have been reminded that you have the ordinary law to fall back upon. You can put these men in gaol for trespass.

You can proceed against their children for trespass. You can take them up before the magistrates, who are the landlords of the locality, or the landlords' agents. Do have some little humanity in your hearts. I would say a word for the ordinary magistrates of Ireland. When cases come before them in which wretched men are prosecuted for putting their cold and starving women back in their cabins for a night's shelter their hearts are moved, but the Resident Magistrates commit men to prison for it. We hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) defending the action of the Government on the ground that men come down in crowds to put these people, by force of arms, into their dwellings. But if it is merely the case of a man taking the hasp off his own door, in order to put back his wife into his miserable, unfurnished, almost roofless cabin, for the sake of keeping her and her children from the wind and rain, where is the force of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument? Have you wives and children of your own? Can you feel no pity for these children? This clause does not prevent wrong being done even when a question of title is raised. A question of title may be raised, a suit may be entered, and a decision may be ultimately arrived at, as in the case of Father Keller, in which, on Saturday last, it was decided that the imprisonment was illegal. I would beseech the Committee to consider these points. Surely if they will take into consideration all the matters that we have brought under their attention they will give some play to human feeling. Can you not see that it would be sufficient to put this clause in operation where force is used to regain possession of a house and holding? It is useless to appeal to the Irish Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour), but surely an appeal of this kind cannot be lost upon Tory Gentlemen who have a duty to their consciences and to their constituents. I have here a case that occurred in 1882. It was published in 1883, before the Act got into working order. It says that a large number of men surrounded a dwelling-house, under the impression that the tenant and his family, who had been evicted, were in the habit of visiting it at night as a place of shelter. These men—they were policemen—searched the place, but did not find the man there. The wife and children were found sheltering in the house, but the man was spending the night on the mountain side. My God, is it not enough to turn the man out? Is it not enough that the man should spend his nights upon the bleak mountain side, but you must needs send him to prison for giving his wife the only shelter he can find for her—a cabin which was his own, and which is used by no one else?

[Twelfth Night.]

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have seen men and women with families of little children, this winter and last winter, in the midst of some of the most wretched weather that we have known for years, turned out of places in which they have lived for years, and in which hon. Members opposite would scorn to put their dogs. I have seen these people living in the ditches of the bleak country-side, within sight of what were their homes.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: A damned pack of assassins. [Cries of "Name, name!"]

Mr. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): Name away! name away!

Mr. DILLON: No man could, for a moment, doubt that what drove those people out of their homes was absolute and unquestionable poverty. And, if that be true, who is there in this House who can deny that there are men in Ireland who have no bowels of compassion for these wretched people, and yet who have the sanction of your laws for their doings? You refuse us this small concession. The poor starving wretches who crawl into their own homes at night, or put their wives and children into their cabins, and themselves go and lie out in the ditches, you wish to have dragged off for 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour. Do you grant us no concession on behalf of these people? Do you give your sanction to scenes like those which have been described to you? You can weep crocodile's tears over the Glenbeigh evictions; but we who live in Ireland know that hardly a day goes by that deeds are not done as black as those of Glenbeigh. Hardly a week of my life has passed, when I have been living in Ireland, that deeds of that kind have not occurred. The Glenbeigh case became known in England by an accident; because the fool who carried out the eviction was idiot enough to pour oil on the roofs of the people's houses, that he might burn them out. What difference did it make to the people that their houses were burnt? I say it would be a mercy to these people to burn down their houses. Burn the houses if you like; but do not pass these plausible laws, which are defended by the Attorney General for Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman talks about armed bands taking possession. Let me tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that, for one case in which these armed bands take possession of these miserable holdings, I can point out 50 cases where, instead of going with arms in their hands, these poor wretches have crawled back to their homes, unarmed, defenceless, beggared, starving, and in rage, from the ill-treatment of your laws, and wishing for nothing more than to be sheltered in their misery from the winter weather. And yet you listen to no appeal of this kind. You will have this clause put in force against these men, who come without arms in their hands. You want to be able to say to these poor wretches—"Lie in your ditches, and if you dare to creep back into your miserable hovels for a night's shelter, Parliament is going to send you to prison."

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I should like to say just one word more before this Division is taken. I wish to put it to the conscience of every individual, so that he cannot say he was voting blindfold in this matter. We have made two appeals to hon. Gentlemen opposite. We now appeal to you, sitting on this side of the House, who are their masters (the Liberal Unionists). We ask the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) whether he is willing to allow this clause to be inserted in its present form in the Bill? He knows that the tenants on his father's estates in the district of Lismore, in the county of Waterford, are as honest a people as there are in the entire world. Now, it is proposed that if one of those tenants is put out, and goes back to his cabin for a night's shelter—for any kind of shelter, for a dog's shelter—or even if he, without force, puts his wife and children back into the miserable hut he built himself, or where he has lived all the days of his life, he will be liable to be sent to prison. I ask, is it unreasonable that we should stand up in this House and make these appeals to men under circumstances of this kind? It is impossible; it is repugnant to the feelings of men that such appeals should be made without effect. And all I can say is that, when you on the last day are appealing for mercy to One above, I hope that you, or those of you who are opposing this Amendment, will never find it.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 237: Majority 119.—(Div. List, No. 179.) [3.0 A.M.]

THE CHAIRMAN: The decision just arrived at rules the next Amendment, No. 96.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): That being so, I wish to ask the Government if they have any objection to an Amendment providing that unless some question of title should arise the section should not apply? I asked a Question to-day about the case of Kevil against King-Harman. That was the case of a tenant being prosecuted for taking turf on what he said was his own bog. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) contended that it was his bog, and the magistrate insisted upon arbitrating upon the case. The case was taken to the Queen's Bench, and the magistrate's decision was ousted. Here you give absolute discretion to the magistrate. No question of title can be raised. I think the least we can get from the Government, seeing that questions of title will arise, is that the section should not apply until the disputes have been settled. I had a case the other day of a man being ousted from a wrong holding. There was a distinct question of title there. I had another case in which a Captain Fagan ousted a tenant from his holding without any right or title whatsoever. The magistrate who would be a friend of Fagan would, under this section, have given the man six months' imprisonment for going back. I think when questions of title are involved we should get the benefit of the doubt. Unless the Government mean to pass this Bill by mere brute force they will accept the words which I propose.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after the word "thereof," to insert the words, "unless a question of title is raised."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I hope the Committee will consider for a few moments the Amendment which has been proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It would have the effect of inciting persons to take possession of land by violence if any question of title was raised. The cases put by the hon. and learned Gentleman have nothing whatever to do with this section. If a Sheriff removes a man from land improperly, the Sheriff is liable to be sued and mulcted in heavy damages. That has nothing to do with forcible possession. Forcible possession means that a person, by employing force, takes possession of land which he has no right to take.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman ought to be ashamed of himself. [Cries of "Order!"] I repeat, he ought to be ashamed to make such a statement. [Cries of "Name!" and "Order!"] I am perfectly in Order. I say the right hon. and learned Gentleman ought to be ashamed to make a statement of that character in this House, in view of the fact that the cases I have mentioned occurred only the other day, and ought to be within his official cognizance. To tell me that a Court of Law is open to a man who has been evicted, a man who is nothing more than a pauper, is absurd. A man who has not a cow, or even a goat to be seized, has a right of action against Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Sheriffs! I suppose stuff of that kind is good enough to go down with hon. Gentlemen opposite. Of course, at 3 o'clock in the morning, the hour for common sense has passed by. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland thinks that anything is good enough for supporters who will neither listen to argument, logic, pity, nor common sense. [Laughter.] I hope these laughs and sneers at the miseries of the poor people of Ireland will be remembered by the Chairman of Committees, to whom we must all bow. The question we are raising now is the question of the poor, the question of the evicted people, the question of the men who have nothing at all. It is not a question of taking forcible possession.

[Twelfth Night.]

Sir, I cannot use Parliamentary language to describe the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. No force of any kind is required, no force is ever used, and there has not been in Ireland since 1880—I will admit that seven years ago, in the time of Mr. Forster, there were cases of taking forcible possession—since 1880 there have been no cases of taking forcible possession. I challenge the Attorney General for Ireland to put his finger upon a case of taking forcible possession for the last seven years. The Government are trading on the ignorance of the Committee, in the interest of the most contemptible class of men which ever cursed or disgraced a nation.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): Certainly, Sir, I have listened to the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland with profound astonishment. I venture to appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Richard Webster) sitting next to him, because I know from experience that he knows that what the Attorney General for Ireland has stated is utterly wrong. Everybody who knows anything of law in this country knows that when a question of title is raised it is a universal rule that a magistrate has no jurisdiction. The Attorney General knows perfectly well that that is the rule of this country—that the moment an ejectment or turning out is challenged the jurisdiction of a magistrate ceases. And yet, forsooth, the Government get up and say that they will not make a concession which is only in conformity with the ordinary law of this country! I suppose they do so because they are anxious upon asserting and carrying out to its bitter end this cruel section. I am astonished at the tone in which this debate is conducted by the supporters of the Government. [Ministerial cheers.] You have forgotten a great deal of what you heard yesterday at St. Margaret's Church. The lesson has been thrown away on the whole of you; you know it perfectly well. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes; I say it, and I say it because I mean it. I am perfectly satisfied that every hon. and learned Member opposite will agree with me in my statement of the law. Do not let anyone suppose I get up to state what I do not know. I say what I feel. When our proceedings become known out-of-doors, the country will feel you are forcing down this cruel section with all the cruelty you can put into it. Notwithstanding the appeals you have heard on behalf of the people of Ireland, you sit there unmoved, occasionally jeering and sneering at what is said. [Cries of "Order!"] The conduct of Her Majesty's Government and their supporters does them very little credit.

Mr. T. M. Hea'y

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I rise to a point of Order, Sir. The hon. Gentleman does nothing but talk to this side of the House, very unwarrantably, in my opinion.

MR. ANDERSON: I do not wonder the hon. Member is impatient. He and those who sit with him are tongue-tied in this debate. They are burning, I know, to speak their true feelings—to get up and repudiate the action of their own Government. I hope the Attorney General will say something upon this Amendment, because I am satisfied the Attorney General for Ireland has not placed the matter fairly before the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I am sorry to say I am obliged to state, most distinctly, that there is no law in England which would apply in the sense, either directly or indirectly, indicated by the hon. Member (Mr. Anderson). I regret that I should have heard such statements made under a misconception of this section. This section provides that a person may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, if he—

“Within twelve months after the execution of any writ of possession of any house or land shall wrongfully take or hold forcible possession of such house or land or any part thereof.”

No question of title could then be raised, and no question of title which could then be raised would be any bar to any proceedings, because the question of title would have been determined under the writ of possession. There is no provision in any Statute which would allow any question of title then raised to be any bar.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I claim to move, “That the Question be now put.”

Question put accordingly, “That the Question be now put.”

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Your conduct is disgraceful.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Unless hon. Gentlemen are able more respectfully to restrain themselves I shall be obliged to take notice of their conduct.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE (speaking from his seat, and with head covered): Mr. Courtney, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) has called me and other hon. Members "damned cowards."

THE CHAIRMAN: I heard no such expression. It is extremely awkward and inconvenient to take notice of statements which are only reported in discussion, although reported, no doubt, in perfect good faith. I hope the hon. Member, whoever he be, who is so impugned, will withdraw the statement, or disavow having made it.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE: It was the hon. Member for Mid Cork.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Mid Cork, I hope, will either disavow or withdraw the statement.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) (speaking from the Cross Benches on the Ministerial side of the House): In the first place, Sir, I wish to say that, as usual, I have been misquoted. I distinctly used the words "damned cowards," and I applied them to the whole crowd of men on this side of the House. I said it, and I would say it again, only I would not be in Order; therefore I will withdraw it.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 239; Noes 108: Majority 131.—(Div. List, No. 180.) [3.20 A.M.]

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 240: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 181.) [3.30 A.M.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I claim now to move the Question—

"That the words 'or (c) shall assault, or wilfully and unlawfully resist or obstruct, any sheriff, constable, bailiff, process server, or other minister of the law, while in the execution of his duty, or shall assault him in consequence of such execution,' stand part of the Clause, be now put."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have an Amendment of an important character on the Paper, which I desire to move. I would ask your ruling, Sir, as to whether I can move it? [Cries of "Order!"]

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 244; Noes 109: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 182.) [3.45 A.M.]

Question put,

"That the words 'or (c) shall assault, or wilfully and unlawfully resist or obstruct, any sheriff, constable, bailiff, process server, or other minister of the law, while in the execution of his duty, or shall assault him in consequence of such execution,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 244; Noes 111: Majority 133.—(Div. List, No. 183.) [4.0 A.M.]

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I beg to move the omission of the words from "person," in line 1, page 3, to "any," in line 3, inclusive.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 1, to leave out from the word "person" to the word "any" in line 3, inclusive.—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'person who shall commit any offence punishable under the Whiteboy Acts as defined by this Act,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish now, 10 minutes past 4 o'clock in the morning, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) whether he does not think sufficient progress has been made—[Cries of "No, no!"—] with this Bill in the course of this evening? I have no wish to delay the progress of the Bill; but the House has been now sitting for 12 hours, and you, Sir, yourself, have been 10 hours in the Chair. That is a great strain upon the physical and mental powers of any man, not even excepting yourself. Many of us—I for one—have been engaged in and about this House since 1 o'clock yesterday; and, inasmuch as there is other Business of importance to be taken, I think we are justified in suggesting to the Government that Progress should be now reported. In reference to the particular Amendment now before the Committee, that, of course, is moved in accordance with a promise made earlier in the evening, and to it there can be no objection, especially as I understand the Government are willing to reconsider what offences under the Whiteboy Acts should be included in this clause. With reference to Sub-section 5, which is the only remaining sub-section of the clause, I think the right hon. Gentleman stated earlier in the evening that there were some Amendments worthy of discussion, and the discussion of which would take some little time. I think I may ask hon. Members to rise for a moment above the excitement and fever-heat to which they have reached. [Ironical cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen may jeer at that remark; but they must candidly confess that the frame of mind in which the Committee has been for some time past does not tend to a favourable and impartial consideration of Amendments. There is a fair case to ask the Government that Progress should now be reported, and that the remaining Business on the Paper should be proceeded with.

[Twelfth Night.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I fully recognize the extremely fair spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has approached this question; but I think I also may claim to deal with the matter before the Committee in an equally fair and candid spirit. I am very sorry indeed it should have been necessary to keep hon. Gentlemen sitting here till so late an hour. I had hoped we might have got through the Business of the evening before this. There is an understanding that these words should be omitted; surely they should not be the occasion of any debate at all. The right hon. Gentleman thoroughly admits that. Then we come to Sub-section 5. There is a disposition on the part of the Government to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Amendment he has on the Paper. That being the case, and seeing that we really have got very nearly to the end of the clause, it does seem to me we should lose time, instead of gaining it, if we reported Progress now. I think that with moderation, good temper, and good feeling, we may be able to complete our work, work which I had hoped we should have completed earlier without any undue strain upon yourself, Sir, or any officers of the

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

House. I will take no contentious Business after this clause is reported.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N): The desire of the right hon. Gentleman to be courteous we must all admit; but I did not gather from his remarks that the Government will assent to the Motion to report Progress after the omission of Sub-section 4 is agreed to. The 5th sub-section relates to matters of great importance, and, therefore, it is not right it should be forced on at this hour.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I thought I had explained myself. It appears to me to be reasonable that we should take the clause, seeing that we are prepared to meet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) in the Amendment he desires to move.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse my expressing myself very strongly on this subject. We feel that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell) demands the consideration of the Committee, and that it is impossible at this hour (4.15)—in fact, I think it would be impossible at any hour after 12 o'clock—to do justice to such an important Amendment. The First Lord of the Treasury will remember that my hon. and learned Friend drew most especial attention to this sub-section of the clause in the speech which he made on the second reading of the Bill. This has always been felt by Members on this side of the House to be one of the most contentious points in the Bill; and, therefore, I hope he will not insist upon taking the 5th sub-section this morning. I can quite understand the right hon. Gentleman feeling it is important to get to a certain portion of the Bill at this Sitting; but, as regards the 5th sub-section, it was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), earlier in the evening, that that was a point at which the Government might stop. The 5th sub-section stands in a very different category to the rest. If the right hon. Gentleman perseveres with the sub-section, I shall feel bound to utter the strongest protest in my power against such a proceeding. I trust the Government will not go beyond the Amendment the Chief Secretary for Ireland has just moved.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have a suggestion to make which may possibly meet the views of the Government. There cannot be the slightest doubt that Sub-section 5 is not only novel in its character, but is of the most serious and wide-reaching character. To lay down the proposition that this Committee is to be called upon to pass into law such a provision as that, which will practically leave the entire Press of Ireland at the mercy of the magistrates, is most extraordinary, and unprecedented in the proceedings of this House. This clause has been urged through the Committee at a rate which we certainly consider to be most unjust and unfair to us. It has been the custom to discuss at considerable length, even after they have passed through Committee, clauses of such a complicated character as this; and the proposal I have to make is that if the Government can see their way to abandoning the 5th sub-section, we shall not offer any further opposition to the passing of the clause. This is a sub-section of a most extraordinary character, and, as has already been pointed out, there is an important Amendment to it on the Paper in the name of the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell), who has a claim even upon the present Government to have his Amendment discussed. Surely it is very strange the Government are in such a hurry that they will not allow the hon. and learned Gentleman to move an Amendment to which he has already stated in the House he attaches the utmost importance. I think I see a way in which the difficulty can be got over, and that is by the Government agreeing to omit the sub-section. The willingness of the Government to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) in the Amendment he has to the sub-section, affords us very little consolation indeed. Even with the words omitted, we should be landed in the old squabble as to the meaning of the words. The offer of the First Lord of the Treasury is quite illusory; and to enable the Government to state their views on the matter I beg to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillon.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: We really cannot agree to the Motion to report Progress now, whatever course may be forced upon us at a later period. The words to be omitted are words which the whole Committee desires to omit; and, therefore, it would be unreasonable that we should not at least make progress so far as their omission is concerned.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I should like to say, in reference to the offer with regard to my Amendment, that the right hon. Gentleman overlooked the previous Amendment standing in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), which is to leave out the whole sub-section. Of course, my Amendment is based on the hypothesis—perhaps a correct one—that the Committee will reject the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend. Having regard to the position my hon. and learned Friend occupies in the House, and to the fact that on the second reading of the Bill he particularly stated that he meant to raise the whole Press question on this clause, I appeal to the Government not to proceed with the 5th sub-section to-night. I quite agree with what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has said with respect to not reporting Progress now. Let us omit the words in question, and then let the 5th sub-section stand over, so that my hon. and learned Friend may submit his Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be impossible for us to accept the suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—namely, that we should purchase the passing of this clause by the sacrifice of the 5th sub-section. To that sub-section we attach great importance, and we would not willingly abandon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) has adverted to the fact that this sub-section is one on which the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell) desires to move an Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman announced, in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, that the Amendment to which he attaches special importance raises the whole Press question. I regret as much as anybody that we are driven by the course which has been pursued by certain Gentlemen in this House to discuss anything, however trivial, at this hour of the morning (4.30); but we must, after all, choose the lesser of two evils. It may be better for us to choose to discuss matters at an hour when we would all be better in bed than to allow Public Business to be indefinitely and hopelessly prolonged.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I do not think the Government can properly understand the offer we make to them. We think we are making a concession in assenting to the postponement of the 5th sub-section. The Report stage undoubtedly gives the Government a great advantage, because on Report a Member is only allowed to speak once.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We promised to re-commit the Bill, if there is any alteration of any importance.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I do not think there was any desire on these Benches to oppose the Motion made by the Chief Secretary before the Motion for reporting Progress was made. We are all agreed upon the desirability of omitting at once the 4th sub-section; what we now want is this—that the Chief Secretary should also postpone the 5th sub-section, especially in the absence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell.) If to that question we get a simple answer—and the answer can be simple—our future course of action will be decided. We cannot think the Government wish to be so unreasonable as to press this sub-section in the absence of its chief opponent. If the Government give us a satisfactory answer as regards the 5th sub-section I have just heard that the Motion to report Progress will be withdrawn.

MR. DILLON: I gather from the few observations which fell from the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) that he contemplates reporting Progress after the omission of these words, because he said "whatever course we may be forced to adopt." I do not understand what the position of the Government is, because the First Lord of the Treasury plainly indicated—at least, that was the impression he conveyed to me—that the Government would be willing to report Progress at some stage before the clause was taken. I am quite prepared to withdraw my Motion to report Progress if the Government will assure us that they will report Progress after the present Amendment is disposed of, and before the 5th sub-section is taken. What I object to is that the 5th sub-section should be taken without adequate discussion, and in the absence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell). It would be a disgrace and a shame if no discussion were allowed upon such an Amendment as the hon. and learned Gentleman has placed upon the Paper. Before I sit down I desire to protest most earnestly against the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I absolutely deny that there has been, during this night, any obstruction whatever, or even prolongation of debate, on these Benches. I do not know what opinion may exist as to the proceedings of other nights; but I completely deny that there has been any obstruction to-night, and I have, on previous occasions, seen debates drawn out to very great lengths upon subjects of infinitesimal importance compared with the clause we have been discussing to-night. I think it is a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman who is responsible for the government of Ireland, and who ought to do what he considers to be necessary in as inoffensive a manner as he can, should have used an expression which he must know he ought not to have used, and which, at all events, must inevitably make his task more difficult in Ireland. When he insults us, he will invariably find his path bestrewn with difficulties. [Laughter.] It is all very well to laugh, but man after man has broken down in the attempt to govern Ireland. It is no laughing matter at all, and it is a foolish thing, and an unwise thing, and a sad thing, to see an Irish Chief Secretary begin his task, which is no joke for any man, by sneering at and insulting the Irish Representatives.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely the Government might honour us with a few words in reply. An hon. Friend of mine made a mistake in regard to the Irish Chief Secretary. We know upon the authority of the hon. Member for Central Leeds (Mr. Gerald Balfour) that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) only took the position of Irish Chief Secretary because he despises the Irish soil—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: When was that said?] In this House to an hon. Member of this House.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Dr. TANNER (Mid Cork): Swallow it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I heard the hon. Member for Mid Cork make use of a most offensive observation. I call upon him to withdraw the observation.

Dr. TANNER (sitting in his place, and raising his hat): Certainly, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman will rise in his place and withdraw the observation.

Dr. TANNER (rising): Certainly, if you wish it.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I rise to Order, Sir. I ask you whether the manner in which the hon. Gentleman withdraws the observation is one which is conducive to the dignity of this House? He simply says he will withdraw it if you wish it, and expresses no regret for the use of the language.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: May I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that seeing that these are only informal matters—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Mid Cork must express his regret.

Dr. TANNER: Certainly, Sir; I thought I had already clearly expressed my regret. If you wish it I withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish the hon. Member for Mid Cork to understand that it is a duty he owes to the Committee not only to abstain from the use of offensive observations, but to apologize for the one he has just used.

Dr. TANNER: Certainly, Sir.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: They are not so very delicate to us, when they continue in this manner. On the point at which we have arrived we are asking for a very reasonable concession—

Mr. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I call your attention, Sir, to the fact that the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) immediately repeated the offensive expression.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to confirm the statement of the hon. Member for East Bradford.

Mr. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I must say I was sitting immediately in front of the hon. Member for Mid Cork, and was in a position to hear what he said, and I absolutely deny the statement of the hon. Members opposite.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am in a position, Sir, to do the same.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) himself whether he avows or disavows having repeated the expression? I must ask whether he disavows having repeated the expression?

Dr. TANNER: Certainly, Sir; I rise to say—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Member for Mid Cork whether he disavows having repeated the observation?

Dr. TANNER: Yes, of course. There has been another mistake made by hon. Gentlemen opposite—I never said anything of the sort.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out that in the first instance no mistake was made by any hon. Member. I heard the remark myself.

Dr. TANNER: Can I disavow what I did not say? I state that I did not repeat the expression, and, of course, I cannot disavow what I did not say.

Mr. P. STANHOPE (Wedgesbury): I am in a position to state exactly what the hon. Gentleman said. He was asked by an hon. Gentleman behind him to state what was the observation which he said which was considered offensive to the Committee, and for which he expressed his apologies. He told the hon. Member quietly what the observation was, and the answer he made was immediately taken up by hon. Members opposite as being a repetition of the offensive language.

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter can now come to a close.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I am afraid that this incident shows Her Majesty's Government the undesirability—in fact the hopelessness—of pretending to conduct debate in the condition in which hon. Members find themselves. I would submit that it is unfair to ask us to debate this sub-section, which places the peace of the country at the mercy of two Executive characters at so late an hour of the morning. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite talk amongst themselves in a loud tone in order that none of us may be heard, and they consider that they conduct debates in a reasonable way. I should consider that this Motion should be withdrawn, if we could get from Her Majesty's Government a statement that they do not intend to press this important sub-section to-night. I think the First Lord of the Treasury was on the point of making a concession to us when the unpleasant incident which has just terminated arose. There has been so much unpleasantness to-day that it might be desirable, after all, when you are dealing with a large Party, assisted as it is by the sympathy of other hon. Gentlemen, and when you have an Amendment on the Paper to be proposed by the late Attorney General for England, it is desirable, I say, and it is due to the position of that hon. and learned Gentleman, that you should give a little time before bringing this clause to a termination. I do appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite to say that after this Amendment is disposed of he would be disposed not to insist upon further progress being made with the Bill.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would be much more convenient if the Committee took the Business in the order in which it stands upon the Paper. If we disposed of the Amendment now before the Committee, it would then be fitting to consider the suggestion as to when the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney should be entered upon.

MR. DILLON: Under those circumstances I withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and negatived; words struck out accordingly.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I would now repeat my appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I put it specially on the ground of what is fair to this side of the Committee, and of what is fair to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell). I move, Sir, that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say that I think the ground upon which the right hon. Gentleman makes this Motion is a sufficient one. I do not want to do anything at any time, either in Committee or in the House, which appears to be unreasonable; but, surely, the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney should have been in his place. He has not been present on the Committee, unless I am very much mistaken, during the whole evening; and if the right hon. Gentleman opposite feels that the Motion the hon. and learned Gentleman has to make is an important one, I do not know anyone who is more capable of doing justice to it than the right hon. Gentleman himself. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman's arguments in support of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney would be as good as any which could be urged against the sub-section. It does seem to me a great misfortune that we should have now an Amendment thrown in the way of the completion of this clause. It seems to me unreasonable that a further delay should be asked for, when the Committee has fully considered the whole question, and when it is, I think, in a position to dispose of the most important question remaining on the Paper in a very short time. As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman opposite is prepared to make the Motion himself. If he does we will accept it in that way, and meet him in a reasonable manner. He is aware that on the Report stage he can move this Amendment; but I must say it is rather hard that in a full Committee, ready and disposed to enter into the consideration of these questions—["No, no!"] Well, with the exception of hon. Gentlemen opposite—I would say in a full Committee, ready and disposed to go on with the Business, I think it is hard that we should now be prevented in finishing the clause which we very reasonably asked to be allowed to finish at an early period of the evening.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I do hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite will let his better nature prevail. I apprehend that the fact that the hon. and learned Member (Sir Charles Russell) is not present to move his Amendment may very well be accounted for by the extraordinary progress we have made this evening. [Laughter.] I think that is a very reasonable statement—that we have made extraordinary progress this evening. The hon. and learned Member could not have expected that we would have reached his Amendment to-night.

Mr. T. M. Healy

The offer the right hon. Gentleman opposite has made with regard to the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend does not meet the case at all. It is the original Amendment—the omission of the sub-section—which the whole of this side of the Committee has the strongest desire to have debated ably and fully, and without reserve, and that cannot possibly be done at 5 o'clock in the morning. Sir, I would like to appeal to the Law Officers of the Crown, to the hon. and learned Attorney General and the hon. and learned Solicitor General; I would ask them to put in a plea for their learned brother on this side, that some consideration should be shown to his position, and to the important Amendment of which he has given Notice. I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the scenes of the last quarter of an hour; and I would ask him whether they are not arguments entirely in favour of the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Henry H. Fowler).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney was not here on Friday night, when he had an Amendment on the Paper. His Amendment on that occasion was moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid). There was a previous Amendment on the Paper to-night in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney; but he was not here to move it. I must say there was no reason to suppose that this Amendment would not be reached to-night; and we cannot help observing that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney has not been in the House during any part of the debate.

SIR UGHTRUD KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: It was never expected that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) would come on to-night. There is not the slightest desire on this (the Front Opposition) Bench to obstruct the Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; I repeat that statement. It is not reasonable to expect hon. Gentlemen to be here to move Amendments when it was not expected that so much progress would be made. But the force of our appeal lies in this—that we consider this sub-section one of the most important parts of the Bill—one that ought to be fully debated, and debated at an hour when the attention of Members can be given to it fairly, and when the attention of the public can be properly directed to the matter. It is because the sub-section is so important, and because we entertain such strong feelings with regard to it, that we do most strongly urge on Her Majesty's Government—certainly on the Leader of the House—that it would not be fair to a large section of the Members of this House if this sub-section were pressed at this hour of the morning. I think it would be impossible to take this sub-section in the present state of feeling in the House without a very lengthened space of time being devoted to its consideration. Upon this part of the Bill there arise a great number of important questions with regard to the Press, and we do once more beg hon. Members on the other side of the Committee to recognize the fairness of our appeal and the injustice that would be done to the opinions and feelings of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House if this question were not fully debated, and debated in such a manner that the public may know what takes place.

THE CHAIRMAN: It may, perhaps, influence the conduct of Members of the Committee if I point out to them that it would not now be proper to put the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney. The first word "any" in Sub-section 5 has been struck out, and the words that remain to be dealt with are—

"Person who, by words or acts, shall incite, solicit, encourage, or persuade any other person to commit any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned."

The adoption of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney would not make sense. Therefore, it is impossible to deal with the hon. and learned Member's proposal.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Even supposing that the word "any" is allowed to remain, could it not be struck out on the Report stage? It so happens that in the clause we have just passed a word remains which is rather an absurdity—which will have to be struck out on Report. So can this word "any" be struck out. I would add this suggestion

[Twelfth Night.]

—you are going to deal with the question of the Whiteboy Acts on the Report stage with any Amendments that you may consider necessary. Then I would propose that you should take this clause now, omitting Sub-section 5, as well as Sub-section 4, and put them in on the Report stage, re-committing the Bill then. That, I think, is a perfectly reasonable proposition. It would get the Committee out of the difficulty into which it appears to have got. [Interruption.] I am addressing myself to those in charge of the Bill. I make a suggestion that will give the Government practically everything they want. They can put those words in on the Report stage.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope we shall not have to re-commit the Bill in regard to the Whiteboy Acts, for I am of opinion that we shall find Sub-section 4 quite sufficient. Would it not meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite if the Government were to give a pledge that the debate on this question on Report shall be brought on early—before dinner in the evening, at a time when, if necessary, an important debate can take place on the subject? Would not that meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Friends around him?

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: The view we take upon this matter is this—I was obliged to put it on what I may call the ordinary grounds of courtesy, which have often had considerable weight on both sides of this Table in the management of Public Business. Our appeal on those grounds has been in vain. I now put it on the ground of public principle. I contend that it is impossible for anyone to debate a question of this kind at 5 o'clock in the morning. I appeal to the oldest Member of the House of Commons to say whether he ever knew an important debate to take place at this hour of the morning. ["Yes!"] Someone says "Yes." I suppose it is some hon. Member who is here in the House for the first time, and he is ready to give us the benefit of his experience of two or three months. I know something about all-night scenes in this House. They reflect no credit on the House of Commons or Parliamentary institutions, and I, for one, am very sorry that there ever should be any necessity for such a thing. Where All-night sittings have taken place, their object has been to arrive at the definite and formal conclusion to which the House has practically arrived many hours before. The question now before the Committee has never been raised in any one of the debates which has previously occurred, and I am quite ready to admit to the right hon. Gentleman opposite that there has been many questions that have been debated over and over again in this House. I do not deny that for a moment; but I say, as an historic fact, that the question of the operation of this Bill on the Press of Ireland has never been debated at all. I ask in that fairness which is due from a majority to a minority, and in the fairness which I am sure has always characterized the right hon. Gentleman who is now leading the House, that so grave and important a discussion as this should not be brought on at 5 o'clock in the morning.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think, perhaps, the best solution of the question is to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). We will strike the sub-section out of the Bill now, with the object of introducing it on Report. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney can then be considered. I understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite will be content that the 2nd clause should be disposed of in this way.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will you re-commit the Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That will be the form in which we will then take it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Re-commit the Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The proposal is to strike this sub-section out of the Bill now, and to bring it up again on Report. That I understand is the arrangement.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: With regard to this question of re-committing the Bill, I see the force of the hon. and learned Member's argument; but I would ask him to see what the position of the matter is. If the Government pursued a different course, and if we were in a majority, all that we could do would be to strike this sub-section out of the Bill. We could do nothing more, and then the Government might again propose to bring it in on Report, when we should have to discuss it again. I am bound to say that I think the offer the right hon. Gentleman has made is a fair one, and I would ask the Committee to accept it.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section 5.

Question, "That Sub-section 5 stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): There are a number of Amendments on the Paper which have not been formally smothered as yet.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Before you put the clause, Sir—I do not intend to raise a discussion at this hour of the morning, but I rise for the purpose of protesting against the course which is being taken. This clause is of enormous importance; and to say that we are to pass it as we are compelled to do now, practically sub silentio, is most unreasonable.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 235; Noes 103: Majority 132.—(Div. List, No. 184.) [5.0 A.M.]

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday 7th June.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland, The Lord Advocate.)

[BILL 225.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee be deferred till Monday 6th June."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Perhaps the Government will say now what they propose to do in respect to the adjournment for the holidays.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): What I propose to do is to move that the House, after its sitting to-day at 2 o'clock, shall adjourn until the 6th of June. If hon. Gentlemen do not like it, I will not make that Motion; I merely wished to save hon. Gentlemen the trouble of coming down to-morrow. ["Oh!"] Then I will not make the Motion now.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee deferred till Monday 6th June.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACTS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.
(Sir James Corry, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Johnston.)

[BILL 176.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid.): I have to move that the Bill, as amended, be now considered; and I wish to make a proposal to the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), which I hope will obviate any delay in the passing of the Bill. It is that in the Belfast Main Drainage Bill I will move to insert a new clause to give the same power as is possessed in England under the Borough Funds Act.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I apprehend, in the first place, that the hon. Baronet will not have the power to do what he proposes. I think it would be much more convenient if the consideration of the Bill were postponed until the 6th June.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday 6th June.

MOTIONS.

MUNICIPAL REGULATION (CONSTABULARY, &c.) (BELFAST) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Royal Irish Constabulary, and to make provision for the appointment of a Watch Committee in Belfast, and for other purposes in relation thereto."—(Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I suppose this Bill will be circulated immediately?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think this Bill is opposed; but, at any rate, it is monstrous to ask leave to introduce a Bill of this kind at this time of the morning. We have Bills tinkering with the Royal Irish Constabulary every Session. We do not know what his Bill is. Why should it be brought on after 5 o'clock in the morning?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I did not know the hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the Bill. The 6th of June.

Motion postponed till Monday 6th June.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask until what hour?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Two o'clock.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not necessary to make a separate Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: It is sufficient for the right hon. Gentleman to mention the hour.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman not name 3 o'clock?

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Five o'clock, A.M.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 24th May, 1887.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.] — PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL —
*Ordered—First Reading—*Local Government
(Ireland) (Killiney and Ballybrack) * [275].

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 39 and 129 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to Monday 6th June.—
(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

THE MAGISTRACY — NONCONFORMIST MAGISTRATES IN FLINTSHIRE.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that there are over 30 Nonconformists in Flintshire legally qualified to hold the Commission of the Peace; and why none of those are appointed, seeing that two-thirds of the population of the county are Nonconformists?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am not aware that the facts are as suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The information I have is to the contrary effect, as I have already twice stated to the House.

BURMAH — LICENSING AND REGULATION OF IMMORALITY.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that arrangements are made, under the charge of high officials, in the British Service in Burmah, by which prostitution is licensed and regulated for British soldiers there?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The fullest information respecting the matters referred to by the hon. Member was laid before the House of Commons on February 28 last, in a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Shoreditch. The Secretary of State cannot accept as correct the description of the arrangements given in the Question.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—APPEALS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked Mr. Attorney General, How many cases, which have been heard on appeal to the House of Lords, are now awaiting judgment, and the several periods in each case which have respectively elapsed since the hearing; and whether he can state the cause of the delay?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that 11 appeals which have been heard in the House of Lords are now awaiting judgment, one of which was heard in April and two in the autumn of last year, and the remaining eight during the sittings in the present year. I am not able to speak as to the cause of the delay in delivering judgment beyond the fact that, from personal knowledge, I can state that in many of the cases very difficult questions of law arise.

BURMAH (UPPER)—THE RUBY MINES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any Contract or Memorandum relating to the Burmah Ruby Mines has been signed by any person on behalf of the Government; and if so, the date of and parties to such Memorandum or Contract; whether the representatives of Mr. Streeter are the only persons connected with the jewellery trade who had been permitted by the Government to visit the Ruby Mines prior to such Memorandum or Contract; whether other persons applied for like permission and on what grounds; and, whether such permission was refused by the Government, and on what grounds?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The terms under which the Ruby Mines are to be worked are still under the consideration of the Government; but a Memorandum has been signed on behalf of the Local Authorities in Burmah, indicating the terms which they would recommend the Government of India to offer, and this document has been communicated to Messrs. Streeter. It is not official, and does not bind the Government of India. Mr. Streeter went to the Ruby Mines with the Expeditionary Force in November last, and no expenditure was incurred for his protection. Other persons subsequently applied for leave to visit the mines, and were not permitted to do so, on the ground that it would involve either risking their lives, or throwing a considerable expense on the Revenues of India in providing for their protection.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether any document had been signed by Mr. Streeter; whether the hon. and learned Gentleman could state the names of the other persons who had applied for permission; and whether there was any record in writing on the subject?

SIR JOHN GORST said, he had no information of any document having been signed by Mr. Streeter. With respect to the names of other persons, there was only one—which he had forgotten—and he had not the paper at hand.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked whether the name was Ongar?

SIR JOHN GORST said, he believed that was the name. There were no official documents.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would try to find out whether there were other names?

SIR JOHN GORST replied, that he had no doubt that during the Recess the Government's knowledge of the Ruby Mines would be more complete, and he should be happy at a later period to answer any further Question.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he would put another Question after the Recess.

EMIGRATION (IRELAND) — REFUSAL OF THE AUTHORITIES AT NEW YORK TO ALLOW EMIGRANTS TO LAND.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Have the Government any information as to the refusal of the American Authorities to allow 14 families, emigrated from County Mayo by Robert Vesey Stoney, esquire, J.P., D.L., of Rossturk, to be landed in New York yesterday, on the ground that they were paupers; and, will any precautions be taken to prevent landlords emigrating pauper families without making any provision for them on their arrival in America?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: As no Notice was given of the Question, I have been unable to make the necessary inquiries.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the Question would be repeated on the 6th of June.

IRELAND—THE EXECUTIVE AND MR. PATRICK EGAN.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has since received the letter addressed to him on 28th April by Mr. Patrick Egan; and, if so, what reply has been given?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Yes, Sir; such a letter, bearing date April 28, has been received by me. Mr. Egan has been informed that it is impossible to make any conditions whatever with regard to his returning to Ireland.

M O T I O N S.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (KILLINEY AND BALLYBRACK) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel King-Harman, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board for Ireland constituting the Township of Killiney and Ballybrack an Urban Sanitary District, ordered to be brought in by Colonel King-Harman and Mr. Balfour.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 275.]

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday the 6th day of June next."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS (SCOTLAND).—OBSERVATIONS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness), who had given Notice to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of shepherds, ploughmen, farm servants, cottars, and other agricultural labourers of Scotland, especially in reference to the system of service, hours of labour, housing, and the physical and moral results of the Bothy system ;"

said, at the outset he would like to call attention to the decisions given on Saturday by the Crofters Commission on the cases brought before it from the estates of Lord Macdonald and Colonel Fraser, in Skye. The Commissioners gave decisions in upwards of 200 cases, 113 of which were on the estate of Lord Macdonald, and in their case the rent was reduced from £856 to £525, or about 30 per cent. These 113 tenants were £1,831 in arrear, of which two-thirds were wiped off. On the estate of Colonel Fraser, comprising seven townships, 98 decisions were given, and the rent was reduced from £769 to £444. The arrears were about £2,000, of which over £1,300 was wiped off. On Lord Macdonald's estate the 113 tenants had their rents reduced on an average from £7 10s. to £4 12s. and on Colonel Fraser's estate the 98 tenants, who before paid on an average £7 8s. each, now paid only £4 10s. Even if they got the land for nothing they could not live on it. He would ask, was it possible for a man to live comfortably on a farm the rent of which was, on an average, only £4 11s.? These decisions would do little to alleviate the condition of those poor people, or lessen the difficulties of the Crofter Question. They would certainly have £3, 10s. more to spend on themselves; but that would do little. Indeed, it was in view of this that in the discussions on the Crofters Act he and his Friends pointed out that what these men needed was more land. That this House and the Government had refused to give them. There was a clause in the Crofters Act permitting the Fishery Board to lend money to start the fishermen; and the Government had offered to advance money, on certain conditions, to help them to carry on their industry as fishermen. In January a Circular was issued by the Secretary for Scotland, laying down the conditions on which the men should get these loans. He would remind hon. Members that the fishermen had fallen into poverty because the herrings and other fish no longer came into the inland lochs, and the fishermen had to go out 50 or 60 miles to sea to catch them, and they required heavier and better boats for that purpose; the kelp trade was played out, and there was no labour for the people. Now, even though their rents had been reduced, and their arrears of rent reduced from £4,000 to £1,200 on Saturday last, these men were absolutely poor. They have no money and no credit, yet, before they could get the advance from the Government to help them to buy a boat and nets, they must be able to contribute from £80 to £100. Taking the average cost of a sea-going boat at £350 for boat and nets, would crofters, who were paying £4 10s. of rent, cottars, who were paying no rent—crofters and cottars who were in arrears and in debt to everybody who had given them credit—would they ever be able to start as fishermen if they had first to raise £80 or £100? It was said that four or five men were required to man each boat, and that they might each raise £30; but, with no furniture and no credit, they were unable to raise even that amount. The Government by their Circular were keeping the promise to the ear by the offer of money and breaking it to the hope by the conditions which were laid down. He thought the other conditions in the Circular gave the Government a sufficient security without any such condition as this advance of £80 or £100. In the first place, they had the mortgage on the boats and gear. Then, if the boat was insured, and if it was lost, the Government would get the insurance money. These poor crofters could not give them more; they could not meet the conditions imposed for a loan of money. There had been plenty of applications, but not a single penny had been lent, because none of the crofters were able to advance the money; and so long as that condition was laid down, the men of Skye and the Western Highlands would be unable to obtain loans. Unless they intended to do something for these men, they had better tell them at once they could not lend them the money, and that they had better emigrate or do something else, because the condition of things was getting worse and worse every year; and he asked, if nothing could be done for them as farmers, could not something be done for them as fishermen? He was not in favour of giving public money to special classes, but this was a most exceptional case. The people were fast sinking into poverty in the congested districts; while sportsmen owned hundreds of square miles of land for amusement. The big farms did not pay now, and the Duke of Sutherland on his estate was giving over the big farms to increase the Duke of Westminster's sporting land. The Duke of Westminster, by confiscating the property of the London people at the end of their leases, was able to pay for more land, while the unfortunate crofters could not get land nor pay for it. As to the working of the Commission, 200 decisions had been given in Sutherland and the North-East district, 213 in Skye, and probably 400 more would be given during the remainder of this month, so that they had about 800 cases decided up to the present time. But there were several thousand more applications, and others were coming in every day, and he estimated that there would be 7,000 or 8,000 cases that would have to be adjudicated on. Unless something was done, therefore, in this direction to assist the Commissioners and to meet the reasonable demands of the crofters, they would soon have a condition of things that would again call for the intervention of gunboats and marines. There were cases of hardship now pending, and unless the Government took some steps in the matter many more poor crofters, in his own county and elsewhere, would be cruelly cleared out of their holdings in the course of a very short time. He urged the Government to fully apply the clauses of the Crofters Act, which, he said, they were not doing, and advised them to grant a sum of money for the appointment of valuers and assessors in the different counties for the purpose of valuing the land and giving evidence on the point, a course which, at comparatively small expense, would obviate the great waste of time that now took place under the present course of dealing with the difficulty. Last year only £200 was voted for this purpose, and it was proposed in the present year to expend the magnificent sum of £419! That sum was totally inadequate to the work. He did not at first like the Commission, for they had not got a single representative of the Crofters on it. They had a Sheriff as its legal head, and although the Sheriff had acted so far judicially and wisely, and considered the interests of both landlords and tenants, he did not value land. Of the other two Commissioners—one was a factor and the other was a big farmer. The factor and the big farmer would do their duty and act fairly between the parties; but they must remember that the crofters did not like the factors, and that between the big farmers and the crofters there was as much love as between the Protestant boys of Belfast and the Nationalist Catholics. In his humble judgment, the only and proper way in which these thousands of cases could be considered in time would be to appoint in the different counties valuers and assessors, as was provided for under the Act, and these gentlemen could value the land and come to the Court and give evidence, and so save the Commissioners occupying so much of their time in tramping over the bogs in going to examine the crofts concerned in the many cases before them. He hoped something would be done, and this was, in his opinion, the best way to expedite the work of the Commission. He also thought the measure which had been introduced in the other House would help them. Turning to another subject, he desired to say a word in regard to the ploughmen and agricultural labourers in the North of Scotland; he would press on the Government the desirability of looking at the conditions under which they worked and lived. He learned that in Kincardineshire and other adjoining counties ploughmen's associations were being formed everywhere. Their grievance was that they were fed in the farmhouse and lodged worse than horses were stalled or dogs were kennelled. In fact, they were stalled with the horses in the lofts over the stables, and there were plenty of openings between the stable and the bothy, so that the men could see the horses, and the smell of the stable was always very prevalent in the bothy. The physical and moral degradation of such a system was very great indeed. He predicted that, under the influence of the Education Act, men would not much longer consent to pig together as they were now expected to do. As an instance of the evil of the bothy system, he would state that in Caithness-shire, where the bothy system prevailed, the rate of illegitimacy was 14 per cent of births, while in the adjoining county of Sutherland it was only 10 per cent. He attributed the extra 4 per cent in Caithness-shire to the custom of pigging young men and boys together in these bothies. He appealed to the Government not to wait until the ricks were burning before they appointed a Commission to inquire into this matter.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) said, he wished to call attention to another part of the Crofters Question, which, to his mind, was as important as that brought forward by his hon. Friend—namely, to those who had not the advantage and benefit of the Crofters Act. He would refer to the crofters in Morayshire and Nairn, where the Crofters Act did not apply, while it was in operation across the bounds of the county in Inverness-shire. In Inverness-shire the crofters who had gone before the Commission were entitled to the adjustment of their rents to a fair standard, and the reductions in those rents by the Commission amounted to 30, 40, and in some instances 50 per cent, while the crofters in the contiguous county were excluded from the operations and the benefits of the Act. This was naturally a very fruitful source of dissatisfaction to the crofters of the border.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is out of Order. He is now anticipating the discussion of one, if not two Bills, which are before the House, one of which proposes, if I remember aright, to extend the benefits of the Crofters Act to Highland counties adjoining the actual declared crofting counties, and the other Bill is of a similar nature. The hon. Member is clearly anticipating the discussion on both Bills.

MR. ANDERSON said, he presumed he should be in Order in calling attention to a particular case with respect to which he got an answer from the hon.

and learned Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) on Monday. The case he wished to bring under the notice of the House was that of Alexander Taylor, a crofter of Lake of Moy, Morayshire, who had been induced to sign a document under which he would have to give up his holding, and be evicted from a house built 50 years before by his ancestors, and from a farm which had been enclosed and reclaimed by himself and his ancestors, whose labour had given it its present value. That man's case was but an illustration of the condition in which those tenants stood in that part of Scotland. They were wholly and entirely at the mercy of the lairds in consequence of the present state of the law. He (Mr. Anderson) wished to ask the Government whether they intended to introduce a measure this Session to give powers to enable persons to obtain small patches of land compulsorily, which were so much wanted in the North of Scotland, and mentioned a case which had come under his notice, where a shopkeeper on being obliged to leave his premises could not get a piece of land on which to erect other premises, although the proprietor owned hundreds of thousands of acres?

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)— CONTRACTS FOR MAT MAKING.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, South) said, he was desirous of calling attention to certain advertisements which had appeared in the newspapers at the instance of the prison authorities offering to contract for the supply of large quantities of mats made by prison labour in the Bristol, Leeds, Cardiff, Chelmsford, and other prisons. Such contracts entered into on the part of the prison authorities were calculated to keep a great number of honest and industrious persons out of work, and were entirely opposed to the spirit of the assurances which had been frequently given by the Government that every effort should be made to reduce the amount of mat-making in prisons, which competed most unfairly with outside labour. It was one of the greatest anomalies of our system of government that a Public Department was allowed to compete in the open market with manufacturers and industrious artizans for the supply of articles which were the result of labour in our prisons, which were supported and paid for by the taxpayers of the country. In these circumstances, he asked the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) to give him assurance that these proposed contracts should not be entered into by the Prison Department until he and other hon. Members had had an opportunity of bringing the subject under the notice of the House.

Dr. Clark

SCOTLAND — ACTION OF THE CROFTER COMMISSION.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he wished to raise his humble voice to emphasize the peculiar facts connected with the results of the recent deliverances of the Crofter Commission. He did not think these points were sufficiently appreciated, even after the speech of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark). The reductions that had been made in rents by that Commission were even more significant than those connected with the fixing of judicial rents in Ireland. The reduction percentages were much higher in Scotland than in Ireland, reaching, as they did, to 30, 40, and even 50 per cent, which showed how great the injury was that had been inflicted upon the crofters. He did not think the meaning of the reduction of 50 per cent was sufficiently realized. Suppose there had been a reduction of 50 per cent, what did that mean? It meant an injury to the tenant much higher than an injury of 50 per cent. It represented 100 per cent. A tenant, say, was charged £100 a-year rent; it was then discovered by the Commission that the rent ought to be reduced to £50. That was a reduction of 50 per cent, so far as the landlord was concerned; but what did it mean with respect to the injury that has been all along done to the tenant? It meant that he had been all along paying £50 of unjust charge, so that he had been charged 100 per cent more than he ought to have been charged; £50 on £50 was the same as £100 on £100. [Ministerial laughter.] It required elementary instruction of that kind to bring the matter properly home to the minds of hon. Members opposite. He thought it ought to be impressed on the minds of hon. Members opposite that there were sufferings in connection with the tenancies in the Western Islands of Scotland that were even more deplorable, in many respects, than the sufferings of the tenants of Ireland. There were numbers of people in Scotland who had been proved by the statistics placed before them by the Crofter Commission to have been charged 100 per cent in excess of what they ought to have been paying, and in some cases even more than 120 per cent.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) said, that being a Scotch debate, perhaps it had been rather dull. Scotch affairs did not evoke much enthusiasm. He would not seek to retract one word which had been said on behalf of the Highlands of Scotland; but he demurred somewhat to the complaint of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson), who said that they had no Representative of the Scotch Department in the House. He regretted as much as the hon. and learned Member that they had not the Secretary for Scotland in that House. It was a circumstance over which they had no control; but they had in that House a very eminent Member of the Government (Mr. J. B. P. Robertson), who represented a Scotch county constituency, and whose abilities were known throughout Scotland. As this was the time for complaints, he (Mr. Esslemont) would, while he supported the complaints of his hon. Friends, make his own complaint, for the difficulties which existed in the Highlands existed equally in East Aberdeenshire. They had a fishing population there, and they had the cottagers, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General knew of the unsatisfactory condition of their houses, and of the tenure in many places on the East Coast of Scotland, and particularly in Aberdeenshire. There they had the depression of trade, and the consequent depression of fishing, and they had there all the difficulties which the fishermen had in the West of Scotland. The other day he suggested that the Fishery Board and the Scotch Department generally should make specific inquiries into the complaints which, from time to time, came before them. They should by-and-bye have to discuss the extension of the Crofters Act to the other counties of Scotland, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Scotland was aware that in Aberdeen they had a larger number of crofters than in any other county. What he asked was, that before that discussion came on the complaints of the fishermen in regard to the boat question, and the complaints in regard to the Land Question, should receive from the Scotch Office that attention and inquiry which he knew they deserved. They had not yet had Her Majesty's gunboat on the East Coast; but that was not because they had not suffered. But they were a courageous and long-suffering people; and he hoped the Government, while they would not pay less attention to the Highlands, would pay more to them. He should be failing in his duty if he did not point out that the complaints were by no means confined to the Highlands of Scotland—that there was suffering on the East Coast. There was much domestic legislation sorely needed. He hoped, in the meantime, the complaints would be investigated which he had had the sorrow to lodge in the Scotch Office; and he commended that inquiry to the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Scotland.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute): The observations of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) have touched a number of social questions which affect the constituency which he so assiduously represents. I need make no general protestation on behalf of the Scotch Department that questions relating to fishermen as well as to agricultural labourers must always bulk largely with those who have the responsibility of administering the affairs of Scotland. We fortunately have Representatives in this House who are perfectly able to enforce on the Government and on Parliament the views of their constituents, and I do not think I should be far wrong in saying that, with regard to the social legislation, we should welcome any suggestions which are made to us from any quarter of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) has addressed the House on a variety of topics, upon which I shall not dwell for any time. He has introduced to the House two cases of individual or personal grievance, regarding one of which he has informed the House that an explanation has been given him from this Bench, the accuracy of which he is not in a position to impeach. If that explanation be well founded, as we have every reason to believe it is, that subject ought to vanish, and I hope has vanished, from occupying the time of the House. The other case is one regarding which I have no information, but if the hon. and learned Member thinks he has a substantial grievance, he has the means of calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to it in the ordinary manner. The hon. and learned Member for Elgin has added as a supplement to these somewhat personal observations about two of his constituents a general appeal to the Government to initiate legislation enabling persons to acquire land by compulsory powers. I need hardly say that this is too large a subject to enter upon at the present time, and this would be a most improper occasion for me to enter upon it. I pass to the more important remarks of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), because they relate to a specific and definite subject—the administration of the Crofters Act. There is one remark with which I think the House will generally sympathize. The Crofters Act was passed little more than a year ago, and we have not yet had a year's experience of its administration to show its merits or defects. I think I may appeal to hon. Gentlemen whether all Parties ought not to give the Crofters Act fair play and fair trial; and I am bound to say that I deeply regret that on this occasion the hon. Member's sense of duty should have compelled him to make remarks disparaging to the Commission itself.

DR. CLARK said, he was not aware that he did.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member said—"We do not like the Commission," and he proceeded to give his reasons for that dislike—[DR. R. McDONALD: Hear, hear!]—and I see his observation is sympathized in by another crofter Representative. He proceeded to give his reasons for that dislike. That Commission was only appointed last year, under an Act passed in the last Session of the previous Parliament, and I venture to think that anyone interested in those parts of the country would forget something of what is due to the prospects of the population if he were to shake the confidence of his constituents in those who administer the Act. The action of the Government has been animated by motives of a totally opposite character. The present Government were not parties to the passing of the Act.

Mr. Esslemont

DR. CLARK said, he wished to correct a misapprehension of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Dr. Clark) had stated distinctly what he thought—that the learned gentleman the Sheriff at the head of the Commission had acted very impartially and judicially, and had considered the interests both of the landlords and the tenants. He eulogized the Sheriff's conduct as far as he possibly could, and he also stated that the other two Commissioners had acted in the same way. He entirely repudiated that he had disparaged these officials, but had pointed out the class to which the crofters had a prejudice. He would not personally do so.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member has not overstated what he said, but at the same time he did emphasize the point that he did not like the Commissioners.

DR. CLARK said, he begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon, he simply spoke of the prejudice—the class dislike—and that they loved each other as the Protestant boys love the Irish Nationalists. He only spoke of the antagonism between the big farming class and the crofting class.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think that is not the best means of inspiring confidence in the persons whose qualifications are so characterized. I think the hon. Gentleman will find that he added, "We do not like the Commissioners." The hon. Gentleman went further, because he criticized the result of the Crofter Commission down to the present day in a way which was hardly fair. He said, in the first place, that they had an enormous number of applications, and that not much progress had been made, and that in regard to the Fishery Clauses we must regard the terms required for advances as prohibitory. Now, the clauses relating to rents and the clauses relating to fisheries constitute practically the bulk of the Bill, and if I were a friend of the successful administration of the Act, I should hardly point out that the Act was not working smoothly or successfully in its two main purposes. I have, however, a word to say in regard to each of these matters, and I do think that the dispassionate opinion of the House will discover no ground for despondency as to the work of the Crofters Act. In the first place, as regards the Land Clauses, the Commission has certainly not been able to get much more than abreast of the applications which are coming in, and for a very good reason. They have proceeded with some caution, because the powers entrusted to them were of the most novel description. They desired that they should have a sufficient number of cases to enable them to generalize and form rules and opinions as to the methods by which they should dispose of the various classes of cases which came before them, and accordingly, I think, they have acted rightly in hearing a great number of cases before deciding upon any. There is another point to be observed as to the rate of progress. The Crofter Commission began its operations in October last year. Much of the work of the Commission involves the peripatetic process of going about and examining the country, and making themselves acquainted with the circumstances of the district and even of the individual holdings. The winter days were short, and necessarily the part of the year which has elapsed since October is not the most favourable for making progress with a work of that kind. I may be allowed, on behalf of the Scotch Department, who necessarily are brought into contact with the Commission, to say that there is now good reason for hoping that once the Commissioners break ground, and see their way through the various classes of cases, they will proceed with a firmness, precision, and rapidity which they could not have done if they had decided a number of cases as they came in, and pronounced what might be called hasty decisions. The other branch of the Act which the hon. Gentleman criticized, and the working of which he did not seem to consider very satisfactory, was that regarding the fishing loans. The importance of that question the Government are quite alive to. I should like to mention, for the information of the House, that the hon. Member is not quite accurate in saying that the terms have proved to be prohibitory, because, in point of fact, there is evidence in the proceedings which took place before the Commission that the population were alive to the advantages of these clauses, and would take advantage of them. I am informed that down, not to date, but to a considerable time ago, 1,400 forms of application had been applied for from fishery towns, and 183 applications had been sent in. That does not show that in the judgment of those who are primarily concerned—whatever their political advisers may consider—these clauses are likely to be inoperative. I should add, regarding the Fishery Board, whose duty it is to superintend the working of this branch of the Act, that they necessarily proceeded with some caution. It was necessary that they should find out how many applicants there were to be, in order to see how far the limited amount of money at their disposal would go, and also to exercise great caution in finding out whether there was any ground for supposing that the security was not sufficient to cover the advance of public money, and also that the boats which are to be built would be such as would conduce to the further prosperity of the fisheries of Scotland by being efficient and good boats for a storm. There was one other point of detail to which the hon. Member referred—that in regard to the appointment of valuers. Under the Act it did not fall to the Government, but to the Commission, to appoint valuers, and, accordingly, it is entirely in the judgment of the Commission to say at what time they should require assistance of that kind, and when grants are required for that purpose. It is the duty of the Government not to cut in and interfere with the action of the Commissioners, but rather to expedite their operations. In this matter the Government are not at variance with the judgment of the Commissioners. I was very glad to hear the hon. Member mention, with incidental approval, a Bill which has been introduced and passed, I believe, through the House of Lords, and I was very happy to gather that those for whom the hon. Member for Caithness is spokesman approved of its provisions, and I hope we may rely on their active assistance in carrying the Bill through this House. The judgment of the Government entirely coincides with the view that that Bill is a proper complement of the legislation of last year. There is another point somewhat detached from the subject of the crofting population—the condition of ploughmen in Scotland. It would be impossible to enter into a subject of that magnitude at the present time, but I think the hon. Member who referred to this matter would leave the House under a somewhat gloomy and mistaken view of the condition of Scotland, if I were not to mention that the present system is to a very large extent being superseded and replaced in many parts of the country. The subject of dwellings for the working classes is one which of late years has excited very great attention; and more especially—to their credit should it be said—among the proprietors in Scotland, and the housing of ploughmen, as well as other classes of labourers, is, I believe, receiving very great amelioration from the exertions of those to whom I refer. I think I have touched upon all the questions mentioned by the hon. Members in this discussion.

DR. R. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) said, he had the misfortune not to be in the House during the whole discussion. The question as to the fishing boats was of great importance. He had no reason to complain of the tone of the remarks of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson), and he assured the hon. and learned Gentleman that the terms on which loans were granted for building boats were not satisfactory. He had received scores of letters from fishermen in the North complaining of the terms offered by the Government with regard to the purchase of fishing boats, and stating they were perfectly useless, as it was impossible for the fishermen on the West Coast to collect the money to pay for them. £350 had been mentioned as the sum required for a fishing boat; but, from information which he had received, he thought that the sum was too low an estimate, and would not be sufficient to buy a boat and gear. He thought that the Fishery Board had no right to ask such onerous terms, as they insisted on the boats being insured to their full value—thus giving them full and ample security if anything should happen to the boats—and they were thus secure of their money. With regard to depreciation, it must be remembered that one-eighth of the money was paid year by year. On the whole, therefore, he thought that the Fishery Board were driving too hard a bargain with these people. As the hon. and learned Solicitor General had stated that the Government would welcome any suggestion, he (Dr. McDonald) would recommend that they should offer the boats to the fishermen for a very small sum paid down, and so enable them to prosper. He freely told the hon. and learned Solicitor General that he did not like the Commission. The crofter Members were not allowed to have any say in the matter, for the Government did not give them on the Commission one man in whom the crofters had confidence. That the Commission had, however, done better than he expected, he freely admitted; but it was doing its work very slowly, and it was time that the Government brought pressure to bear on the Commission to appoint valuers so that their work might be facilitated. A great deal of the work was done by gentlemen who got £800 a-year, which could well be done by paid valuers, who could be got for £200 a-year.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

THE MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES)—APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES IN FLINTSHIRE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) said, that he desired to call attention to a subject of much interest to his constituents—namely, the constitution of the magistracy in Flintshire. The question had been brought before the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) by means of Questions by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. He had not himself taken part in these Questions until that day, being in hopes that the grievance would be removed. But his hopes were now very faint, and he thought it was his duty to impress upon the House the great injustice under which the Nonconformists of Flintshire laboured. It ought to be known that in this county two-thirds of the population were Protestant Nonconformists. The magistracy of Flintshire numbered between 80 and 100 gentlemen. He believed there was not a single Nonconformist on the Bench in Flintshire. This caused, as it seemed to him, very grievous injustice. The appointments in Flintshire had been made, he might say, almost entirely in the interests of the Conservative Party. Most of the magistrates in Flintshire belonged to that Party. There were a few Liberals, mostly Churchmen, and one or two Catholics; but so far as he knew, there was not a single magistrate sitting on the Bench in Flintshire who belonged to the religious denomination of the great mass of the constituency. This state of things was one which, at this age of the world, was perfectly intolerable. They had hoped that by means of friendly private negotiations they might get over this difficulty; but they had come to the conclusion that there was nothing for them to do but to lay the matter before the public and the House of Commons, until at last the mere sense of shame, if nothing else, would lead to justice being done. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there were about 30 gentlemen in Flintshire who possessed the requisite qualification, and the right hon. Gentleman had informed him that this was not the case. Now, he (Mr. Samuel Smith) had taken much pains to ascertain how many Protestant Nonconformists of Flintshire possessed the legal qualifications, and he was quite within the mark when he said there were 30 such men that could be easily found. He might be told that some of these gentlemen did not possess the social qualifications. He admitted that some of them did not hold the highest position in society; but there were, no doubt, a fair number who possessed both the educational and social as well as the legal qualifications. If the appointments were made by the Lord Lieutenant, looking at this matter with fair and unprejudiced eyes, there could not be any difficulty in discovering several highly estimable persons who might be put upon the Bench with great satisfaction to the mass of the population of Flintshire. Again, the bulk of the people were Welsh speaking, while the present magistrates, almost without exception, were English speaking, and were totally unacquainted with anything of the Welsh language. Interpreters—often men of a very incompetent kind—were employed, and he believed that in consequence there were cases decided in which the magistrates were improperly informed as to the facts, and injustice was done. There ought to be an adequate representation on the Bench of the Protestant Nonconformists, and especially of those who were able to speak the Welsh language. The existing state of things was producing want of sympathy between the people of Flintshire and the administration of the law. He wished to see the law strengthened, and it could be so only in so far as it was based on the confidence and affections of the people; but those who were responsible in this matter in that part of Wales were doing their best to bring about a breach between the people and the administration of the law. The system of excluding the great mass of the community from their proper share in the administration of justice was not truly conservative, or conducive to the real interests of the country. He hoped that the Government would, in some way or other, put pressure on the Lord Lieutenant, the Queen's Representative in Flintshire, in order to see that this glaring injustice was remedied. If it was not remedied, he believed there would be never-ceasing agitation, increasing disaffection, and want of confidence in the administration of the law. He did not wish to see in Wales a repetition of the scenes that had taken place in some parts of Ireland; but this system of excluding representatives of the great mass of the people from the administration of justice was certain to bring it about. His only object in bringing that question forward was to promote good feeling among all classes of the community, and to remove all just ground of complaint.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, the people of Wales must be exceedingly grateful, and he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) begged to express his thanks to his hon. Friend for bringing that matter forward, because such a state of things as now existed in Flintshire did not exist in any other county of England or Wales. Although the great majority of its inhabitants were Nonconformists, yet there was not a single Nonconformist magistrate on the Bench. Question after Question had been put to his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State to the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley), and he was bound to say that the answers of the Under Secretary upon the question had been most unsatisfactory. His hon. Friend had pointed out that there were 30 Nonconformist gentlemen in Flintshire who possessed the necessary qualification for appointment to the magistracy. The hon. Member for the county of Flint (Mr. Samuel Smith), and also the hon. Member for the Borough of Flint (Mr. John Roberts), themselves possessed the necessary qualifications for the magistracy, and both of them, he believed, acted as magistrates in neighbouring counties, but yet the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire had not thought fit to put either of them or any other Nonconformist on the Bench. Was that the result of accident? The Welsh people had hitherto been among the most loyal and law-abiding subjects of the Queen; but he doubted whether there was not a strong spirit of discontent and disaffection springing up in many parts of Wales, and he was bound to say that Lords Lieutenant who acted in the way which the Lord Lieutenant for Flintshire did were greatly responsible for that state of things.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE BARBAVILLA PRISONERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.) said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the condition of the prisoners who were convicted in this case, and to ask the Government to grant an impartial inquiry in their case, as had been given in the case of the prisoners Hebron and Brian Kilmartin. Mr. Justice Day had been sent to investigate the Belfast riots, and he urged that some impartial Judge should be sent to investigate the circumstances of this case. If he were not clearly convinced that the men now suffering penal servitude were completely innocent he would not trouble the House for one moment on the subject. All the Government were asked to do was to give an impartial inquiry into the case of these prisoners, such as was given into the case of Hebron, Ryan, and Kilmartin, and if that were done evidence would be produced to show the innocence of the men, and to show the perjured character of the testimony on which they had been convicted. Constable Fitzgerald was ready to substantiate the statement which he had already made that the informers in the case had between them concocted the evidence on which a packed jury in Green Street had convicted the prisoners. He again appealed to the Government not to be so steadfast in refusing the impartial inquiry he asked for, and for which he would continue to ask so long as he was a Member of the House. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had not thought fit to make it convenient to be present in the House; for he (Mr. Tuite) wished to call attention to the National Teachers' Bill. The Government had promised from time to time to deal with the position of those teachers, and successive Chief Secretaries had been interviewed on the subject. The reply given in each case had been to the effect that the position of the teachers would be immediately considered by the Government. The result up to the present had been that the teachers had received many promises, but nothing in the shape of substantial improvement in their position. Comparing the inferior position of the Irish teachers with that of the English and Scotch teachers, he said that all they wanted was to have the Irish teachers placed on the same footing as their brethren in England and Scotland. He asked, seeing that no facilities had been offered by the Government for the discussion of the Bill, whether they would give a promise that before the Session closed the case of the Irish teachers would be considered.

Mr. Samuel Smith

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) said, he wished to interpose in the debate in order to answer the question raised by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Quilter) as to the tenders for contracts of prison labour. The subject had been brought to his notice so late before coming down to the House that he had practically no opportunity of learning more than that the tenders had been invited. In the circumstances, he must not be taken to admit that in the contracts to be made there was any departure contemplated from pledges given to the House, or that there was any intention to increase to any extent the amount of mat-making labour done in the prisons.

There had been a great decrease in the last nine years in the amount of mat-making labour. In the convict prisons mat-making had disappeared altogether, and in the local prisons the daily average number of prisoners employed on it had diminished in this period from close upon 3,000 to 1,681. He hoped that this fact indicated what the policy of the Department was. He assured the hon. Member that he would take care that no action was taken in respect of those tenders until after the first two days after the House had met again, and until there had thus been an opportunity of raising the subject in the form of a Question in the House or on the Estimates. In reference to the question raised by the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) and the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) as to the insufficient representation of the Nonconformist party on the magisterial Bench—

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: No representation at all.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: Well, an inadequate representation.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: None at all.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: Well, in saying that there was no representation at all it seemed to be assumed that there was a right to some representation. The mere fact that a man belonged to a particular religious denomination did not constitute a right or qualification for the Bench. Moreover, the law did not give the appointments to the House nor to the political departments of the Executive Government. The information they had received from the Lord Lieutenant, upon whom the responsibility rested, was to the effect that he was unable to find gentlemen possessing the necessary qualification to sit on the Bench. When he said qualification he understood him to mean not merely qualification by estate, but to include also qualifications with regard to social position, and in the matter of legal learning. He thought it was a wise arrangement which kept the appointment of magistrates a thing apart from the duties of the Administration; but even if it were advisable to alter the law, there were measures on the subject before the House which made discussion on such a subject at present out of Order. He did not see what the Government could do in the matter. If it was possible to put pressure on the Lord Lieutenant in the direction indicated, an opportunity had presented itself during the five years hon. Gentlemen opposite were in the enjoyment of power. It was surprising that they had made so little use of their opportunities in the matter complained of. The matter did not come within the province of the Department which he represented. The main facts on which the hon. Member rested his case were really disputed by those who were equally well able to judge of the question with himself. He (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) must protest against the idea that anything improper had been done, and deny that the matter was within the province of the Department to which he belonged.

THE VACCINATION ACT—ACTION OF
THE COMPULSORY LAW OF VACCI-NATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, that he wished to bring before the President of the Local Government Board and the Government generally a subject which was one of increasing importance—that was the growing friction which attended the working of the Vaccination Acts. He wanted to urge some reasons why the Government should give attention to the question and look into it under the new aspect which it wore now. Within a very few years there had been thousands of prosecutions under that Act, a great number of conscientious men had been imprisoned, and the goods of many honest and industrious men had been distrained. It should not be forgotten that the people who suffered under what they called persecution were, in almost all cases, men and women of good character, of industry, and of thrift, and of intelligence enough to form an opinion for themselves, and of firmness to stick to it. He thought such people were deserving of a good deal of consideration. They had, at any rate, experience to go by. A large number of them had seen their own children suffer from vaccination. ["Oh, oh!"] At all events, they had seen them suffer in a manner which they traced to the effects of the operation. They were fortified in this view by the opinions of a good many medical men, who not only did not deny, but urged that vaccination was frequently attended with considerable danger. The Government should not look on quietly and see prosecutions increasing by leaps and bounds, and also see the amount of suffering entailed, without trying to find out whether anything could be done to lessen the strain of the law. He had asked a Question the previous day with respect to a case of special hardship which had happened on the borders of his own constituency. He referred to the case of a Mr. King, who, in consequence of what had happened in his own family, had declined to have one of his own children vaccinated. A fine was inflicted. The child died on the 9th May last year; but it was not until the May of this year that the fine was enforced by distraint. The mode of carrying out the law had inspired such a bitter feeling in Leicester, that a sale of King's goods could not be carried out, and it was not surprising that some disorder arose. Besides that, it was said that the provisions of the law were not fully complied with, especially with regard to the time of selling the goods.

MR. SPEAKER said, that he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he must remind him that he was now speaking on a subject—the compulsory vaccination laws—in regard to which he had given Notice of a Motion on a future day.

MR. PICTON said, that he begged pardon if he had transgressed the Rules of the House. He did not then desire to discuss the operation or the merits of the laws of compulsory vaccination. He was only asking that the Government should direct their attention to the increasing friction caused by the enforcement of the law of compulsory vaccination. The difficulty of enforcing the law was now rapidly increasing, and he trusted that the Government would not allow it to escape their attention, but would, if possible, take measures to terminate the existing state of things.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, that after the Speaker's ruling the House would not expect him to enter at any length into the subject which the hon. Member had brought under the notice of the House. The object of the hon. Member had his sympathy, and he regretted that such action as the hon. Member referred to had to be taken for the purpose of seeing that the law was carried out. There were, no doubt, a considerable number of persons who had conscientious objections to their children being vaccinated, but many of the prosecutions arose, not on account of persons conscientiously refusing to comply with the law, but because certain associations urged people not to comply with the law. The Local Government Board had a duty to perform, and were bound to see that the Vaccination Acts were carried out, but at the same time they were desirous that this should be done without undue harshness. He could not say that there was any intention on the part of the Government to institute any general inquiry into the matter. He gave his personal attention to every case brought before him, and he always took care to see that the law was not unduly strained. More than that he could not say.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.) had wished to say something at an earlier moment on the subject of justice in Flintshire, as he did not wish what had been already said by a right hon. and hon. Gentleman on the other side to pass unchallenged. No one had had a greater opportunity for the last 35 years than he had to see the way in which justice in that county was administered. He had the honour of knowing very well the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire; and of seeing the extremely conscientious manner in which he made his appointments, and he ventured to think that there could be no greater justification of the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant than the remarks which fell from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Flintshire. The nature of the hon. Gentleman's complaint was that Nonconformists ought to be appointed, and in fact, that inquiries ought to be made into their political views. Now, that was the very thing which the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire refused to do. The Lord Lieutenant said that a Lord Lieutenant, in order to win the admiration and the confidence of the country, ought not to look any way either to religion or politics, and he refused to do so. What he did look to, and rightly in his (Mr. Swetenham's) opinion, was that the gentleman he wished to appoint to the County Bench was both socially, educationally, and financially a desirable person. Therefore, he ventured to think that if the hon. Member for Flintshire had had as much experience as he had had, and the same opportunities of seeing the way justice was administered in Flintshire, he would have spared the House the remark which fell from him to-day—a remark which was calculated to bring justice into disrepute in the county. He thought it quite right to make these observations, and he should not have troubled the House with them if he had not thought it was absolutely necessary that someone knowing the facts of the case should rise in his place and say that which he knew, and be able to refute the arguments used. There was only one other observation he had to make. It had been said that there were no less than 30 gentlemen fully qualified for taking their seat on the Flintshire Bench. No one knew the facts better than he, and he ventured to say there were not anything like that number who were fit and qualified to take that important position. It was said that the hon. Member himself was not a magistrate. He (Mr. Swetenham) did not think the hon. Gentleman resided in Flintshire, but he was quite certain if he did reside there, and if he expressed the smallest wish to become a magistrate, and that wish was conveyed to the Lord Lieutenant, that officer would instantly recommend him for the position.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, that the speech of the Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) had raised several questions which were of interest in the West of Ireland. The hon. Member had referred to the want of the crofters for more land. This was also the case of tenants in the West of Ireland. Whatever the rent might be, the smaller tenants in the West of Ireland could not support themselves and families in decent comfort on their small holdings. Fortunately, with the exception of the coast, all over the West of Ireland there was an ample supply of grass land in each district which could be taken at a valuation and given to increase the holding of the small farmers. As a general rule proprietors would be extremely glad to sell the grass lands at a fair value, and the result would do more good than could be accomplished by any amount of legislation. There would be some objection on the part of the larger grass farmers, but that was a comparatively small difficulty. He should like to see an Amendment of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act so as to enable the tenants to buy the land adjoining their holdings. This could easily be done if the 1877; and for a very considerable period before that the Court of Chancery Appeal was constituted with the Lord Chancellor as one of its constituted members. The hon. and learned Member said that in Ireland the Lord Chancellor sat in the Court of Appeal, while in England he did not do so. It would be impossible, without a much larger staff, to manage the Court of Appeal unless the Lord Chancellor was a member of it; and it was on that basis that its constitution under the Act of 1877 was drawn out. It did not appear to be an extraordinary thing, when that Act was passed, that the Lord Chancellor should be placed at the head of the Court of Appeal. They had in the Court of Appeal in Ireland Lord Chancellors drawn from both sides of the House. They had two very distinguished and keen politicians from the Liberal side of the House—Lord O'Hagan and the late Mr. Hugh Law. In the same way, Lord Ashbourne had always acted as his Predecessors had done in presiding in that Court; and, as he gathered from the hon. and learned Member, he did not impute to Lord Ashbourne partiality in the mode in which he administered justice. At present the English Lord Chancellor did not sit in the Court of Appeal. For many years he had done so; but by reason of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords his time was fully occupied, and it had been for many years not usual for him to do so, and why? Because he was presiding in the very highest Court of the Realm. If the case of Father Keller was brought to the House of Lords the Lord Chancellor would preside at the hearing. The hon. and learned Member then referred to the arrest of Father Keller, and asked why the Government should not make some inquiry into the circumstances connected with it, and make that inquiry with the view of seeing that some compensation should be given. What occurred in that case occurred very frequently in the various Courts, the only difference being that it was a rev. gentleman in that case, while in other cases the person committed would not be in Holy Orders. The Court of Bankruptcy made an order that had the effect of sending this rev. gentleman to prison. It came by appeal before the Queen's Bench, and that Court decided that the order was right; and it then came before the Court of Appeal, and that Court, by a majority of four Judges to one, decided that the order was wrong. The hon. and learned Member also referred to the case of an English clergyman, who was released by the Superior Courts. He (Mr. Holmes) was not aware that any demand for inquiry or compensation was made in that case, which was a precisely similar case to that of Father Keller.

Mr. Holmes

MR. T. M. HEALY: No; he was convicted in that case.

MR. HOLMES wished further to point out that the Court of Appeal held that Father Keller should be released by reason of the warrant not being valid. They all admitted that the facts of the case as they transpired in the Bankruptcy Court were sufficient to justify the Judge in making the order to commit him to prison, but they held that the mode in which he made that order was bad. The point had been a technical one; although a proper order could have been made, as a matter of fact it had not been made. With reference to the proceedings at Youghal, in which a man, unfortunately, lost his life, it must be remembered that there was considerable excitement in Youghal; and at the time the police charged with their bayonets Father Keller was not arrested at all. It took place early in the morning after the lives of the police had been placed in danger. Although the stabbing of the man was an unfortunate circumstance, he denied that it was a criminal act. The matter was investigated before the Coroner's jury, and it was not a fact that Constabulary witnesses refused to answer any question, because it appeared from the depositions that all the questions asked were answered. He read the depositions most carefully, and beyond all doubt, any officer would be justified in ordering the charge. The man Ward would have been dismissed from the force if he had not carried it out, and the officer (Sub-Inspector Somerville) would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty if he had not ordered it. Having read the depositions he advised that no prosecution should be brought, as he had advised in the case of eight policemen who had, also, been found guilty of wilful murder by a Coroner's jury in Belfast. He was informed that according to the practice in England there was no precedent for a man being put on his trial on a Coroner's inquisition. He believed he would not be justified in the performance of his duty by directing a trial against those men in Youghal or against those men in Belfast. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: What happened?] The matter did not belong to his Department, but he heard the Chief Secretary for Ireland stating, in answer to a Question, that Sub-Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward were still in the force, and he did not see why they should not be. Then, in regard to the case of Sub-Inspector Milling, he was bound to clear the streets of Cork owing to the collection of a crowd in the streets at that late hour. And he did clear the streets, as the police would do under ordinary circumstances. Although the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) was knocked down, that was done in the ordinary course of clearing the streets, and on reading the depositions in that case he did what he had done again and again in other cases—directed that the Crown should not prosecute. These were the facts the hon. and learned Member had referred to. He had no knowledge that he was going to bring them forward, except what he said with respect to the Court of Appeal last night; but he had the facts in his recollection, and was, therefore, able to answer the questions which he had raised.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — UNSATISFACTORY STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) said, he rose to make some observations on a subject which he wished could have been taken up by some Member of greater experience in the House than himself. He referred to the extraordinary situation in which the House found itself placed with regard to the general business of the country. The House had now been sitting four months, and during that time what had taken place? They had passed two clauses of the Coercion Bill for Ireland and the Bill to enable the Duke of Connaught to come home for the purpose of attending Her Majesty's Jubilee Celebrations. He did not know whether the First Lord of the Treasury considered this record of achievements as sufficient to justify the reward he had conferred upon the House in giving a somewhat extended Whitsuntide holiday; but he felt certain that the country at large were looking on with disapproval and with disappointment at the very small results that had attended the first four months of the present Session. He did not blame for a moment the line of conduct pursued by hon. Gentlemen from Ireland below the Gangway; he did not say as to any one of their Amendments that it was not reasonable in itself, or at all events arguable; and there could be no doubt of this—that all their Amendments had been argued with conspicuous ability if not at all times with success in the voting Lobby. But he could not shut his eyes to the fact that any Bill, however small it might be, could be so loaded with Amendments, each in itself reasonable, that the discussion, even the reasonable discussion, of these Amendments might in the aggregate amount to a state of things which would prevent any other business whatever being taken by the House. He did not blame hon. Members from Ireland for doing what they had conceived it to be their duty to do; but he did blame the Government for the position in which the House of Commons was placed. First of all, what was the prime cause of the condition into which they had been led? He insisted upon throwing the responsibility upon the Government, because they had committed themselves to a Bill which, in the view of the Opposition, was absolutely unnecessary and unjustified by the condition of Ireland—a Bill which everybody must have seen was ill-conceived and ill-considered, and which had been ill-defended and obstinately adhered to. The prime cause of the present position of the House was the unfortunate policy of the Government. Then he complained that the Government, having undertaken that policy, had not adopted the only means of carrying it through without injury to the Business of the House. He referred more particularly to the policy and conduct of the Government with reference to the closure, and he would remind the House that the Government had refused to accept the only effective form of closure which was offered to them by the great majority of the Liberal Party. They had insisted on overloading the closure with restrictions which had made it almost inapplicable. They had insisted on retaining the veto of the Chair; they had insisted on the presence of the 200 majority, and they had insisted on introducing considerations with regard to the rights of minorities and the fulness of discussion which were totally irrelevant to the question of the closure as a means of facilitating discussions in that House. The fact was, he supposed, the Government were troubled with the anticipations of a guilty political conscience. They remembered what they had been in the past, and they did not expect always to be in a majority. They had a shrewd suspicion of how the closure would be applied to them when they came to carry out in Opposition their habitual policy. This had foiled the application of the closure, which had bent in their hands. There had never been any closure during the dinner hour, and why? Because the Government could not get the necessary attendance, and because they refused to accept at the hands of the Opposition that absolute majority which alone would enable them to work this instrument. He would not refer to other examples that might be given of the failure of this instrument. This, however, he might allude to—that on several occasions they had been beaten by the application of the closure, because they insisted upon calling in the judgment of the Chair. His further objection to the conduct of the Government in the whole of this matter was that they had not been ashamed to make Party capital out of the situation which they themselves had created. If they were to apply to old maxims in questions of suspected guilt, who was to gain by the perpetuation of the present state of matters in this House, what must be the answer? Who gained by the present condition of this House? It was not the Government alone, but it was the alliance between the Government and the illegitimate Opposition. There was an illegitimate Opposition, which sat on this side of the House and voted with the other, and it was the alliance between the Government and the Opposition, and that alliance only, which gained by the continuation of the present state of things. If the Government were successful in passing through the summer discussing nothing but this Irish Coercion Bill, all the questions would be staved off on which there would be any possibility of dispute between the Government and the Liberal Unionists. He said, moreover, they were attempting to make Party capital out of the present situation by charging the Liberal Party with Obstruction. The secretaries of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith), as he knew very well, scattered broadcast over the country insinuations of all kinds against the Liberal Party, until they were checked by questions put to the right hon. Gentleman in that House. For some weeks they had been silent, but apparently, in anticipation of the Whitsuntide Holidays, the secretaries were at it again. Perhaps the House would allow him to read the latest manifesto of one of the right hon. Gentleman's secretaries, which was in answer to a letter from a branch of the Primrose League. Speaking in the name of the right hon. Gentleman, the secretary said—

“I trust that the growing indignation of the country will, even at the eleventh hour, warn those who are leading the minority in the House of the dangerous and unpatriotic course they are pursuing, and remind them that they, equally with Her Majesty's Government, are responsible that the time of Parliament shall not be wasted, and still more that the proceedings of the House shall not be brought into contempt.”

With the sentiments of that letter he had no fault to find. He was as anxious as any man on the other side of the House that the time of the House should not be wasted. He was anxious also that the proceedings of the House should not be brought into contempt or ridicule; nor was he going to presume to defend his Leaders. Some hon. Members on the Opposition side were not such slavish followers of Leaders as were hon. Gentlemen on the other side. He left his Leaders to defend themselves. For himself, he said that the charge in the letter against the Liberal Party was one which they repudiated. What he repudiated especially was that any responsibility whatever rested upon them for the present condition of things. The Leader of the House had the power and the responsibility, and if he chose to engage in measures which led to this result—that after four months the House had done next to nothing—then the responsibility of getting them out of that position rested not upon them but upon him. He wished to make this final charge against the Government—that they were using the state of things they themselves had created not merely as a means of attacking the Liberal Party, but as a means of disparaging this House and of exalting the other House of Parliament. Lord Salisbury could not make a speech without endeavouring to secure Party capital in this way. He was not surprised at anything Lord Salisbury might say. He was not surprised that even Tory Democrats might reveal their real character by such charges as these. They were Tories at heart and Democrats by necessity; but he was surprised that the Leader of that House, who was charged with the maintenance of the honour of the House, could sit silently under charges which were directed against the institution he was bound to protect, and which were based upon a state of things he was chiefly responsible for producing. As a Member of the Liberal Party, as a Member of that House, he declined to permit Her Majesty's Government to walk away with the advantages which they were so disingenuously claiming. He declined to submit patiently to charges which, so far as Members around him were concerned, were entirely unfounded. He insisted that it was the duty of the Government to find a way out of the imbroglio which they themselves had created. This was his practical conclusion. It was the duty of the Government so to manage Parliamentary Business for the rest of the Session that the House of Commons should be able, whether this Bill went on or whether it was dropped, to set itself to the discharge of those tremendous duties which had been imposed upon it, and to the safeguard of the great interests which had been committed to its care.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, he must congratulate the Leader of the House on having moved the Resolution for Adjournment; it was about the best thing he had done since he had led the House. The adjournment would prevent them from doing a great deal of mischief for a couple of weeks. But still it was a most extraordinary Motion. They had for seven weeks, at the instance of the Government, been doing what was called "promoting law and order" in Ireland. They had been told that the policy of the Government was absolutely essential to keep things quiet in Ireland. The Chief Secretary had told them that they would neglect the most elementary duties of government if they were to defer for a single day to answer the appeal that came to them from Ireland—that things were going from bad to worse in that country, and that society was crumbling into its original atoms. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they would be guilty of a great breach of trust if they did not restore the authority of the Queen in Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them that there were 850 gentlemen in Ireland suffering from Boycotting. Well, the Bill was brought in for them; it was not brought in to put down crime. They were told at first that it was; but that had gone to the winds, for everyone knew that there was no crime. Even The Times and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) were out of work. But why did the Leader of the House, who had brought in this Bill to relieve the 850 Boycotted gentlemen, move this Resolution? He had had plenty of opportunity to carry out his policy. He had had the whole time of the House. He had had the closure, which he put into force night after night with so much ability and with so much agility. He had had the most loyal support of his Party, and he had had a contingent from the Liberal side. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not wish to use an offensive expression; but he must say of the latter that they were the most servile supporters any Government had ever had. Having all these advantages, in preventing society from crumbling into atoms in Ireland, what did the Leader of the House do at this time of crisis? He moved that the House do adjourn for a fortnight, and left Ireland to crumble into atoms. Everyone must see that the policy and proceedings of the Government were the very greatest sham. He was glad, however, for two reasons that the Adjournment had been moved—first, it would show to the people that the policy of the Government in regard to this Crimes Bill was a sham; and, secondly, because the Radicals would go to the country, and return, he hoped, in a fortnight like giants refreshed with new wine. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might be sure that they would return with increased determination to give the most persistent opposition in their power to what was the most unjust, unconstitutional, and uncalled-for measure ever introduced into a Legislative Assembly. He knew what was said of them in the Tory and other Presses—[An hon. MEMBER: The wine press.]—that they were assisting what was called Obstruction. It was their duty to practise what was called obstruction, but what he called Constitutional opposition. He cared little for the charges made, or for diatribes against them in the Press. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) when he said that it was the duty of an Opposition to oppose; and the worse the policy the more incumbent was it upon them to oppose. What was done the previous night when some of the most important clauses were dropped or postponed was a justification of the opposition given to the Bill? He had the warmest and sincerest admiration for the Irish Members for the course they had taken. He did not see how anyone who valued patriotism or freedom could object to their course. They had before the House a measure which was nothing more nor less than a declaration of war made by the Government of this country on the Irish nation, and the Representatives of the immense majority of the Irish people would be cowards if for a moment they relaxed their opposition to that measure, and Liberal Members would be traitors to all Liberal principles if they did not support them. The House of Commons was a national assembly, and when any locality was attacked the nation would be called upon to come to the rescue of that locality. When the nation sent a majority to carry out a certain policy obstruction could not be justified. But this House of Commons never was sent to carry a Coercion Bill, and that was why he avowedly defended a policy of persistent opposition to that Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite pathetically said—"Do get on with this Bill. Let this Bill get through, and then we can get on with some very important measures we are anxious to pass." The right hon. Gentleman apparently wished the House to look upon him as a benevolent deity with his pocket bursting with Bills ready to scatter them abroad upon a grateful nation. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman believed in himself, but he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not believe a word of what he said about these Bills. The Government were now in the happiest position a Government ever was in. They were getting through the whole Session without doing anything—just the position a Tory Government liked—and making people believe they wanted to do something. He rejoiced that the right hon. Gentleman was giving them a fortnight's holiday, because he believed that time was on their side in fighting this great battle, and that they would come back re-invigorated to give the right hon. Gentleman even more trouble than he had yet had on behalf of a policy which he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) believed to be one of right and justice.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said, the defence made by the Irish Attorney General to the case brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) was a most feeble one. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to make out a parallel and similarity between the action of the English Lord Chancellor and the Irish Lord Chancellor, whereas anybody who was acquainted with the condition of things in the two countries knew that by no possibility could such a parallel be made out. The Lord Chancellor in Ireland was a Lord Justice at the head of the Executive Government; he was, at all times, one of the chief advisers of the Executive, and actively engaged in carrying on the Executive Government. The present Lord Chancellor of Ireland was one of the pillars of the Government, and a man on whose advice they leaned. The case on which the Lord Chancellor recently sat was a case in which a section of the people believed that the whole of that transaction was part and parcel of a political policy carried out in consultation with the Irish Attorney General and the Executive officers in Ireland. He had reason to believe that there were good grounds for such an opinion. If that were the case, if the Lord Chancellor was at this moment one of the mainsprings of the Executive Government in Ireland, if he had any sense of decency he would not have taken his seat on the Bench where a case of that kind was to be heard, but would have left the trial to the four other Judges, who were perfectly competent to hear it, and who would have fully manned the Court of Appeal. The English Lord Chancellor was not in the habit of sitting on trials where political considerations were decided. This case of Father Keller had been brought forward in that House time after time, and no notice had been taken of it, but there could now be no doubt that a grave and serious wrong had been done this rev. gentleman. He was arrested in a case which he had nothing to do with, simply because it was suspected he would not answer these questions, and that there would be an opportunity of putting him into prison. The Judge of the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin was so eager to carry out the policy that he did not know how to draw up the warrant, which was incorrectly made out, and subsequently declared to be illegal, after Father Keller had been in gaol for eight weeks. He felt bound to protest against the treatment of the rev. gentleman by the authorities while in gaol. It had been most unnecessarily harsh and severe. He heard the First Lord of the Treasury express from that Bench the previous day his gratification at the release of another clergyman of a different religion, and he stated that all the Members of that House would be gratified to hear of the release of the Rev. Mr. Bell Cox. They were gratified that the gentleman was released from prison, for the Rev. Bell Cox was a good friend of theirs, and of the Irish cause; but was it not a strange thing that no English Minister, no, nor any Irish Minister, had indicated the slightest gratification that an Irish priest had been released? On the contrary, as far as they could gather from the manner of the Ministers, while they rejoiced to see an English clergyman released from prison—although condemned by the tribunals of his own Church—yet, when an Irish priest was released from illegal imprisonment—having been condemned by no tribunal—the Minister of Ireland found no cause of congratulation; but, as far as they could judge from his demeanour, rather the contrary. What was the treatment of the two gentlemen? He abstained from drawing any parallel between the cases until the Rev. Mr. Bell Cox was out of prison, in order that it could not be said that the Irish Members were anxious in any way that the indulgence properly granted to the rev. gentleman should be withdrawn. But now he wished to ask how it was that the Rev. Mr. Bell Cox had two carpeted rooms, and was as comfortable as he would be in his own home, while Father Keller was treated like a pick-pocket? He considered that the treatment of Father Keller was calculated, and no doubt intended, to embitter the feelings of the Irish people. He asked that an inquiry should be granted into the whole case, and if necessary some compensation granted to Father Keller for the cruel sufferings to which he had been wrongfully subjected.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

MR. W. REDMOND rising to address the House—

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) interposed, and appealed to the House to allow the Question to be put now. They must all feel that the Speaker and the officers of the House were greatly in need of some sort of relaxation. He wished to refrain from putting any pressure on hon. Members; but he appealed rather to their good feeling—not with regard to himself or his hon. Friends beside him—to permit the Adjournment to be now taken.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Six o'clock till Monday 6th of June.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 6th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Army and Navy Estimates, nominated.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — REVENUE DEPARTMENTS; POST OFFICE.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Customs and Inland Revenue * [241]; National Debt and Local Loans * [266].

Committee — Report — Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment * [225].

Withdrawn—Corn Sales * [91].

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS — Ordered — First Reading—Pier and Harbour (No. 2) * [276]; Metropolis (Cable Street, Shadwell) * [277]; Metropolis (Shelton Street, St. Giles) * [278].

QUESTIONS.

SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND—LEGISLATION.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, When the measure for completing recent legislation as to the powers of the Secretary for Scotland will be introduced?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It is expected that this Bill will be brought in in "another place" on an early day.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—THE GOVERNMENT SUBVENTION—DRAINAGE OF THE BARROW, &c.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government have yet decided as to the particular mode in which the £50,000 proposed to be taken for public works in Ireland is to be expended; and, whether, in view of the immense damage annually caused by floods in the valley of the Barrow, in insalubrity induced thereby, the impossibility of properly draining such places as Portarlinton, and other centres of population, and the strong representations made by a series of Commissions and other authorities on the subject, he will cause arrangements to be forthwith made for carrying out a general scheme for dealing with the main channel of the Barrow, from Mountmellick to Carlow, in the present summer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Her Majesty's Government have been giving their very best attention to this matter, and are working out the best plan for the disposal of the sum referred to. I shall be obliged to the hon. Member if he will repeat his Question on Thursday, when I trust that I shall be in a position to give him full details with regard to the subject.

WAR OFFICE—THE ROYAL ENGINEERS—TRANSFERENCE OF LIEUTENANT GORDON OF THE ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that a Lieutenant from the Royal Marine Artillery has been appointed to a Lieutenancy in the Royal Engineers, over the heads of all existing Lieutenants of Engineers whose commissions bear date subsequent to 15th February, 1883; and, if so, on whose recommendation and on whose responsibility that appointment has been made; whether, under the terms of the Royal Warrant, such an appointment could legally be made; and, whether, in view of the injury which may result to officers thus superseded, the precedent thus for the first time created is to be allowed to be followed in the future?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Lieutenant Gordon, of the Royal Marine Artillery, had been employed for some time at Suakin as our acting Engineer, and he was reported to possess in a marked degree the qualifications of an Engineer officer. As he was also a nephew of that very distinguished officer of Engineers, the late General C. G. Gordon, the authorities of the corps were desirous that he should be transferred to it, so that one of the same name and family should still be borne on the roll of the Royal Engineers. In accordance with that desire, the Secretary of State, on the recommendation of all his military advisers, felt justified in submitting to Her Majesty a transfer which was undoubtedly unusual. Care was taken that Lieutenant Gordon should not supersede in the corps any officer who had been a candidate with himself and above him when, in 1880, he qualified for admission to the Royal Military Academy, though he was not successful in gaining admittance.

SIR HENRY TYLER: Is it not a fact that 193 officers have been superseded?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that, as he had already stated, care had been taken that no one should be superseded, and that no injustice should be done to any other officer by the transfer; but he could not state whether the figures quoted by the hon. Member were exact.

CEYLON—CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL—PROPOSED REFORM OF CONSTITUTION.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any intimation of a wish on the part of the people of Ceylon that Her Majesty's Jubilee in that island should be commemorated by a reform in the constitution of the local Legislative Council in the direction of enlarged popular representation; and, if so, whether any steps will be taken to carry out that wish?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): Her Majesty's Government are unable to take the steps contemplated in the Question. The Constitution of Ceylon from time to time has formed the subject of discussion, and the Government has recently sent home a Memorial and a counter Memorial on the question. The population of Ceylon is composed almost entirely of Natives, and it is a matter of grave consideration how far it would be possible to entrust to them the responsibility of electing Representatives consistently with the system of Crown Colony government, which is the only one possible in Ceylon. At present there are six unofficial Members of the Council, representing the Burghers, the Cingalese, and the Tamil populations. Besides these, three Europeans, representing the general European community, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Planters' Association respectively, have seats in the Council. To fill those allotted to the Chamber and the Association, the usual practice is to invite those two Bodies to suggest the names of fit candidates, who are thereupon appointed. The Governor reports that the Memorial aroused no popular feeling, and was not supported by any unofficial Member, Native or European.

BURMAH (UPPER)—THE RUBY MINES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will state the tenour of the document communicated to Messrs. Streeter with reference to the Ruby Mines of Burmah, and the names of the several persons who have applied for permission to visit the mines, the dates of their several applications, and the respective grounds stated for each such application, and the date and tenour of the reply in each case; why permission was granted in one case and withheld in others; and who is the person responsible for the permission granted to the representatives of Messrs. Streeter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State is not in possession of such official information as is necessary to enable me to reply to the detailed inquiries of the hon. Member. He has, therefore, referred to India for a full Report upon the matters in question.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether the hon. and learned Gentleman could give him any information of which the Government were now in possession, whether official or officious?

SIR JOHN GORST said, that he did not like in a matter of that kind, which appeared to be of a controversial character, to make any statement unless it was supported by official information.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether the hon. and learned Gentleman meant, by the term "controversial," that he had any reason to modify any answers that he had already given on this subject?

SIR JOHN GORST: I am afraid that I cannot answer that Question without Notice.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he would like to know from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, whether, as the question could only be raised on the Indian Budget, and as he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had reason to suppose that many of the answers which had already been given were not in accordance with the facts which were now known, the right hon. Gentleman would give him some opportunity of permitting the question to be raised, seeing that it implied serious misrepresentation by the Home Government, or serious misconduct on the part of the officials in Burmah?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I must ask the hon. Member to be good enough to give me Notice of the Question, as I have no information which justifies me in giving an answer which might appear to imply agreement on my part with the views of the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he should like to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India could give a similar assurance to that of the right hon. Gentleman, or, indeed, any information on the subject?

SIR JOHN GORST: As the hon. Member has appealed to me, I can only say that there is no foundation whatever for the implication involved in the Question put to the right hon. Gentleman by the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH gave Notice that, inasmuch as the answers which had been given on the part of the Government were unsatisfactory, unless within a reasonable time the Government were in a position to make a complete statement as to the contracts with reference to the Ruby Mines, he should take such means as were in his power to raise a discussion on the subject.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—DEFECTIVE WEAPONS—THE TESTS.

CORRECTION OF ANSWER.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I wish, with the permission of the House, to make a correction of an answer which I gave just before the Recess. On the 19th of May, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), I explained at some length the re-testing of the triangular bayonets in the hands of the Regular Army, and in store. On Wednesday last, I became aware of an inaccuracy in my statement as regards sword bayonets; and I communicated to my hon. Friend my intention to correct it, with the permission of the House, today. I then stated that the test now applied to the sword bayonets included, among other things, their "being sprung round a curved block 2½ inches high, or over a bridge giving the same bend." I find now that the height of the bridge is really only 2 inches, and not 2½ inches. This must also modify my answer as to the comparative severity of the tests applied to these sword bayonets. The new test is more severe as regards blows on the flat, but the height of the bridge over which they are tested is the same as before. I am sorry to have made any error in a statement of so much importance. The information was supplied to me on the authority of Colonel Arbuthnot, late Superintendent of the Small Arms Factory, who expresses his regret that in speaking from memory the error should have occurred.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston) asked, whether the bayonets would be submitted to any stronger test?

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, that that would be impossible, as they were 30 years old.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY).

Mr. GOURLEY (Sunderland): Seeing the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, I should like to ask him, Whether it has been finally decided by the Committee who have charge of the arrangements being made for the Jubilee Service at Westminster Abbey, that the Members of the House of Commons who are widowers and bachelors are to be debarred from being accompanied by ladies; and, if not, whether the right hon. Gentleman will ask the Committee to reconsider their decision upon this point, as I believe that the number of widowers and of bachelors in the House is not very large.

Mr. Bradlaugh

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have not had Notice of the hon. Member's Question, and, therefore, I am unable to answer it definitely. As far as I know, however, the arrangement proposed was, that accommodation should be provided in the Abbey only for Members of the House and their wives. I will, however, inquire whether it is possible to make any relaxation in the rule with reference to the cases of those Members of the House who may be widowers or bachelors.

THEATRES — PROTECTION OF LIFE FROM FIRE — BURNING OF THE OPERA COMIQUE, PARIS.

Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the frightful accident that has occurred in Paris by the burning of the Opéra Comique, and to the possibility of similar accidents occurring in London, in consequence of the non-inspection of theatres, he will allow his (Mr. Dixon-Hartland's) Bill, which stands upon the Paper for the 15th, to become the first Government Order?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sorry it is not in my power to accede to the view of my hon. Friend. He is well aware that, under the present circumstances, I am unable to make any promise with reference to the progress of Private Business.

Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND: I would further ask my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he is aware also that one of the Deputies in the Paris Chamber of Deputies raised the question of this very theatre, and whether he (Mr. W. H. Smith) will not consult his Colleagues before he returned a definite answer to so very important a Question.

[No reply.]

COAL MINES—THE UDSTON COLLIERY ACCIDENT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the accident which happened at the Udston Colliery, in Lanarkshire, whereby a large number of lives were lost and a very large number of persons were injured, What is the constitution of the Board of Inquiry which is to be appointed to investigate the circumstances; and, secondly, whether there are any means known to the Home Office by which the magnificent heroism which has been displayed by the rescuing party will be properly recognized? He would also ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman could inform the House when the Coal Mines Regulation Bill was likely to be reached?

MR. S. MASON (Lanark, Mid): I intended to have myself asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Question which has now been put by the hon. Member; and I wish to impress on the Government the necessity—[Cries of "Order, order!"]—of the Coal Mines Bill being reached as soon as possible.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): With regard to the unfortunate accident at Udston Colliery, to which the hon. Member alludes, I immediately directed that an inquiry should be held the moment it was brought to my notice. That inquiry, as far as my memory serves me, will be conducted by one of the Inspectors, assisted by a Scotch barrister nominated or suggested to me by my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate as a proper person to conduct the inquiry in the most satisfactory way. With regard to the second part of the Question, that of rewarding the heroism of the relief parties, I am afraid that I have no means directly in my power of recognizing what I would so gladly recognize, except that of suggesting that those among them who have displayed the necessary amount of conspicuous gallantry should be awarded the Albert Medal of the first or second class according to the circumstances. I have not yet had before me any details as to the conduct of these gallant men, but I am aware generally that there has been very great bravery displayed by the rescuing party throughout. With regard to the Coal Mines Regulation Bill, it stands at present for the 9th of June; but I am afraid that I am not in a position to say whether it will be proceeded with at that date. I will, however, endeavour to give the hon. Member the information he desires upon the point to-morrow.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether the Board of Inquiry would have power to inquire into the Reports of Inspections of the mine in question which had been made for some time anterior to the accident, not only by Her Majesty's Inspectors, but also by the subordinate officials connected with the management of the colliery?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should like to refresh my memory by reading the section of the Act before I answer this Question; but whatever the law enables me to inquire into shall be inquired into. For the satisfaction of the hon. Member I may say that, at the request of the workmen, I desired that the Inspector should allow two representative workmen to accompany him in the inspection made at the pit with the view of ascertaining the cause of the accident.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Will the Inspector who is to conduct the inquiry be the Inspector for the district in which the colliery is situated, or an Inspector taken from some other district; and, will there be given, in the course of the investigation, an opportunity of inquiry into the allegations that have been made, that on some of the bodies of the men were found the means of opening their safety lamps?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already stated that the inquiry shall be the fullest that the law permits; but not having the terms of the section of the Act in my memory I am unable to answer definitely the Questions put to me. As regards the Inspector who shall hold the inquiry, it appears desirable that it shall be conducted by some other Inspector rather than by the Inspector of the district.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

POST OFFICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,820,770, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office Services, the Expenses of Post Office Savings Banks, and Government Annuities and Insurances, and the Collection of the Post Office Revenue."

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): There are two points to which I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, one of which is personal to himself, while the other deals chiefly with the Post Office at Liverpool, in regard to which there are one or two general remarks I desire to make.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I rise to a point of Order. I have an Amendment to move on the second item contained in this Vote, and I wish to know whether I shall be in Order in bringing forward that Amendment, if a general discussion is taken now upon the whole Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) propose to move an Amendment upon any special item of the Vote?

MR. BRADLAUGH: No; but I have risen for the purpose of speaking upon the whole Vote. I do not intend to move any Amendment in connection with any particular item.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then, in that case, there will be no interference on the part of the hon. Member with any Amendment the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) may desire to move subsequently. I would ask, however, whether the hon. Member for Northampton intends to propose the rejection of the entire Vote?

MR. BRADLAUGH: No; I am addressing myself to the whole Vote and, therefore, I am entitled to speak upon the whole Vote. The first question I wish to ask the Postmaster General is, whether he promotes by seniority having reference to fitness, which appears to me to be the regulation concerning promotions established by the Post Office, and which will be found on page 105 of a book which is, no doubt, very familiar to the right hon. Gentleman; or whether he simply regards fitness without reference to seniority, or whether he takes seniority without reference to fitness, or whether he acts on the advice of heads of Departments without reference to either, or whether he disregards alike advice, seniority, and fitness for reasons personal to himself? My reason for putting this question is that I have recently received a letter giving certain information which may or may not be accurate, although I have taken the best means in my power to verify the facts contained in it, and also those of certain other cases which I desire to bring before the Committee. This letter states that a very flagrant case has occurred within the last few days. There was a vacancy for a second-class clerk in the Receiver and Accountant General's Office, and for that vacancy a person was recommended as the senior man qualified for promotion. The letter states that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General did not confer the post upon the gentleman so recommended, but that he has promoted, although on probation only, a Mr. Davies, who stood fifth in the class, and who was reported by his senior officers as not fully qualified to perform the duties of his own class. I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to make some satisfactory statement to the Committee as to what certainly does seem to be a departure from the rules which govern promotion, and that he will explain why it is that, absolutely in the face of the declaration made by the heads of a Department, he has promoted a gentleman who was declared to be unqualified for the duties he is now performing to the performance of the still higher duties to which he has been promoted. I come now to a matter of which special Notice has been given to the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has already answered some Questions which I put to him in reference to the Post Office at Liverpool, and I now wish to deal with the matter in one or two general words. I am inclined to think that in Post Office management errors have been allowed to creep in which are difficult to account for, but which operate prejucially in various ways. One serious defect is, that the letter-carriers, sorters, and the lower class of employés are so poorly paid, that they are under a strong temptation to commit crime. Another defect is, that the superior classes are either too well paid or have too little to do for the pay they receive. The great evil connected with the promotion in the superior classes appears to be this, that the Post Office promotion is conducted on a method entirely different from that of the rest of the Civil Service, and without any reference to the eligibility or seniority of the persons promoted. In the Post Office Department throughout the country the postmasters have the opportunity, which they generally exercise, of appointing or promoting persons from personal considerations, or from influences which may be brought to bear upon them. For my own part, I think it would be more wise, if it were possible, to place the Post Office promotion on the same level as the rest of the Civil Service promotion. Surely if it is good for one set of Departments, it should be equally good for another. In referring to occurrences which have recently taken place at Liverpool, I am under this difficulty—that I have had to investigate the facts entirely from one side, and I may have been misled, in some degree, in the matters I am about to submit to the Committee. I put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General in the first week of April, in reference to the promotion of a man named McDougal, who had been promoted over 14 persons who were his seniors. The answer given by the right hon. Gentleman was that, although there were in the second class 14 clerks who were senior to this gentleman, "All those 14 clerks, I am sorry to say," remarked the Postmaster General, "were reported to me as not qualified for the duties of a higher class." Now, I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would wish me to trouble the Committee with the particulars of all those 14 cases, into the whole of which I have gone carefully. I found that none of them warranted the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman. Let me take the first case, because it is one which seems to me to put the answer of the right hon. Gentleman entirely on one side. The first person passed over had been for 42 years in the Service, whereas the person who was promoted over his head had only had six years' service. The person with 42 years' service was a gentleman of irreproachable character, and it is recorded that he is employed in the highest duties of the class to which he belongs; not only so, but he is also employed to instruct others belonging to that class in the performance of their duties. The next person passed over was a gentleman who had had 32 years' service. He, also, was of irreproachable character, and had been in sole charge of a branch office for seven years. These are two out of 14 persons passed over for this gentleman with six years' service alone. I will not trouble the Committee with the other 12 cases, although in each case there seems to have been nothing whatever against the persons who were passed over. Therefore, I think the Committee are entitled to some explanation why, when the rule laid down distinctly says, that seniority is to be regarded when there is nothing in the nature of unfitness, and that it is to govern the postmasters in the various districts in reporting to the Postmaster General for promotion. I think the Committee ought to have some explanation as to how it has come to pass that, in this instance, that regulation has been disregarded. I am sorry to bring these questions before the Committee; but there is no other tribunal which is capable of examining them, and, if necessary, of reversing the Postmaster General's decisions. Therefore, I think it is not unreasonable that I should take this opportunity of submitting the matter to the Committee. This, however, is not the only case which has occurred in Liverpool, where the promotion has been dependent upon the judgment or the favouritism of the Postmaster General. I believe the postmaster of the Liverpool district is an admirable servant. I am assured by those who know him better than I do that as postmaster in a large office like Liverpool he conducts the business in a way that is most satisfactory to the State. But I hold in my hand a list of five cases of unsatisfactory promotion which have taken place in reference to the lower class of officers in Liverpool. One is the case of a man named Hegnett, who has been promoted to be assistant superintendent over 19 persons who were his seniors by many years, and many of whom have been engaged in the performance of duties which involve great responsibility, and which they have performed with a considerable amount of satisfaction. There is, also, the case of a man named Helsby, promoted over 11 other officers. This promotion has been regarded as a special hardship, seeing that several men who were senior clerks were admittedly qualified for the duties this gentleman is now performing, and who have been passed over for no reason whatever, as far as I can make out, and who ought to have received from the State the reward to which their services entitled them. Then, again, there is the case of a man named Miller, who has received promotion over the head of a gentleman named Richardson, who has been acting as assistant superintendent for years with the salary of a supervising clerk only. There are several other cases of the same kind with which I will not trouble the Committee, but I will go to a case which seems to show, if anything can show, that favouritism does operate in the Liverpool Post Office. I will take the case of the medical officer, because it is one of so striking a nature as to show what happens generally in the whole of the Department. Prior to June, 1882, the whole of the Medical Department at Liverpool was under the control of Mr. Townsend—Mr. Townsend being a doctor of considerable experience, and a gentleman in regard to whom there had been no complaint. It was suggested in 1882 that the district under this gentleman's care was too large. Mr. Townsend had several assistants, who were qualified medical men. A portion of the district was, however, taken from him, and given, not to one of Mr. Townsend's assistants, but to a young gentleman who may have been highly qualified, for anything I know, but who came fresh from his examination, and whose only qualification appears to have been that his father happened to be the postmaster. This young gentleman received the appointment at a high salary, and after a little while Mr. Townsend resigned, and the three districts into which Liverpool had been divided were handed over to young Mr. Rich, notwithstanding the fact that in the first instance he had only been placed in charge of a third of the district, on the ground that the district itself was much too large. The result is, that a district which in 1882 was under the charge of a highly qualified practitioner, and was then declared to be too large for the supervision of any one individual, has now been handed over to this young medical gentleman, whose qualifications may be great, but whose only qualification, as far as I know, is that he happens to be the son of the man who appointed him. I think it requires something more than an off-hand answer in this House to get rid of the complaints which have been made in regard to the way in which promotion has been carried out in the Liverpool Post Office. I quite feel that it may be suggested that the statements I have made are ex parte, and liable to be challenged on the other side. That is the misfortune of the manner in which these questions have to be dealt with. It is, however, no fault of mine, and as long as these matters have to be discussed on the Votes it will be necessary to discuss them in this way. It has not been an agreeable task to myself to have been compelled to raise the question now. In the first instance, I put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman, and when his answer differed from my own knowledge of the facts I was obliged to give Notice that I would raise the question on the first opportunity that was afforded to me. In conclusion, I will ask the Postmaster General to state, when he rises to reply, whether it is not possible, especially in the case of the Telegraph Department, to consider if there are not a number of men with high salaries whose salaries might be saved, and the sums they receive apportioned among the lower class of servants, who are at present wretchedly paid, and who are occasionally found figuring in the Criminal Courts charged with embezzlement and felony on account of the starvation wages they receive not being enough to enable them to provide for themselves and their families? I have no wish to attempt any palliation of the criminality of their conduct; but I must put it to the Government that it is the duty of the State to pay the men it employs in its service such wages as will remove them from all temptation to commit crime.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Committee for any length of time; but the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down affords me an opportunity of directing attention to the fact that all the blame in matters connected with the Post Office rests with the official Heads. The Postmaster General, like other political Heads in this country, finds himself in this difficulty—that if he were to oppose the permanent officials of his Department he would inevitably go to the wall. At any rate, that has been the experience hitherto; and in order to bring the question clearly before the Committee I feel tempted to move the omission from the Vote of the item for the salary of the Secretary of the Post Office. To give an instance of what I mean, I think it will be in the recollection of hon. Gentlemen that in an early period of the Office of the present Postmaster General an address of sympathy was got up to the Secretary of the Post Office himself and signed by all the head officials in the Office. If such a thing had been done under ordinary circumstances, or if it had occurred to anybody else, in all probability the offender would not have been tolerated in office for a day. The Postmaster General took a stand against the action of this official, but I believe that he found the officials in the Department were backed up in high places, and for several days there was a question whether the Postmaster General should resign his Office or continue in the performance of his duties. The very document—I mean the address of sympathy—came into the hands of the Postmaster General, and I asked him some Questions in the House upon it. He informed me that he had not made up his mind what action to take in the matter, and that before taking notice of it he intended to consult the Head of the Government. That answer simply meant this—that it would be a question for the Head of the Government to say whether Mr. Blackwood was to continue his office of Secretary to the Post Office, or whether the Postmaster General should resign. If the Postmaster General had continued his objections to the proceedings of the Department, can anybody doubt what the result would have been? I have called attention to the action of the Secretary to the Post Office, because that gentleman is responsible for almost every one of the matters which have been referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton; and, moreover, the Secretary to the Post Office has been notoriously opposed to every reform which has been attempted to be brought about in the Post Office of this country. I trust I may be permitted to allude to some of the reforms which we desire to bring about. In doing so, let me point to this simple fact that in every country in Europe, except England, and in all the Colonies with which I am acquainted, Money Orders can be sent by telegram. If a man desires to send a few pounds from Sydney to Melbourne, for instance, he has simply to go to the Money Order Office and the service is performed by telegram. In the same way, if he desires to send a sum of money to Germany, Switzerland, or France, he is able to do so by the simplest operation possible; but through the obstinacy, the officialism, and the desire on the part of the Post Office Authorities to avoid trouble, obstacles have been placed in the way of effecting this reform in this country. I think there could be no greater advantage conferred upon the public than to provide that if a man desires to send a few pounds to Manchester or Liverpool, or from any of the large towns to the Metropolis, he should be able to go to the Post Office and do so. I am afraid, however, that this reform will never be carried out until we teach the Post Office officials that we are their masters. The next point I desire to draw attention to is the nature of the postal arrangements of this country with all parts of the world. I have prepared a statement showing the postal rates from this country to France, Germany, and other parts of the Continent, as well as to the Colonies and other parts of the Empire. It will be found that the postage from England to the Colonies is 4*d.*, 5*d.*, and even 6*d.*; whereas from France and Germany, as well as various other countries, it is only 2½*d.*—that is to say, that what in England is charged 5*d.*, is charged in Germany and every other country in the world, 2½*d.* I say it is a scandal that to all parts of the British Empire the charge should be 5*d.* from England, and only 2½*d.* from Germany and France. The same remark applies to the postal rates from Ceylon to Hong Kong, the Straits Settlements, and to other countries. The system pursued creates much annoyance to men engaged in business. The other day I received an envelope from Singapore, which had been received there from New York with a 2½d. stamp. By the same mail steamer the gentleman who sent this letter received a number of home letters, for each of which he had to pay 5d. As a matter of fact, the English Government are giving a bounty to foreigners to carry on their business, and they are imposing on English merchants and traders double the rates charged in America, Germany, and France. Nay, foreign letters are even sent through our own Office for half the rates charged upon English letters. I maintain that such a state of affairs is a great scandal, and that it is the duty of the Postmaster General to make an inquiry into such a condition of things. No doubt, the Government are making a large profit out of the Post Office; but they are pursuing a course only to be paralleled by that of a farmer who preferred to eat up his seed corn rather than sow it in the field for a future harvest. Probably the Postmaster General will inform the Committee that there is a decrease in the revenue of the Post Office. I say that that is a great mistake. I have carefully looked through the Estimates connected with the Post Office, and I find that so far as the postage of letters is concerned, there is a very large profit indeed, amounting to something like £3,000,000 a-year; and, further, that there has been a steady increase in the profits derived from this source during the last 40 years. If there has been any source of trouble or difficulty which has arisen from the mode in which the affairs of the Post Office are managed and administered, and the large and increasing expenditure which is incurred, it is also very difficult to get at the real facts; and if a Question is put to the Government with reference to the nature of the arrangements with foreign countries, the invariable reply is that no accounts are kept with foreign countries. Fortunately, I have been able to obtain an account which shows what the real state of matters is, and the facts are of such an extraordinary nature that I maintain and I think it is a duty of the Postmaster General to cause an inquiry to be made into the whole question. The profits of the American Mail Service amount to more than £100,000 a-year, while the whole cost of sending letters to America is only £80,000. Indeed, we could establish 1d. post to America without costing the country one farthing, but, in fact, leaving a profit of £120,000 a-year. I do not ask for any reduction whatever on book postage, or on newspapers or circulars, but only upon letters. It is a curious fact that the postal arrangements in Australia yield £120,000, while the whole cost of a weekly service is only £85,000. Nevertheless, when any proposal to carry out any reform is made, the officials of the Post Office invariably come forward and whisper in the ear of the Postmaster General their fears that it will involve a loss. The result is, that any Englishman can at this moment send six letters to his friends in England, Ireland, and Scotland for every one he sends to Australia. I believe that Imperial Penny Postage could be carried out without involving any loss to the Revenue, and in order that the matter should be inquired into I asked for a Select Committee. Some of the Members of the Opposition promised me their support; but I believe that the Government intend to oppose the Motion, notwithstanding the fact that if a Select Committee were appointed, and I failed to prove my case, the Government would be confirmed in their present course of action. I see that the next Vote in these Estimates is for the Packet Service. We are asked to vote a sum of £725,000 for the Packet Service.

Mr. Bradlaugh

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question of the Packet Service is in the next Vote, and not in this.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Then I will touch upon that question later on. All I will say now is that the heavy subsidies we are paying for the conveyance of mails are, in my judgment, no longer necessary. If we want speed, it would be much better to subsidize the Cable Service of the Telegraphs. I believe that we could construct cables to Australia for much less than we are now paying for the Mail Service. And what is the state of matters in India? We are constantly boasting of being in touch with, and having the freest possible communication with, every part of the Empire, and yet the English people cannot send a letter to distant parts of the Empire under 6d., and they cannot send a telegram under 10s. a word. These are prohibitory rates which ought no longer to be tolerated by this House, and if we really want Imperial unity we could not act more wisely than in reducing the rates to all parts of the Empire. There are other important matters in connection with the anomalous state of things now prevailing which ought not to be overlooked, and among them is the growing danger to our trade, especially when it is well known that Germany and France are sending heavily subsidized steamers to Australia to compete with our trade in letter carrying. Those who know the Post Office Departments of Germany and France are quite aware that these subsidies are not paid for Post Office purposes at all. I was surprised to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer declare that the Post Office does not pay, and he endeavoured to prove it by including the money paid for the Packet Service. The enormous sum paid for Packet Service should not be charged to the Post Office at all. To prove that, and to show the absurdity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's views on that head, I will point out that we pay at the present moment something like £350,000 for the Packet Service to India, while the total revenue derived from it only amounts to £55,000. Would that be tolerated for a moment if it were not perfectly clear that we are paying this large sum of money for other purposes? Such an expenditure would not be sanctioned unless the people were aware that it was incurred for the purpose of encouraging trade. If you admit that fact, I would ask you why should the Post Office, and those who send letters, be put to this enormous cost, and be prevented from carrying out the reforms of the Post Office Service which are so strongly demanded? The theory now put forward by the Government in justification of their refusal to carry out reforms is altogether a new doctrine. As a proof of this, I may mention the fact that a Select Committee was appointed by this House in 1863, of which Sir Stafford Northcote was a Member.

Mr. Henniker Heaton

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Sir, I rise to Order. I understood you to rule just now that the hon. Member would not be in Order in dealing with the question of the Packet Service, which has nothing to do with the Vote now under discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so. I pointed out to the hon. Member that the Packet Service is in the next Vote.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to apologize for having wandered from the subject of the Vote; but it is difficult to separate the two matters. The whole system of our Telegraph and Postal Services ought to form the subject of an inquiry. Most gross anomalies exist, and every week samples of English goods are posted abroad, instead of being sent from England. I am acquainted with one firm, who have informed me that they have posted 500,000 samples to all parts of England at one-half the rate which it would have cost them if they had posted them in London; and as a matter of fact, letters for all parts of the British Empire can be posted from France and Germany at 100 per cent less cost than would be entailed if they were posted in England. There are other grievances of another kind which demand a remedy; and, under these circumstances, I think we are justified in asking for a full inquiry into the whole state of affairs.

Mr. RAIKES: I do not know whether it is desirable that I should intervene so early in the debate; but as the speech of the hon. Member who has just addressed the Committee seemed to travel rather wide of the question, perhaps it would be as well to go back to the observations of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), which certainly were relevant to the Vote now before the Committee. The hon. Member for Northampton called attention to the system—or, rather, what he characterized as a want of system—in regard to the promotions in the Post Office. I quite admit that it is an extremely difficult thing to conduct the promotions in this or any other important Public Department. The hon. Member has asked me whether, in sanctioning various promotions, I am guided by the question of fitness, or by seniority, or by fitness accompanied by seniority, or by the advice of my permanent advisers? In reply, I can only say to the hon. Member, as I think he has already anticipated, that I am guided by all those considerations. I think it is very desirable that fitness should be considered, and by the constitution of the Department it is bound to be considered in the case of all promotions to the first class. In the promotions in the classes below, seniority, coupled with fitness, is considered. Of course, I cannot myself pretend to decide as to the individual merits of the 94,000 or 95,000 employés of the Government in the Post Office Department, and I have to be largely guided by the opinions of those who are acquainted with the details of the Service. The hon. Member has made special reference to the case of a promotion which took place a short time ago in the second class in the Office of the Receiver and Accountant General. It is a curious thing that whenever a man does an act which he thinks will be popular, he afterwards finds that that is the very thing he gets pulled up for. I have not had any communication with the hon. Member for Northampton as to the details of this particular promotion; but if he had intimated to me that he desired to bring the matter before the House of Commons, I should have been glad to give him all the information in my power.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I regret that I did not give Notice to the right hon. Gentleman. As a matter of fact, the Holidays prevented me from giving the same Notice in regard to this case as I gave to the right hon. Gentleman in regard to other cases.

MR. RAIKES: As far as I remember, three clerks had to be promoted, and the Secretary recommended me to promote three officers who were all rather junior. It was said that the first four in the class were not fit for promotion; the fifth was an improving clerk, and after him came others who were reported to be fit for promotion. I was asked to promote three gentlemen the highest of whom stood ninth on the list, but I was unwilling to pass over the first eight clerks, when I saw that one of them was reported to be an improving officer. I therefore thought it would be better to give the improving officer a probationary appointment, and that is the long and the short of the whole matter. I have no knowledge whatever of the gentleman promoted, either personally, or of his politics. I come now to the case of Liverpool. These cases seem to be rather mutually destructive. In the first case I did, to a certain degree, disregard the advice tendered to me, and I recognized the principle of seniority; whereas, in the case of Liverpool, I acted upon the advice given to me, and disregarded seniority. Yet the hon. Member is not satisfied with either appointment. These two cases exemplify the difficulties which surround the Postmaster General in making these appointments; but they show, at all events, that I have not erred according to any fixed principle for determining what I ought to do. As regards Liverpool, the hon. Member brought the case before the House some time ago, and when my attention was called to it, I at once sent for the papers. I was extremely reluctant to confirm that promotion. I quite feel the force of what the hon. Member has said, and it certainly did seem that some of those who have been passed over had considerable claims. I did not, however, care to set aside the very strong recommendation of the postmaster of Liverpool in favour of any individual respecting whom I had no information at all. I was inclined to believe that the officer promoted must be a gentleman of exceptional merit, seeing that he had been acting almost as a sort of private secretary to the postmaster, so that the postmaster had special means of forming an accurate opinion of his capacity. I believe that the course I pursued was one which the hon. Gentleman himself would have taken if he had been in my place. There were two or three other cases mentioned in regard to Liverpool, and I can only say that I will make inquiries about them. The facts in connection with the cases of Hegnett and Helsby have not been brought before me, nor have I received any information in regard to that of Miller. I will, however, make inquiries into all of those cases. Then comes the case of the medical officer, but that is a matter which happened when the late Mr. Fawcett was Postmaster General, and I was not in Office. The arrangement which was made in 1882 has since been set aside, and the gentleman who was then appointed medical officer for part of the district is now officiating for the whole district. It is simply a return to the system which was in force before 1882.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I be allowed to explain? I did not intend to make any attack upon the right hon. Gentleman at all, but I simply pointed out that in 1882 a large district which had been under one competent medical man was divided into three, because it was considered too large for one officer. On that occasion the postmaster's son was given a large portion of the district, and shortly afterward, when the previous medical officer resigned, the whole of the district was put into the hands of this young man, thus more than doubling the original salary, although his only qualification was that he was the son of the postmaster.

MR. RAIKES: I was not aware that he was the son of the postmaster. All that I know is that what has been done has been to restore the practice which prevailed before 1882, and that one medical officer now controls the whole district. I do not know the facts precisely; but from what has fallen from the hon. Member, I take it that the Mr. Townsend he speaks of was an experienced medical officer, who was probably a man advanced in years, seeing that he soon afterwards resigned the office. It is quite probable that a young, vigorous, and energetic man may be competent to perform duties which may have been too heavy for an older man in 1882. The hon. Member has made a reference to salaries generally, and particularly to the higher and lower salaries. I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. Member, and I do not deny that I share to a certain degree in the sentiments to which he has given expression. He says that it is desirable to reduce the salaries of those who are at present highly-paid in order to increase the salaries of those who are ill-paid. That is a very natural sentiment; but you have to deal with bargains which have been made with individuals when they first entered the Service, and the existing interests and the expectations of these men must be carefully borne in mind, seeing that they form part of the reward they expected to receive when their salaries were not so good as they are now. I regret the reference made by the hon. Member for Canterbury, who followed the hon. Member for Northampton, to a matter which I had hoped had now passed into oblivion. I do not wish to detain the Committee by going into it again, but I must refer to it, lest it should be assumed that I have any regret to express for the course which I took. I refer to the question of the irregular proceeding which took place in the Post Office shortly after I became Postmaster General, and which I hope all the parties who participated in it have since regretted. I felt bound to vindicate the authority of the Office I have the honour to hold, and having so vindicated it, I have been perfectly satisfied to let the matter rest, and I trust that I shall secure the cordial co-operation and hearty assistance of the very able gentlemen who form the permanent staff of the Department with whom I was on that occasion in temporary conflict. The hon. Member then proceeded to refer to the question of telegraphing Money Orders. That is a matter which I think will be more suitably dealt with when we come to the Telegraph Vote. I will only say that, as far as convenience is concerned, there would be great risk in largely increasing the balances deposited in the hands of provincial postmasters, or in giving them increased credit with the local banks. If the suggestion of the hon. Member were carried out, it would be necessary to enlarge the balances in the hands of the postmasters.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I only suggested that the amount of the Money Order Telegrams should be moderate.

MR. RAIKES: I quite admit that there might be a certain amount of convenience in the arrangement; but a much larger sum must necessarily be deposited in the hands of the postmasters, and the danger is not so much the loss to the State as of placing temptations before a large class of the public servants. If the hon. Member knew the great temptations to which the postmasters are exposed now, even in regard to the balances they now have, I think he would hesitate before he determined on increasing the risk. I am, however, quite prepared to consider the matter, which is one worthy of consideration; and, as a matter of fact, I have given to it some consideration since I have been in Office. Hitherto, however, I have been unable to get over the obstacle I have mentioned. Possibly, if there were a great demand for the introduction of the system on the part of the public, some way of getting rid of the difficulty I have pointed out might be found; but up to the present time I have not seen sufficient reason for changing the present system. As to the mail subsidies, I will only point out that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman did not apply to the present Vote. I do not wish to close these observations without making one statement, which I think the Committee will be glad to hear, and it arises out of the last part of the hon. Gentleman's observations. Ever since I came into Office I have done my best to endeavour to bring about some system for re-establishing the pattern post. I found, however, that there were difficulties in the way, and serious objections were raised to the plan. It was said that the Parcel Post ought to meet all the requirements, and I was assured that the system could not be re-established without loss to the Revenue; but I have persevered in the project, because, as I have stated elsewhere, I consider it to be a scandal that it should be possible to send patterns and samples abroad, and then send them back home at a cheaper rate than they can be sent direct from one part of this country to another. Patterns can be sent from abroad for 10 centimes, no portion of which reaches our Revenue, a rate considerably below the cost of postage in England. I am happy to say that within the last few days I have obtained the sanction of the Treasury to the re-establishment of a Pattern Post. Although the details are not settled, as the matter is one of considerable public interest, I think I may not unreasonably give the Committee the outlines of the plan. I do not propose, at all events, at present, to extend it beyond the weight of $\frac{1}{2}$ lb., but I propose that we should establish a graduated scale. The proposed rates are—for patterns less than 4 ozs., 1d.; between 4 ozs. and 6 ozs., 1½d.; and between 6 ozs. and 8 ozs., 2d. I believe this scale will meet the exigencies of the case, and will deal with all samples and patterns correctly and justly described, though it will be necessary to keep a watchful eye against the surreptitious sending of correspondence under the form of patterns. In the first year or two there will probably be some loss of Revenue; but I expect that the loss will be almost imperceptible. I shall be happy to deal with the larger and Imperial questions which have been referred to by the hon. Member for Canterbury when the Packet and Telegraph Votes come on.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the samples and patterns go by the Letter or the Parcel Post?

Mr. Raikes

MR. RAIKES: The present intention is to send them with the letters.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the good-conduct badges for the letter carriers. I understand that among a great number of the letter carriers there has been some falling off in the number of good-conduct badges awarded. Now, these badges are highly prized, and bring pecuniary advantages to a very poor class of men. In some districts it is quite clear that when a man who possessed one of these badges has either died or left the Service, the vacant badge has not been given to a letter carrier in the same district. I am informed that that has been specially the case in Hampshire. There are several districts there in which the number of badges is less than it was some time ago. I am not prepared to say that the number has grown less since the time the right hon. Gentleman has been in Office. I am rather inclined to believe that the falling off commenced before he assumed Office; but I know it would be a great consolation to the men to know that their chances of enjoying this distinction are not fewer than they used to be. It is also desirable that some encouragement should be held out to men who have distinguished themselves by their good conduct and honesty that they will receive a reward which will have the effect of making their lives more happy.

MR. RAIKES: I entirely appreciate the force of the remarks which have been made by the hon. Member. I think it is most desirable to maintain the system of awarding good-conduct badges, and even to extend it. I do not believe, however, that there has been any falling off in the number of good-conduct badges given. Certainly, no diminution of the number has been sanctioned. I think the point to which the hon. Gentleman has called attention is only to be found in the fact that the districts are more extensive than he is aware of, that a certain number of good conduct badges are given for the whole district, and that the districts are of a very considerable size and area—for instance, although a man may have died in Hampshire, it is possible that the badge may have been given to some other letter carrier in Surrey. I will, however, inquire into the matter.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I am sorry to give my right hon. Friend the trouble of having to speak again upon this Vote; but, as a matter of fact, I rose before my right hon. Friend made his answer to the previous observations, in the hope that I might be able to save him the trouble and limit him to one speech on this occasion. Upon this Vote I desire to call attention to a matter which I have constantly had upon the Paper, but which, owing to the unreasonably late hour at which the Post Office Estimates have been discussed, I have found it impossible to place before the Committee, although it is a matter of considerable inconvenience to the country—I refer to the defective mode of collecting letters at various railway stations in the United Kingdom. I have never been able to discover—indeed, it passes the wit of man to discover, why the English public should not have the same facilities in regard to posting letters at railway stations which are enjoyed by the citizens of every large Continental town. At the railway stations in nearly every foreign town—certainly in France and Italy—there are moveable post-boxes which are ready to be emptied on the arrival of a train, and by this means the public have an opportunity of posting their letters without any extra charge up to a few minutes before the arrival of the train. I am sorry to think how many years have elapsed since I first directed the attention of Her Majesty's Government to this subject. It was when Mr. Tilley was Secretary to the Post Office, and he met my representations with the assertion that it was absolutely impossible to carry out this scheme in this country. Nevertheless, the system was introduced by the Postmaster General for France, under the Imperial Government, and a Report was obtained from him showing the way in which the system was worked; and I dare say my right hon. Friend, if he will make inquiries, will find that Report in some pigeon-hole at the Post Office. I think it was when the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (The Marquess of Hartington) was Postmaster General that a Post Office van was put on, and by the payment of an extra fee letters were allowed to be posted, but only in the travelling vans. What I complain of is that the same advantages should not have been extended to the Post Office boxes at all the railway stations. At present, a very idiotic practice prevails at some of the great stations—such as Rugby, Preston, and Bishopstoke. We find at those stations a pillar-box; but instead of the contents being emptied at the station into the van when the train arrives, the letters are taken from the station to the central office of the town, which may be a mile distant, and there is no advantage whatever in posting a letter there. Then, again, at a certain hour in the evening, even these pillar-boxes are shut up, and the only way of posting a letter is to give a fee to a railway porter employed at the station with instructions to give it to the travelling clerk when the van arrives. In that case you have to trust to the honour of the porter in discharging the duty he has taken upon himself. I have spoken to several of the Post Office officials on the subject privately, but I have never been able to get any reason from them why the foreign system should not be carried out. I think if they would consult with the officials connected with the Continental Post Offices, they would soon ascertain the lines upon which the same plan could be worked satisfactorily in this country. I recollect that on one occasion Mr. Tilley did state an objection—namely, that when a letter was put into a travelling van there was no telling whether it was going up or down the line. The answer to that was that no inconvenience could be sustained, because the sorting clerks who take charge of the letters would put it into the proper train the moment they reached the next railway station. I hope my right hon. Friend will be able to tell the Committee that something may be done in this direction. I believe that upon the South-Western line very great inconvenience is at present experienced, and also in the town which I represent. There is another point to which I also desire to direct the attention of my right hon. Friend, and it is this. As I understand—perhaps I may be wrong—it is not possible to post a letter in a railway train unless there happens to be a travelling clerk or some recognized official person in charge of the van. I have been told that an alteration has been made in that respect lately; but I understand that hitherto the presence of a clerk with a train was a condition precedent to the despatch of a letter by the train carrying the mail. What has happened has been this—the Post Office train which carries the London and Southern mails leaves Whitehaven at 7.30 in the evening; but the letter van is not in the charge of a travelling clerk, but simply in charge of the railway authorities. The Post Office van leaves an hour and a-half earlier, for the convenience of the Post Office, so that all the letters between Whitehaven and Carnforth may be picked up. The consequence is that letters from the town of Whitehaven, with a population of 25,000 people, are not able to be put into the travelling van when it leaves without an extra fee of $\frac{1}{2}d$. I will ask my right hon. Friend if he cannot make some arrangement to prevent this inconvenience by employing some trustworthy clerk to take charge of the Post Office van, and also of all letters which may be given to him to deliver at Carnforth? I believe that a similar inconvenience has been experienced on the South Western System. The hon. and gallant Member for South Dorset (Colonel Hambro) will be aware that the morning mail which leaves Waterloo Station at 8.5 takes the whole of the letters despatched in the morning. There is no travelling clerk in charge, and any person who is desirous of sending a letter specially is not able to do so. I hope my right hon. Friend will take the matter seriously into his consideration, and that before he has much longer occupied the Office which he now so worthily administers, he will be able to introduce some satisfactory change in these respects. I can assure my right hon. Friend that the restrictions now imposed often cause the greatest inconvenience, and the people of Whitehaven, whom I represent, fervently hope that they will be done away with.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston): There are one or two points to which I desire to draw attention in connection with this Estimate. In the first place, there is an item in reference to the insurance of public buildings belonging to the Post Office; but I do not see in the Estimate that any regular rule is followed, either in regard to the buildings which belong to the Post Office or to any other Department. In some cases it would appear that they are insured, whereas in others there is no insurance at all, and there certainly appears to be no definite principle adopted. There is an item on page 71 for—

“Water, fire insurance, tithes, compensation to ministers and parish clerks for loss of emoluments, rent of windows in money order office overlooking graveyard, &c.”

I want to know what the principle is which the Post Office Authorities adopt in regard to insurances? There is also another matter. I find from the Customs Report that a good deal of smuggling goes on by means of the Parcel Post. The right hon. Gentleman is about to increase the facilities for the Parcel Post, and I want to know how it is when the Parcel Post system is so much more extensive on the Continent, and the articles on which duty is paid are so much more numerous, that they avoid smuggling, whereas in this country tobacco is the only thing that can be smuggled, and we have it stated in this Report that a good deal of tobacco smuggling is carried on. Then, again, I wish to have some information with reference to the conveyance of mails by coach in this country. I understand that the mails are now being conveyed by the coach running to Brighton, and I wish to know whether the steps which are now taken are really tentative, or whether the change is meant to be permanent. If the conveyance of mails by coach should have the effect of leading to improvement in the roads it must command approval, and I am glad to hear of it; but I desire to know whether in regard to the coach now running to Brighton the experiment shows that it is cheaper to convey the mails by coach rather than by rail, and if there is any idea of carrying out the same plan extensively throughout the country? It is not often that we get an opportunity of discussing the Post Office Vote, and I think my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury has started a mine in reference to some of the Post Office anomalies, which is very well worth working. Indeed, I hope he will keep pegging away until he gets some of the evils he complains of redressed. Unless he continues to press them upon the attention of the Government day after day and year after year, I am afraid that very little will be done. I do not see how it is possible for the Government to say that the Post Office cannot afford to carry out the reforms and improvements suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury. I hold in my hand a Memorial from the Chamber of Commerce in London, which states that there is annually a large surplus provided from the Post Office Department, which, to the extent of about £2,500,000 a-year, is appropriated by the Treasury. I cannot help regarding that surplus of £2,500,000 as a tax upon the commerce of the country, and I cannot believe that the House of Commons will continue much longer to permit this large surplus to be handed over to the Treasury—a surplus which amounts to the return of about 30 per cent on the capital invested—without part of it being spent in affording the public increased postal and telegraph facilities, such as are enjoyed in Germany and other countries, and which would be of great benefit in securing the real federation of the Empire. In every other country in the world surpluses of this kind are appropriated, not to the use of the General Exchequer, but in increasing the postal facilities. We know very well what the facilities are which are given to trade in Germany, and in other countries, but which are not afforded in England. Taking into consideration the tremendous material interests which are concerned in a great commercial country like this, I think it is simply ridiculous to go on appropriating this surplus instead of utilizing it in increasing our postal facilities.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I only want to say a word or two by way of explanation in regard to the telegraphing of Money Orders. I want to explain the system in operation in Australia. In the first instance, money order offices were established in connection with the Post Office in those places which stood most in need of them, but the sums remitted in that way were limited to a small amount, not being allowed to exceed £10; but I believe that the amount has since been greatly extended. As to the objections raised by the Postmaster General that the system would be liable to fraud, I am prepared to admit that temptations might occur if large sums of money were placed in the post offices for this purpose; but, as a matter of fact, the postmasters are already in receipt of sufficient sums to enable them to pay the Post Office Orders sent by telegram. What I propose is to establish a similar system in this country to that which exists in Australia, and which the Postmaster General could easily carry out. I am sorry to find that the proposal has not received more encouragement from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General. Long before the right hon. Gentleman came into Office the same answer was given—namely, that the matter is still under consideration. If he is really desirous of testing the matter, let him arrange to introduce money orders first for small amounts at such places as Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, Edinburgh, Belfast, and Glasgow. Then, if the experiment is a success, as I have no doubt it would be, he will gain the gratitude of the country. I congratulate the Postmaster General on the information he has given to the Committee that he is about to remove one great scandal which has hitherto existed. I feel certain that if he were not obstructed by the permanent officials of the Department we should have many more reforms of the same kind. I sincerely trust that he will give a favourable consideration to the proposal for establishing a Telegraphic Money Order system.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: There was one remark which was made by the hon. Member who has just sat down with which I cannot agree—namely, that the Postmaster General is obstructed in improvements by the permanent officials of the Department. In the first speech delivered by the hon. Member he stated that the Secretary to the Post Office was a man who obstructed all reforms, and that to him rather than the Postmaster General or the Government the failure to carry out the reforms he desires is due. I can only assure the hon. Member that that is not my experience of the Post Office permanent officials. Certainly, my tenure of Office as Postmaster General was not very long; but, before my time, Mr. Fawcett was Postmaster General for some years, and during his tenure of Office more important changes took place in the Post Office Department than probably took place in any other Department. During the whole of that time Mr. Blackwood was Secretary to the Post Office, and I will undertake to say that Mr. Blackwood can in no sense be called an obstructor of any of the reforms which have taken place. Mr. Blackwood, on all occasions, properly pointed out the cost which would be entailed by carrying out the improvements which were suggested. The real obstructors of reforms and improvements are not the permanent officials of the Post Office, but the Treasury. Every reform involves a certain amount of cost, and upon this point the Treasury have to be consulted. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) has, I think, hit the real blot in the matter when he pointed out that the Treasury have been receiving for some years past a very large income from the Post Office. There can be no question about the fact that the profit derived from the Post Office has been appropriated by the Treasury in the interests, generally, of the Exchequer, and that the income has been gradually increasing. I find, looking back for some years, that in the years 1870-73, the income from the Post Office was £1,470,000; 1874-7, £2,175,000; 1878-81, £2,654,000; and in 1882-6, £2,857,000; showing a steady tendency in the net income to increase. I am not disposed to complain of the Treasury receiving a certain income from the Post Office; but a grave question arises as to whether the Treasury and the Government should insist on appropriating the continually increasing surplus of the Post Office. I think some rule should be laid down that when a definite fixed sum has been derived from the Post Office everything beyond that surplus revenue, in the future, should be spent in carrying out improvements and reforms. I am bound to say in the last two or three years there has been a decrease in the revenue. The highest point was reached in 1883, when there was a surplus of £3,022,000; in 1884 it was £2,610,000; in 1885, £2,647,000; in 1886, £2,987,000; and in 1887, ending the 31st of March last, £2,720,000. This fall, however, was partly due to the expenditure of £300,000 on the purchase of the new Post Office site, which was an abnormal expenditure which will not occur again. As far as I can make out, from the account of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Statement, we may expect a surplus revenue of something like £3,000,000 in the coming year; and what I venture to suggest is that there should be a kind of understanding, on the part of the Government, and of the House, as to what is to be in future the average net revenue to be derived from the Post Office, and that beyond that limit the surplus revenue should be devoted towards carrying out improvements and reforms in connection with the Post Office itself. If any such rule as that were laid down, I think that without question it would be possible for the Post Office to effect a number of those smaller reforms which have been pressed upon the Department from time to time without the continued intervention of the Treasury. For my own part, I do not think that it is fair for the Treasury to insist upon appropriating the whole of the surplus revenue of the Post Office. No doubt the Treasury ought to have part, but there should be an understanding as to the point beyond which the appropriation by the Treasury should not go, and that the surplus revenue beyond that should be devoted to reforms. I must again repeat that there has been no obstruction whatever of the nature suggested by the hon. Member for Canterbury, on the part of the permanent officials of the Post Office, and still less from the Secretary, Mr. Blackwood. I was rather surprised that the Postmaster General did not reply to that part of the speech of the hon. Member for Canterbury when he addressed the Committee on the subject. I do not propose to go into the question of the conflict which unfortunately arose between the Postmaster General and the permanent staff. We have here only one side of the question, and when the right hon. Gentleman says that he has re-asserted his authority, I am inclined to think that there may be another side to that question. Certainly it was not a regular proceeding on the part of the clerks of the Department to draw up an address of sympathy with the permanent head of the Department. No doubt the matter did give rise to a great deal of discussion among the Members of the Government; and, if I am rightly informed, there was a compromise entered into by both parties by which the question was settled without coming more prominently before the public. I think I am right in saying that concessions were made on both sides which prevented the controversy from being brought before the public. I am quite content, for my own part, to leave the matter there, and I only wish to say that there is no foundation whatever for the reflection which the hon. Member for Canterbury has passed upon the permanent officials of having obstructed every proposal for the improvement of the postal service. Of course, when a proposal is made it is the duty of the permanent officials to point out what the cost of carrying it out will be, and I think it will be found that those who obstructed and prevented the reforms which have been suggested in connection with the Post Office are not the permanent officials of the Post Office, but the Treasury.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I regret that the Postmaster General has not endeavoured to re-arrange the Parcel Post instead of re-introducing the Sample Post. I am afraid that we are getting too many varieties of postage; and if we go on in this direction we shall have a system so complicated that it will be impossible for the public to understand it. There is already one rate for letters, another for parcels, another for books, a fourth for newspapers, and now we are to have a fifth for patterns. If the right hon. Gentleman had carried down the minimum of the Parcel Post a little further, he would have met every object which he has in view, and would have done something to simplify a very complicated tariff, which, I confess, I think might be still further simplified by doing away with the Book Post altogether, and relegating books also to the Parcel Post. With regard to what has been stated in connection with the telegraphic transmissions of Money Orders, I think the reply of the right hon. Gentleman is anything but satisfactory. That system is in operation, not only in Australia, but in most European countries, and no difficulty has been experienced in regard to it. It is, in fact, a great public convenience, and there is no reason why such a proposal should interfere with the banking business. Of course, if the Post Office undertook to transmit large sums of money they would interfere with banking business. But what is proposed would not interfere with banking business, but would simply supplement banking business in the same way as postal and post office orders supplement it. If it were limited to the small amounts of money which are now capable of being transmitted by postal or money orders, it is quite evident that it would require no increase in the balances placed in the hands of the postmasters. The sole result would be that a person remitting a sum of money by telegraph would pay a little extra to the Post Office. The Department would be so much the richer, and the convenience of the public would be served to a greater extent than it now is. I think there is great force in what has been suggested in the course of the discussion as to the gradual introduction of some such system into the Post Office—for instance, if it were adopted simply in London, by enabling an individual to send £5 or £10 by a telegram from the Provinces, it is quite evident that no danger would be incurred. Any amount of money could be sent by telegraph to London, to the great convenience of the general public, without the slightest danger of injuring the service. As to the Parcel Post, I see no reason why it should not be worked with success here as it is already in other countries in Europe. On the Continent, a system exists of collecting the price of the parcels sent out by Parcel Post by tradesmen. If the person to whom the parcel is addressed does not pay, the parcel itself is not delivered. I think the adoption of a similar system would not only be a source of revenue to the Post Office, but that it would give a strong stimulus to the retail trade. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General will take the opportunity at least of inquiring into what is being done by other countries. If he finds that a pecuniary gain is likely to accrue to the Post Office, I trust he will not hesitate to introduce the same system into this country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I wish to say a few words in order to protest against the doctrine laid down by my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), that it would be a good arrangement to come to an understanding that any surplus of the Post Office beyond a certain amount should be utilized in Post Office improvements. I am bound to protest against that in the interests of the Revenue, and also in the interests of economy, because I cannot imagine any arrangement more calculated to lead to extravagance than to hand over any surplus to be spent in Post Office improvements. With the permission of the Committee, I should like to make one remark as to the surplus of £3,000,000 derived from the Post Office. That surplus is almost exclusively—I might say is exclusively—derived from the penny postage in Great Britain and Ireland. It is from the letter writers generally in the United Kingdom that the surplus comes. As I understand, there is no other Department that leaves a profit. The Parcel Post may just pay its way; but the telegraphs, we know, result in a considerable loss, while long distance postage is carried on without profit, and in many cases with a loss. The argument used by those who are in favour of cheaper postage with the Colonies and other parts of the world is that the revenue of the Post Office, as a whole—that is to say, the profit derived from the penny postage—should be applied to the advantage of letter writers communicating with other parts of the world as well as to letter writers communicating with different parts of the United Kingdom, instead of, as now, being returned in the shape of remitted taxation to those who employ the penny post. At present, the gain arises from the great bulk of the letters written; not from business, banking, or manufacturers' letters only, but from the mass of the population who write the penny letter. I cannot see why the senders of letters to other parts of the world are more entitled to have a portion of the profit derived from the penny postage than the people who pay the penny. This is a question of equity between the two. The question whether by cheaper postage to other parts of the world—to the Colonies, for instance—we could ultimately increase the revenue, and secure an equally good service, is a matter which ought to be and must be looked at with the greatest anxiety. The matter can be considered in two ways. There is the system which I have mentioned of applying the surplus revenue derived from one portion of the business to another portion; and the other plan is to consider whether the rates in that other portion of the business can be lowered so as to obtain a revenue equal to that of the penny post. Every proposal in that direction that comes from the Post Office would be considered by the Treasury with the greatest desire to promote every possible reform. I am far from deprecating the attention which is now being directed to the question of cheap postage. If there are large reforms possible, let them be made, but do not risk the £3,000,000 earned by the Penny Post in carrying them out. I cannot think that it would be wise to fix a maximum profit, and say that when we have secured it, we may then enter upon speculative improvements in other directions. These improvements ought to be considered quite apart from the questions whether there is a surplus or not. I entreat the Committee to remember the case of the telegraphs. I do not know whether the House thinks that the enormous price paid for the acquisition of the telegraphs was a satisfactory arrangement or not. In consequence of the great pressure put upon the Department by the public and by hon. Members in this House, the cost of telegrams has now been reduced from 1*s.* to 6*d.* It is extremely convenient to be able to send telegrams for 6*d.* instead of 1*s.*; but, it should be remembered that the general taxpayer has now to contribute to the cost of every telegram thus sent out. A large amount of interest was taken in the acquisition of the telegraphs; but, at the present moment, the telegraphs involve the country in a loss of £500,000 a-year. There was exactly the same anxiety with regard to the acquisition of the telegraphs as there is now with regard to ocean postage and other matters, and when I served on the Committee which sat in reference to the telegraphs, I divided the Committee two or three times, for the purpose of protesting against the enormous price paid for the telegraphs, and of showing the loss which would be incurred. Enormous pressure, however, was put on by every commercial centre and by the Press, and in the end an enormous price was paid. Some of us thought that £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 were too much to pay for the acquisition of the telegraphs; but they were acquired under the plea that the country required cheap telegraphy. I can only trust that while the House of Commons looks with a jealous eye upon every part of the Service, in order to insure efficiency and speed, combined with economy, and while it watches the expenditure of the Post Office, it will not stimulate expenditure in every direction and in every branch which is under the control of the Post Office. I can assure the Committee—and I have had some experience of official life—that the public officers are only too glad to make experiments and to attempt reforms which are called for by increasing business. Hon. Members speak of a very considerable profit derived from the Post Office; but that profit is a diminishing profit when looked at with reference to the bulk of the business which is done. At the same time, it is important to remember that the working expenses of the Post Office are gradually increasing. They have increased from 57 per cent to 65 per cent of the receipts during the last five or six years, and that shows that the Post Office business must be watched from the point of view of economy as well as of efficiency. I hope it will not be understood that there is any disposition on the part of the Treasury to discourage improvements in postal and telegraphic communication, as to which the initiative must, of course, rest with the Post Office. It is the wish of the Government to give every facility for improvement, looking to proper economy, and looking also to the fact that the different Services must not be regarded simply as part of a whole, but how far each is remunerative in itself.

Mr. Goschen

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not express a wish that there should be no surplus Post Office revenue to dispose of, but I pointed out that the surplus paid into the Exchequer has been increasing year by year. Whereas, 10 years ago, it was less than £2,000,000, it has now reached an average of more than £3,000,000 from the postal and telegraphic Services together. On the Telegraphic Service all profit has disappeared during the last three or four years, and I do not think that for some years to come there will be any revenue derived from the Telegraph Service. Yet, from the Postal Service taken alone, there is derived a revenue which is continuously and largely increasing. What I contend is that the Treasury should not expect to continue to derive a large revenue from the postal and telegraph Services together. Without fixing any rigid rule, I think it might be understood, on the part of the Treasury, that when a certain amount of revenue has been derived from the two Services together, then they will consider all questions affecting the surplus revenue in a liberal spirit, and will not expect to derive continuously an increasing revenue. I should be content to take the revenue at about £2,500,000, in the understanding that questions of improvement in the Post Office should be liberally considered by the Treasury, and that as much as possible should be done in improving the Services. The question of the use to be made of any surplus is a different matter. I am not sure that the money could not be better disposed of than in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton). The senders of the letters in this country give the money from which the profit is derived, and their interest ought to be considered in the first instance. There are many ways in which improvement could be effected in the Post Office if only the money were forthcoming. If a surplus were to be derived from the two Services, the Postmaster General would find many ways of spending it in the improvement of the Service so as to promote the public convenience.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I must say that the statement we have heard from a right hon. Gentleman who has occupied the important position which has been occupied by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) is a most astonishing one—namely, that he is prepared to throw away every consideration of economy and every precedent which has been previously set in the financial arrangements of the country. I thought as I heard the words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman, what on earth would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) have said if he could have heard the proposal of the late Postmaster General? The right hon. Gentleman has suggested, in all seriousness, that a certain definite sum should be the maximum revenue to be derived by the Treasury from the Post Office, and that the Postmaster General should then be able to play with the remainder.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said nothing about playing with it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: It would practically amount to that. If any such system were resorted to, one of the immediate results would be that the Post Office officials would feather their nests very rapidly; the whole of the staff would put forward incontrovertible reasons for an increase of pay, and a large portion of what might be derived from the suggested arrangement would never find its way into the Treasury or anywhere else to the benefit of the public service. I am not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having already experienced some difficulty in providing the sum fixed for the redemption of the National Debt, should have risen at once to protest against the proposal to fix a limit upon the amount of the Post Office surplus which in future should be handed over to the Treasury. Nothing could be more objectionable than to introduce such a system into a spending or revenue Department. There was another remark which fell from the right hon. Member for Central Bradford which I was sorry to hear. He alluded to the position which the present Postmaster General has found himself obliged to take on the question of promotion. The right hon. Gentleman made use of language which certainly requires explanation. If he is not prepared to go further, he ought not to have said what he did. He endeavoured to make the Committee believe that there had been a considerable amount of difference of opinion on the part of the Government as to the treatment which a particular case had received at the hands of the Postmaster General, and he indicated that the Cabinet had not supported the Postmaster General in the original position he took in reference to the matter—hinting that there had been some kind of give and take arrangement—some compromise which enabled an unpleasant matter to be kept from the public eye, and which resulted in some kind of arrangement by which the amour propre of all persons concerned was saved. I was very sorry to hear that statement. A Minister holding the responsible position of Postmaster General ought to be master in his own Department. It appears to me to be perfectly ridiculous to put a Minister into a responsible position like that of Postmaster General and at the same time to tie his hands in regard to the amount of authority he is to possess. Passing on to the Vote itself, I think it is a matter for congratulation that we have now the Post Office Vote brought on for discussion at a time when something like serious criticism can be attempted. I am glad that that is so; but, at the same time, I feel that a Vote of this magnitude can hardly be seriously considered when taken as a whole. It ought to be presented in parts, and there are many precedents for dividing a Vote. Matters, however, have gone so far now that I presume it would be impossible to discuss the present Vote in different parts. It appears to me that the Postmaster General occupies a position midway between the Department and the Treasury itself. He is responsible for the duty of catering for the wants of the public to the best of his power; but he is also responsible for running the Post Office machine on the most economical terms, and for securing the greatest benefit to the Treasury. It does not seem to me that adequate means are taken to secure that the balance available for the Exchequer has been as large as it ought to have been. I do not propose to enter into the new arrangements for extending the Parcel Post or the pattern post; but I am certainly of opinion that the authorities at the Treasury have not endeavoured to improve the machinery of the Post Office as it might have been improved. Anyone who will look carefully through the Estimates will see how the Post Office is in general worked. The Heads of the Department come under sub-head A; the surveyors under sub-head B; the Provisional Establishment under sub-head C, and then there is the Miscellaneous Establishment after that. Of course, I am unable to speak from any personal knowledge, but looking at the matter from an outside point of view, it does occur to me that the Surveyors Department is unnecessarily large, and that much is done by the surveyors which ought not to be done by them at all. A great deal more ought to be given to the head postmasters throughout the Kingdom. As a matter of fact, some of the surveyors do allow the head postmasters to do a great deal of work which in other districts is done by the surveyors and their clerks, and the consequence is that the line of demarcation between the province of surveyor and the province of head postmaster is a varying and uncertain one, with the natural result that a considerable amount of friction and rivalry takes place. Then, again, the work of the head postmasters is most unequally provided for. One head postmaster is employed for nine hours a-day, while another head postmaster cannot get his work done under 17 or 19 hours a-day, whereas the pay is precisely the same. There are, I believe, great inequalities and anomalies, both in the amount of work done, and in the amount of pay received by the head postmasters. Another anomaly is the charge imposed upon the postmaster in reference to the requirements of his office. Why should a head postmaster be called upon to pay out of his own pocket for the fittings of the post office? That is clearly an anomaly and an injustice. In regard to postmaster-ships themselves—speaking as an individual Member of the House—I would suggest to the Government whether the whole system of political patronage in regard to them might not be got rid of. It is a very great nuisance to every Member of the House to be pestered, whenever a postmastership is vacant in the constituency he represents, with letters asking him to use his influence in obtaining the appointment. The Irish Members are not now much troubled in this respect, as they have systematically refused to have anything to do with any of these appointments whatever, and they decline to approach the Government for any favour of the kind. That is very lucky for us who represent Irish constituencies, and it has saved us a good deal of trouble. I know, however, that English and Scotch Members who have not taken the same course are beset with an enormous number of applications, which are not only embarrassing, but give rise to a great deal of discontent. I think it would be a great advantage to the postmasters themselves if the system were made more just and less uncertain in its operation than it is at present. As to promotion in the Post Office, there is, as a matter of fact, none at all, but absolute stagnation, and the result is that a stronger feeling of injustice and unfairness is produced in the minds of the Post Office employés than in any other branch of the Public Service. Then, again, in regard to the men employed under the postmasters, the position of the unfortunate rural letter carriers is an extremely hard one. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman fully sympathizes with them, and I hope that something may be done to improve their position. With regard to the award of good conduct badges, I understood the Postmaster General to say that he intends to take into consideration the possibility of introducing some better system in reference to the distribution and award of these good conduct badges than that which now prevails. When a vacancy arises under the existing rule, it is not the most deserving man who gets the badge, but the man who has the good luck to serve under an energetic postmaster who will fight for the honour. As I have already said, it is impossible, under the way in which this Vote is presented, to deal with all the items contained in it at once in a satisfactory manner; but in order to show that there are plenty of means of reducing the present postal Vote without any undue interference with the efficiency of the Service, I will cite one item. On page 87 there is an item of £8,500 for extra duty pay, and to provide for the commutation of pensions. Now, the business in the Post Office Savings Banks is a growing business, and some years ago great difficulty was experienced in obtaining accommodation for the staff. The consequence was that an enormous building was erected in Queen Victoria Street; but that building was soon found insufficient, and it is so very insufficient now, that out of some 480 clerks employed 383 are absolutely obliged to be accommodated, if I can use such a word, in warehouses hired for the purpose on the other side of the street. I believe that the accommodation at the present moment, even in these extra warehouses, is insufficient for any increase of the staff, and the present staff is altogether inadequate to do the work with advantage. The consequence is that the existing staff have to fall back upon a system of extra attendance, accompanied with extra duty pay, which is a bad system, and one which has been altogether condemned by the highest authorities—among others, by Mr. Blackwood, the Secretary of the Post Office, as long ago as the year 1875. I am afraid that the Postmaster General is unacquainted with the opinion expressed by Mr. Blackwood on that occasion in regard to the system of extra duty pay. Mr. Blackwood, who was a Member of a Committee which took the subject into consideration, reported that the Committee had not dwelt on the important subject of the extra duty pay system as far as might otherwise have been desirable, because it had been found that extra duty in a number of cases was no longer necessary. At the same time the Committee recorded their conviction, in which they asserted that the Treasury agreed, that the performance of extra duty for any length of time was highly inexpedient. I think the Secretary to the Treasury will probably feel an interest in the view then expressed by the Committee, who went on to say in their Report that the arguments against the system were obvious; but as they were so well known, it was unnecessary to repeat them. The performance of extra duty arose from the insufficiency of the force in the Savings Bank Department; but the extra duty itself pressed very heavily upon the officers, and the Committee expressed their opinion that it prejudicially affected the satisfactory performance of the work. It was found, however, that extra duty continued to be necessary at certain periods of the year; but the Committee pointed out that it was desirable to regulate the principles upon which it should be undertaken, so that in future it might not interfere with the efficiency of the Department. The Report went at considerable length into details with which I will not trouble the Committee; but speaking of the accommodation which the unfortunate members of the staff have to put up with, the Committee called attention to the fact that the work had to be performed in a vitiated atmosphere much overcrowded, and in rooms badly ventilated, in addition to which it was performed at night, when a large number of gas burners were lighted. Such a system, I maintain, is altogether censurable, and the Committee in their Report state distinctly that the accommodation of the Post Office Savings Bank ought to be such as to guard against the performance of work under such extreme pressure, owing to the insufficiency of the establishment. No stronger opinions were ever placed on Record by a Departmental Committee, and I fail to see why the Postmaster General did not consider it his duty to attach a little more weight to the Report of that Committee. We have now in the Department something like 250 men belonging to what is called the "Lower Division," who are employed for only six hours a-day; whereas the clerks in the Lower Division of other departments of the Civil Service work for seven hours a-day. After the six hours' labour is over you are obliged to continue these men beyond their stipulated period and to give them extra duty pay for the extra time they are employed; but what could be more easy than to carry out the plan which the Treasury adopt in reference to all other Departments, and to make the hours of the men seven per day instead of six. That would, I believe, render extra duty unnecessary, and there would be no actual injustice done to the men; because with six hours' labour a man commences at a salary of £80 a-year, going up to a maximum of £200; whereas, if he is employed for seven hours, he commences at £95 and goes up to a maximum of £250. The Post Office would, therefore, be able to save this item of £8,500 for extra pay which I have referred to and would get rid of the anomaly which now exists in the Service. Until the year 1884 I think it was understood by the clerks generally that the Treasury would refuse to allow any claim to choice on the part of those who were passed into the Lower Division after that date. I believe it was a question of the interpretation of the Order in Council which was issued in 1876. Before the year I have mentioned—namely, 1884, the Civil Service Commissioners were accustomed to send a successful candidate without any choice on his own part into the different Departments, and the consequence was that a man who passed very high found himself relegated to six hours' labour a day with a less amount of pay; whereas a much inferior man might be relegated to seven hours' office work with much better pay. Now, Sir, I think the Postmaster General and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will see in what I have pointed out the means of effecting some economy. I instance this merely as a sample of what may be done by careful administration at headquarters. I am afraid the Treasury, as at present constituted—I make no personal reflection upon the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson)—I am afraid the Treasury Office is not competent to look after the Civil Service of the country. Every official of the Treasury seems to have his own particular work to do, and no one seems to have, as part of his work to look after, what I may call the engineering part of the Civil Service. Until you have some one in the position, say of Chief Engineer, you will never have the reforms necessary carried out. I mention this to show that Members of the present Government will be able to judge whether some reforms may not easily be carried out, if they will only have regard to matters of detail. I do not know whether the present Postmaster General has ever had this matter brought before him; perhaps he has not. If he has not, I shall be content if he will promise to have the matter investigated, and to thoroughly look into it for himself, and not trust to the report of any subordinate, who, possibly, in the past, may have committed himself to an hostile attitude, by refusing assent to representations which may have been made.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) must have entirely misunderstood the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). What I understood my right hon. Friend to do was to protest against the action of the Treasury in demanding that a constantly increasing surplus revenue of the Post Office should be maintained for the benefit of the Exchequer. My right hon. Friend pointed out that during the last 10 years, for example, the free revenue of the Postal Services, including Telegraphs, had mounted from £2,200,000 to £2,750,000, and he also pointed out that last year, had it not been for some enormous capital expenditure, the free surplus revenue would have been £3,000,000. He asked, very justly, how much further the Post Office was to be expected to increase its revenue for the benefit of the Treasury and not for the convenience of the public? I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman's views. It happened that some years ago I moved, in connection with the Telegraph Service, a Resolution in this House to the effect that it was inexpedient to insist upon an increase of the free revenue from telegrams; and that that was equivalent to taxation on the transmission of telegraph messages; and that, instead of insisting upon that taxation, the price of telegraphic messages should be reduced. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), in the course of his remarks, illustrated what he had to say about the postal revenue by reference to the Telegraph Service and to the Packet Service. I am aware both these are included in another Vote, and, therefore, I will not dwell upon them. I will merely point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the increasing revenue referred to by my right hon. Friend was much greater than appears on the Paper. In the last few years enormous expenditure has been made on capital account, which has only increased the public property of the nation. There were between £300,000 and £400,000 expended for the plant required for the Parcel Post; £500,000 was expended in new plant to meet the increasing business resulting from the introduction of the 6d. telegrams; and last year close on £400,000 was expended on Post Office sites. It appears to me that all this expenditure rendered the country so much richer in public property, and indicated a still greater increase in the postal revenue than appears from the figures. I have always protested against the system of book-keeping on which we are called upon to judge of the results of the Postal Services. You find £300,000 or £400,000 expended on capital account—expended in the most wise and judicious manner on capital account—but because that expenditure has taken place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes down the following year and says, look what a falling off there has been in the postal revenue. If any business man conducted his business in that way the world would characterize him as no financier at all. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of the telegraph business. I am not here to defend the original purchase of the telegraphs. I know the right hon. Gentleman protested against the price paid, and I know also that the late Mr. Fawcett proposed that £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 sterling should be written off, and that we should no longer charge interest upon that amount upon the Telegraph Department; that in fact this amount of money should be considered as a bad debt. But, since the telegraphs have been acquired, it is not at all certain that they have been such a bad business as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) appears to believe. I was a Member of a Committee which inquired into the matter. The Post Office officials came before us, and they presented to us what they called a commercial balance sheet which showed a totally different result from the uncommercial balance sheets which are presented to this House. The balance sheet laid before us showed a distinct profit after the payment of all interest on the debt incurred in connection with the purchase of the telegraphs, and it was in connection with the surplus shown that I moved the Resolution protesting against further taxation on telegraphs, and proposing that the free revenue should be applied to increasing the facilities given to the public. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who was present in the House on that occasion, did not vote for my Resolution—Governments do not like increased expenditure—but he did not protest against the doctrine I laid down, as the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) appears to imagine. Now, I think my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) made his position perfectly clear. He did not suggest that we should fix a distinct sum, and say that beyond that sum the Post Office shall not earn money; what he suggested was that we should have some general understanding that it must not be expected that the free revenue to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer should double itself every 10 or 20 years. He was most explicit in laying down the doctrine that Treasury sanction is desirable in connection with any Post Office experiment, and I protest against the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in inveighing against these experiments as likely to cause expenditure. The experiments advocated would cause no expense at all; the introduction of telegraphic money orders would not involve a sixpence of capital outlay.

MR. GOSCHEN: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I thought I laid it down distinctly that there were experiments which I thought ought to be made. I do not wish to be understood to protest against all the experiments suggested. What I do protest against is the doctrine that because we have a surplus revenue, we ought therefore to carry out experiments.

DR. CAMERON: I have no doubt I misunderstood what the right hon. Gentleman meant; I am very glad to hear the explanation of his meaning; because I think that the suggestions that have been made to-night in regard to Inland administration, at all events, both as to the telegraphic remission of money and as to the collection of charges in connection with parcels delivery by Parcel Post have this important peculiarity to recommend them—that they would not involve the outlay of one single sixpence; they would only bring in additional business to the staff which is already in existence without any extra expenditure. I thought it right, as the doctrine laid down by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had been misunderstood, to say so much in explanation of what appeared to me to be his meaning. As to the present amount of Treasury sanction being sufficient to cut down or prevent expenditure for increases of salary, we all know the late Mr. Fawcett was constantly telling us that he had been obliged to raise the salaries of the telegraphic operators; the increases, of course, were made with Treasury sanction.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Mr. Courtney, I should like to refer to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), that the whole of the profits are derived from letters within the United Kingdom. I think he has been misinformed in the case of the American mails. The total expenditure this year upon the American Mail Service will be £80,000; but the income derived will amount to £212,000. There are some other expenses in connection with these mails, but there is an ample margin—a profit is made on the American mails of over £100,000 a-year. I think the right hon. Gentleman will see he is mistaken in the statement that all the profit is derived from home letters. But, there is a larger source of profit still. We send millions of letters every year to the Continent. We charge 2½d. for every letter, say to Paris; while we only charge 1d. for a letter to Dublin. It would pay very well to have a 1d.

Dr. Cameron

postage from here to Paris. I contend that by the Continental Service a large profit is made, and that, in this particular also, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is quite erroneous. While not desirous of entering now upon the Packet Service question, I understand that £85,000 is the cost of the Australian Service; while the Post Office revenue from this service is £121,000. There are other instances which would go to prove that all the profit made in connection with the Post Office Services is not made in the United Kingdom. It is quite true that the Postmaster General is the milch cow of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have remembered, when he spoke so strongly against the remarks of the late Postmaster General as to the application of the surplus revenue over, say, the amount received last year, to the cheapening and facilitation of the Postal Services generally, that his own Postmaster General made a very similar statement in December last to a deputation which waited upon him. These facts should be borne in mind, because they show that Postmaster Generals agree that it is a sound doctrine that no more than the sum made last year should be taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that, in future, the sum above £3,000,000 made last year ought to be applied to extending, cheapening and facilitating the postal work of the country. The only other point I desire to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to is this: He has repeatedly pressed on this House the fact that there is a decreasing revenue from the Post Office, but he has not informed the House that there is an enormous increase in the receipts of the Post Office. In 1841 the receipts of the Post Office were only £1,324,000; in 1851 they were £2,277,000, and in 1886 they rose to £8,150,000. There has been no decrease whatever in the receipts of the Post Office, but, on the contrary, the Post Office has yielded in absolute receipts for postal work done a yearly increase of £200,000. I also agree with hon. Members who say the Post Office accounts are kept in such a disgraceful manner that no business man would tolerate them for a day. The admissions in the Parliamentary Papers which have been presented at my instance fully establish this fact. I will, however, reserve any further remarks I have to make until the Vote for the Packet Service comes on.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Mr. Courtney, I regret to be obliged to draw the attention of the Postmaster General and the Committee to grievances affecting the head postmasters in Ireland. These grievances are, however, of great concern to the head postmasters, and therefore I trust my observations will receive some consideration by the Postmaster General. My hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) alluded in the course of his able criticism of the Vote to the grievances of head postmasters in general; but I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that the head postmasters of Ireland are paid about 20 per cent less than the head postmasters in England, Scotland, and Wales. Why that should be so has never been made clear to us. It appears to us, from our investigations here upon all the Estimates which come before this Committee, that the public servants in the employment of the Government in Ireland are treated not only with exceptional severity, but with an unfairness which is scarcely creditable to the administration Departments. Not only are the head postmasters in Ireland paid 20 per cent less than people in a similar position in England and Scotland, but they labour under the disadvantage of being permanently installed in there present offices. They complain that, unlike the public servants in the other Departments in the Inland Revenue, they are not moved about from place to place, and do not get the advantages of removal which servants in the other Departments have from time to time placed at their disposal. Not only are they debarred from improvement by their non-removal, but actually the best offices in Ireland have been from some unaccountable reason shut off from the head postmasters in Ireland. I allude to the four best offices, those at Belfast, Cork, Londonderry, and Limerick. I have taken the trouble to ascertain what the salaries of the occupants of these four offices in Ireland are. I find that the head postmaster at Belfast receives £645 a-year; the head postmaster at Cork £550 a-year; the head postmaster at Limerick £440 a-year, and the head postmaster at Londonderry £380 a-year. Now, those are very fair salaries, and when we come to compare them with some of the salaries paid to postmasters elsewhere, we find that promotion to one of these offices is a matter of very considerable moment indeed. I will take some of the best, not the very lowest, offices elsewhere. At Carlow the head postmaster receives £135 a-year; at Carrickshannon the head postmaster is paid £120 a-year; at Cashel the head postmaster is paid £107 a-year; at Coleraine the head postmaster receives £135 a-year, and at Dundalk the head postmaster gets £174 a-year. I consider it a very grievous injustice that the head postmasters of Ireland should be shut out from the very desirable promotion to Belfast and the other chief towns I have named. The result has been, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal very aptly stated, a stagnation of promotion in this particular Department. Why that should be so has never been made clear to me or to hon. Members who have considered this matter from time to time. I shall not dwell upon that branch of the subject to which the hon. Member for East Donegal referred—namely, promotion by political patronage. That has been a great grievance, not only in Ireland, but in England, Scotland, and Wales. We, in Ireland, have got rid of it—I will not say to the advantage of our friends—by simply declining to put ourselves under any compliment whatever, either to a Liberal or a Conservative Government. We have relieved ourselves of any obligation in the matter, and we have done so upon a principle which can be easily understood by Members of both sides of the House. I can quite understand that it is a matter of very serious consideration and grievous moment to hon. Members of this House to be pestered continually in respect to the bestowal of patronage. There is another matter respecting head postmasters which I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to. It is the manner in which head postmasters are paid. They are paid by a fixed salary. They ask that there shall be a minimum and a maximum, and an annual increment, as is the case in regard to every other official in the postal Department. If there were a minimum and a maximum, the head postmasters would be relieved of the necessity of occasionally appealing to perhaps an unsympathetic surveyor to take up their case, and represent it to the Postmaster General. Very often postmasters have to depend upon these surveyors, who may or may not bring under the notice of the superiors of the Department a deserving case. A surveyor may be influenced by one motive or another; he may have a grudge against a particular postmaster, and a deserving man may be kept in the background owing to the shortcomings of a surveyor. There is another matter. The head postmasters ask to be allowed to conduct the affairs of their own respective districts rather than the surveyors, who are now asked to interfere in the most trivial matters. I think head postmasters would be able to get work done very much better than surveyors, who only pay cursory visits to the district, and who are not at all acquainted with the particular matters into which they are asked to investigate. Then, again, I complain altogether of the manner in which surveyors' clerks and inspectors are appointed. It has now amounted to a custom to appoint young men from the London office as surveyors' clerks and inspectors. It is an obnoxious thing to have a young clerk from the London office promoted over the head of older officials. It often happens that the conduct of these young men is overbearing in the highest degree. These young men are placed over men whose service is of twice the length, and who have more experience of the office, and of the requirements of the office, but who are still, at the same time, obliged to submit not only to the inexperience of these young men, but to their arrogance and overbearing manners. Why should you not promote head postmasters to the position of surveyors' clerks and inspectors? It nearly always happens that the inspector of a bank has at some portion of his career been a bank manager. I say the same principle may be made to apply to the service of the Post Office, that the head postmaster, if he showed the capacity, might be made an inspector to the advantage generally of the Post Office system. And by making these promotions, men will look forward to them as a reward for their services, and they will act as an inducement to a better class of men to join the service. Now, Sir, these are the few remarks concerning the head postmasters to which I desire to draw the attention of the Postmaster General. I will now trouble him for a very few moments by asking him a question concerning another branch of the Postal Service. I drew his attention on a former occasion, both by question and speech in this House, to the position of postmen in Cork. I wanted to know then, and I ask him now, what has been the result of his inquiry. I desire to know why these men are not eligible for promotion to the position of letter sorters, and for positions of a higher grade as they are elsewhere than in Cork? Then again, in Cork, when sick, they get only half pay; while in Dublin a married man who is sick receives full pay, and an unmarried man who is sick gets three-quarter's pay. The grievance of these public servants at Cork is all the greater, because their pay is 25 per cent less than that of men who serve in like positions elsewhere. Now, these are the grievances which I drew the attention of the Postmaster General to on a past occasion, and he then promised inquiry. I should be very glad to get some information on the point. Of course, if he cannot now, without notice, recall all he has done in the matter, I should be very pleased if he would say that he will give me the information at some future time. I trust he will consider these matters of sufficient moment to give them his consideration.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Mr. Courtney, there are only one or two points to which I desire to refer. One is respecting the patronage to sub-postmasterships. Everyone knows what a nuisance it is to receive letters from the Treasury asking Members to recommend a man to some sub-postmastership. Upon receipt of such a letter an hon. Member writes down to someone in his constituency to recommend a person for the office. Altogether, Members are put to a great deal of trouble, and there is not the slightest reason why this relic of the past, this system of giving patronage to Members of Parliament in order, it is supposed, to influence constituents to the advantage of Members should continue, and I really suggest that the system be done away with. It seems to me that the best person to apply to in these cases is the local postmaster. He is able to give a reasonable, common-sense answer to the question asked, what person is best fitted for the vacant office? Generally it is someone who has got a shop in some central position, and it is a perfect nuisance for Members to be pestered in the matter. It is part of the old system of Members being corrupted by the Treasury, and of Members attempting to corrupt their constituents. I find it a nuisance, and my constituents do not require to be corrupted. The next point to which I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General, refers to postcards. Every Postmaster General is anxious to distinguish himself by doing something to the public advantage, and I submit to the 'right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) that he would distinguish himself if he would adopt in England the penny closed postcards, such as exist in France. Many people do not care about using our halfpenny postcards, because they are open. If postcards could be closed, and a penny charged for them, it would simplify correspondence very much. I believe that the French postcard is a patent, but of course arrangements could be made for the use of similar cards in this country. If they were issued at a penny each I believe the Post Office would gain very considerably; but, whether they would or not, the public would find them of great convenience. There is another point I should like to call attention to, and it is in reference to the telegraphs. There is at present, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, a telegraphic cable between France and England—

THE CHAIRMAN: Telegraphs are not included in this Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I thought we were dealing with the whole of the Vote. I will reserve my remarks upon the point, and upon one or two other matters connected with the telegraphs, until we get to the Vote.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Before the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General replies, I should like to call his attention to two matters in reference to the service of mails to the North. The first point is in reference to the mails between the Western Islands and the mainland. At the present time, if you post a letter, say, on a Monday, at Stornoway, that letter will not be delivered in Caithness until Thursday, although the distance is less than 100 miles. The reason is, that the mail train arrives at Dingwall at half-past 1, while the mail train for the North leaves at a quarter to 12. The consequence is that letters are detained for 24 hours in Dingwall. For the last 18 months we have lost an entire day because the mail train arrives at Dingwall 43 minutes after the train from the south comes up. Now, there is another matter to which I think I have only to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to have it remedied. It is in reference to the South mails. We, practically, in the whole North of Scotland—north of the Caledonian Canal—have only one mail per day. There are two mails ostensibly, but one mail leaves here at 10 o'clock in the morning, and the letters carried by it are only delivered in Caithness one hour before the letters leaving by the mail at 8 o'clock at night. The mail leaving London at 8 o'clock at night gets to Caithness at 6 o'clock the next night; while the mail leaving at 10 o'clock in the morning only arrives at 5 o'clock the next afternoon. The morning mail really takes 9 hours longer to do the journey than the evening mail. The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt say that this is a question of expense. I admit it is; but in certain districts in the North, where you have nothing like the same amount of correspondence, you really pay more for it. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter, and that, if he is only going to spend a certain amount of money in Scotland, he will see that it is fairly spent among the various districts.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I want to ask the Postmaster General to give us some assistance in a matter in respect of which an industry has suffered a great deal of late years. An inquiry was fixed before the Fishery Commission at Hove into the statements which had been made that the fishery people of Ireland had been deceived by false telegrams, telegrams sent for the sole purpose of imparting false information to fishermen along the coast as to the whereabouts of fish in order that the senders might ring the market. At the inquiry which was held at Hove about the middle of last year, the sending of these false telegrams was proved to the hilt, and the recommendation was then made that the Postmaster General should be applied to in the matter. The application was a very simple one, it was that the Postmaster General should arrange for reliable telegrams to be sent to the fishery districts of Ireland, in order that the false telegrams, which are sent for the purpose of deceiving men and ringing the market, should not have the effect which they have now had for a considerable time. The Postmaster General has undertaken the despatch of storm signals, and I think he might very properly do something in the direction I have indicated. Of course, the Postmaster General cannot prevent anyone sending false telegrams as long as they are paid for; but he can prevent the evil which is done by acting officially in the matter, and by having telegrams of a reliable character sent to the different fishery neighbourhoods of Ireland so as to prevent a recurrence of the evil.

MR. TAPLING (Leicestershire, Harborough): I have only one remark to make. I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the great facilities the residents of Paris enjoy by means of what is called the pneumatic post. By that post anyone living in Paris can write a short letter, despatch it by this post, and receive an answer to it in the course of a half hour. I am sure no hon. Member of this House who has ever been in Paris can have failed to have been struck by the great facility this post affords to people. I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will consider if it is possible to institute something of the same kind in London, because I am fully persuaded that the people of the Metropolis would find it an enormous convenience if they had some such means of communication.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I must ask the indulgence of the Committee in dealing with the multifarious points which have been raised in the course of the discussion. I will endeavour to do my best to notice the various matters which have been raised, although I cannot undertake to deal with them at the length they may deserve. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) was the first Member to rise since I sat down, and he called the attention of the Committee to the question of post boxes at railway stations, and also to the question of pillar boxes. There is no doubt an apparent grievance in the system of requiring that the letters posted at pillar boxes at stations should be sorted at the head Post Office of the town, as that, of course, deprives the travelling public of some time for posting before the train leaves. I dare say there are good reasons why this system has hitherto endured; but I will look into the matter, and see whether any arrangement can be made to facilitate the transfer of letters directly from the station pillar boxes to the travelling vans. Then my right hon. and learned Friend went on to deal with a question which is perhaps more distinctly local, inasmuch as it has reference to the mails from Whitehaven to the South. I understood him to say that the mail bags leave Whitehaven at a quarter past 6, although the fast train which is to convey them ultimately to London does not go till half-past 7.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I merely referred to that as an instance. My point was this, that, where the mail bags are not in charge of a travelling clerk of the Post Office, letters are not received. That is to say, when the mail bags are in charge of the guard or of some other railway official, letters are not received.

MR. RAIKES: At first sight, it would seem not unreasonable, at all events in the case of places of some importance, that the guard might be allowed to carry a supplementary bag. That is a matter again on which I can only promise inquiry; it is not a matter to which my attention has been previously drawn, and I should be glad if what is suggested can be found practicable. Then the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) asked a question about the charge for insurance. He commented very naturally upon the very small charge which appears for water, and many other things connected with the Department in London, and which includes insurance. My hon. Friend is perhaps not aware that the Government is its own insurance office. It is possible, in fact it is no doubt the case, that some small payments are made in London in respect of insurances where the Government is not the freeholder, but holds premises on lease; it is quite probable that the lease may contain a covenant for insurance. That may account for the very small amount of insurance which is charged for. Then my hon. Friend mentioned the question of smuggling by means of the Parcel Post. I heard last year one or two complaints in regard to the smuggling of tobacco in the Parcel Post. There has been no doubt from time to time mention made of it by the officials of the Inland Revenue; but I am not aware that there is anything the Post Office could do to prevent the practice. It is rather a matter for the Inland Revenue than for ourselves, and I think it is a matter to which the best attention of the Inland Revenue is at present given, and as far as I can judge the complaints made have become fewer in number in the course of the last few months. Then my hon. Friend asked a question in regard to the sending of mails by coaches, and I think a certain amount of public interest has been raised by the introduction of the parcels coach between London and Brighton. That is an experiment, and it is an experiment which at present has been sanctioned by the Treasury only for one year. We made the contract only for one year. The coach, as hon. Members are probably aware, is really a parcels van, and is confined to the carrying of parcels. It leaves London about 11 o'clock at night, and it reaches Brighton about 5 o'clock in the morning; it makes the journey, I believe, in six hours. It is thought that in distances of this description it may be found possible to effect considerable economy by the establishment of these coaches. It will not probably be applicable to longer distances. But the Committee is no doubt aware that under the Acts which establish the Parcel Post, a certain percentage of the postage is paid by the Government to the railways which convey the parcels. It amounts to 55 per cent of the entire amount received for postage, and certain experts of the Post Office have satisfied themselves that we can convey our own parcels by road from London to Brighton at a less cost than that represented by 55 per cent of the postage. That being so, it was thought desirable to make an experiment, and to see whether the result corresponded with the expectations of these experienced officers. I have very little reason to doubt that the result will be satisfactory from a commercial point of view, and if we find that the parcels mail is conveyed safely, regularly, and economically, it will probably be found practicable to extend the system in other parts of the country; but it will only be extended where the distance to be travelled is not a very great one. For instance, I am afraid that the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) cannot look for any great assistance in this direction. Now my hon. Friend the Member for Preston asked a very natural question about trip allowances. The name is an old one, it has been always on the Estimates; it is rather a misleading one, for it seems to suggest something to do with holidays. On the contrary, these trip allowances are sums paid for extra duties to those officers of the Post Office who conduct the sorting operations in the travelling vans, and it is done entirely, or almost entirely, as a matter of extra duty. This is the explanation of the £24,000, or thereabouts, for trip allowances. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) made a speech on the subject of the surplus revenue of the Post Office, upon which I do not think it will be necessary for me to offer any observations, especially after the reply of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen). There is one part of his speech, however, which I hope he will forgive me for saying that I had much rather he had not made. I think it is a pity that one who has held the position of head of a Department should make observations as to the internal arrangements of the Department in the form of insinuations and innuendos. I think that if he has any complaints to make, he should make a categorical statement of the case; it is unfortunate that the statement which the right hon. Gentleman made should be couched in the language which he used. I can only say in regard to the matter which the right hon. Gentleman thought fit to bring up, that I have nothing to add to what I said earlier in the evening in regard to the services of the Secretary to the Post Office. I trust I shall never be suspected of depreciating the services of the Secretary to the Post Office; indeed, I am so fully sensible of the valuable assistance rendered by the permanent officials of the Department that I cannot think I am open to any taunt of the description the right hon. Gentleman levelled at them. Well, now, the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) has made one or two speeches, and among others he has made a speech to explain the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford. But I will confine myself to his own original matter. He was rather sorry that we had determined to re-establish the Samples Post, and thought that the solution of the matter was rather to be found in reducing the size of parcels. Well, I do not think he would find the public to agree with him on that point. The cry is certainly for greater convenience for sending small samples or patterns. It would be impossible to bring the Parcel Post down to a point at which it would touch the Letter Post. If you were to create a new parcels rate for everything above the size that is commonly sent by Letter Post you would create enormous confusion, and probably reduce our whole postal system to something like chaos. We prefer the simpler and less presumptuous attempt which we are making to endeavour to re-establish the Pattern Post, and I am convinced that it will be found extremely useful and convenient to the public, while I trust it will not be unremunerative to the revenue. Then the hon. Member dwelt upon the question of sending money orders by telegraph, and so also did the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton). I have said what I have to say upon the point, but I am quite willing to add this much, that I think there is something worthy of consideration in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Canterbury as to whether we might make an experiment, and after consideration with my advisers, I will say whether a system can be devised by which an experiment can be made. Then the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) went on to dwell upon the increasing revenue of the Post Office. Upon that he harped for some time. It is very undesirable that a mistaken idea on this subject should go abroad. It is, of course, a fact that the gross revenue of the Post Office has continued to increase; but it is also a fact that the cost of the service has increased in a greater ratio. Although the figures given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) are no doubt correct up to the point at which he left off, I am afraid that if I were in a position to state positively the figures for the last few years, they would show a very decided falling off in the profits of the Post Office. As far as I calculate, the amount paid by the Post Office into the Exchequer for postal and packet service amounted last year to something under £2,400,000, and it fell short of the sum paid the preceding year by more than £300,000; therefore, it certainly is misleading the public to speak of the increasing revenue of the Post Office, when, although the gross revenue has increased, the actual surplus has diminished.

Mr. Raikes

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Was that irrespective of the expenditure upon Post Office sites?

MR. RAIKES: No, of course it was not; but that was not the last demand to be made for Post Office sites. The demand last year was a large one, and I trust the demand this year will be very much less. Irrespective of the expenditure on Post Office sites, if my expectation is carried out, I hope to see a larger surplus paid this year than last; but these matters do not affect the question as to whether the surplus of the Post Office did or did not decline last year. As I have already said, the surplus paid into the Exchequer last year fell short of the surplus of the preceding year by something more than £300,000. Then if you come to the question of the income which is derived from the sister Service, the Telegraphs—I merely connect it with the question of the gross revenue of the Services—it is necessary to bear in mind that the decline in the finances of the Telegraph Department, which commenced about four years ago, has continued steadily to increase. If we take the time seven years ago, before the late Mr. Fawcett commenced the various reforms with which his name is identified, I find that in the year 1880 there was almost an equilibrium in the finances of the Telegraph Department. If you take the interest at £326,000 a-year, which represents the interest on the capital sum expended on the purchase of the telegraphs, the profit earned in that year was £313,000, so it only fell short of the annual charge for interest by about £13,000. But I find that in the past year, in addition to the £326,000, the annual charge for interest, there was a deficit upon our telegraphic revenue of between £220,000 and £230,000, so that last year the Telegraph Department must be regarded as having cost the country about £550,000, which is paid by the taxpayers in order to assist the senders of telegrams. And when you are taking the revenue of the Post Office, you must deduct that sum of £550,000 from the surplus earned by the Post Office itself—something like £2,400,000. So your entire surplus from the Post Office, instead of being £3,000,000, is something less than £2,000,000. The surplus necessarily rests upon the receipts of the purely Postal Department. I may repeat what was said by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)—that the income of the Post Office finds its sheet anchor in the 1d. postage. There is, no doubt, as pointed out by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton), a profit also upon the postage to foreign countries where the Postal Union prevails; but that is as a bagatelle when compared with the revenue earned by the 1d. postage. In regard to the other points to which the hon. Member for Canterbury adverted, it seems to be very difficult to make him accept the fact that we do not believe that the American mails result in any profit whatever to the Department. We have to pay the charges of the mails conveyed from London to Queenstown—no small sum—and we have also to pay the charges of bringing the mails from Queenstown to London; and while we have to charge this outgoing service from London to Queenstown against the revenue which we derive by sending our letters to America, the reverse process of bringing the mails from Queenstown to London is to be charged against the service from which we derive no revenue at all. The American Post Office, of course, receives all the profit of the postal business from America to this country. Putting all these things together, I hope there will be a surplus; but it will not be a large one; it will not be one about which much question can be made. Then came the question raised by the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). The hon. Gentleman has taken up the question of postmasters generally, and he has pointed to what I think are various changes that may very well be considered in connection with the position of these officers. I quite agree with him that it seems a very great hardship that a public servant taking up an important public charge should be put to great expense in the way of fitting up his office, and to that initial charge I think may be traced several painful cases of deficiency on the part of postmasters. The irregularities of some of these postmasters may be traced to the fact that they have been saddled with a debt incurred by the necessity of fitting up their offices, from which difficulty they have never been able subsequently to extricate themselves. Though the system is not a good one, I am afraid it would be a very difficult thing to persuade the Treasury to incur the expenditure which would be necessary to provide post office fittings in the case of every country postmaster. If, however, I hold Office during the present year, I shall endeavour to see what amelioration can be devised in the position of the postmasters in this respect.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: My suggestion was limited to postmaster-ships where the premises were devoted exclusively to the public service.

MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member is no doubt aware that in regard to the Crown offices, or the offices which are devoted exclusively to post office work, the fittings are supplied by the Government. At all events, that is the intention I know; but I will look into the matter, and I shall be very glad to receive any suggestion the hon. Gentleman likes to make to me. He was anxious that something should be done with the view of improving the position of postmasters in relation to promotion. This is of course a question of very burning interest to postmasters at large; but I think it is well that these officers should understand, when they obtain on their own request a position of postmaster which at the time is satisfactory, that that does not entitle them to further promotion to a larger postmastership in a different town. Of course, it is very desirable when a postmaster at a small station is found to be a very efficient officer and a person of considerable ability, to utilize his experience as much as possible, and to find the opportunity, if one is available, of giving him a wider sphere of action by promoting him to a larger station. No doubt efficient postmasters will, as a general rule, obtain promotion; but I do not think it would be a good thing if we were to allow it to be generally understood that the fact of soliciting and obtaining a small postmastership should, in itself, entitle one to promotion to a large postmastership later on. If that principle were admitted it would be very hard to those servants who prefer the more active, and therefore the more responsible, duties at headquarters if they were to be excluded altogether from competition for important postmasterships, for the fulfilment of the duties of which they are so well fitted. I can assure the Committee that in cases where I have had to fill up vacant postmasterships, though I could not, without reference, state the exact proportion in which I promoted postmasters from small to large stations, and in which I had promoted other post office servants, I have always been extremely glad, where I could promote efficient postmasters, to give them new spheres of action; and when other opportunities may occur the hon. Gentleman may be sure that I shall be glad to adopt the same course of action. Then comes the question about the extra duty of the Savings Bank clerks in connection with commutation. The hon. Gentleman is so accurate in the statements he makes as a general rule, and he has such an extended knowledge of the Civil Service, that I am surprised that on this occasion he should have made a little slip. He assumed that the extra duty for which that sum of £8,500 was charged was extra duty that could be met in a considerable degree by lengthening the hours of the day's work of the clerks in that Department. I am quite with him as to the desirability of lengthening the hours of work. I think six hours are not adequate, and that seven hours' work and pay would be better for the State and for the individual. But as regards this particular duty, the fact is that this commutation work in respect of which this charge is made only occurs once a-year, and therefore the difficulty could not be met, either by increasing the staff or lengthening the hours. It is work that must be extra. It is an extra pressure that comes at the beginning of the year. It only lasts a few weeks, and therefore, as I say, it could not be met by an extension of the hours throughout the twelve months.

Mr. Raikes

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: This particular work does not represent more than £3,500 of this item of £8,500.

MR. RAIKES: I have not with me the figures with regard to the other part of the amount.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Am I correct with regard to that?

MR. RAIKES: I should not be surprised if the hon. Member is correct, because he is generally so very accurate in his statements with reference to these matters. The hon. Member read some observations made by the Committee in 1878—the Committee presided over by the present Secretary to the Post Office, which I think are worthy of consideration. I only refer to that at this moment to say that I have not been so long in my Office that I have been able to make a perfect study of the history of the Post Office transactions, and this matter has escaped me. But I will endeavour to acquaint myself with these particulars, and on some future occasion shall be able to deal more satisfactorily with the matter. Then the hon. Member for South Tipperary (Mr. John O'Connor) made some observations with reference to postmasters in Ireland. He says their salaries are 20 per cent less than those of postmasters in England. That is a statement which I cannot accept without further inquiry. I think, no doubt, that it is possible that the salaries are lower in Ireland than in this country, as we know the salaries in Scotland are generally lower than in England in all branches of the Public Service. But at the same time, it must be borne in mind that both the cost of living and of rent, even where it is paid, in Ireland, as in Scotland, are much less than in England. I will, however, inquire into the question of promotion. I do not think I could hold out any prospect that I could sanction the fixing of a maximum and a minimum, as the salaries of postmasters, with an annually increasing increment, because that would be making allowance for an increase of work in some cases where work did not increase, whilst it might increase very considerably in other places. However, the hon. Gentleman will be glad to hear that I have raised the salaries of at least 12 of these minor postmasterships in Ireland since I have been in Office. There is a further process of readjustment going on, and I may assure the hon. Member that whenever the salaries can be raised above what is called starvation point, not only in Ireland, but in other parts of the United Kingdom, I shall be very happy to avail myself of the opportunity. Something has been said with regard to the surveyors, both by the hon. Member for East Donegal and the hon. Member for South Tipperary. Comparisons have been made as to the way in which these gentlemen perform their duties in Ireland and the way in which they are performed elsewhere. The general question was dealt with by a Departmental Committee only last year. That Committee had power to inquire into the question as to all the relations between the surveyors and the postmasters, and I think that in some cases it has been found convenient to sanction the employment of the head postmasters in important places as surveyors in the districts where their post offices are situated. The hon. Gentleman is, I hope, misinformed with regard to the manner in which some surveyors' clerks have behaved. All I can say is, that during the last nine months, since I have had any practical experience of this matter, I have not appointed a surveyor's clerk in Ireland without having a recommendation from the authorities of the Irish Post Office. I quite agree that it would be most desirable to prevent any unpleasantness by bringing into the postal service in Ireland any person, whether he comes from England, Scotland, or Ireland, who does not know how to behave himself in carrying out his duty. Then the case of the Cork letter carriers has been referred to. I have gone into that matter, but I have not with me the particulars. I did not think it was likely to be alluded to to-day. I thought a reply had been given, but as that does not seem to be the case, I will undertake that a reply shall be given to the complaint of the hon. Member on some future occasion. I now come to the question raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who suggested that it was desirable that the minor positions in the Post Office should be filled up on the recommendation of the head postmaster of a district rather than that of the local Member for a constituency. I think I have already stated in one of the discussions that have taken place upon Postal matters since I took Office, that my own mind tends in the same direction as the hon. Member; and that in the case of these little sub-receiving and sorting offices, which are generally either in the same town or in the immediate vicinity of the head office, the postmaster would probably be on the whole—if not the invariable—at least the best guide to whom the Postmaster General could look for information upon this matter. I have not had any official communication with the Treasury on the subject; and, of course, it would be impossible for me to act without a thorough understanding with that Department; but, I think it is not impossible, if no objection is raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, or any other Member of the Treasury Board, that some step may be taken in the matter. The other point to which the hon. Member for Northampton refers was with regard to the establishment of a penny closed postcard. That matter, I confess, is new to me. The hon. Member is not now in his place, otherwise I would have asked him to send me a sample of the postcard to which he refers. However, I have no doubt that a sample could be obtained, and I will see what can be done after further consideration. Then, as to the question raised by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark)—his complaint as to the slowness of the morning mail—I should be very glad if that train could be accelerated so that letters could arrive at the places he referred to at an earlier period than they do at present. To those who live at the extreme end of the line of communication, it must be a serious provocation to find their morning and evening letters arrive practically at the same hour. However, persons even in the North of Scotland differ in opinion with regard to this subject; and I have had representations made to me with regard to the service of this slow train, which leads me to believe that many parts of the country are fully satisfied with the arrangement as it at present exists. With regard to the Postal Service to the Western Islands, I should be very much obliged if the hon. Gentleman would put upon paper some practical suggestion. If he will do so, I shall be very glad to communicate with him upon the subject. I must say I have had more than enough almost to do with Stornoway and Strom Ferry ever since I came to the Post Office, and the names of those places are more familiar to me than the names of almost any other place in her Majesty's dominions. However, I shall be glad to see what can be done with regard to the Dingwall connection. As to what was said by the hon. and learned Member sitting below the Gangway on the Front Bench opposite (Mr. Molloy) with regard to false telegrams having been sent to Irish fishermen respecting the weather, he suggested that perhaps the Postmaster General might send sound and true weather forecasts for the benefit of the Irish fishermen. Well, if there was no other objection to it, I should most respectfully decline to be in any way responsible for the Irish weather. It is variable enough in this part of Her Majesty's Dominions, but I think if the Postmaster General were to do any such thing as to hold himself responsible for the unexpected variations in the Irish weather, we should be adding a substantial grievance to the alleged woes of Ireland. But false telegrams are sent about many other subjects besides the weather, and I should be very glad if there were power in the Post Office to remedy the evil of these false telegrams. I might mention that the other day I received a letter from the owner of one of the favourites, or rather of one of the horses that were expected to make a show in the late Derby, enclosing a false telegram announcing to the officials of the Jockey Club that the horse had been "scratched," and I was asked to take dire vengeance on the offender. Well, I should be very glad if it were in my power to hand over the offender to the legal authorities; but it must be remembered that persons who send false telegrams are not very particular to identify themselves.

Mr. Raikes

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: With reference to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about my remarks earlier in this discussion, I wish to say that it had not been my intention to advert in any way to what has taken place in the Post Office, and I should have made no remark whatever if it had not been for the severe observations made as to the conduct of the Secretary to the Post Office, Mr. Blackwood, by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton).

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): In consequence of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General as to the postal arrangements with the Hebrides, may I understand him as inviting schemes from the locality interested? I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman that last year, in the month of July, advertisement was made for tenders to establish a steam postal service between Strome Ferry and the Island of Harris. Tenders were to be given in in August, and it was supposed that the whole matter had been arranged. Although I have not the letter from the Secretary for Scotland, I have seen it—that official wrote in November last that the steam service had been sanctioned, the only matter to be dealt with being some minor detail. The people of Harris are surprised to find now that the whole matter has fallen to the ground on the score of expense. I put a Question to the Postmaster General two months ago on the subject, and he stated, very much to my surprise, that he was not aware that any promise had been made. The people in the district have been very much put about by what has occurred, and the other day a meeting was held in Harris, attended by a large number of people, at which a resolution was passed showing the very great loss and inconvenience which had been sustained through the absence of proper postal communication. The resolution set forth that during the 10 days previous more than £1,000 had been lost to the herring fishing industry in consequence of the inability to communicate speedily with the mainland. This is a matter which requires very serious consideration, and I trust the Government will consider the state of the Hebrides altogether. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes some scheme to be suggested to him on the part of the people, they, I am sure, will be only too happy to communicate with him; but I must protest in the strongest manner against the way in which the people of Harris have been treated.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General's attention to the postal service in the South of Ireland. I think if the right hon. Gentleman paid attention to the point I mention it would be of great service to the people I represent in Cork. I refer to the mail train which goes out of Cork at six minutes past 10—the train I came by myself last night. There are numerous complaints made in the neighbourhood of Cork, notably from my own constituents, in regard to the time at which this train leaves the City, and there is a general concensus of opinion that it would conduce enormously to the advantage of the neighbourhood if it could be deferred, say for an hour or an hour and a half. The effect of the present arrangement for starting, as everybody who travels by the train knows, that if you are coming across to England you have to wait, generally, two hours and a half in Dublin. The mails are sorted in coming up in the train, and they have to cross the water. There will be no difficulty, seeing they are made up in the Cork train, to delay the train and send the letters across to Westland Row, immediately on the arrival of the train in Dublin. If the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to defer the departure of the mail train from Cork, he would be able to pay more attention to the reception of the various mails in the City of Cork, which is the centre of the South of Ireland. He would be enabled to gather the mails in there, and he would be able to pass them on with much greater celerity than at present. I know perfectly well that if the right hon. Gentleman looks into this question, and I am certain he will, for he is always distinguished by his courtesy in dealing with these matters, he will see that in the first place, practically speaking, people living in the City of Cork and in the whole of the South of Ireland are put to great inconvenience by the existing mail system, and in the next place he would see that it would greatly simplify matters by delaying the train as I suggest. Take the mail arriving from Skibbereen and Bantry, the mails which come into Cork from Skibbereen or Bantry, or from a longer distance, have to leave their starting place at an early hour, in consequence of the mail train leaving Cork at six minutes past 10. If the amount of time which is lost in Dublin were given to the mail train at Cork, this would give the branch trains a longer period, and would enable the mails to be made up later, and consequently to permit of the posting of letters at a later period. If the mail train at Cork were put back an hour, say until six minutes past 11, it would facilitate the answering of letters in almost every district, and would enable people to reply to letters which at present they are not able to answer. One other point I would like to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to, and that is in connection with the town of Macroom, which is situated in Mid Cork. It was only the day before yesterday that they were speaking to me about the way in which letters were taken at Macroom. There is a railway running from the City of Cork to Macroom, but the Government do not make use of it. [Cries of "Yes, yes!"] Well, if they do make use of it, it is only to a very small extent. The day mail arrives in Cork at six minutes past 12 and goes out by the Macroom train at 3 o'clock, which is a very small accommodation. What I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to is this point, that letters received by the people in Macroom, and all along that line, by the morning post, from this side of the water cannot be answered till the following day, whereas if the right hon. Gentleman would put back the departure of the train from Cork there would be much greater chance of letters being answered in Macroom at an earlier period; and this statement applies equally to Skibbereen and other places which are connected with Cork by Railway. If the right hon. Gentleman, instead of sending these mails by car, as has hitherto been the case, would dispatch them on the Macroom line, he would confer a great benefit on the people of the locality. I do not say there is very much business done there. That is not the case; but anyone who understands business matters—and I presume no one understands them better than the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General himself—will see that the proposal I make would give business men very great facilities, and would conduce very much to their interests and the development of the business in these remote districts. I would ask him to allow the mails to be sent into Cork from Macroom and these other places by train, and sent away from Cork later than at present. I had a few notes on this question; but I did not know that this estimate was to be taken this evening, and, therefore, I have not provided myself with them. I sincerely hope, however, the right hon. Gentleman will do me the courtesy to look into these matters, and, so far as he possibly can, deal a substantial benefit to all the commercial people dwelling in or about the City of Cork.

Dr. Tanner

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): Before the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) answers that question, I would like to ask him if any progress has been made in the establishment of money-order offices in two villages in Morayshire, about which I asked him a question a few days ago. I refer to the villages of Dallas and Archiestown. It may be a matter for the Treasury, and I would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) to inform the Committee what is the difficulty that does exist in having money-order offices established at these small villages. I am sure the Government must be aware of the importance of having savings banks established wherever there is a considerable population, and I wish to point out that in the Highlands villages and houses are scattered. They are practically at great distances from any bank, and the people complain of not being able to deposit their savings without going some eight or ten miles to the town of Aberlour, I think, where there is a single savings bank, or where there is a proper savings bank. I do not think it is right that that state of things should exist. I understood, from an interview that the Postmaster General was kind enough to give me some time ago, that the question was a financial one, and that some small sum had to be made up—or something of that kind. I do think, in a matter of such importance as this, it is not right on the part of the Government—it is false economy on the part of the Government—to impose on people who are not well off a tax that, though it might not be a large one in the opinion of the Committee, would still be one that would be felt by the people and should not be encouraged. What I want to suggest is that the Government should remove these little difficulties of raising £10 or £20, or giving written guarantees.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I must apologize for rising to trespass upon the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) again after he has been already once or twice upon his feet answering Questions. I was not able to arrive in the House until some time after this discussion commenced this evening, and therefore am obliged to trouble the right hon. Gentleman again. There are just one or two matters which have been entrusted to me to place before his notice, and I shall endeavour to discharge this trust as briefly as possible. In the first instance, however, I should like to advert for a moment to a matter which concerns my own constituency, and which, as I believe, has been as troublesome a question to successive Postmaster Generals as those matters relating to Strone Ferry and other parts of the islands of Scotland about which we have heard to-night—I allude to the stoppage of the calling of the mail from Penzance at the town of Camborne. I myself have had some correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General and with his Predecessors upon this subject, and others have done the like. Correspondence of this kind has taken place on this subject, but all our representations have been without effect so far. The urgent and repeated requests of the people of Camborne, and the thickly populated districts around that town, have failed to produce, by what I might call silent entreaty, the reform required, and I am, therefore, compelled reluctantly to bring the matter before this House in a more pointed form. The grievance is that when a few years ago some alterations were made for the purpose of facilitating and improving the postal service in the Western part of the County of Cornwall the mail train, which at that time stopped at Camborne, was taken off for stopping there, and has never since been allowed to stop there. There was no excuse whatever for the taking off the train for stopping at Camborne in the past, and still less excuse is there for the refusal to allow the train to stop there now since Camborne has become the head of a Parliamentary Division. Camborne is, I believe the most important town in the County of Cornwall; I might say without exception, but I will, if you like, grant the one exception of Truro. The population is an industrial one, and one of growing importance, and it is, as I have before pointed out to the Postmaster General, the most populated district throughout the whole of Cornwall. I am very well aware that the answer I shall receive from the right hon. Gentleman is likely to be similar to that which I have read from his Predecessors in Office—namely, that the question is one for the Directors of the Great Western Railway Company, and that it is not for the Postmaster General to interfere in it at all. But when we go to the Directors of the Great Western Railway Company, who are exceedingly Conservative, and a body particularly hard to move, they say that the question is one for the Postmaster General to deal with, and that they have no power and cannot interfere in the matter at all. Now, this may seem a very small matter to a great many people, but this position of affairs is very disagreeable to us who are interested in the town of Camborne, and to a great many others who reside in the district; and we are desirous that this sort of thing, of which we are the victims, should be put an end to. The problems which have been brought before the right hon. Gentleman and his Predecessors for solution are no doubt many and various; but, to my mind, there is no problem and no difficulty, so far as my inquiries, and so far as the information which I have been able to lay before the right hon. Gentleman goes, so easy of solution as this. There would be no difficulty in the world in adopting one or two solutions—either starting the mail train five minutes earlier at its starting point, or requiring the Great Western Railway Company to stop at Camborne, and to make up for the delay by increasing the speed of the mail train between Penzance and Camborne. Now, I believe there are occasions—and I ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman especially to this, if he is not already acquainted with these matters—on which the Directors of the Great Western Railway, to suit their own convenience, and for their own purposes purely, have stopped this mail train between Penzance and Camborne without causing any appreciable delay. Such stoppages are important matters when you have to deal with a mail train running upon a single line, as the Great Western Railway is in this district, and in a train which has to run 300 miles up to London. If it is possible for the Directors of the Great Western Railway to stop a mail train at stations which are not usually stopped at, at places of much less importance than Camborne, it would be perfectly possible, it seems to me, to stop at Camborne without interfering with the regular service of the train. Then there are other methods by which this difficulty might be got over. It really only requires a little determination, if the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me for saying so, on his part to get over this difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman is in the position of being able to require that a mail train of this kind shall stop at a particular station. Unfortunately at the time the contract was entered into, Camborne was struck out of the stopping places. I believe it was done, not through the fault of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General himself or his Predecessors, but through some local jealousy or something of that kind. That was before my time, however. I contend, that if it can be shown to be to the interests of a large portion of the population of the country, and if it can be shown to be not only in their interests to grant the facilities I ask for, but that they can be granted without interfering with the interests of any other portion of the population—I say that the least the right hon. Gentleman could do would be to grant this reform, which is not a revolutionary reform, but really in the nature of the restoration of a privilege or a right to the people of Camborne—a right which was unjustly taken away from them a few years ago. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take steps to restore this right. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I am very much averse to referring to these questions over and over again, but it is my duty to refer to them, and though I do not wish to put it before the right hon. Gentleman in the nature of a threat, I still must say, that until a satisfactory answer has been received from him, I shall have to bring this matter continually under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman and his Successors so long as I continue to enjoy the privilege of a seat in this House. Another matter which I wish very briefly to bring before the notice of the right hon. Gentleman is one with regard to which I should not have asked for any portion of the time of the Committee if it had not been for the fact that no one has alluded to the subject, and that it affects the interests of a very considerable class of deserving servants in the Post Office—I mean the question of the promotion of the second-class sorters. Now the facts with reference to the grievances of the second-class sorters which I am asked to place before the Committee are as follows. The second-class sorters have petitioned and memorialised successive Postmaster Generals from time to time for a redress of their grievances, but with no better success than I and my constituents who have petitioned them with regard to the stopping of the mail train at Camborne. These people complain that the majority of second-class sorters in the Metropolitan district entered the service with the advertised prospect of promotion to the position of sorters of the first class. When the second-class sorters were appointed by open competition there were posts as first-class sorters, but in the year 1874 the first-class appears to have been abolished, and when that abolition took place no equivalent for the loss of their opportunities for promotion was allowed to the second-class sorters. These men, therefore, have been deprived of the only channel of promotion that was open to them, that to which they were looking forward, and to which I may say they thought they had a sort of vested right according to the terms under which they entered into the public service. In other cases in the Civil Service when offices are abolished in this way, or when reconstruction of departments takes place, I have always noticed that those who have been deprived of any benefit to which they had a legitimate right to look forward to, have been put in the receipt of pensions. Now, I do not ask that these men, in whose interests I am addressing the Committee, and who are such a very important class of public servants, should have pensions given to them. I do not ask for anything of that kind; but I do think that as they have been deprived of the chance of promotion to which they had a right to look forward, they are entitled to some consideration. If it is impossible to restore the first class of sorters, as those persons ask should be done, at any rate, their position should be considered with a view of enabling them to look forward to some promotion of another kind, or some other advantage. The late Mr. Fawcett, when they represented their grievance to him, replied to them that he could not open up the question of first-class sorters at that time, which implied that the question was not altogether a closed one, and that he might refer to it at some future time. When the noble Lord the Member for East Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) was Postmaster General, he replied, to the petition of the second-class sorters, that the second-class overseers was substituted for the first-class sorters; and he also held out this prospect,—that if the first-class sorters were re-established it would lead to a reduction in the pay of the second-class sorters. That was not a very hopeful or satisfactory answer; but I think it is desirable to state that at the time this answer was received by the second-class sorters, let us say 10 years after the second-class overseers had been established in place of the first-class sorters, not one of the second-class sorters had been promoted to the second-class of overseers. Ever since then in the Metropolitan Office, or, at any rate, in the Western district, only one second-class sorter has obtained an appointment as second-class overseer, the other appointments being obtained by postmen. As to that I have no complaint to make—I have no complaint to make that postmen should be promoted, or that others should be promoted by legitimate means—but I do think that the second-class sorters have a right to complain when they not only find that this principal channel of promotion held out to them—namely, that of first class sorters—is done away with, but that they are practically excluded by another class in the service from obtaining that which was their only chance of promotion. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General whether he will consider the possibility or desirability of re-establishing the post of first-class sorters in the Metropolitan district, and whether it is not true that the majority of second-class sorters entered the Service with the advertised prospect of obtaining promotion to that first class; and, if that be so, whether he will, at any rate, so far as those who entered the Service before the abolition of first-class sorters are concerned, consider their position? I would urge upon him to see whether it would not be possible to make these people some restitution of that which has been taken away from them, or give them some equivalent. I believe I am correct in stating that there is a first class of sorters in the General Post Office, and that a considerable number of them are younger men in the Service than the members of the second class in the Metropolitan district, and yet I am informed that they all entered the Service with the same qualification. There is a broad distinction between them. With regard to this matter of sorters there is one point upon which I would wish to make a remark in passing. I should like to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a question affecting the sorters employed in the Registered Letter Department. A Question was put to the Government as to these sorters being allowed risk money; but I do not remember the exact terms of the answer received. I have been informed since, however, that the second class of sorters are employed, and that, the work involving risks, circumstances have occurred which have rendered the imposition of penalties necessary, and that these penalties have been inflicted without the sorters having received extra risk money. If that is so—and I am informed that it is the fact—I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General will look into the matter, and will see that those who are employed on this extra duty will be properly remunerated. This, however, is only by the way, and with reference to the risk money of the sorters. As to the general question of promotion, I would like to place before the right hon. Gentleman the complaint of another body of servants in the Post Office—namely, the porters, of whom I think there are about 300 in the General Post Office. I do not know whether a Memorial has been actually placed before the Royal Commission which has been sitting or not; but, at any rate, I have been asked to place the complaint of these people before the Committee in connection with this matter. What they ask is that the barrier at present existing between their class and other classes for promotion to the minor establishment may be removed, and that they may be made eligible for examination for admission into the department, especially in the position of second-class sorters. This question of the porters therefore hangs together with the question of the second-class sorters to which I have just called the right hon. Gentleman's attention. I am glad to be able to place the matter before the attention of the Committee, because it is quite clear that the efficiency of the service will be materially improved by giving reasonable facilities and opportunities of obtaining promotion to all the servants of the Post Office, from the lowest class up to the highest. If you can promote or give facilities for the promotion of porters to the position of second-class sorters and can give the second-class sorters what they justly ask for, you will get increased zeal on the part of those officials; you will get more work out of them and will have the work done much better. The porters on whose behalf I am now speaking make the remark that in asking that they should be permitted the chance of promotion, they do so with the full knowledge and belief that there are many amongst them who by education and ability are capable of attaining to higher posts in the Post Office; but are deprived of the possibility through no fault of their own. They say that there are several duties connected with their division such as loading and unloading mails which could be efficiently discharged by foremen and their class as they are discharged at present by second-class sorters. I think that it is a very reasonable representation to make. It appears that there are at the present moment second-class sorters engaged in performing the work of porters. I think my appeal for opportunities for promotion for these two classes of servants altogether is a most reasonable appeal. The class of public servants for whom I plead as I have already pointed out is a most deserving class, and one whose interests the right hon. Gentleman will not be wise in the interests of the Public Service to overlook. Another point the porters desire to have stress laid upon is that their wages instead of rising 1s. per annum, should increase at the rate of 1s. 6d. per annum up to 30s. per week. They have a grievance in this respect which they desire to have removed. They entered the service as adults having passed examinations, and having undergone a severe scrutiny as to their character and the previous services they might have been engaged in, and yet they have to wait no less than 12 years, according to the present arrangement, before they reach the maximum of their wages, and obtain the salary that the Nation considers sufficient for competent porters. These men also ask that their period of attendance should be eight hours for day duty and seven hours for night duty, thus making the hours of attendance uniform through all the grades of the minor establishment. These are matters which are not immediately connected to the question of promotion that I have ventured to place before the Committee, but I think they are questions which affect the efficiency of the Public Service generally, that efficiency depending in a large measure on the zeal with which the different services perform their duties. From this point of view, it is very desirable that all questions of grievances which are brought before the Postmaster General in this Committee for the reason that there are no other channels through which these subjects can be brought substantially before the right hon. Gentleman should receive adequate consideration. A considerable part of the grievance of the porters is with regard to this question of hours. Their hours of attendance are now from 4 o'clock in the morning until 9, and from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until 8 in the evening, and during the whole of this time they are employed without the slightest interval for refreshment. The porters ask that their hours should be made similar to the hours of attendance of first and second class sorters, which are in the day from 4 o'clock in the morning until half-past 7, and from a quarter-past 4 in the afternoon until 8 o'clock in the evening. If they are employed after half-past 7 they receive 6d. an hour extra. The hours of attendance for porters in the newspaper branch are the same; but if these men have to stay beyond half-past 7 o'clock they do so without extra pay, so that they have longer hours of attendance and receive smaller pay than any other class. There is no distinction, as I am informed, existing between the sorter and the porter class, either in day or night duty, therefore, I think one may fairly say that the claim of the porter class to be taken into consideration may be fairly taken into account. These, Sir, are one or two matters connected with the working of the Post Office Department, and relating to the servants who are of an humbler position than many others whose grievances are more constantly brought before the public notice, to which I desire to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. The matters I have dealt with may seem trivial to the Members of this House; but I am quite sure that if a good case can be made out—as I think I have made out a good case in connection with these servants to whom I have referred—I think if the Government can give these people greater hopes of increased reward for greater zeal and energy, and if the attention of the Government is devoted to this case, the time I have taken in placing these grievances before the Committee will not have been lost. I can only say that, so far as I am concerned, I have taken these matters up and placed them before the Committee simply because I have been appealed to by the servants of the Post Office, and because I had ascertained before rising that no one else had said a word in their favour. I will here leave the matter, only asking that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, in respect of these grievances—these substantial grievances, as I think them—of second-class sorters, and of Post Office porters, who are all most deserving public servants, and also as to the stopping of the up-mail at Camborne, will be so kind as to give the points I have placed before him some attention and consideration.

Mr. Conynbare

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I desire to call attention to a matter in connection with the administration of the Post Office; and also to allude to a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in reference to an attack made by me on the permanent head of the Post Office. I maintain that there were very good grounds for that attack—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I was saying, when interrupted by the counting of the Committee, that I desired to draw attention to a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford, who concluded his speech by saying that a statement I had made with regard to the action of the permanent head of the Post Office was not to be relied on.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I merely wish to say that I contravened the charge made by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) against Mr. Blackwood, the Secretary to the Post Office, of general obstruction in the business of that Department.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: The charge I made against Mr. Blackwood was this—that, knowing the Postmaster General was taking a course which was strongly opposed to the views of the autocrat of the Post Office, Mr. Blackwood, acting upon an unexplained grievance, took a course which led the officials connected with him to present him with an address of sympathy; that he had that address in his possession for some time, and made it known to the Press. I say that such conduct ought not to be tolerated, in face of the fact that Mr. Blackwood appealed to a large number of Members of this House against the Postmaster General. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford is not justified in saying that my statement is not to be relied on; and if the Postmaster General will consent to an inquiry being held into the matter I shall be prepared to prove all that I have stated.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): There is one matter to which I should like, very briefly, to draw the attention of the Postmaster General; and my reason for introducing the subject now is that I find that the only way of getting these details attended to is by bringing them forward when the House is in Committee; but, although a good many Postmasters General have expressed a certain amount of sympathy with me, I have not hitherto derived much advantage from my action. On page 91 of the Estimate it will be seen that the very first of the railways mentioned in Ireland is that from Athenry to Tuam. What I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General is that the Department over which he presides is spending a considerable sum of money—something like £182 a day—for the day and night service, the day service being performed by rail and the night service by car. If the Postmaster General could only infuse into the Irish Post Office officials a little of the energy with which he is endowed they would be able to get the Railway Company to run a train at night, and at a very little increase on the present cost of running the mail cars; and it would be a matter of great and important advantage to the district to secure this change. If the right hon. Gentleman would only transfer the subsidy from the cars to the trains, we should then have Galway in regular mail communication with London through Athenry and Tuam, because a very large portion of the traffic goes to Dublin, and, consequently, to England. I would suggest that this matter is worthy of consideration on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, who, if he will look into it, will find that to make the alteration I propose would entail only a very slight increase in the present cost. Of course, to do this would be a convenience to passengers. I cannot for a moment deny that such would be the result, and I know that the Postmaster General is not desirous of subsidizing passenger trains; but in many parts of Ireland it is absolutely necessary that these things must go together. I would also suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should establish a cross-country post between North Galway and South Galway. It would not be a very difficult thing to do this. There are a very large number of letters that have at present to go round by Athlone, which is a very long distance—over 100 miles—and they might with great advantage be sent across country, some 10 or 12 miles only, instead of having to make so wide a detour. The expense of running a car to make the cross country communication would be very trifling, and the advantage to the whole district would be very considerable.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I desire, very briefly, to call the attention of the Committee to a matter in connection with the cost of the medical department of the Post Office. That is a very expensive department, and the items in connection with it will be found on page 64 of the Estimates. There are the chief medical officer, with a maximum salary of £1,000; a second medical officer, with a maximum of £600; another with a maximum of £300, and also a female medical officer with a maximum of £450, an assistant to the medical officer with £100, and a dispensing assistant with £180. There are other items which bring up the total cost of this Department to the very large sum of £2,878. The Committee ought to bear in mind that this is not the total cost of the medical supervision at the whole of the Metropolitan post offices, but merely the cost of the staff employed at the General Post Office, together with the Central Telegraph Office. My main object in bringing this matter forward is to draw attention to one item of the cost of the Department—namely, that which comes under the head of "Substitutes," and is stated at £100. I called attention to this point last year, but at that time I was precluded from moving the reduction of the Vote, as I intend to do on the present occasion. I would ask the Committee to consider for what purpose this item is created. An explanation of it was furnished by the Postmaster General when the matter was referred to last year. He stated that the object of this item of £100 is the payment of substitutes for the medical officers while they are away on their annual leave. But the privilege of an annual holiday is not confined to the medical department of the Post Office, and in all such cases the established practice of the Service is well known. When an officer is away on his annual leave it is not usual to bring in a stranger to perform his duties; the custom is that they should be discharged by his colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman, in meeting an objection to the Vote, stated that the shortness of the medical staff did not prevent the employés falling ill; but a reply of that kind would equally apply to the other departments in which the work does not stand still, simply because some of the officers happen to be away on their annual leave. I believe the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General also stated that there was an exceptional amount of illness during the spring and summer of the year referred to in the debate I speak of, during which it may be presumed those gentlemen would take their vacation. I do not think there is very much in that point. Every season of the year brings its peculiar ailments; and even supposing there was an exceptional amount of illness among those employed at the Post Office that, I think, is far more than counterbalanced by the fact that during the spring and summer months a large number of the officers are away on their annual leave, and are, consequently, removed from the Post Office medical supervision. I object to this item, in the first place, because it seems to me to be as unnecessary, as it certainly is an anomalous item; and I object to it, in the second place, because it is the means of introducing into the Public Service strangers who are to be casually employed, and over whom the Department cannot possibly have any kind of effective control, and invests those strangers with very large powers involving not only the comfort and the health of the established servants of the Crown, but, as I have shown on a previous occasion, the very lives of those individuals. I do not at the present moment wish to do more than refer in passing to a death under very painful circumstances, to which I drew particular attention last year. I have also shown that one of these strangers, as I call them, who are thus casually employed, was last year guilty of what I think the House agreed with me was an act of oppression towards an established servant of the Crown, of long standing and high character, by compelling him to resume his duty in spite of his strenuous protest that he was unfit to do so. There is also another aspect of this question. I think we may regard it from a financial point of view. I elicited from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General last year that when the medical officer was away for five weeks the gentleman who performed his functions was paid at the rate of £3 3s. a-week, so that we have this anomalous state of things—that we are paying a salary of £3 3s. a-week only for the discharge of duties which are ordinarily paid for at the rate of something like £1,000 per annum. I can hardly see how the Postmaster General can avoid being impaled on one or other of the horns of this dilemma. Either the Medical Superintendent of the Post Office is extravagantly overpaid, or the casual professional gentleman who is called in to supply his place is very much underpaid. I had hoped that this item might have disappeared from the Estimates of the present year; but I was too sanguine, for I find it re-appears. I will, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100 on the grounds I have stated to the Committee—namely, that it is an unnecessary and anomalous expenditure; that it introduces into the service of the Department strangers over whom there cannot be the same effective control which is exercised in the case of the established officers, and invests those strangers with powers which may be used for the oppression of valued servants of the Crown.

Colonel Nolan

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £4,820,670, be granted for the said Services.”—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

MR. RAIKES: I hope the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), who has proposed this Amendment, will not put the Committee to the trouble of taking a Division upon it. The matter to which he refers was brought before the House last year, and I have nothing to add to what I then stated. I believe the House was then satisfied that the provision referred to had been found to be adequate for the duties of the medical officer in the absence of that functionary; and although the sum set down for the purpose seems very small—as to which matter I am quite in agreement with the hon. Gentleman—I would point out that the principal medical officer of the Post Office is an old public servant, who, no doubt, could have secured outside the Department an income larger than his official salary. The hon. Gentleman does not question the amount of the salary paid to the medical officers, and he can hardly quarrel with the sum paid to the substitute for being too small. He will remember that last year I answered his statement with regard to the death to which he has referred, and I am sorry that that unfortunate occurrence has been remembered and brought up again. I can only say that I cannot see any reason for departing from the practice which has been pursued hitherto, and I trust the hon. Gentleman will see the propriety of not persisting in his Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN: I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General will favour me with a reply to my question with regard to the establishment of a night mail train to Athenry and a cross-country service between North and South Galway.

MR. RAIKES: I will answer the hon. and gallant Gentleman after we have dealt with the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 111 : Majority 80.—(Div. List, No. 185.) [9.55 P.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. RAIKES: I only wish to say one word before the Question is put. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) I will say I am conversant with the fact he has stated, and I shall be very glad to consider what he has said. At the same time, it must not be assumed that I make any promise to take any particular action. With regard to what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) has said, I should be very glad if he will furnish me with some representation from the locality dealing with the matters he alluded to. The hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) has raised a question which has been already carefully considered by the Post Office, and I will undertake to do my best to meet his views. As to the point raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North-West Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare), I must say that I shall be extremely glad to co-operate with the Great Western Railway Company, if it is possible to devise a method of increasing the convenience of the people of Camborne without delaying the trains. But the hon. Gentleman is aware that the interests of the people of Camborne are somewhat antagonistic to the interests of the people of Penzance. It is impossible to suit the people of Camborne without injuring the people of Penzance, unless the Great Western Railway Company will accelerate the trains. If they are prepared to do that the matter can be easily dealt with. With regard to the second-class porters and sorters, I may say that the matter has already been considered; but I will look into it again. As to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan), I will confer with my advisers and see what can be done. I think these remarks cover all the observations which have been made, and I trust the Committee will now be able to give us the Vote.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a Memorial which has been for some considerable time under the consideration of his Department. It was presented by the London officials, who desire to be placed on the same condition with regard to holidays as the officials holding similar rank in the large Provincial towns. The officials of a given rank in Dublin, Edinburgh, and in all the large Provincial towns have three weeks' instead of a fortnight's holiday which the London officials have. The employés in the London Department have memorialized the right hon. Gentleman that they may be placed under the same conditions as the officials in the places I have named. So far, the memorialists have not received any answer to their Memorial. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that I have on more than one occasion asked questions of the right hon. Gentleman, in the hope that an answer might be made to the Memorial. I trust sincerely that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to promise us this evening that these Government servants shall be placed in the same position as their Provincial brethren. It is admitted on all hands that they have quite as great and important duties to perform; and, therefore, it is hard that they should only receive a fortnight's holiday, while others in the like position receive three weeks' holiday.

MR. RAIKES: The matter is under consideration, and I will undertake that an answer shall be sent to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Will the right hon. Gentleman promise to answer early? It is important that he should do so, because the holidays are now taking place.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I can only say, with reference to the subject I brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, that I tried to put the matter I raised as fairly as I could. There are a great many people in the South of Ireland who get a letter, say, in the afternoon, and cannot answer it for a couple of days. The right hon. Gentleman, by casting his eye over page 57, will see that in Ireland there are two methods of conveying mails—one is by rail, and the other by road. Surely, when you have got the option of choosing between these methods, the right hon. Gentleman is called upon to choose that which contributes most to the public convenience. I think I put it clearly that in the Mac-room district there is a railway, but that the Post Office persist in carrying mails by an ordinary car, across the mountains, into Cork. The Railway Company is perfectly willing to transmit the mails; and, therefore, I cannot possibly understand why the Government persist in continuing the present system. Then, again, I tried as well as I could, in my humble way, to put before the right hon. Gentleman another substantial; grievance, and that is that the people in Cork and the South of Ireland who travel by the night mail train are really required to waste three hours in Dublin. Why not, at any rate, confer a boon upon the inhabitants of the South of Ireland by postponing the departure of the mail for one hour at least? I ask that something shall be done in this matter in the name of common sense, and in the name of right. I hope, before we pass this Vote, the right hon. Gentleman will give me some solid assurances that the subject of the conveyance of mails by road from Macroom will be seen into, otherwise it will be my painful duty to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £300, which is set down for the conveyance of mails from Macroom.

MR. RAIKES: I think the hon. Gentleman cannot have been in the House when I made my reply. [Dr. TANNER: Yes; I was.] Then he could not have understood what I said. I asked that he would furnish me with some memorandum upon the subject. It is impossible to make an inquiry into a matter of this sort unless I have some written statement. If the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to furnish me with such a statement, I shall be most happy to make all inquiry.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £509,311, to complete the sum for the Post Office Packet Service.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I cannot allow this Vote to pass without some explanation from the Postmaster General. As a preliminary inquiry, I should like to know whether it is proposed to reduce the rates of the postage to India, and also to China?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The Vote for the Packet Service is, no doubt, one of very great importance, and of great public interest; but it so happens this year that the great majority of the questions raised by it will be more conveniently discussed upon the new contracts which have been negotiated by the Government for the conveyance of particular mails. All these contracts are, or will soon be, on the Table of the House; and I presume that the more convenient course for the House will be to discuss each of these questions separately on its own merits, when the occasion arises. The question of the India and China Mails, to which the hon. Member has just referred, stands on the Paper for to-night; and it will be taken to-night, if reached at a convenient hour, and if not to-night, at all events on an early day. As to the American Contract, I believe my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) has given Notice that the discussion shall be taken on an early day. The Australian Mail Contract is not yet concluded; therefore it would be extremely undesirable if the negotiations now proceeding between the Government and the Companies were to be jeopardized by a premature discussion. It would be difficult for me to enter into the merits of the question at this time. As the hon. Gentleman takes great interest in the question, and as the Committee will be glad to have a general view of the matter, I may, perhaps, just say this much—that I hope and believe that the reduction in the cost of the Mail Service of this country to distant places, which is shown in the Estimates of this House, will be a very much larger reduction in the Estimates of years to come. The reduction which we hope to secure by the India and China Contract amounts altogether to no less than £107,000 a-year. The reduction which we hope to secure by the American Mail Contract amounts to no less than £20,000 a-year; and I am inclined to believe that a similar reduction may be effected by the Australian Mail Contract; but as to that I am not in a position at this moment to give a definite opinion. I think the Committee may naturally wish to express its opinion upon the policy of these contracts; but I hardly think that this evening any good purpose can be served by a desultory debate, as a sort of preliminary canter before the question comes on to be seriously discussed. When we come to discuss these matters, I trust I shall be able to show that a very great and permanent saving has been made in this great branch of expenditure; and I trust that, instead of there being any sacrifice of efficiency, the Service will be more efficient in the future.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,500,248, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, for the Salaries and Working Expenses of the Post Office Telegraph Service."

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): Reference was made earlier in the evening to the unremunerative nature of the Postal Telegraph Service. Well, as I said, I do not imagine the Telegraph Service is so unremunerative as is generally believed. In the first place, there are large sums charged against revenue which should be properly placed against capital. In former days, when a commercial balance sheet was issued by the Post Office Authorities, there was a considerable surplus shown. Upon the introduction of the 6d. telegram it was contemplated that the diminution in the price would cause a falling-off of revenue; but I am extremely glad to learn, by the statement made at an earlier portion of the Session by the Postmaster General, that the anticipations of the Postal Authorities with regard to the falling off have proved to be exaggerated, and that the result of the last year exceeded the Estimate by no less than £100,000, and that notwithstanding the fact that the messages were shorter than it was estimated they would be. But I think it is of very little use to indulge in pessimistic cavilling about account keeping. It is impossible to tell the exact cost of the Telegraphic Service, because the percentage of postal expenses placed against that Service is, and must be, a purely arbitrary one. I rose particularly to point out an item in which a practical economy to a considerable amount may be effected. This Vote contains, under the Sub-head C, an item of £68,300 for the maintenance of telegraph wires by Railway Companies, an item of £8,700 for works carried out by Railway Companies and others, chargeable to maintenance, &c., and an item of £29,900 for compensation to Railway Companies for surrender of their rever-sionary interest in telegraph business, including way-leaves, pole rents, &c. Now, Sir, reference was made earlier this evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) to the extravagant nature of the bargain made when the telegraphs were taken over by the State. That extravagance extended to the bargain made with the Railway Companies. The Railway Companies were given, by way of a solatium, a heavy price for way-leave. It figures here as £29,000. I believe they are paid way-leave at the rate of something like £1 per mile. They are entrusted with the duty of maintaining the wires; but the telegraph officials state that the payment to the Railway Companies is largely in excess of the rate at which they are able to maintain the telegraph wires that are entrusted to them for maintenance. Now, of course, a bargain is a bargain, and I do not propose we should confiscate the bargain entered into with the Railway Companies; but I think that when a Railway Company comes to this House, demanding further concessions and fresh monopolies, demanding the right to extend its line and so forth, we might fairly say as a condition of granting it a new monopoly—"We insist upon you revising your bargain with the country with regard to the way-leaves for telegraph wires, and with regard to the maintenance of these wires." I have risen for the purpose of suggesting to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General whether it would not be worth his while, at a time when he is contemplating economies, to inquire into the amount of waste incurred through these extravagant arrangements with the Railway Companies; whether it would not be worth his while to look minutely into the cost of maintaining telegraph wires through the agency of the Railway Companies, as contrasted with the cost of maintaining them through the agency of the officials of his own Department; whether it would not be well for him to consider the advisability of getting some clause drawn up to be inserted in the Bills of every Railway Company which comes to this House for increased facilities, revising a bargain made with respect to telegraphs many years ago? I think that would violate no principle of equity. The bargain was made when the Railway Companies held the key to the position, and it may be altered when this House holds the key to the Companies. I should be sorry to repudiate any bargain made; but I think we may fairly say, when these Companies are seeking further monopolies, that they ought, as a condition of our giving them facilities and monopolies, to revise their agreement in the matter of these Public Services.

Mr. Raikes

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The very items my hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) has just called attention to are items I intended to bring to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, but for quite another purpose. For years past the question of underground wires has been discussed on the Estimates. We were told that great progress is being made; but it seems that if great progress is being made in the carrying of wires underground the actual number of over-head wires is increasing. If a calculation were made as to the maintenance of over-head wires, and of the repairs necessary owing to their destruction by storms, and so forth, it would be found that a large economy would be effected if the wires had been carried underground. I wish to know if it is the intention of the Department to put all telegraph wires underground?

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I do not desire to enter into the question of the telegraph system of this country, but to say a word or two with regard to the Submarine Cable Service. The Committee is aware that next year the 20 years' monopoly enjoyed by the Submarine Cable Companies for messages to the Continent will expire, and I think hon. Members will agree with me that we ought to put an end to these monopolies, and that we ought to receive an undertaking from the Postmaster General that the cables to the Continent should be worked by the Post Office. I think it is quite possible that, worked by the Post Office, it would be possible to send telegrams to Paris and Germany for 1*d.* a word. Foreign Governments are most anxious that this should be carried out, and I trust we shall receive an assurance from the Postmaster General that he will not renew the contract that is about to expire to the Submarine Cable Companies. There is one other point I wish to refer to—namely, the extraordinary debt on the telegraph lines in this country. We paid an enormous sum for the telegraphs, and now we are saddled with between £300,000 and £400,000 a-year as interest upon the purchase. I maintain that the debt ought to be transferred to the National Debt. If that were done, we should be in a position to go on steadily in respect to the Telegraph Service. At present these are the only matters I desire to call attention to. I trust hon. Gentlemen will support me in asking the Postmaster General for an undertaking that he will not renew the contract with the Submarine Cable Companies.

MR. RAIKES: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) has referred to the relations existing between the Railway Companies and the Government in regard to the telegraphs. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is perfectly sincere when he said that a bargain should be a bargain, and that, therefore, it is practically not within the bounds of equity for the House of Commons to seek to review arrangements which have been legally made and entered into with the Railway Companies. We may regard the arrangements as not being as advantageous to the State as we could wish, and we may think that there was in making them something of the same lavishness which characterized the purchase of the telegraphs themselves. The Government could not, without a breach of equity, attempt to interfere with the arrangements existing between them and the Railway Companies in regard to the maintenance and support of the telegraph wires. If it were open to the Post Office at this moment to arrange the matter de novo, I should hope to make a much better bargain; but, as the matter stands, there is little use in indulging in vain regrets. The hon. Gentleman who spoke from below the Gangway (Mr. Molloy) went on to refer to underground wires. I ought to have prepared myself with the actual figures and details as to the present state of our underground telegraph communication. I have not done so, however; but at a future day I shall be glad to arm myself with all necessary information; and when opportunity arises I shall be glad to give it to the hon. Member. We are materially developing the underground system; and I would take this opportunity of correcting a popular misapprehension as to the overhead telegraph wires. There is a general impression amongst the public that the wires which are seen overhead in London belong to the Post Office, and are under Government control. That, however, is not the case. The numerous wires which are seen overhead in the Metropolis are mostly the property of the Telephone Companies, and do not belong to the Government, and are not under the control of the Postmaster General. As to the development of the underground system throughout the country, I am afraid this House would not be prepared to sanction the expenditure which would be necessary to take all the wires underground. An outlay of about £1,500,000 would be necessary for establishing the system throughout the country, and considering the difficulties we should have to encounter not only in the House of Commons, but from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I should hardly like to present so large an Estimate for the general substitution of the underground for the overhead system. The Committee must not lose sight of the fact that the overhead system, after all, possesses some advantages. Overhead wires are much more easily repaired, and you must always bear in mind that it is possible, if you have an underground system, that the ground under which the lines run may become built upon, and that you may experience a difficulty in getting at the wires when you want to. You never can exclude the possibility of requiring to carry on the repairs on an extensive scale. However, the whole matter is being carefully looked into, and I may at once inform the Committee that the Department are certainly of opinion that, as regards the Metropolis and the larger towns, it is most desirable to substitute the underground for the overhead system. I think hon. Members and the public generally will have noticed the wonderful celerity with which, in the unexampled severe weather we had last winter, the overhead telegraph wires which were broken down were repaired by the Telegraph Department; and I cannot refer to this matter without referring in the highest terms to the assistance received from the Royal Engineers, who so ably seconded the efforts of the Department in restoring order out of the chaos which occurred on that occasion. In regard to submarine cables, the subject has been spoken of as if there was a concession by the British Government to the Submarine Companies. There is, however, no such concession. The only concession which the Companies have is from the French Government. There will be negotiations between the two Governments—in fact, negotiations have already begun as to the policy which should be adopted when the concession from the French Government comes to a natural end; but I trust the Committee will not press for any more positive statement as to what the policy of Her Majesty's Government will be. It will be evident to the Committee that in dealings of this kind with the French Government Her Majesty's Advisers should have a free hand, and that we should not be hampered by declarations made here which would be laid hold of out-of-doors. The country, I think, fully recognizes the paramount importance of the Government retaining control and command over the telegraphic means of communication between this country and the Continent, and I think the Committee will remain satisfied that nothing will be wanting on the part of Her Majesty's Government in their negotiations with the French Government to give effect to that which we believe to be the feelings of the public.

DR. CAMERON: I feel somewhat disappointed at the reply of the right hon. Gentleman to the remarks which fell from me. He said it is no use crying over spilt milk, and I quite agree with that. He says it is not proposed to extract from the old Telegraph Companies any portion of the extravagant sum that was paid for plant. I did not suggest anything of the kind. I say that when a Railway Company comes to us and asks for fresh advantages, for leave to extend its lines, that we have a fair right to say—"You must, as a preliminary to our agreeing to consider the possibility of granting you any fresh monopoly, reconsider the terms of your bargain with us." It is a monstrous thing that we should consider ourselves compelled to pay upwards of £100,000 a-year for way-leaves and services that belong to the nation as a matter of right, and which we should be justified in enforcing as a condition of granting new privileges. When the minimum charge for a telegram was 1s., of every 1s. handed in to the Railway Telegraph Offices 3d. went to the Railway Company and only 9d. to the Government. The object with which the railway telegraph lines were left to the Railway Companies was to enable them to regulate their traffic, and so long as those private telegrams were confined to the regulation of the traffic no one could object to that arrangement; but that privilege has been taken advantage of for all kinds of absurd purposes. For instance, an official witness told the Postal Telegraph Committee of a certain Railway Director who wished to obtain a box of pills from London, and who availed himself of his privilege to use the telegraph, free of charge, in order to effect his desire. In this way the railway privilege is made use of, not for the purpose of facilitating traffic, but to a large extent for the purpose of ordering luncheons and ordering beds at railway hotels, and so forth. And this right on the part of Railway Companies of franking telegrams is not confined to the telegraphic system along the railways, but extends all over the telegraph system. I think the present arrangement might be revised without injustice; and I think it would be very important that it should be revised—seeing that a saving of many thousands per annum might be effected when the railways come to ask for fresh privileges. All I ask the right hon. Gentleman to do is to inquire into and investigate the relative cost of the Services, with the view of doing away with those privileges enjoyed by the Railway Companies when they come here to ask for fresh monopolies as the price of granting them these fresh monopolies. [Mr. RAIKES dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General does not seem to care about this idea; but I assure him it is one of the most practical pieces of economy that could be effected in connection with our telegraphic communication. An obvious economy might be brought about which would result in considerable saving. As the right hon. Gentleman does not appear to appreciate the suggestion, in order to call his attention to the point more closely I will move the reduction of the Vote by £25,000.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,475,248, be granted for the said Service."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. MOLLOY: Must we wait, Sir, for this Division before going on with the general discussion?

THE CHAIRMAN: The more convenient course, no doubt, would be to take this Division before proceeding with the general discussion.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 132: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 186.) [10.45. P.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Before this Vote is taken, I should like to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the results of the adoption of the 6d. telegram. I understand the right hon. Gentleman a short time ago stated that the result of the account of last year was that there was a deficit of £500,000. I presume that is based upon the estimate of £350,000 interest on the capital expended in the purchase of the telegraphs from the Telegraph Companies—on the £11,000,000 or £12,000,000 that was given for telegraphs. I think it includes also the £100,000 or £150,000 for new plant purchased within the year, and for new sites, &c. and a large new expenditure for new post offices and telegraph offices in the City. I should like to hear what the right hon. Gentleman has to say about this. Then I should like to know if the income derived from telegrams since the introduction of the 6d. telegram has not been in excess of what it was anticipated it would be; and whether there has not been a greater increase in the net receipts owing to the adoption of the 6d. telegram than would otherwise have been the case? If I am rightly informed, there was last year an increased receipt from the Telegraph Service owing to the 6d. telegram of no less than £100,000. I wish to know whether that is the fact, and also whether a similar increase is not expected for the current year? So far as I am able to judge, from figures before the House, the finance of the 6d. telegram has turned out much better than was expected; and though it may be a long time before the Telegraph Service pays profit, or pays the interest on the capital funds, yet the account is much better than we had reason to expect, and paves the way for hopefulness for the future. There is reason to believe that before long we may see such an increase and profit as will enable a small amount to be set aside in the shape of interest on capital. The Telegraph Service, some three or four years before the introduction of the 6d. telegram, showed a very bad state of account. The receipts were almost stationary, and the expenses were increasing year by year, owing mainly to the large increase in salaries which took place in the Service four or five years ago. In fact, long before the introduction of the 6d. telegram the account was becoming a very bad one, and I think that the change from the old system to the new has given a spring to the telegraphic receipts which is very promising. The receipts are so largely increasing that there is reason to hope that they will soon show a net profit.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): There is a question I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, which I think is very pertinent to the points in discussion, and which is within his province to consider. I would recommend for his consideration the desirability of adopting the American system of night telegraphic messages. Under this system telegrams could be sent at 12 o'clock at night or 2 o'clock in the morning, and if the sender does not wish the persons to whom the telegrams are sent to be disturbed at that hour the messages can be held over until the morning. In the United States they charge less for these night messages than for the day messages. You can go into the telegraph office at 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and call for a printed form, which is printed in a different coloured ink—it is just the same as the form for day messages, only it is printed in red ink—and you say you want to send a night message. Perhaps it is too late to send to the town you want to send to, but you can send your message, no matter what hour, at a less figure than the price of an ordinary day telegram, and that is a matter of great convenience to a number of people who miss the post, for example, but who want their communications to get to the person addressed the very first thing on the next morning.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

When I was in Dublin I wanted to send a telegram here at night, to be delivered very early in the morning, but certainly not at that time of night. But they would not take that message at Dublin unless it was to be delivered right away. So I had to arrange for a servant to be up very early in the morning—to be up before I was up myself—and that was very inconvenient. The clerks of the Department in America keep these night messages until night, and they send them off when the line is clear, and then they are delivered at the house they are addressed to first thing next morning. That is a very great convenience to many gentlemen, a great many of whom would not otherwise use the telegraph at all, but they do use it in this way, and I believe from what I have heard that this system has the effect of increasing the profits of the Department, and is very useful indeed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Mr. Courtney, I want to ask the Postmaster General one question with reference to the remarks of my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who took, I think, a very rosy coloured view of the Post Office Telegraph Revenue, which I should be very glad to hear justified by the Postmaster General. About a week or two ago I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for some figures, which, when supplied, certainly did not altogether bear out that view. I have for some time looked with considerable alarm at the loss to the Revenue in recent years from the Postal and Telegraph Services. If you look at The Statistical Abstract, you will see that the net profits of these two Departments have year by year been growing less and less, both upon the Postal Service and upon the Telegraph Service. In the year 1880-1 the Telegraph Service as near as possible paid the interest on the money that had been expended in its purchase within about £1,000, so that in that year the Telegraph Department may be said to have just paid its way—the interest on the purchase money and the working expenses. But for several years it has not paid its working expenses, and has paid no interest whatever on the £10,000,000 or £11,000,000 expended in the purchase originally. That, no doubt, is a very disastrous business concern, that you should lose altogether the £10,000,000 that you paid, and, after that, that you should find it does not pay its working expenses. I think, if I remember rightly, for I have not got the figures here, that the loss upon the Telegraph Service is something between £100,000 and £200,000 a-year upon the actual working expenses. Now, in the year 1881 the receipts of the Telegraph Service were £1,600,000, and in the year 1886 they were £1,740,000, showing an increase in the receipts of £140,000. But if you come to look at the expenditure, you will find that the increase of expenditure was from £1,226,000 in 1881 to £1,741,000 in the year 1886—that is to say, you had added more than £500,000 a-year to your annual expenditure, and had increased your receipts only £140,000. Now, the real fact is, according to the figures which were given to me by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that we are losing £500,000 a-year by the telegraph business. I do not deny for a moment that large additional accommodation is given to the public; but we should perfectly understand what is the cost at which it has been given. We should keep that well in our view. It is all very well to say that the Post Office and Telegraph Department ought not to make any profit at all; but you cannot have your cake and eat your cake. If you choose to give up that profit you must find a sum which was £3,230,000 in 1881—amounting to 1½d. upon the Income Tax—and which has been steadily growing every year since—you must make up that deficiency out of other taxation. Well, now, one reason that has been given is true no doubt. The Telegraph Service and the Post Office Service differ from ordinary businesses in the fact that they have no working capital. They have to find whatever is wanted for extra service out of the Revenue of the year. Then, we are told that this money has gone in additional plant. I can understand that for a year or two; but I want to know from the Postmaster General when we shall get to the end of this story of additional plant? I know that in—I forget what year, but I think it was 1883—the operations were begun for the 6d. Telegraph Service, and then we were told that they caused an additional expenditure; but I did hope and believe that it would come to an end—that the plant would be made perfect, and that we should then have an account to the good instead of to the bad, as we have now in the Telegraph Service, and that that Service would at last pay its way. I should be glad to have some information upon this point. I should like to know what is the prospect of the Telegraph Service paying its way, and what hope there is of our returning to the condition in which we were six years ago, when it not only paid its way in the matter of working expenses, but paid the interest on capital as well. The same thing, though not to the same extent, is true of the Post Office. I think the—

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I rise to Order, Sir. We have already discussed the Post Office Vote, and I was ruled out of Order for referring to a matter already settled. I put it to you, Mr. Courtney, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in dealing with the Post Office on this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question of the Post Office has certainly been settled on the Post Office Vote.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was out of Order, no doubt, in referring to the Post Office. But I will only say that it is very desirable that we should keep our eyes open to this matter, because it is of great importance that we should not part with any legitimate source of revenue that can be brought into the Service. I only make these remarks in defence of the Treasury. I think it is of great importance to defend them from the assaults to which they are exposed from all sides in this House, especially by the hon. Member (Mr. Henniker Heaton) who has just had me called to Order. He is a formidable danger to the public Revenue; but I can assure the occupants of the Treasury Bench that they will always find me ready to support them in resisting the demands which the hon. Gentleman is in the habit of making upon them. There is nothing easier than to part with revenue on any occasion; it is always very popular. You were told in the case of the telegraphs, I remember, that the 6d. telegrams would pay. Well, they do not pay. If people would say—"We know the particular thing we ask for will not pay; but we ask you to embark on it, knowing that it will be a losing concern," then it would be put on its true footing. These demands are always being made, and I do hope the House of Commons will not press them, and so throw away more of the Post Office and Telegraph Revenue, but will endeavour to protect the Treasury against these assaults which are so constantly made upon them.

MR. RAIKES: I am sure, Mr. Courtney, that anyone occupying my position must be very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) for the observations he has just made, which constitute a very efficient support to the Government under the circumstances in which we are placed. But the figures which the right hon. Gentleman has quoted do not exactly coincide with those which I have here, though practically they are pretty much the same—the difference probably arising from the fact that my figures here are taken from the Appropriation Account, and his from the Estimates for the year. If I venture to repeat the figures of the last seven years in reference to the telegraphs you will see what the facts are. In the year 1880-1 the revenue from the telegraphs amounted to £1,600,000, and the expenditure was £1,286,000; the surplus was £313,000, which very nearly met the interest on capital, amounting to a sum of £326,000. We were only £13,000 to the bad on the telegraph system in that year. In the following year, the interest on the capital remaining, of course, the same, I find that the revenue increased to £1,630,000, and the expenditure increased to £1,424,000. That was, I think, the first year in which the additional expenditure which Mr. Fawcett proposed began to operate. In the following year the revenue was £1,710,000, against an expenditure of £1,567,000. Thus it will be seen that the revenue continued to increase, but the expenditure increased much more rapidly. In 1883-4 the revenue was £1,745,000, but the expenditure reached the amount of £1,795,000. That, therefore, is the first year in which there was a deficit independently of the constant deficit caused by the interest on capital. In 1884-5 the revenue again slightly increased to £1,760,000, and the expenditure was £1,805,000. In 1885-6 the revenue was £1,740,000—£20,000 less than in the preceding year—while the Expenditure had mounted up to £1,818,000. That falling-off in the revenue was owing, no doubt, to the fact that it was the first year in which there were two months of the new tariff for the 6d. telegrams. The right hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, remember that it was estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time that there would be again a loss on the following year on the telegraphs, owing to the progress of the 6d. rate; but I am happy to say that those melancholy anticipations were not borne out by the facts, and that a considerable increase took place in the revenue, which rose from £1,740,000 to £1,830,000, an increase of £90,000. But, at the same time, the expenditure rose from £1,818,000 to £2,053,000. These figures, I should say, are estimated figures; but I believe they very closely represent the facts. Therefore, in the last financial year our position is, that we had a permanent charge against the revenue, in the shape of £326,000 interest on capital, plus an actual deficit on the working of £223,000; so that, on the whole, the figures came out last year, giving a deficit of something like £550,000, which, if you compare it with the deficit of 1880-1, which was only £13,000, shows, unfortunately, a decline altogether in the telegraph account of something like £530,000. Well, these are the figures which the right hon. Gentleman wished to have.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: May I ask how much of the Expenditure in this last year was of an exceptional character—for plant, &c.?

MR. RAIKES: I am just coming to that. I was going to analyze it shortly. The expenditure first began to increase very much in the year 1882-3, which represents the time when Mr. Fawcett's scheme assumed its full development. In that year there was an increase of Expenditure of about £140,000. That represents, I believe, the additional salaries and wages which Mr. Fawcett succeeded in obtaining for the employés from the Treasury of that day. But it should be borne in mind that not only were these salaries a very considerable charge, but they continued to rise by annual increment, and we have not seen the last of this increase yet. Some portion of the additional expenditure for each year is due to this natural automatic process by which these salaries are increased. That would account, therefore, for a moderate increase in the expenditure of the following year; but it does not, of course, at all represent the very rapid leaps and bounds by which the expenditure has gone up. There is an increase between the years 1882-3 and 1883-4 of about £230,000, and again there is a very slight increase in the following year. Well, a good deal of that, no doubt, is attributable to additional plant, and if you use the word "plant" in its largest sense a very large portion indeed of the expenditure of last year is owing to that. The total sum again, it is estimated, represents the expenditure on the telegraphs in the course of last year is £2,053,000, while about £230,000 or £240,000 represents the expenditure in additional plant under the Sites Act. There is, no doubt, the expenditure for sites, and it is very hard to fix anything like a normal figure for that; but if you assume, as you perhaps may, that the extra expenditure of the Telegraph Branch for sites represented between £100,000 and £150,000 last year, then that amount may be regarded as an exceptional expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) asked me to point out some future time at which there will not be that increase of expenditure on plant. I wish that I could prophesy; but I have not been able to do so, and all that I will venture to prophesy is that so long as the telegraph business of the country continues to increase as largely as it has done, so far from anticipating a cessation of demands for additional sites and buildings, I apprehend that you are likely to see it constantly increase. I think I can give some figures now with regard to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) wished to have some information upon. He wished to have the figures with regard to the telegraphs account during the time since the new rate came into operation. I should say that the right hon. Gentleman was anxious, some time ago, that I should give him a distinct account of the telegraph business in one week before the 6d. telegrams came into operation, as compared with one week since they were started; but it has been found a matter of such immense labour to work out these details that some time must elapse before I can give the precise figures. But I may say that the telegrams sent per week for some time past have exceeded 1,000,000, and that number of 1,000,000 you may safely compare, roughly speaking, with between 700,000 and 800,000 per week for the preceding year, that being a year in which the 6d. telegrams had already come into operation. Now, I will give these other figures. The 6d. telegram system came into operation on the 1st of October, 1885, and during the first year the total number of inland telegrams sent at the new rate was 37,692,000, as compared with 24,615,000, the number sent in a corresponding period under the old tariff. That is to say, there was an increase of 52 per cent. The receipts were £1,275,000, as compared with £1,313,000, which shows a decrease of £37,000 in the Revenue. But the sum of £21,500 was made by the registration of abbreviated addresses; and, therefore, the total falling-off in consequence of the operation of the 6d. telegrams was £16,000. For the 10 months of the financial year to the end of last year the number of telegrams was 33,906,000, as compared with 24,645,000 in the corresponding 10 months of the preceding year, showing an increase of 40 per cent in a similar period. The receipts for telegrams and for the registration of abbreviated addresses was £1,172,000, as compared with £1,117,000, showing an increase of £55,000. Then I can give a comparison of four months of the 6d. telegrams. Up to September last 6d. telegrams were compared with 1s. telegrams; but in the four months from September onwards the comparison has been between the number and revenue of messages under the new rate. For the four months an increase has been obtained of 1,553,000 in the number of telegrams, and of £51,000 in the amount of revenue. These figures will show that the 6d. telegram system at this moment may be said to be still almost in its infancy. The progress has been so rapid that it is almost impossible to forecast what dimensions it will attain. Anyhow, there will continue to be a constant growth of the number of telegrams sent, and a corresponding growth of revenue; but at the same time, per contra, there will be a continual growth in the establishments required, and a continually increased expenditure in plant, &c. It is impossible, I think, therefore, to say, as a matter of fact, whether the reduction of the price of telegrams to 6*d.* has really paid its way or not. It is quite plain that in the first year of its introduction it produced a loss of revenue as well as an increase of expenditure. In the course of last year it produced a considerable increase of revenue and a considerable increase of expenditure; but we hope that in the course of the coming year the revenue will still continue to increase, while the expenditure will certainly be in some degree diminished. That being so, I confess that I look with some hope to the future of the 6*d.* system; but it will, no doubt, have an influence in demanding fresh plant, which will greatly disturb any calculations that may be made. I may be permitted to say one word with regard to the extreme embarrassment cast on the Post Office by the necessity of making these charges for additional buildings out of the income for the coming year. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) turned his attention to this subject when Chancellor of the Exchequer, or whether my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen), who now fills that Office, is disposed to take it up; but it is a source of serious embarrassment to the Department, and to those who administer the affairs of the country, that all our calculations should be made unsound, and all our averages of little value, by the fact that £200,000 or £300,000, or even £400,000, may be required for buildings in any particular year. We have just passed through a period of that sort, but I find the demand for buildings still continues, and that the sites we have already are hardly adequate for our requirements, and no long time will elapse before I shall have again to apply to the Treasury for some assistance for further space for our requirements. I may now give some attention to the remarks which have been made by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. T. P. Gill). Inquiry has been made into that system to which he has referred as practised in America, and which he calls night telegrams; but it would require a very great deal of consideration before it could be properly launched here. We have to consider whether we should not interfere with our existing revenue if we introduced a cheaper form of telegram which would compete with the present already cheap form. That must be considered, and it would probably be unfair before the 6*d.* telegram has grown up to start a rival to it. But I cannot help hoping that no long time will elapse before that experiment may be made, and I shall be glad to receive any information which the hon. Member may have upon that point, or, indeed, on any other that is connected with this particular subject.

Sir William Harcourt

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his very interesting and clear statement as to the result of the introduction of the 6*d.* telegrams. I think, on the whole, this statement is rather re-assuring as to the future. It shows that the actual number of telegrams has increased very much more largely than we anticipated; at the same time that the average payment per message is lower than we expected, so that the two balance each other. When I persuaded the House, two years ago, to adopt the 6*d.* telegram, I estimated that the increase in the number of telegrams would be about 30 per cent. It seems, however, that the first year the increase was 40 per cent, and that the second year a further increase amounting to another 50 per cent took place. On the other hand, the public have learned very much more quickly than we expected how to economise in the addresses, and the average received per message has been, instead of 10*d.*, as was anticipated, only something like 8*d.* I told the House, when I proposed the scheme of the 6*d.* telegrams, that they must abandon all idea of making interest on the plant in future, and I warned the Treasury of this when the scheme was before them. I said that though we must expect a large increase on the number of telegrams, in all probability the cost of the Service would go on increasing relatively, and that, therefore, we could not expect a large profit; at all events, not enough to pay the interest on the capital in future. The House and the country were aware of that when I adopted the scheme, and all I had to do was to urge these points upon the House in order to induce it to adopt this scheme, instead of urging on the Government a more expensive one. On the whole, I think the figures laid before the Committee have been rather reassuring. At all events, I think we may look forward, at no distant date, to the Telegraph Service reaching a point that there will be no loss in the business, though we might not be able to pay interest upon capital. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the difficulty in connection with the cost of the Post Office buildings. At present there is a charge to the Telegraph Service of one-third of the cost of the Post Office buildings, and all the new buildings required for the Post Office and Telegraph Services. I would question whether that is not an unduly high proportion to allot to the Telegraph Service, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he would reconsider this point. I think the proper proportion would be to take the expenditure on the plant in the two Services and the total receipts for the two Services, and balance one against the other, and draw an average to be paid by each. The inconvenience the right hon. Gentleman complains of is that one year we may have a large expenditure to face, such as that incurred on new buildings in the City of London—something like £400,000—which disturbed all the averages for some years to come. I cannot help thinking that some system should be adopted to prevent this charge coming in one year, and in this way disturbing all our averages. When you have to meet payments so large as this in one year it disturbs your whole accounts. At the same time, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there will be expenditure required for increase of plant for the extended Service, though possibly not quite so large in amount as it has been within the last two years. I would suggest to him the reconsideration of the proportion charged to the Telegraph Service and that charged to the Post Office in the sense in which I have spoken. I think a larger proportion ought to be charged to the Postal Service, and a less proportion to the Telegraph Service. The fact is that the profits on the postal part of the Service have been much larger of late years than those from the Telegraph Service, and can bear much more easily a high charge of this kind.

Mr. Raikes

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid.): Some of us on this side of the House are really anxious to see economy much more carried out, provided this can be done with due regard to public efficiency. I, for one, should like to see Her Majesty's Post Office take steps to get rid of the anomalous state of things under which the telegrams of private individuals cost the country something like £500,000 a-year. I should like to see the scheme proposed by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) carried out—namely, the adoption of a system of Imperial 1d. postage. I think this would make emigration to the Colonies more easy and popular, and this would be an enormous economical advantage; and as I am not in the habit of making a criticism upon an existing state of things, unless I am in my own mind prepared with a scheme by which I consider a re-arrangement could be carried out, and am able to suggest a remedy, I would propose that it might be worth while to take into consideration the abolition of what is called the $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per word system of charge for telegraphing. At present, for every word after the first 12, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. is charged; but I would propose that the sum in future should be 1d.—i.e., for every two words or part of two words. This would be to the advantage of the Post Office. It would save the clerks the troublesome $\frac{1}{2}$ d. calculations, and the public some inconvenience—at some slight cost it is true. I would suggest, therefore, that the Post Office should take into consideration whether it would not be as well again to examine the tariffs. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General does not anticipate for some years that there will be a saving in this Department. He cannot expect to carry out any reforms unless they are established upon a real sound financial basis, and I hope that next year Her Majesty's Government will see their way to adopt this system I propose, or some other, which will wipe off this State subsidy of £500,000 to those who use the telegraphs.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the adoption of the suggestion I made with regard to night telegrams would involve considerable risk of expenditure and consequent loss; but I do not think he is quite right in that matter. I would suggest, if he fears that result, that he should charge for the messages I refer to the same as he charges for day messages at present.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): As to the very great advantage which is derived by those who live in America from the system of night messages I wish to say a word. I agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down in thinking that the plan he proposes could be put into practice at an early stage and without any loss to the Revenue at all. The lowest charge now made for a telegram is 6d.; and if night messages were introduced, and if double the number of words were sent for 6d., no loss would be incurred by the Postal Authorities on messages of this kind. The cost of delivery for a message of double length is absolutely the same as that of the shorter message, and messages taken in this way would only be delivered on the following morning, although they would be transmitted at a time when the wires were free, and consequently without interfering with ordinary messages. I think, under any circumstances, an experiment with regard to night messages might be tried. That it would be an advantage to the public generally, and also to the Revenue, I have no doubt. I trust it will be tried, and tried at an early date. I am sure it will be found beneficial to places at considerable distances and across country—for instance, from Belfast to Hull or Cork to Glasgow, or from London to Galway and Derry, or to and from any place where letters have to leave early, and can only be delivered late on the following day. Persons engaged in commercial pursuits would find a system of this kind of great value and advantage, and I hope the Postmaster General will take the matter into his early consideration and endeavour to carry out the suggestion which has been made.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Jackson),—put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

Mr. T. P. Gill

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—[BILL 241.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): This Bill and the Bill that follows—the National Debt Bill—practically go together. The arrangements made under the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill as to the diminution of taxation really involve the provisions made with reference to the Debt in the Bill which will immediately follow. Now, I am perfectly well aware that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes a reduction of taxation he is certain to carry his Bill, whatever it may be. Therefore, it is not with the least hope of successfully opposing this Bill, or even with the intention of opposing it, that I propose to make some remarks on the arrangements which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid before the House and the country. The only proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to which I mean to call attention is his proposal to diminish the annual provision for the reduction of the Debt. I have seen that proposal, I must confess, with great regret and considerable alarm in regard to its effects in the future. I do not know whether the Treasury Minute on this subject has been presented to the House; but, at all events, by the courtesy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have had a copy of it, and I have no doubt that it is either now or soon will be before the House. It is perfectly well known to the House that provision was made in 1875 by Sir Stafford Northcote whereby a sum of £28,000,000 was set apart for the service of the Debt. A portion of that sum, amounting to about £6,000,000 out of the ordinary Revenue, together with an additional £1,000,000 or thereabouts from other sources, was set apart to the amount of something like £7,000,000 annually for the discharge of Debt; the difference between that and £28,000,000 being the sum necessarily paid annually to the public creditors as interest on the Debt. That is to say, about £21,000,000 is what we have to pay for the interest on the Debt; and £7,000,000 would be that which has been appropriated for the purpose of the liquidation of Debt. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his speech on the Budget and in the Treasury Minute, has endeavoured to reconcile his present proposal with the scheme of Sir Stafford Northcote, by diving into the financial conscience of Sir Stafford Northcote and saying that his proposal was made in a totally different fiscal condition of things from that which now exists. He says that Sir Stafford Northcote thought that a growth of Revenue might be presumed, and anticipated that the Revenue would increase at a rate at least equal to the rate at which the population was increasing. And the right hon. Gentleman says that in the event of any material alteration in the circumstances of the country Sir Stafford Northcote contemplated a modification of his proposal, which was made on the assumption that he could depend on the growth of the Revenue being maintained. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, is that Sir Stafford Northcote anticipated a growth of the Revenue which has not taken place, and that, therefore, under present circumstances, he would not have maintained the proposal he made in 1875, but would have modified it by reducing the sum applicable to the liquidation of Debt. My answer is, that the right hon. Gentleman's hypothesis is absolutely negated by the conduct of Sir Stafford Northcote himself. Sir Stafford Northcote remained responsible for the finances of the country for five years after 1875—that is to the spring of 1880. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that the Revenue—I am now speaking of the Revenue apart from the Income Tax—has not increased according to the rate at which population has increased. It has, however, actually increased. The Revenue, apart from Income Tax is now higher than the Revenue was in the time of Sir Stafford Northcote by nearly £2,000,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has left out of his calculations all the sources of Revenue not derived from taxes. But he should not have omitted the Revenue from the Post Office, which is now higher than it was in 1875. That is money which is available for the purposes of the country, and should be taken into the calculation of Revenue. The yield of the taxes, exclusive of Income Tax, is now £1,200,000 higher than it was in 1875. If to this you add £500,000 for the increased receipt from the Postal Service, you have an increased Revenue available for the purposes of the country of £1,700,000. Therefore, you have a higher Revenue than you had in the time of Sir Stafford Northcote when he made his proposals for the reduction of Debt; and now I want to test the theory of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Sir Stafford Northcote, if he had found the Revenue diminishing and the Expenditure increasing, would have diminished the charge for the reduction of the Debt. Now, in 1880 there was a diminution in the receipts from Excise of £2,000,000. That is to say, the receipts from the Excise had fallen from £27,000,000 to £25,000,000; and, consequently, Sir Stafford Northcote was face to face with the very state of things which the Chancellor of the Exchequer speaks of as a failure in the ordinary Revenue. In 1875, the Customs and Excise together produced £46,846,000. In 1880, they only produced £44,695,000; so that there was a falling off in these two sources of Revenue taken together of £2,000,000. If, then, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's theory of the views of Sir Stafford Northcote were true, Sir Stafford Northcote should have come forward and said that the ordinary Revenue was falling, and that another very important thing had taken place—that in consequence of the Eastern policy of the Government, the Expenditure had increased from £65,000,000 to £75,000,000; that there was, therefore, an increase of Expenditure of £10,000,000 between these two periods of 1875 and 1880, and a falling off in the Revenue from Customs and Excise of £2,000,000. And then, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Northcote should have said—"The circumstances under which I made that proposal for the reduction of Debt in 1875 no longer exist; the fiscal circumstances of the country are changed, and, therefore, I do not think it fit and proper to call on the country to appropriate the same sum to the liquidation of Debt." Well, was that the course which Sir Stafford Northcote actually did take? On the contrary, in 1877, instead of diminishing the fund set apart for the reduction of Debt, he added 1*d.* to the Income Tax; and in 1880, in the last Budget which he produced under the circumstances to which I have alluded, he added £750,000 to the Tobacco Duty, while obtaining an additional sum of £100,000 from the Dog Licences; and this, together with an increase of £3,600,000 on the Income Tax, made nearly £5,000,000 additional taxation which he imposed, while retaining the £28,000,000 for the liquidation of the Debt. Therefore, I say that in answer to the theory of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Sir Stafford Northcote would have departed from the rule he laid down, in consequence of the changed fiscal circumstances of the country, we have the practice of Sir Stafford Northcote; for, under circumstances more unfavourable than the circumstances in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer now finds himself, he abided by his figure of £28,000,000 for the liquidation of Debt, and met the demand upon him by increased taxation. Sir Stafford Northcote did this, moreover, at a time when there was accumulated deficits for three years amounting to £8,000,000, which were left to be funded; and yet, in spite of that, he made no diminution in the provision for the liquidation of Debt. His successors adopted his policy, and they loyally adhered to it. They insisted, in spite of adverse circumstances, and notwithstanding the growth of the Expenditure, in maintaining the provisions for the liquidation of the Debt. I do not think that, on this side of the House, we have anything to be ashamed of in the course we have taken in reference to the liquidation of Debt. In 1874, the Debt stood, according to the figures given in Sir John Lubbock's Return at £760,000,000. In 1887, it stands at £705,000,000. There has been, therefore, in that period from 1874 to 1887 a reduction of £55,000,000 on the Debt. That period was pretty nearly divided between the Administration of Lord Beaconsfield and the Administration of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—giving about six years to each Party—and out of this £55,000,000, £19,000,000 was paid off by the Conservative Administration and £36,000,000 by the Liberal Administration, through the sums appropriated to the reduction of Debt. But it will be said—"In 1885 you suspended the Sinking Fund altogether." No doubt we did, under the pressure of the great demand which the unfortunate Egyptian War brought upon us. There was a proposal then made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), which was fatal to that Government. I shall, however, always maintain that it was a courageous proposal founded on sound finance. It was a proposal to meet the demands on the Exchequer by a combined appeal to direct and indirect taxation. It afforded, however, a tempting opportunity to overthrow the Government by rejecting the increased taxation of beer and spirits. I said then, and I repeat it now, that in rejecting that proposal a fatal blow was struck at the sources of Revenue; because the adoption of the proposition of the right hon. Member for Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), which overthrew the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), made it almost impossible for any future Chancellor of the Exchequer to make any proposal for the increase of indirect taxation. A still more fatal blow is struck at our fiscal system by the proposal of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The first Government of Lord Salisbury struck a blow at indirect taxation. The second has struck a blow at the provision for the reduction of Debt. For 10 years the system inaugurated by Sir Stafford Northcote has been pursued partly by himself and still more extensively by his successors. We were obliged, it is true, in 1885 to suspend the provision for the Sinking Fund for a single year. But in the following year it was my duty to consider what should be done, and I then determined to restore the system in integro and to re-instate the Terminable Annuities. What could have been easier than for me last year to have adopted the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and said, "Times are changed since the time of Sir Stafford Northcote. The Income Tax is much higher. It is perfectly easy by reducing the provision for the Debt by £4,000,000 to take 2*d.* off the Income Tax;" or I might have gone further and taken 3*d.* off the Income Tax by using £6,000,000 of the sum set apart for reduction of Debt for that purpose. But I thought this would be unsound finance; and I, therefore, resisted the temptation to make any proposal of that kind. It is true I made a temporary provision—there being an apparent deficit at that time in the Budget—to suspend some of the smaller Sinking Funds in order to meet that deficit. I might have made the Bill for that purpose contingent on the necessity arising. As a matter of fact, the necessity did not arise. It was not necessary to divert that money at all. The Revenue fortunately increased, and the Revenue of the year was sufficient to meet the Expenditure of the year without interfering with the provision for the reduction of Debt. The money suspended under the new Sinking Fund came back under the old Sinking Fund in the form of a surplus. Therefore, the whole amount appropriated under Sir Stafford Northcote's system to the liquidation of Debt was actually applied last year to that purpose—at all events, within a few thousand pounds. That was the condition of things which the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had to deal with. But he was more fortunate than I was, for in consequence of the improvement in the Revenue, he was in possession of a surplus; and yet, not having to encounter a deficit as I had in 1886, he has come forward and proposed to diminish by £2,000,000 the provision for the liquidation of the Debt. Let me read a sentence from Sir Stafford Northcote's speech, in which he said that under changed conditions of things a changed policy might be followed. I have shown that under a changed condition of things, more serious than that which the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has to deal with, Sir Stafford Northcote adhered to his plan. But there was one sentence in the speech to which I have referred of which I will remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Sir Stafford Northcote said—

Sir William Harcourt

"I may be told—'Do, please; but you will never be able to bind future Parliaments; and the very first time that a Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to raise an additional Revenue, without increasing taxation, he will put an end to your Sinking Fund, and will shatter all your dreams of reducing the National Debt by some hundreds of millions.'"

But, said Sir Stafford Northcote—

"Few Chancellors of the Exchequer would like to come down to this House and propose the repeal of an Act of Parliament establishing a Sinking Fund of this character, on the plea that they did not like to increase the taxation of the country."—(3 Hansard, [223] 1043-4.)

He did not contemplate that a Chancellor of the Exchequer would come and propose to suspend the Sinking Fund in order to reduce taxation. Undoubtedly the reasons which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given for his proposal are not such as would have induced Sir Stafford Northcote, in 1880, to depart from the course he then adopted of increasing the taxation of the country by £5,000,000. When he originally brought forward his proposal for the reduction of the Debt, Sir Stafford Northcote said that we were then only paying £26,000,000 for the service of the Debt. He added that that was the lowest sum ever devoted to this purpose, and he remarked that he thought it unfit, and, indeed, unworthy of this country, that so small a sum should be thus appropriated. He reminded the House, at the same time, that our ancestors, in former days, had paid £28,000,000—or even more. When the Funded Debt, at the end of the great war in 1817, was upwards of £800,000,000, and the long annuities were in existence, the amount paid by this country—with its small population, and its very small wealth compared with that which we now enjoy—for the service of the Debt was £35,000,000. When you consider that the country, then impoverished by war, and with its comparatively small population, was able to devote £35,000,000 to the service of the Debt, the fact that we now shrink from appropriating £28,000,000 to the same object seems to show that we are rather wanting in financial courage. The proposal before us, let it be remembered, is a proposal made by a Chancellor of the Exchequer having a surplus in his hands to deal with. Under those circumstances he comes forward, and, for the purposes of a popular Budget, he throws away the provision for the liquidation of Debt while he is actually in the possession of a surplus. What is the inevitable consequence of that? Why, no future Chancellor of the Exchequer can ever resist following such an example. Every argument the right hon. Gentleman has used in defence of his present proposal is equally applicable to the remaining £5,000,000 still devoted to the reduction of Debt. The right hon. Gentleman can say next year, or any future Chancellor of the Exchequer can say—"The Revenue is not increasing as much as Sir Stafford Northcote expected, therefore, let us take off £2,000,000 more. In the time of Sir Stafford Northcote the Income Tax was 2*d.* in the pound, it is now 7*d.*, therefore, let us again diminish the taxation imposed for the reduction of Debt. There is no virtue in this £26,000,000 higher than the virtue which applied to the £28,000,000. You have begun a descending scale, where there is no means of stopping. It is like breaking a hole in a dam, through which the water pours, and the breach becomes greater and greater; and it will be absolutely impossible in the future to defend any provision for the liquidation of Debt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of the future will always be able to use the same arguments which the right hon. Gentleman has employed. The arrangement made by Sir Stafford Northcote has, in my opinion, at once and for ever gone by the board. I have another great objection to this system of finance. I can only describe it as extravagance made easy. I am happy to hear that a single voice—that of the last Chancellor of the Exchequer—is crying in the Tory wilderness for economy; but it meets with no response, least of all from the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The whole of this arrangement is not due to any deficiency of Revenue. I have shown you that the Revenue of this country has increased since the time of Sir Stafford Northcote. What has, also, increased in a terrible ratio is the Expenditure of the country. I am afraid, moreover, that we have now a Chancellor of the Exchequer who is favourable to an increase in our Expenditure. My right hon. Friend, when he sat behind us, was the advocate of great military and naval establishments, and of the policy which requires great military and naval establishments; and when you have a Chancellor of the Exchequer favourable to a policy which requires great military and naval establishments, and ready to meet their cost by proposals for cutting down the sum available for the liquidation of Debt, the final result must inevitably be most serious to the finances of the country. A few years will remove the £5,000,000 now remaining for the liquidation of Debt. No future Chancellor of the Exchequer—I care not to what Party he belong—can help following the example of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer; and when you have swallowed up that £5,000,000, what remains? Why, the proposal you have heard from the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton). The suggestion that you should borrow money on Terminable Annuities to meet your naval and military expenditure will be repeated. Recollect we have already had proposals from the Bench opposite for borrowing £5,000,000 to meet that expenditure. With this policy of large expenditure thus encouraged, you will not only get rid of the provision for the reduction of Debt; but you will have a system of borrowing on Terminable Annuities, in time of peace, in order to meet your increased Expenditure. That is the system which my right hon. Friend has inaugurated. For every reason I deeply regret this proposal. I regret it not merely for the £2,000,000 which it has put an end to, as a provision for the liquidation of Debt. I regret it still more on account of the fatal example which it sets for further progress in the same direction. But I regret it most of all because it is the greatest encouragement yet given to that system of extravagance which we should set our faces against. If the public agree to the suspension of the provision for the reduction of Debt in order to keep up military and naval establishments at their present unnecessary height, and to relieve the people from the inconvenience this may cause in the form of taxation; and if they do this by either cutting down the provision for the discharge of Debt, or by assenting to proposals such as that made by the First Lord of the Admiralty for borrowing money on Terminable Annuities to carry on this expenditure in time of peace, then it is clear that we are creating Debt as much as we should do by borrowing money. It was an established principle, when wars were more frequent than they are at present, that you should in time of peace pay off the Debt which you incurred in time of war. Well, with the unhappy interval of the Crimean War, we have had 70 years of peace since the Great War. How much Debt have you discharged since the close of the Great War? The Debt which then stood at between £800,000,000 and £900,000,000, now stands at £700,000,000. That is to say you have not discharged one-fourth of that Debt in 70 years, which have been years of peace, except for the unfortunate interval of the Crimean War. The debt incurred in the Crimean War has since been discharged; but the efforts we have made in a time of unexampled peace and prosperity to reduce the main body of the National Debt are really insignificant. I have alluded to the sacrifices our ancestors made under very much more unfavourable circumstances. And yet we declare ourselves incapable of making anything like the sacrifices they made. We are now called on to pay £10,000,000 less for the service of the Debt than our ancestors paid in 1817. I do not think that is to the credit of a country with the wealth and the resources of this country. These financial proposals of the Government seem to me to depart altogether from the sound principles of finance established by Sir Stafford Northcote and carried out by his successors, and I am afraid those principles have now been fatally broken down by the present Government.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I should like to say a word on this Bill, and on that which is connected with it. I think it is a grievous mistake to reduce the amount set apart for the liquidation of the National Debt. I think that what the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said is practically correct—that at the period we now have of complete peace, of great riches, and of comparative prosperity, it does seem a great misfortune that we cannot continue to reduce the Debt by the old Sinking Fund amount. We know that if a period of war should arise we should in a few months add to the Debt a very large sum indeed, and this consideration alone, to my mind, is of great weight in pursuing a policy of reduction of debt when we can do so. In reference to the present proposals of the Government for meeting the Expenditure of the country, I would ask first whether these proposals will promote economy? I believe the country demands a very large amount of economy. I would not talk of knocking off £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 at a sweep without knowing the details; but I believe the country demands that there should be an exhaustive and extensive system of complete economy. And I am sure that no Party will remain in favour with the country unless it manages to reduce the enormously increasing taxation of the people. I do not wish to dwell now on the Military and Naval administration. A great deal has been said about that; but I believe that, without doubt, an efficient system of Military and Naval expenditure might reduce considerably the Votes for the Army and Navy. The key-note of economy in the Army and Navy seems, however, to be the policy which the Army and the Navy are employed to carry out. If the Army and Navy are regarded solely as means of protection, and not of defiance, then I believe that a great deal of economy might be exercised; and if this principle is adhered to, as I believe it will be by the present Government, I have no doubt but that, in a year or two, considerable reductions will be made in our Army and Navy expenditure. But there is another source of economy which I should like to speak of, though at this time of night I am not able to go into it at great length. I think, however, that it is necessary we should note the increase in the expense of the different Departments of the country in the present year as compared with previous years. It has been my fortune to spend 20 years of my life in the Public Service, of which I can, therefore, speak with some knowledge; and I am convinced that with care considerable reductions might be made in our Public Establishments. The expenditure, for instance, under the head of Works and Buildings, has increased enormously during the last 30 or 40 years. We have now an expenditure of £1,700,000 on public works and buildings. Twenty years ago it was £900,000; 30 years ago it was £800,000; 40 years ago it was only £500,000; therefore, the expenditure on this Vote has increased more than threefold in 40 years. I will not say that it is unreasonable that there should be some increase under this head of Expenditure. But when we go back to 1848, and see that the Vote for that year included £150,000 for the Houses of Parliament, £100,000 for the Caledonian Canal, and other liabilities that are not now pressing on us, it will be found that the Vote for Public Works for that year was in reality only about one-eighth of what it is now. That does, I think, show that there has, in respect of this Vote, been an undue increase of expenditure. There is, indeed, I fear, in every direction a system of getting more money out of the Imperial Exchequer, and I think we should support the Government in resisting this tendency. Take the Departments of Law and Justice, the expenditure on which has grown so much of recent years that it is now £6,250,000. In 1878 it was only £5,000,000; in 1868 it was £3,000,000; in 1858 it was £2,250,000; and in 1848 it was just over £1,000,000. Therefore, Law and Justice now cost more than sixfold as much as they did 40 years ago. Now, I do not say that we do not get a benefit out of this expenditure. on Law and Justice. But the figures I have given show that the whole tendency and tone of expenditure is to increase out of proportion to the benefits derived; and what I regret in the present financial arrangements for the year is that the Budget has not dealt with this great question, but has found money for a reduction of taxation, not by a reduction of expenditure so much as by reducing the Sinking Fund by £2,000,000. Then closely allied to this subject is the increase of local taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes in his Budget to give £320,000 from Imperial taxation in aid of local taxation. Now, in my opinion, that money will be practically thrown away. It can do no good to the localities, for when it is worked out it only amounts to 6*d.* on each acre in the country. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) who usually sits in this seat expressed gratitude for this donation in the present depressed state of agriculture; but 6*d.* an acre will not set the farmers on their legs. It is a mere drop in the bucket, and absolutely useless as a means for putting things right. I regret, therefore, that this grant has been made. Grants in aid of local taxation have increased largely of recent years; but local taxation has not been reduced. In fact, it may almost be said that the more you give to localities out of the Imperial Exchequer, the greater the ratio in which local expenditure increases. The system of granting aid to localities impoverishes the Imperial Exchequer, while it tends not to reduce local taxation, but usually to increase it. Then there is the growth of local debt along with the increase of local taxation. We think a great deal of paying off £5,000,000 a-year of the Imperial Debt, but we are adding every year £10,000,000 to the local debt of the country. We ought to consider very carefully the growth of the local debt in regard to the Imperial Debt. It is indeed so closely allied to it that we cannot help considering it in connection with this Budget. The local debt is now growing, as I have said, at the rate of something like £10,000,000 a-year; and in the last 10 years, although the National Debt has decreased, the local debt has so largely increased that the two together have increased since 1875 to the extent of £50,000,000. Taking the National and the local debts together, the total indebtedness of the country was in 1875 £861,000,000, while in 1884 it was £911,000,000. Therefore the Debt of the country has increased in 10 years, as I have already said, by £50,000,000. Of course, some of this increase is for purposes that ought to be remunerative; but still, this increased burden of taxation is growing rapidly, and undoubtedly there was in the present year an opportunity of doing something to reduce this heavy burden by stringent economy. The present Budget is very popular, because it reduces the Income Tax; and although we are all gratified at the Chancellor of the Exchequer reducing the Income Tax by 1*d.*, and, in fact, hoped it would have been more than 1*d.*, yet I think this should have been done without reducing the Sinking Fund, but by promoting economy in the various Departments. I must say that I think that with the present wealthy condition of the country reduction of taxation should not have been secured by reducing the Sinking Fund for the reduction of the National Debt, which I consider ought to be reduced at least as fast in the future as was contemplated by Sir Stafford Northcote's scheme. In my opinion, £7,000,000 is the least we should pay annually for the reduction of Debt. I must say that I think, especially looking to the example of America, we should face with courage the subject of the reduction of the National Debt; and this we can only effectually do by a permanent reduction in the National Expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Speaker, I do not at all complain of the speech just made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley). I am glad to see that he is an advocate of economy, and that he is one likely to support the Government in resisting the multitudinous attacks which are made on the Treasury, and which, I am bound to say, receive in the abstract much support in this House. It is the duty of those who sit on this Bench—and I am glad to say that in the fulfilment of that duty we have the support of a former Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt) who sits opposite—to defend the public purse in several directions. My hon. Friend the Member for North Islington has mixed up several questions. He was, however, anxious to bring forward the growing and important question of the increase of the local debt, and I am glad that he has done so, although it is scarcely ad rem in connection with the present subject. There is no doubt it is a matter which deserves the greatest attention. I am glad to hail my hon. Friend as a fellow worker, because I think I was one of the first in this House who called attention to the increase of the local debt, and who warned the public and the House of the great dangers which it involves. It is a very easy way of carrying out local improvement and of meeting other local demands to create local debts; but it is a dangerous tendency which requires to be carefully watched. As my hon. Friend has said, you cannot properly separate the local debt and the National Debt. They must be reckoned together when you deal with the indebtedness of the country. The growing amount of these local debts is a matter of very considerable Imperial as well as local importance; and I am, therefore, glad that my hon. Friend has introduced the subject. But I would point out that there is nothing in the financial plans of the Government which in the slightest degree militates against watchfulness in that respect. We do not touch the local debt. What we touch is merely the indebtedness in respect of advances from Imperial funds for local purposes, such indebtedness having, we think, been advancing with too rapid strides. I have already called attention to the necessity for checking these local loans. It is within the knowledge of the House that pressure is frequently put upon us to increase the assistance given to localities for every possible purpose. In this connection I will recall to my hon. Friend's (Mr. Bartley's) recollection the remarks I made in my Budget speech with reference to the growing expenditure of the Civil Service. My hon. Friend has made a contrast between the Expenditure now and the Expenditure in 1848. I remember that, in a former speech, I drew a comparison between the Expenditure now and that in 1868. I pointed out that the entire increase in the Expenditure was due, not to the increased extravagance of the Government in enlarging establishments, but to the action of the House in passing Resolution after Resolution and law after law, involving additional expenditure in every possible direction. It is of no great service to call attention to the increase of Expenditure unless it is pointed out why and how that increased Expenditure has arisen; and I think that, in my Budget speech, I proved conclusively the mode in which it has arisen, and the circumstances to which it is due. There has been no great increase in the cost of administration. The great Departments are administered at about the same cost now as they were 20 years ago. The increased cost comes from the fresh duties day by day imposed on the Government, frequently against the wish of the Government itself. Again, you cannot entirely leave out of consideration the immense growth of the population since 1848. If the population has grown, of course the cost of education, of the administration of the law, and of many other things, has also increased. Why, in regard to the very service of the Post Office, the cost of which has risen now to £8,000,000, compared with a very much smaller sum in 1848, that is an increase on which the House prides itself as showing the enormous services rendered by the Post Office to the public; and yet my hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley) cited the growth of that expenditure as an instance of the great increases which have taken place. At the same time, I do not complain of the course which has been taken by my hon. Friend. I myself was anxious to call attention to the growing Expenditure of the country in submitting my financial proposals, and I shall certainly not object to the criticisms of any hon. Member in that direction. But I do not think my hon. Friend can fairly say he would have preferred that I should have handled these matters in my Budget proposals, so as to reduce the total of the financial plan which it has been my honour to propose to the House. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, and ought to have, a considerable voice in regard to the Estimates; but still the Estimates are not to the same extent in the hands and on the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as those proposals he has to make in order to meet the aggregate amount of Expenditure. It is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to object to any needless expenditure, and to use his whole influence in cutting down such expenditure; but, at the same time, it cannot be said that in his Budget proposals he can produce a revolution in the whole of the Estimates submitted to the House. I come now to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) opposite, and I will deal first with that portion of it which resembled the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), and which dealt with the Budget in its relation to Expenditure. My right hon. Friend called my proposals, I think, an encouragement to extravagance, and he reminded the House, or suggested to the House, that I had been in favour of large establishments when I sat on those Benches. I do not know whether I understood my right hon. Friend aright.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I have always understood that my right hon. Friend was a great supporter, when he sat behind our Government, of what was called a spirited foreign policy, and what is sometimes called a Jingo policy.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; my right hon. Friend went further than that. He said I was in favour of great establishments, and that I had not been entrusted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) with great Departments in his Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was speaking of later times.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, my right hon. Friend wishes to escape from that point. In a very late time I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian would not have objected to entrust a large Department to my care. I do not think it is necessary to refer to such a matter, and I have been led to make the remark simply because my right hon. Friend pressed his observation, and said that, even in recent times, I was not to be trusted on the subject of great establishments. I certainly go as far as this. I think that any excessive measures of reduction which lead to a sudden increase of expenditure the moment the first danger arises, is a dangerous policy. We have several times had experience of this. After great reductions have been made, if there has been even a moderate panic, Votes of Credit have been proposed in order to obtain an increase of stores, which have been allowed to sink too low. That, I think, to be an extravagant way of conducting the national finances. But I can assure my right hon. Friend (Sir William Harcourt), that both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) and my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) are, like myself, entirely in accord with him in wishing to make reductions wherever it is possible in the Establishments. My right hon. Friend (Sir William Harcourt) said that there was a solitary voice crying out for economy; but I think my right hon. Friend will see that the attacks which have been made upon the Department have involved, to a great extent, the action, not only of the present Government, but of the Government of which he was himself a Member, and that many of the mistakes alleged to have been committed have been committed, and most of the money alleged to have been wasted has been spent, either for good or for evil, under the auspices of the Cabinet of which my right hon. Friend was a Member, and during part of the existence of which he occupied the position that I hold now. But I do not complain in the slightest degree of my right hon. Friend's remarks in that direction. I certainly wish to do him this justice. I speak as having succeeded him at the Treasury, although not as his immediate Successor. I am perfectly certain that there never has been a more sincere champion of economy than my right hon. Friend (Sir William Harcourt), and I would not hold him responsible for any extravagance which has been committed. But when my right hon. Friend sees that the Government of which he was a Member is itself exposed to the charges which have been made, and that it is accused of having fallen into several errors and of having spent money which may be proved to have been wasted, I hope he will be a little charitable in judging of those who now occupy the place which he formerly held. In regard to the point my right hon. Friend raised in reference to the suspension of the Sinking Fund, and to the remarks he made with regard to Sir Stafford Northcote's position, I may say that I do not object to criticism which has for its object the strengthening of the hands of the Government with reference to setting aside a large sum for the payment of the National Debt. But I do not think my right hon. Friend was justified in saying that, because the sum has been diminished, we have, therefore, overthrown the whole of the principle. I stated, in making my Budget proposals, that if the Sinking Fund would have been endangered by them, I should have been the last man to bring them forward. My right hon. Friend mentioned the fact that even in 1880 Sir Stafford Northcote did not touch the Sinking Fund. But I will call my right hon. Friend's attention to this point. If this had been an exceptional year; if there had been two or three previous years which showed different symptoms from the present year, I certainly should not have consented to suspend any portion of the Sinking Fund, and I certainly think that Sir Stafford Northcote was quite justified in not suspending it in 1880. He had then had an experience of five years, and it was hoped from year to year that the stagnation of Revenue which was then witnessed was only temporary. We were all lothe to believe that the stagnation was of anything like a permanent character. But seven more years have now passed, and they all tell the same tale, and all teach the same lesson. We have now arrived at a point at which, with the Income Tax at 8*d.*, we are at liberty to contrast the state of things with that which existed when Sir Stafford Northcote made his proposals. My right hon. Friend (Sir William Harcourt) has referred to the statistics I quoted to show that there had been no growth in the Revenue at all paralleled with the growth in the population. My right hon. Friend seemed to be unaware why

I had taken a growth of 1 per cent. It was because I believe that the population increases 1 per cent. Instead of there having been a normal growth of the Revenue proportionate to the growth of the population, it is now seen, after an experience of 12 or 13 years, that the elasticity of Revenue which existed in 1875, and which formed the basis of Sir Stafford Northcote's calculation, has entirely disappeared. I quite admit that the Fund ought not to have been touched until ample experience had been gained, and until it had been seen what, looking over a long period of years, might be the expectations as to the situation. Now, we have to face this position. Given the present Revenue, given the present Expenditure, is it right to maintain the Income Tax at 8*d.* in order to pay off that amount of National Debt which was fixed by Sir Stafford Northcote as the normal amount to be paid off when the Income Tax stood at 2*d.*? I submit that the case is very strong in favour of an arrangement not for suspending the whole Fund, but for modifying the scheme and bringing it more into accord with the present situation. My right hon. Friend opposite speaks of the sacrifices which were made in 1817, when the population was small, and the wealth of the country was not such as it is now. I would point out that at that time it was far more necessary to make large provision for reducing the National Debt, looking both at the rate of interest paid and the amount of the Debt, than it is now. With the credit of the country in its present position, and with money bearing only 3 per cent interest, I do not think that the provision of £5,000,000 a-year is inadequate. Although it is desirable, and although it is the duty of the country, to pay off a large sum every year, I believe the position of the country to be such that it is not necessary to look at the matter from that point of view. We are now proposing to set aside a sum which will pay off the whole of the Debt in 56 years. I believe that the proposals I have ventured to make are suited to the present circumstances of the Kingdom, and I should deeply regret if my right hon. Friend were justified in saying that the course I had taken had imperilled the Sinking Fund as regards the £5,000,000. If that were my conviction, if I shared that apprehension, I certainly should not have made these proposals. I am glad to see the feeling which has been displayed, because it indicates a determination to maintain the proposals which I have submitted to the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1867)

AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 225.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland, The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power to trustees to make abatement of rent).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Amendment made, in page 1, line 9, by leaving out after "powers" to and including "authority," in line 12, and inserting—

"conferred upon trustees by the second section of 'The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867,' in all trusts to which that section applies the trustees shall have power."

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I think, Mr. Courtney, that the scope of this Bill might be somewhat extended. As it stands at present, it gives permission to trustees to grant reductions of rent, and I cannot help thinking that it ought to be extended so as to enable trustees to allow leases to be given up entirely. I therefore beg to move, at the end of Clause 2, to add the words "and to accept renunciations of leases of any such subjects."

Amendment proposed, at end of Clause, to add "and to accept renunciations of leases of any such subjects."—(Mr. Hosier.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I think that these words would be a decided improvement to the Bill, and the Government will accept them.

Question put, and agreed to.

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD, the following New Clause was agreed to :—

(Past abatement of rent not liable to challenge.)
"No abatement or reduction of rent, heretofore made by trustees, shall be liable to be challenged, which would have been lawful if made after the passing hereof."

Mr. Goschen

MR. HOZIER: I beg to move as a consequential Amendment, after the word "rent," to insert the words "or acceptance of renunciation of any such lease."

Amendment proposed to the New Clause, after the word "rent" to insert "or acceptance of renunciation of any such lease."—(Mr. Hosier.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

CORN SALES BILL.—[BILL 21.]

(Mr. Rankin, Sir Joseph E. Bailey, Mr. H. T. Davenport, Mr. Williamson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): In moving that the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill be discharged, I would ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade to give the House some assurance, for the satisfaction of those who are interested in this subject—and they are numerous—that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to deal with the subject at an early period next Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged."—(Mr. Rankin.)

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I cannot take upon myself to do that; but I may say to my hon. Friend that the Government hope next Session they may be able to deal with the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MOTIONS.

ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee do consist of Nineteen Members."—(Mr. W. E. Smith.)

Mr. MASON (Lanark, Mid): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to defer the nomination of this Committee until Thursday, seeing that there are a large number of hon. Gentlemen interested in the subject who are not now present.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I regret that it is not in my power to accede to the request of the hon. Member. As the House is aware, the Motion for the appointment of this Committee has been on the Paper for a long time, and for a long time it was blocked by a Notice of opposition. Although it was the desire of almost the whole of the House that this Motion should be proceeded with, it was not in our power to reach it in time. We have now an opportunity of going on with it; it has the general sanction of the House, and it is absolutely necessary to proceed with the business of appointment of Members of the Committee with the least possible delay.

Mr. MASON: Under the circumstances, I have now to move that the number of Members of the Committee be increased to 25. I am sorry that we should have to go on with the Motion now, but I can understand the desire of the First Lord of the Treasury to proceed while the Motion is not blocked. My reason for advocating the increase of the number on the Committee to 25 arises, in the first instance, from a promise given by the First Lord of the Treasury that the number of the Committee would be 25. This he stated in answer to a Question from an hon. Member; and I do not know on what grounds the Government have departed from that intention and reduced the number to 19. I am of opinion that 25 would be a better number, and my judgment is supported by precedents. On looking back over the Parliamentary history of the past century, I find a number of Committees nominated with similar objects to this. There was a Committee in 1786, another in 1790, and others in 1807, 1817 and 1828, and on the last occasion in 1848. I took especial care to look up the precedent of the appointment of the Committee of 1828. It was appointed, I have no hesitation in saying, by the most eminent statesman of the century, Sir Robert Peel, and the number he nominated at that time, in a much smaller House than we have at present, was 23. I have no doubt that the experience and authority of this statesman will weigh considerably with Members on the other side of the House. I do not think I am asking that the Committee should be unduly enlarged when I mention the number as 25, when we consider the House is so much larger, and the questions with which the Committee will have to deal of so much greater magnitude. I look upon this as, in no sense, a Party question; and I am perfectly well aware that there are Members on the other side as sincerely anxious for economy as Members on this side; and that being the case, I may appeal to the Government to increase the size of the Committee, and that for several other reasons I will now allude to in as succinct a manner as I possibly can. I dare say the House is aware that I raised this question a-year and a-half ago; it was the first thing to which I put my hands on entering Parliament. Doubtless, the question has been accelerated by the adhesion and support of an eminent noble Lord, whose influence was sufficient to induce the Government to adopt the idea of a Finance Committee for the purpose of cutting down the Estimates. I thank the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) for the support he has given in bringing this question to the front much more rapidly than if the movement had not had his support. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), in one of the debates upon the Budget, made the statement that he believed the Army and Navy cost us for every £1 sterling spent on them 30s.—that is to say, that we only get a £1 worth for every 30s. spent; and that being so the Estimates should be cut down at least £10,000,000 a-year. I do not know any Member of this House more competent to give a sound opinion—he has been Secretary to the Treasury, and knows how the money goes—the object then is to cut and carve upon this enormous sum of £10,000,000 wasted annually on these Services. I believe it was the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) who said a large portion was as much wasted as if it were thrown down the gutter. That being the case, we naturally turn to the composition of this Committee, and consider it in regard to the work it has to do. I look over the names and ask myself the question, how have they been selected? Are they the names of the best men we could get for the work? I do not think so. I do not complain of the nomination of Members of the Government, nor so much of Members selected from that side; but I think there might have been a much better nomination from this side. I quite understand that the Ministers of the day ought to be on the Committee; they are proposed as a matter of course, and include the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary to the Treasury. But I cannot see any reason why ex-officials and ex-Ministers should be Members of a Committee intended to inquire into and consider transactions and expenditure that grew up unchecked under the very noses of these officials and Ministers. Why should they be appointed to sit as judges upon delinquencies which occurred under their control? In my opinion, shared I know by many others, these Gentlemen should be called as witnesses to give evidence, not to make a Report. There is another reason which I think should commend itself to the judgment of the House in favour of making a slight alteration in the nominations. With the Navy Estimates in view, I look down the nominations and look in vain for the name of a single Gentleman who has any practical knowledge of ship-building, and yet we have several such among the Members of this House. There is the hon. Member for the Govan Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Pearce), a member of the largest ship-building firm on the Clyde; and, again, we have in the hon. Member for the Jarrow Division of Durham (Sir Charles Palmer) a representative of the large shipbuilding interests on the Tyne. Both these hon. Members are eminently capable of giving a sound opinion on the Estimates framed by the Admiralty for the building of ships, 13 of which I believe are to be built this year. There is not in these nominations the name of any Gentleman capable of giving a close, practical scrutiny to these Estimates. Take, for instance, such an item as £300,000 or £400,000 for the building of a ship; when this comes before the Committee there is no one to say whether this is an over-estimate or not, as either of the hon. Gentlemen I have referred to could were they on the Committee. A ship is said to have a certain displacement, tonnage, and engine power, and the cost is given, say, at £400,000, and these Gentlemen could tell you whether the ship should cost so much. No doubt, they would be able to say where the money would be wasted, and could show how the cost should be reduced probably to £300,000. But there is no Member nominated capable of putting his finger on the estimate and saying, with authority and experience, whether it is right or wrong. This is clearly a mistake. Then, again, with regard to materials, there is no Member in these nominations with practical knowledge of the value of metals and materials largely required in Army and Navy stores. Nor is there anyone, so far as I know, who knows anything about the manufacture and value of clothing or equipments required in either Service. Neither do I think, looking at the Committee as a whole, have you that element of a commercial and business character you require for the work to be done. I except the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), who is a business man. The Report from a Committee thus constituted will not be worth the paper it is printed on. Another point I wish to notice is this. The House is now composed of fully half new Members; have you this half of the House represented on the Committee? No; you have only four or five, and I say this is not dealing fairly with the House. But my great objection is that I do not consider the Committee is of such a nature as to enable us to get the Report we wish for enabling us to cut down the Expenditure of the country. A Royal Commission has just reported upon the system of patterns for warlike stores, and I would have gone into this Report a little more fully, if it were not so late, to show that this Commission has practically recommended what this Committee might be expected to do. They want a Commission appointed to assist the Government of the day. My original idea when I raised the question in the House was practically this—that a Committee should be appointed each year, that it should consist of 39 Members divisible into three sections, 13 to examine the Army Estimates, 13 the Navy, and 13 the Civil Service Estimates, presided over by Ministers of the day; and that its functions should be to assist the Government of the day, whether Tory or Liberal, to scrutinize the Estimates—going over them to see that we really get value for the money. That is really the question before us. It was objected last year that this would be to dictate a policy to the Government; but we do not wish to do that; it is to simply help the Minister of the day to see that money is not worse than wasted in the Departments. I do not intend to take up the time of the House further; I will simply move this increase in the number of the Committee, and I trust the Government will yield to the request I make. I know of Gentlemen quite willing to serve, and I am sure their additions would strengthen the Committee. There is another point I just wish to notice, a point somewhat personal to myself, and I do not dwell upon it. It is in a measure forced upon me by constant inquiries from my constituents, who are somewhat surprised, knowing that I raised this question, to find that my name is not among the nominations. I do not complain personally, but simply in my representative character, and when I am asked why it is I have not been nominated, I can only answer that I really do not know. It is usual, however, to put on a Committee the name of the Member who raised the question; but I do not dwell upon that, but move the Amendment.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I second the Motion pro formâ, not that I quite agree with the proposal, but it enables me to make some remarks on the composition of this Committee, though I care not a brass farthing whether the number is 25 or 21. I am, however, strongly of opinion that the number ought to be larger than 19, unless you get rid of some of the names on the list, as proposed. Let me say, at the outset, that naval men do not fear inquiry; they court it; but we say, if there is to be an inquiry, let it be an honest inquiry, and let the Committee be thoroughly qualified to undertake the work. I find fault with the composition of the Committee on two grounds—that men are put on the list who cannot by any possibility know anything on the subject they are called upon to inquire into; and I find fault with the list for its sins of omission. First of all, I think the object of the Committee ought to be clearly defined. We are told it is to inquire into the Army and Navy Estimates. I did my best to enlarge the scope of the inquiry, but the Government did not fall in with my views. I wanted an expression of opinion as regards the Navy—first, as to what force we really require for the defence of the Empire; next, as to what it will cost; and last, what is the amount of money you can afford to spend on it each year? whereas now the Committee is simply to cut down totals, and not to inquire into the efficiency and requirements of the Service. I have no sympathy with that kind of inquiry. And now I will, in a few words, tell you of what I complain in the composition of this Committee. First we have an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer—of course a very able man—an economist, though a new-born economist. Then we have three military officers, and I find no fault with their nomination—they have a right to be there. Then we have the First Lord of the Admiralty—quite right. But then we have an ex-First Lord of the Admiralty, who did more to injure the Service, towards the ruin of the Service, than any other man in the House. I do not want to see him on the Committee, but if he is to be put on, then let us have more men to check him by their votes. Then we have an ex-Secretary of the Admiralty who assisted that ex-First Lord in his villainous work. [Cries of "Order!"] I will withdraw the expression, if it is un-Parliamentary. I only speak in a naval sense—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member will be good enough to withdraw that expression.

ADMIRAL FIELD: Certainly, Sir. I withdraw it, and apologize to the House for having used it, but I only used the word in a political sense. There is the name of an ex-Secretary to the Admiralty who assisted a First Lord in what we naval men consider was ruinous work to the Service. We have on the Committee the Minister of War, the Secretary and ex-Secretary of the Treasury—good men, very properly placed there. And then we have two barristers! What do they know about the Army and Navy Estimates? Very competent men they doubtless are in their proper place, but that is not on this Committee. Then there is an Indian civilian; what does he know about naval and military administration? Then we have a Scotch doctor, no doubt a very able man, and he has signalized his advent to the House by being down upon all officers in either Service in the discharge of their duty. Then we have three nondescripts, not likely to bring much useful knowledge to this inquiry; and at last we have one naval man. Three soldiers to one naval man! And now for the sins of omission. One would have thought that of Members of the late Administration in the Admiralty, that at least the late Civil Lord of the Admiralty would have been put on the Committee; at all events, he has some knowledge of naval matters, being a naval officer. If you will not increase the number above 19, then eliminate one of these names, and substitute the late Civil Lord, who would bring special knowledge of the Admiralty Department, in which he did good work. When we appointed the Committee to inquire into the charges against the London Corporation—a very capable Committee—we included two assessors, because of their presumed special knowledge on the subject under inquiry, to sit but not to vote. Then, I say, why not appoint assessors in this case, even if you do not give them votes? The Financial Secretaries to the War Office and the Admiralty are men specially informed upon these Estimates, and largely responsible for the form in which they are presented to the House, and they should certainly be present to assist the Committee in their investigations. I will not detain the House further. I am not satisfied with the composition of the Committee, and I think I have shown sufficient reasons for that dissatisfaction. I do not care from which side they are selected; but if this inquiry is to be a reality and not a sham, then get men well qualified for the work they have to do.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Nineteen," in order to insert the words "Twenty-five."—(Mr. Mason.)

Question proposed, "That the word "Nineteen" stand part of the Question."

Admiral Field

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have listened with great interest to the two speeches the House has heard; but I am sorry to say I do not see my way to accept the Amendment the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mason) has moved. Our object is to obtain a Report from the Committee as rapidly as possible, and all experience has shown that large Committees cannot deal with a subject so rapidly as smaller ones. The hon. Member has referred to a precedent of some years ago, when a larger Committee was appointed; but if he had gone to the last and most important appointment of such a Committee for many years, that of 1849, he would have found that the number was only 13, when originally appointed, though it may have been increased afterwards. I will venture to appeal to business men, whether a large body of men sitting and examining witnesses on questions of this kind, do not, must not necessarily, occupy a great deal more time in arriving at the facts of the case than a smaller body of men. The hon. Member remarked upon the absence of the names of certain Members, and he has done justice to the Government for the nominations on this side; with the other side we have had nothing to do; but in reference to his remarks, I would say that the knowledge of those Members he referred to can be best availed of by calling them as witnesses rather than by placing them on the Committee. With regard to one of the Gentlemen, I think he is a contractor for the Government at the present moment, and, therefore, it is scarcely desirable that he should be appointed to sit in judgment upon questions in which he is more or less interested. We desire to obtain for service on the Committee Gentlemen trained to affairs of business, who will present a Report for the guidance of the House on questions of very great importance. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Admiral Field) has gone through the list and has shown reasons why some of the names put on the Paper should be placed on the Committee, and I think, myself, it is only right that every view of the case should be represented. The hon. and gallant Member is well able, on his part, to defend the interests of the Service with which he is connected; but the names on the list were, in a great measure, inserted at the instance of Gentlemen representing the Services; and, so far as the Government are concerned, we are practically responsible for only a few names, which we intended to represent the calm, sober judgment of Members who have not expressed any opinion on the questions involved, possessed of sound judgment, and capable of devoting time to the consideration of these important matters. I hope we may be now allowed to proceed with the nominations of the 19 Members; and if it should appear desirable that other names should be substituted for some of these, no doubt we can make the alteration on a later day.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 31: Majority 89.—(Div. List, No. 187.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Lord George Hamilton, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Childers, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Caine, and Sir William Crossman, nominated Members of the Committee.

Question proposed, "That Mr. Jennings be a Member of the Committee."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think, Sir, it would be desirable if the Government would allow the names of two Members to be withdrawn, in order that two naval men might be substituted for them. I do not like to propose that Mr. Jennings and Captain Cotton should withdraw; but I think that perhaps Mr. Picton and Sir William Plowden might do so to make room for two more naval Members.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the better course would be to allow the Committee to be appointed as it stands, and then, if the hon. Member who has just spoken can, by making representations to the hon. Gentlemen who conduct business of this character on his own side of the House, induce any hon. Member to withdraw from the Committee, the Government will be perfectly ready to substitute another name. The hon. Gentleman is very well aware that there is an understanding as to the appointment of these Committees, and in the absence of the hon. Gentlemen themselves it would not be courtesy for the Government to depart from that understanding. As regards the two or three Members mentioned by the hon.

Gentleman, we could not accept any change in their absence.

MR. GEDGE (Stockport): As my hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Jennings) is not here, I wish to say that this is a subject to which he has given great attention, especially from the point of view of economy, and I think that it would be a great mistake if the House were not to have the advantage of his services on the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question, "That Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy, Mr. James Campbell, Captain Cotton, Admiral Mayne, Dr. Cameron, and Sir William Plowden be Members of the Committee," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Mr. Picton be a Member of the Committee."

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I object to that name, Sir; and I should like to move, in spite of what the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has said, that the name of the late Civil Lord of the Admiralty should be substituted for it.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman can object to a name, but he cannot propose another without Notice. Does the hon. and gallant Gentleman object to the name?

ADMIRAL FIELD: Yes, Sir; I do, very strongly.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question, "That Colonel Nolan and Mr. Sexton be Members of the Committee," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum."

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Hoderness): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether this Committee will have in its power the decision of matters of policy, or whether it will only deal with the method in which the money has been expended? The answer to this question may make a great deal of difference respecting our views with regard to the composition of the Committee.

MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the observation of my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that the Committee was never intended in any way whatever to lessen the responsibility of the Government of the day. When the Government accepted the suggestion of my noble Friend the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) that the Committee should be appointed, my noble Friend said that he intended to reserve to the Government the full responsibility of policy; and I, in assenting to the appointment of the Committee in principle, reserved to the Government full responsibility. The duties of the Committee will be carefully to examine the Estimates item by item, and to report whether the money voted by Parliament has been wisely and economically applied, and whether the country has got a good and full return for it.

Question put, and agreed to.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS
(NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Baron Henry De Worms, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Boscombe and Bridlington, ordered to be brought in by Baron Henry De Worms and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 276.]

METROPOLIS (CABLE STREET, SHADWELL) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, for the improvement of an unhealthy area at Shadwell, within the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stuart-Wortley and Mr. Secretary Matthews.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 277.]

METROPOLIS (SHELTON STREET, ST. GILES'S) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, for the improvement of an unhealthy area at St. Giles in the Fields, within the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stuart-Wortley and Mr. Secretary Matthews.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 278.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 7th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
Resolutions [June 6] reported.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Second Reading—Westminster (Parliament Street, &c.) Improvements.*

Mr. W. H. Smith

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Law Agents (Scotland) Act (1873) Amendment* [284]; Intermediate Education (Wales) (No. 2)* [285].

Committee — Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [217] [Thirteenth Night]—R.P.

Committee — Report — Deeds of Arrangement Registration [231-233].

Considered as amended—First Offenders [169], debate adjourned.

Withdrawn—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment (No. 3)* [219].

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* [279]; Local Government (No. 5)* [280]; Local Government (No. 6)* [281]; Local Government (No. 7)* [282].

Second Reading—Local Government (No. 3)* [268]; Local Government (No. 4)* [269].

NOTICE OF MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to give Notice that on this day fortnight I shall call attention to the manner in which Public Business is being conducted; to the fact that the Local Loans Bill of 21 Clauses was hurried through its Second Reading on Monday night without any explanation on the part of the Minister in charge of it, and without debate; also to the fact that many weeks have been consumed by prolonged debates on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, to the almost total exclusion of other Business; and to move—

"That this House, while prepared to give a general support to the Government in the management of Business, is of opinion that too much time having been already spent in its consideration, the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill should be passed through its remaining stages within a short and limited period."

QUESTIONS.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a Circular has been issued by the Inspector General of Constabulary in Ireland to the different police stations throughout the country calling on the men to subscribe funds to purchase a horse and jaunting car as a Jubilee offering to the Queen; whether the said Circular requires the sergeant in each station to note down the names of non-subscribers; and, whether, in that case, he will consider the propriety of taking steps to protect the men who may not desire to subscribe from becoming marked men, and as such subject to injury, dismissal, or other unfair treatment? The hon. Member observed that he had received a letter from a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary complaining that he had been obliged to give.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am quite unable to account for the hon. Member receiving such a letter, as no such Circular as that alluded to in the Question has been issued.

Mr. CONYBEARE: Would the right hon. Gentleman like a copy of the Circular? [Cries of "Read it!"]

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no Circular of the kind.

TRINIDAD—THE PITCH LAKE.

Mr. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the reason for the delay in issuing licences for the working of that portion of the Pitch Lake, in Trinidad, hitherto reserved; whether it is true that the Government of Trinidad are considering an offer of £10,000 a-year, from the present lessees, to secure exclusive rights; and, whether, if the Lake were kept open to public competition of lessees, the receipts of Revenue would not be greater than the rental mentioned in the above offer?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): Licences have not been issued for getting pitch from the reserved portion of the Lake, because the Colonial Government and Legislature are considering an offer by the lessees of the other part of the Lake to take a lease of the whole on terms which would insure a minimum royalty of £10,000 a-year. From the information in my possession, I have no reason to think that a greater revenue would be obtained by offering the lease of the reserved portion to public competition; but I am not prepared to answer the Question more definitely until the opinion of the Colonial Legislature has been ascertained.

VOL. CXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

UNITED STATES — EMIGRATION OF PAUPER FAMILIES FROM IRELAND.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Have the Government any information as to the refusal of the American authorities to allow 14 families, emigrated from County Mayo by Robert Vesey Stoney, esquire, J.P. D.L., of Rossturk, to be landed in New York yesterday, on the ground that they were paupers; and, will any precautions be taken to prevent landlords emigrating pauper families without making any provision for them on their arrival in America?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The 14 families referred to appear to have been landed and to have proceeded to their destination. Some families arriving subsequently in another ship were detained; but were afterwards permitted to land and proceed to their friends. The Local Government Board are paying particular attention to prevent the emigration of pauper families without due provision awaiting them on arrival at their destination.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked, whether the Government would say where Mr. Stoney got the money from for emigrating these people, and what precautions he took for weeding out a certain portion of his tenantry and supplementing them by others; whether, in fact, all Protestants were refused emigration, which was strictly confined to Roman Catholics?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR replied, that he had no information on these points.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say where the money comes from?

[No reply.]

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — CLASSIFICATION OF TEACHERS.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a rule of the Commissioners of National Education, that first-class teachers may be depressed in classification should their schools not maintain a fair standard of proficiency; and, if so, whether first-class candidates, and candidates for the first division of first-class, will be allowed to go forward for promotion upon merely giving notice of their intention?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): By a long-established Rule all teachers are liable to depression in classification should their schools decline in usefulness and efficiency. The interests of education require that satisfactory school-keeping must be regarded as a condition precedent of allowing teachers to seek promotion in classification.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) INQUIRY COMMISSION—THE REPORT.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Report of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Inquiry Commission will be circulated; and, when he will be in a position to state what action the Government propose to take in reference to the matters dealt with in this Report? The hon. Member observed that since the Question had been put down the Report of the Commission had been circulated.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As the hon. Member has observed, the Report has been circulated. I am closely watching the course of events in the Unions, and shall be prepared to state in a few days the nature of the steps which the Government think necessary to take under the circumstances.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—THE ARABS OF SUAKIN.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that—and, if so, what evidence Colonel Kitchener had that these particular Arabs were implicated in the murder of Lieutenant Stewart; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the policy of fomenting disturbances between different tribes of Arabs in the neighbourhood of Suakin?

“A party of the Bishareen Tribe, acting under instructions from Colonel Kitchener, have attacked and burned a colony, consisting of 300 huts, situated near Rowayah, and inhabited by Jeddameen Arabs, who were implicated in the murder of Lieutenant Stewart, of Her Majesty's sloop Garnet. The Bishareen also took 13 prisoners;”

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's ship

Mr. Dillon

Dolphin was sent to Mersa Halaib, the scene of the attack on the boat of Her Majesty's ship Garnet, to make inquiries and punish the outrage. The Commander convinced himself that the attack had been made by a party of Hatemes, a slave-dealing Colony from the Jeddah District, which had been settled near Mersa Halaib for the last three years. He proceeded to the village with a small force, but found it deserted, as the inhabitants had been warned of his approach. He burned down the village, consisting of about 50 wretched mud huts, and captured two prisoners, one of whom admitted that the Hatemes had fired on the boat.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT—RENEWAL AND AMENDMENT.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the following facts: that the Employers' Liability Act will expire this year; that a Select Committee last Session, after collecting much evidence, unanimously reported in favour of its renewal with amendments; that the noble Lord the then Leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill) last Session distinctly pledged the Government to introduce a Bill to so renew and amend the Act; that such promise has been more than once repeated by the Government this Session, he will without further delay obtain leave to introduce the Bill, so that it may be forthwith printed and in the hands of Members?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I regret that circumstances beyond my control have delayed the introduction of this Bill. I hope to lay it on the table before there is any reasonable prospect of the House being able to deal with it.

EXCISE—ADULTERATION OF BEER.

MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to his statement to the deputation that waited on him on the 5th of April last on the subject of pure beer, that the Excise officers would render every possible assistance in the way of analyzing samples with a view of detecting adulteration, Whether any samples had been so obtained and analyzed; and, if so, with what result?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Since I conferred with the deputation in question 18 samples of beer have been purchased from various publicans; and, as I understand, they were chosen by the hon. Member for the Southern Division of Suffolk (Mr. Quilter). They were submitted to careful analysis by the analysts at Somerset House; and I am able to inform the House that in no single case was there any trace of adulteration by anything noxious, or otherwise detrimental. On the contrary, the beers were pure, genuine, and of high alcoholic strength. This statement fully corroborates the correctness of the view maintained by the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, South): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he can inform the House whether the samples that were obtained were obtained by officers of the Excise of the district, who were presumably well known to the different publicans, or whether they were purchased by the public over the bar in the ordinary course of business?

MR. GOSCHEN: I understand that the samples were arranged for by the hon. Member himself.

MR. QUILTER: With the permission of the House I beg to make a personal explanation. With the exception of indicating the localities in which they might be procured, I had nothing to do with it. They were procured by means of the Excise Department, and, I presume, by officers of the Excise. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will ascertain exactly how they were procured.

MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member wishes for any further inquiry it shall be made; but I understood that the samples were obtained from publicans indicated through the means of my hon. Friend.

MR. QUILTER: I am very unwilling to detain the House; but I venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will at some future date, if not now, answer my Question as to whether the samples were obtained by the officers of Excise of the district or the public?

PROCLAIMED MEETINGS (IRELAND)—
PROTESTANT HOME RULE ASSOCIATION, KILKEEL.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the attempted suppression of the meeting, convened under the auspices of the Irish Protestant Home Rule Association, at Kilkeel, County Down, on the 25th May last; whether he is aware on what day the placards announcing this meeting were first posted in and about Kilkeel; on what date the placard summoning the opposition meeting first appeared; whether the meeting was proclaimed at the instigation of the local landlords; if the magistrates who signed the proclamation were the local landlord, Lord Kilmorey, and his land agent, Mr. John Quinn Henry; whether it is in accordance with practice for a landlord and his agent to act together as Justices in the same case; and, whether he will state the name of the informant, and supply a copy of the information referred to in this proclamation, and give the name of the magistrate before whom same was sworn?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have not received even now such full information on the subject as I should have wished; but, from the telegrams submitted to me, I gather that the meeting was not announced by placard. The meeting was prohibited by the magistrates named, at whose instance, or upon whose information, I cannot say, the magistrates having acted independently of the Government, and on their own responsibility entirely. I believe it is not usual for landlords and their agents to act together as Justices in the same cases. I am unable to give the information asked for in the last paragraph of the Question; but I intend to make further inquiries.

MR. M'CARTAN asked, was the Chief Secretary aware of the fact that the magistrates who signed the proclamation were Lord Kilmorey and his agent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I am aware that such is the case.

MR. M'CARTAN: And that Lord Kilmorey came over from England to prevent a meeting of his Nationalist tenants; and, whether, under the circumstances, the Government will order a prosecution of Lord Kilmorey and his agent for having criminally conspired for preventing these people from doing what they had a legal right to do

[No reply.]

WAR OFFICE — ARMY CONTRACTS — CONTRACT FOR SWORD BAYONETS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a contract has been given to Messrs. Wilkinson for about 150,000 sword bayonets; whether they are of the same pattern as those against which the Royal Commission has recently reported; what is the price, length, and strength of these bayonets; whether they are intended for use on the Henry-Martini or the proposed new rifle; and, if the latter, what portions of the new rifle have been already decided upon, so as to justify the order for so large a number of the bayonets which will be attached to them?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Yes, Sir; a contract has been given to Messrs. Wilkinson for 150,000 sword bayonets. No adverse Report on the Enfield-Martini sword bayonets was made by the recent Royal Commission. It is not desirable, in the interests of the contractors, to publish the price to be given for these bayonets; but I shall have no objection to state the same privately to my hon. Friend. The length of the blade is 18½ inches, and it must stand a vertical pressure of not less than 160 lb. before deviating from the perpendicular; also to be sprung round a curved block (depth of curve 2½ inches), and to stand a spring of 1 inch without taking a permanent set; also to be struck flatwise on back and edge in a mechanical striking machine, the weight of each blow to be from 168 lb. to 170 lb. These bayonets will answer either for the Martini-Henry or for the new rifle. This supply has been ordered to meet the demands of the Navy, and to provide bayonets for arms which will be ready by the time this contract is completed.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPH LINE TO CHARLESTOWN.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Postmaster General, What is the cause of delay in completing the telegraph line to Charlestown, County Mayo; and, whether he will cause the line to be immediately completed?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University), in reply, said, the telegraph line to Charlestown was erected some time ago; but owing to a question having arisen as to certain irregularities in the post office there it was thought advisable to defer the completion of the extension. The extension had now been finished, and the office was opened for telegraphic business that day.

PARLIAMENT — REMUNERATION OF WITNESSES ATTENDING PARLIA-MENTARY COMMITTEES.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case that witnesses attending Parliamentary Committees from the country are allowed reasonable sums of money on account of absence from home in addition to expenses of their journey to London and back; and, if so, why witnesses from the Metropolis are not allowed a like compensation for enforced absence from their homes and occupations?

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS) (Kent, St. Augustine's): Witnesses attending before Select Committees of the House of Commons are paid in accordance with a scale which was approved by the Speaker in 1882. Under this scale witnesses residing in or near the Metropolis are not entitled to remuneration; but there is nothing to prevent the Treasury from making a payment in any case which may be recommended by the Select Committee as one of hardship or for other special reason.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—ENCLO-SURES IN REGENT'S PARK.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Royal Botanical Gardens and the Toxophilite Grounds form part of the Regent's Park; and, whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have any powers of control over these Societies; and, if so, or, in any case, it would be possible to increase their utility and beneficence by the admission of the general public to their grounds, under certain conditions, at stated times?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he had made inquiries as to this subject, which, he understood, was one entirely for the Treasury Authorities, and the Question ought, therefore, to be directed to the Secretary to the Treasury.

WAR OFFICE—THE CHESIL BEACH (PORTLAND)—REMOVAL OF WRECKS.

COLONEL HAMBRO (Dorset, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Chesil Beach between Portland and Wyke Regis is under the jurisdiction of the War Office; and, if it is not, under whose jurisdiction it is; and, if under the War Office, would he, in the interests of the fishermen of Portland and Wyke Regis, give orders for the removal or blowing up of the remains of some wrecks which prevent the fishermen using their nets; or, if he declines to do so, if he will allow private individuals to remove the same in the best way they can?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It has been decided that these wrecks shall be destroyed by the Royal Engineers by means of submarine mines. Steps will be taken to carry this out as soon as possible.

INDIA—THE PISHEEN VALLEY RAILROAD.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in The Times of 6th June, that the Government of India contemplates carrying the Pisheen Valley Railroad over the Khojak; what would be the cost of such an extension; to what point would the line be carried; and, will this House receive information before any further extensions of railway in the direction of Candahar are undertaken?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GOSER) (Chatham): No scheme has yet been adopted by the Government of India for carrying the Pisheen Valley Railway over the Amram Range, either by the Khojak or any other route. So soon as any designs for extending the railway are adopted, the Secretary of State will be happy to communicate the same to Parliament, should it be consistent with the interests of the Public Service to do so. I may remind the hon. Member that the British frontier is on the north-west or Candahar side of the Amram range.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH—CHANGE OF VENUE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Attorney General for Ireland,

Whether his attention has been called to the following report in The Freeman's Journal of the 2nd instant:—

"Yesterday, in the Queen's Bench Division, in the case of the 'Queen v. Fisher,' Mr. Morphy, on the part of the defendant, Fisher, an emergency man, against whom a true bill for murder was found at the last Kerry Assizes, applied that the venue be changed from Kerry to Cork. The defendant fired at and shot a person who he supposed was about to attack him, and he apprehended that he would not get a fair trial in Kerry.

"Mr. Atkinson, Q.C., with whom was Mr. Ronan (instructed by Mr. Morphy, Crown Solicitor for Kerry), said there was no objection to the venue being changed to the City of Cork.

"Order accordingly."

and, whether such report is correct; and, if so, under what law or statute the Court of Queen's Bench acted?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): My attention was first directed to this case by the Question of the hon. Member. The Queen's Bench has at Common Law jurisdiction to change the venue in the case of any indictment removed into that Court by certiorari, as was done in this case.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is it the fact that the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench is limited to the removal of cases into the Court of Queen's Bench?

MR. HOLMES: When the case has been removed into the Queen's Bench they can order the venue to be changed.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Then what is the object of Clause 4 of the Bill?

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW—PROFESSOR OF SCOTS LAW.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the appointment has yet been made to the office of Professor of Scots Law in the University of Glasgow; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): There has been no delay in this matter. The resignation of Professor Berry was sent in only about three weeks ago, and the matter is now under consideration.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) — DEFECTIVE WEAPONS — SWORD BAYONETS OF THE CITY OF LONDON ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received the Report as to the sword bayonets of the City of London Artillery Volunteers; and whether an order has been issued to the Commanding Officers of Volunteer regiments forbidding them to test their bayonets; and, if so, why?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): A Report has been received from Colonel Hope, the officer commanding the 1st City of London Artillery Volunteers, from which it appears that 19 sword bayonets belonging to that corps were tested, some by being thrust into a bundle of cotton waste, surrounded by from four to six inches of straw, and some by being bent against the ground. As these weapons were, by direction of the Military Authorities, not sharpened in peace time, there is nothing surprising in their bending under the first test; while as regards the second test, the pressure may, for all we know, have been more severe than the weapon could or ought to sustain. Orders have been issued that Commanding Officers of Volunteers are not to apply to the weapons of their corps arbitrary tests of their own selection. If any Commanding Officer doubts the efficiency of his weapons, he should ask that they may be properly tested by experts, instead of himself inventing and applying tests. Speaking generally, I may say that the bayonets of the Artillery Volunteers will be tested as soon as the re-testing of those in the hands of the Militia have been completed. As regards the Infantry Volunteers, their bayonets are of an obsolete pattern, and it is not proposed to re-test them. They will be exchanged for bayonets of the Martini-Henry pattern as soon as sufficient are released from the Regular troops on the issue of the new rifle. I am anxious to make this clear, because some time must elapse before the exchange can be effected.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—DRAWING IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Who the Local Inspectors, mentioned in Clause 2, paragraph 8, of the recent Minute relating to aid to drawing in elementary schools, are; who appoints them; what qualifications have they in art or in teaching power; and, inasmuch as the Local Inspectors have, under paragraph 12 of the same clause, to award the marks "excellent," "good," "fair," or "failure," as the case may be, after taking into consideration the method, time of instruction, and the provision of examples, whether the Government will take care that only duly qualified judges of drawing shall be appointed to the position of Local Inspector?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The names of the Local Inspectors will be found on page 2 of the The Calendar and General Directory of the Science and Art Department for the present year. They are appointed year by year by the Department, and care is taken that they should be fully qualified for the duties they have to fulfil. But the award under paragraph 12 does not depend upon their judgment alone, or even to any great extent. That is made almost altogether on an examination by the technical examiners of the Department, who are certificated Art masters, of the works executed by the children in the presence of the Local Inspectors.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICCTIONS IN CO. MAYO.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) (for Mr. CRILLY) (Mayo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact, as stated in The Evening Standard of 6th June, that Her Majesty's gunboat Banterer has been ordered to proceed from Westport, County Mayo, with the Sheriff of Mayo, his bailiffs, a force of police, and a Resident Magistrate, to carry out 12 evictions on Clare Island, 20 evictions on Innisturk, and a number on Inniskea, in Clare Bay; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in the assistance of the naval forces to aid the soldiers and the police who are now engaged in carrying out evictions in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I think it not improbable that the statement of fact in the first paragraph is correct, though, as the Question is down without Notice, I have no specific information on the subject. The Government will not hesitate, in case of necessity, to employ any force at their disposal to carry out the decrees of the Courts of Law.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer me this Question—whether the Government, before they take this step, will make inquiry whether during the greater part of last year the whole population of the Island were not supported by public charity connected with this country?

Mr. Hanbury

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am perfectly willing to make inquiry on the point, though at this moment I fail to see its bearing upon the Question which the hon. Member puts to me.

ROYAL PARKS AND PLEASURE GARDENS — KEW GARDENS — PARTIAL CLOSURE ON WHIT MONDAY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Museums and Tropical Houses in Kew Gardens were closed on Whit Monday last; and, if so, why; and, whether he will make arrangements to have these buildings open to the public on general holidays in future?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, that the Museums and Gardens were open on Whit Monday to the public. That was the usual rule on holidays, and it would be adhered to.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—SERGEANT MURPHY.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Sergeant Murphy, of the Metropolitan Police, stationed at Her Majesty's Dockyard, Devonport, and who (as reported in The Western Daily Mercury of the 21st May, by the correspondent of that paper) has been degraded by the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police for supposed drunkenness, the fact being that Sergeant Murphy was at the time suffering from illness, and was ordered to be removed to the Royal Naval Hospital by one of the Dockyard doctors; and whether he will inquire into the case; and, if the facts are as reported, direct the Chief Commissioner to reinstate Sergeant Murphy?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Commissioner that this man was reported drunk on the 12th of May, and was accordingly suspended. On the 14th he was reduced. It was after this that, probably from the effects of drink, he became so excited that he had to be removed to the hospital. I must decline to interfere with the discretion of the Commissioner in awarding punishments in such cases.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—LEGISLATION OF THE SESSION.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What measures, if any, other than the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, the Government intends to proceed with this Session; and, what means the Government will adopt to enable the House to consider such measures, as well as the Bills of private Members, for which no opportunity of discussion has hitherto been found?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am not in a position to inform the hon. and learned Gentleman what measures the Government will proceed with other than the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill during the present Session. The progress which has been made with that Bill is not sufficient to justify me in anticipating the day on which it will pass through this House. Till then I cannot state, or see distinctly, what the course of Public Business is likely to be; and I cannot say what measures, if any, other than the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill the Government will think it right to press upon the attention of the House. That answer will apply also to the second part of the hon. and learned Member's Question. I shall possibly find it my duty to ask the House to take some measures to promote the greater despatch of Public Business. I hope it may not be necessary to do so; but I am not in a position to do so at this moment.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: What is the nature of these measures, and when is the right hon. Gentleman likely to make his demand?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not in a position to do so, Sir.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): How does the Government propose to fulfil its pledge, given early in the Session, that this House would not part with the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill till it was in possession of the Irish Land Law Bill, which seems to have fallen asleep, or dropped out of existence, in "another place?"

MR. W. H. SMITH: By the honourable fulfilment of the engagements made by the Government in this House.

In answer to Mr. BURT (Morpeth),

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Government were most anxious to provide facilities for the discussion of the Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Bill; and if it were agreeable to hon. Gentlemen interested in the measure, the Government would endeavour that it should be reached at half-past 11 or 12 o'clock on Thursday night. He was not at present in a position to give an evening for the discussion of the question.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—ACCIDENT TO A WORKMAN.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will provide that out of the £17,000 recently voted for the Jubilee Service in Westminster Abbey, a sufficient compensation shall be paid to the family or relatives of the workman who has been killed, and to the other workmen who have been, or may be, injured in the course of their duty upon the said work?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government are not liable for accidents to workmen in the employment of contractors, and that must be my answer to the Question of the hon. Member, though they deeply regret that any person employed under these circumstances should meet with so serious and fatal an accident.

EGYPT—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CON- VENTION—FRANCE AND THE NEW HEBRIDES—THE PAPERS.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question, of which I gave him private Notice yesterday, When the Government will be able to lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to the Egyptian Convention, and also any Correspondence which has taken place between the Government and the Government of France in relation to the New Hebrides?

Sir George Campbell

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): With regard to the Egyptian Convention, I hope it will be in the power of the Government to lay Papers on the Table in the course of a few days. With regard to the New Hebrides, negotiations are still in progress; but they have been undoubtedly delayed. But that is not due to any laches on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, I am unable to give any undertaking in regard to that part of the Question.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—ACCOMMODATION FOR SERVANTS OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, Whether, in the arrangements that had been made for the 21st of June, any provision had been made for the minor servants of the House, to whom they were all much indebted?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sure every Member of the House will be exceedingly glad if it is possible to make any such provision. I am only a Member of the Committee; but I will take care that the matter is brought to the notice of the Committee.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON MARKET TOLLS—NOMINATION OF THE COM- MITTEE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked when the Committee on Market Tolls would be selected, and whether attention would be paid to the Irish branch of the subject; and also whether in the selection of it some attention would be paid to the Irish Members?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he would take care the subject was not lost sight of.

POST OFFICE—EAST INDIA AND CHINA MAIL CONTRACT.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.), asked Whether, as a great number of hon. Members took a great interest in the question of the contract for the conveyance of mails to the East, the First Lord of the Treasury would pledge himself that the Resolution on the subject should be brought on for discussion by half-past 10 or 11 o'clock at night?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he was anxious, as much as possible, to consult the convenience of hon. Members; but he was afraid he would not be able to bring on the mail contracts at so early an hour, unless they had extraordinary and rapid progress with the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, which he hoped might be the case. In such circumstances, he should endeavour to meet the hon. Member's wishes.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that last night, when the Vote was on, the Postmaster General stated to the House that they would have an opportunity of discussing the question of these contracts, and that on that understanding they did not continue the discussion?

MR. W. H. SMITH replied, that he hoped there would be an opportunity for discussing the question of these contracts; but it was impossible for him to make any engagement in the present condition of Public Business, unless the House would itself assist the Government in forwarding that Business.

MR. PROVAND said, the right hon. Gentleman himself said it might come on at 12 o'clock. Now, as this was a most important matter, he would ask him to consent to its being taken at 11 o'clock?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say that I cannot meet the hon. Gentleman's wish.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 23rd May.]

[THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SPECIAL JURY AND REMOVAL OF TRIAL.

Clause 3 (Order for special jury).

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): With the permission of the Committee, and for the benefit of those hon. Gentlemen who have not, perhaps, gone through the Amendments on the Paper, I will follow the example which was set the other day by the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I rise to a point of Order. On a former occasion the course which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes to adopt was taken by the First Lord of the Treasury, who wasted about a quarter of an hour, which resulted in no advantage whatever. Unless hon. Members are to have the right to discuss the statement the right hon. Gentleman proposes to make, I respectfully submit that that statement will not be in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled, as a right, to make a statement except with the consent of the Committee. [Cries of "No!" from the Irish Members.] It is, however, generally permitted to a Minister in the position of the right hon. Gentleman to do so when it is for the convenience of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall not detain the Committee long.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I rise to Order. You have just stated, Mr. Courtney, that the right hon. Gentleman is not in Order in making a statement, unless he does so with the consent of the Committee, and that consent, at present, has not been given.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I understand that the right hon. Gentleman desires to make a statement which it would be for the convenience of the Committee that he should make. That being so, I think, having regard to the universal practice of the House, that the House is in the habit of consenting to that course being adopted in the interests of Public Business; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will, therefore, be allowed to make his statement.

THE CHAIRMAN: In regard to the point of Order raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I may say that it is not necessary that every single voice should consent to a statement being made.

MR. LABOUCHERE: In this case it was not a single voice, but a good many voices.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): The point is, whether hon. Members will be allowed to discuss the statement if the right hon. Gentleman is allowed to make one?

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not, of course, mean to discuss the merits of any Amendment on the Paper; but I may remind the House that, while the Amendments to this clause yesterday amounted to the modest number of six, they have grown since to 55.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is in Order, seeing that it is an indirect attempt to fasten an unfair charge upon hon. Members who have put Amendments on the Paper?

THE CHAIRMAN: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman must refrain from making any charges, direct or indirect, against hon. Members, or from entering into debateable matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am bound to deny that I had the slightest intention of casting any aspersion on any hon. Member, either directly or indirectly, or of raising any controversial matter; but as a large section of the Committee appears to object to my making a statement I will not do so.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to move, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 7, after the first word "where," to insert the words "after the passing of this Act." The 2nd section of the Bill specifies a number of offences, and provides that they shall be tried by a summary tribunal specially composed, and consisting of men of such experience and legal knowledge as the Lord Chancellor may be advised to appoint. It will be remembered that the Government, when they were defending the 2nd clause of the Bill, stated that the reason why they had provided that it should not have a retrospective operation was because there was to be a new tribunal to decide questions of law and fact; and for that reason, and on that ground, they based their proposal to make the 2nd sub-section of the 2nd clause prospective instead of retrospective. Then I would ask the Committee to consider whether there are not far stronger grounds for determining that the operation of the 3rd clause should not be retrospective? Certainly, the grounds are much stronger than those which seem to have actuated the Government in the former case and on which they professed to act—namely, that a serious change has been made in the procedure for the trial of these offences. The Committee will remember that the cases which gave rise to the Juries Act in Ireland were principally these—the Sheriffs of the various counties in Ireland were in the habit of selecting the juries, and the manner in which they selected them was so abominable that it became a perfect scandal, so much so that the Government of the day—for at that time the general sense of Parliament condemned the action of the Sheriffs and Sub-Sheriffs in empannelling juries—provided a very high qualification in the hope of getting the jury panel to work more easily. Now, the peculiarity of the decision on that occasion, and it is the matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee, was this—that the Parliament of this country decided that the persons who were charged with the selection of the jurors should not be entrusted with the power of empannelling juries. Now, the object of this clause is altogether the reverse, and it will give to a particular class not merely the empannelling and selection of the jurors, but will enable them to try every case themselves. Over more than one-half of Ireland the qualification for a special juror is £150, and, consequently, the privilege is confined to landlords, land agents, and persons of that class. If when the power of selecting jurors was in the hands of the same individual it became a scandal and a reproach, and Parliament found it necessary to take it from them, surely, at the present time, when agrarianism is really the matter the Government profess to aim at, their proposal to hand over to a class who have so disgraced themselves and so dishonoured the administration of justice in the trial of the guilt or innocence of their political opponents is preposterous. It is quite plain that if the Government were of opinion that to hand over the summary jurisdiction in minor offences to two Resident Magistrates with special legal knowledge and experience was such a serious thing that they would not make the operation of the clause retrospective, then, a fortiori, in this case a trial by a special jury in Ireland is a far more serious matter. It is for these reasons that I think my Amendment which proposes that past indictments—indictments already found—should not be subjected to the operation of this clause—that, in point of fact, the operation of the section should be prospective and not retrospective. Feeling that the principle contained in the Amendment is manifestly one which, after the decision upon the 2nd clause, the Committee ought manifestly to adopt, I beg to propose the Amendment which stands on the Paper in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 7, after the word "where," insert the words "after the passing of this Act."
—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The argument of the hon. Gentleman appears to be directed against the principle of having special juries at all, rather than against the retrospective action of the clause. An objection to retrospective legislation may be perfectly valid in its proper place; but on this occasion it has very little application to the clause under discussion. The Government are of opinion that if a crime were committed—for instance, between to-day and the time of the passing of the Act—it ought to be punished by the machinery provided by this clause. That being so, it is impossible for the Government to accept an Amendment which would practically give immunity to all offences committed between this time and the time when the Act will become law. Under these circumstances, the Government cannot accept either the Amendment or a subsequent one by the hon. Member, which deals with the same question.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is not a fact that the Government have themselves, on a recent occasion—I think the 2nd of June—in the case of the Kerry Emergency men, obtained or assented to a change of venue? I also wish to know how many prisoners are now awaiting their trial in Ireland? Further, is it a fact that at the last Clare and Limerick Assizes there was a change of venue, so that before the Bill comes into operation at all the men now in prison will have to suffer an additional three months' imprisonment? As some of them may be detained in prison, in view of the possible passing of this Bill, I want to know how many prisoners there are in Ireland now awaiting trial to whom this section will apply?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I do not think I should be in Order if I were to discuss questions that have reference to another clause of the Bill. Later on the question of change of venue will more properly come on for discussion. In regard to the number of prisoners now awaiting trial in Ireland, I am unable to give the hon. and learned Gentleman the information he desires; but if he will put a Question on the Paper in an ordinary way, I will obtain information on the points to which he has referred. I believe that what occurred at the Clare and Limerick Assizes was due to the action of the Court itself.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No; to the action of the Crown.

MR. HOLMES: I am not able to enter further into the matter now.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has told the Committee that if the Government were to accept the Amendment, and were to confine the operation of the clause to cases which may arise after the passing of the Act, a certain number of offenders would obtain immunity; but he seems to have overlooked the fact that in Ireland, considering the weakness of the evidence in many of the cases brought on for trial, Irish juries evince quite as much readiness as English juries to convict, and, in fact, a good deal more. I only rose for the purpose of pointing out to the Committee that, in refusing to accept this Amendment, the Government will secure for themselves the right of selecting from a jury panel containing 200 or 250 names any 12 they may consider reliable, and they will have no difficulty either in obtaining special jurors, or in selecting those whom they know will convict.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I understand that the question raised by the hon. Member below the Gangway is the substitution of a common jury for a special jury in cases of treason and treason-felony. Therefore, as I understand the objection, it is one which is raised against the whole of the clause. Personally, I shall vote against the clause; but I think it is unnecessary to discuss the Amendments which are proposed to be made in it. I do not feel sure that the question which has been raised by the hon. Member will be best discussed on this clause; and, in regard to prisoners now awaiting trial, their cases are those in which indictments have already been found. What I would venture to suggest is that the best course for the opponents of the Bill to pursue would be to confine the discussion of the provisions of the measure to points which raise what may be called vital principles in the various clauses, and to divide against every clause by way of protest against the Bill generally. That seems to me to be a reasonable way for the Opposition to assert their views with respect to the principle of the Bill, and I hope it will be the course that will be pursued. We shall, in that case, be able to record our protest against the clause, and that protest will remain upon the records of Parliament.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I think the advice which has just been given to my hon. Friends by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) is good advice, and I have no doubt that they will pay the attention to it which it deserves, as coming from one of such great experience in the usages and traditions of the House as that which is possessed by the right hon. Gentleman. I, too, think, in view of the late period of the Session at which the Committee has arrived, and the vast number of principles of vital importance which still remain to be discussed in the remaining clauses of the Bill, that my hon. Friends, who have conducted the opposition to this Bill up to the present moment with such skill, judgment, and courage, would do well to select from among the Amendments on the Paper those which they deem to be absolutely indispensable to press upon the attention of the Committee. It is obvious that the time will not be sufficient to allow of full discussion, or, indeed, any sort of discussion, upon the smaller points which my hon. Friends are desirous to bring before the attention of the Committee. I speak with great diffidence as one who has not been able to take any part in the proceedings in Committee up to the present moment, and consequently as one who is liable to incur the imputation of insufficient knowledge of what has been going on in his absence. Still, as far as my humble opinion goes, I would strongly support the advice given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and I will ask my hon. Friends to select those matters of pressing, urgent, and vital importance which they desire to press on the Committee, and to claim from this Committee with the utmost fearlessness, and with the utmost determination, that a full opportunity shall be afforded to them to discuss those matters.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Of course, I feel that the point I have raised, which has reference to indictments already found, may be properly raised on another clause, and the principle fairly discussed. I will, therefore, ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member propose to move the next Amendment, which is also in his name?

MR. O'DOHERTY: No.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to move as an Amendment, in the first line of the clause, after "crime," to insert "other than treason-felony or treason." The Government have on previous occasions manifested a desire to show that the proposals embodied in the Bill are nothing more than the reproduction of provisions which are already in force. In regard to the law of England and Scotland, whether they are correct in that assumption or not is a matter of opinion; but, at any rate, that being their view of the matter, I presume that they cannot object to a proposal to assimilate the law of Ireland to that which obtains in this country. The Amendment which I have placed on the Paper is in accord with the existing law of England. At present there is no right to claim a special jury for the trial of cases of high treason or treason-felony either in the Court of Queen's Bench or any other tribunal, nor is there any such right in cases of misdemeanour tried at the Sessions and Assizes—that is to say, that there is no absolute right of trial by special jury; but a special jury may be allowed in a case of misdemeanour, where it has been ordered by the Queen's Bench Division, subject to certain conditions laid down in the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30. Those provisions stipulate that the form by which an inferior Court may empanel a jury in a criminal prosecution for misdemeanour should be prescribed by the Queen's Bench Division under a writ of certiorari. In that event an indictment may be removed; but only under the provisions of the Act I have mentioned, and the removal can only take place either when the indictment in the Court below is against a body corporate, which is not the question here, or else where it has been made to appear to the higher Court that a fair and impartial trial cannot otherwise be had. The Amendments which I have placed upon the Paper have been drafted with the intention of allowing not only the Attorney General, who has now a right, on the part of the Crown, to demand the removal of a case into the Queen's Bench Division, but also of enabling the prosecutor or defendant to have the same right—namely, the right of removing, under a writ of certiorari, a case in the Queen's Bench Division. If the Committee accept my Amendments, it will then be open to the defendant to apply for a special jury; and he would have to do so not by an ex parte motion, but by a motion in Court, and not in Chambers, with notice duly served upon the other side, and he must be prepared to show cause why the application for a special jury should be entertained. At the present moment it is not necessary that I should urge further reasons for the acceptance of my Amendments; but I should certainly like to hear from the Attorney General for Ireland, or the Attorney General for England, what objections there can be to the proposal.

Sir William Harcourt

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 7, after the word "crime," to insert the words, "other than treason felony or treason."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. Member, in moving the Amendment, has referred to other Amendments which stand in his name, and which relate to subsequent portions of this clause, but which certainly seem to me to be of a character altogether unsuitable for adoption in the clause as it now stands before the Committee. I may add that before the Amendments of the hon. Member can come on for discussion, there are one or two important Amendments standing in the names of other Members, which seem to me to raise, in a more definite way, the matters to which he has referred. The Amendment now proposed by the hon. Member is to the effect that an order of the Court for empannelling a special jury shall not apply in cases of treason-felony or treason. The hon. Member is quite right in saying that, as the law stands at the present moment, both in England and Ireland, a special jury cannot be empannelled for the trial of a case either of treason or felony. I believe the origin of that exception was that a special jury under the old system was incompatible with the challenges allowed by law to the accused. The Crimes Act of 1882 altered that state of things, and provided that a special jury might be taken from a long panel with the right of challenge which the law now gives, and that is practically the proposal we now make in this clause. One of the grounds upon which we do this is that, in trials for treason and treason-felony, it is particularly desirable to have juries of intelligence and independent minds. It is very difficult indeed for an ordinary common jury to follow the charge of a Judge in difficult cases of this kind, involving a considerable amount of technical legal matter. I think most hon. Members would regret that cases of that kind should be tried by individuals whose intelligence is not sufficient to enable them to understand the merits of the case and to comprehend the directions of the Judge. Under these circumstances, I feel that I have no alternative but to oppose the Amendment moved by the hon. Member.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The reason why I consider it necessary to include the words "treason or treason-felony" in the Amendment was, as I explained at the outset of my observations, that at present neither the Crown nor the defendant in a case of treason or treason-felony has a right to claim a special jury, either in the Queen's Bench Division or elsewhere. I pointed out that, in my opinion, it is necessary to recognize in the present section the exception thus made in the existing law. In some cases of treason you may have a trial at Bar with the Court sitting in banco, so that there would be no need to empanel a special jury, and it is for totally different cases that special juries are allowed in this country. Even if the Committee are prepared to take the view of the Attorney General for Ireland, I think it would only be reasonable to make this exception from the operation of the clause of cases of treason and treason-felony, and I trust that the Government will adopt my Amendments. They cannot afterwards be embarrassed by them in the slightest degree. At any rate, they will be aware that there would be no departure from the construction of the Bill beyond that which is absolutely necessary, because, according to the professions of the Government themselves, their desire is to make the provisions of the measure as much like those which now apply in England and Scotland as possible.

[Thirtieth Night.]

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): If provisions of this nature are to be applicable to any class of offences, I cannot see any reason why there should be a special exemption in regard to this particular class of offences. I would, however, suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that it would simplify matters if he would give some indication as to what the view of the Government is in regard to the later Amendments. I hope that I am not out of Order in making this reference; but, speaking for myself, and speaking also, I believe, for a good many on this side of the Committee, I would suggest that the difficulty might be best met by adopting a later Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill), which provides that—

"On application of either the Attorney General or the defendant on notice of motion or summons to the other side, make an order that the trial of the defendant or defendants, if more than one, shall be by a special jury.

"No such order shall be made unless the High Court is satisfied that the application for it is not made vexatiously or for delay, and that it is expedient for the ends of justice that the trial should take place before a special jury. The court may in such order postpone the trial on such terms as seem just."

The adoption of that Amendment would obviate many of the objections which I entertain to the clause as it stands. I quite recognize that the provisions of the Act of 1882 may be looked upon by the Government as a justification for the provision as it stands in the Bill; but the circumstances of the case were very different, and I would point out that the provisions of this measure are to be permanent in their character, and are to remain as part of the general law of the country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it would be entirely out of Order if we were now to discuss a later Amendment—No. 23—on which the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman will probably arise. I cannot, however, hold out any hope that the Government will be able to accept the Amendment referred to by the hon. and learned Member.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is entirely mistaken in the statement he has made that this clause was contained in the Crimes Act of 1882. It was nothing of the kind; but, on the contrary, the clause we are now discussing is as different from the clause in the Act of 1882 as chalk is from cheese. To begin with, in the Act of 1882 there was a definite number of jurors to be summoned. I believe it was necessary to summon 200 in all. [Mr. HOLMES dissented.] I think I am right in asserting that under that Act it was necessary to summon a definite number of jurors; but under this Bill the provision, instead of being of so innocuous a character, the Lord Lieutenant, by Clause 15, will have power to make rules concerning all matters of procedure in cases where a special jury is required. After laying down a long and atrocious list of things which the Lord Lieutenant may do, the clause says that he "may, from time to time, make, and when made, revoke, add to, and alter rules in relation to the case where a special jury is required and the number of jurors to be returned on any panel," &c.

So that if there are 5,000 jurors on the Sheriff's book, he may select any 12 of them he pleases to try a case of treason or treason-felony.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that the hon. and learned Member is travelling altogether wide of the special Amendment now before the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I quite recognize the justice of your ruling, Sir; but I was only stating what the nature of the clause in the Act of 1882 was, and I was only at the beginning of my argument to show that it was not at all identical with the clause we are now dealing with.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Therefore, under the circumstances, your ruling, Mr. Courtney, will probably save the Committee a considerable amount of time. The Bill declares that—

“It is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business.”

Now, Sir, we have already resisted, and we shall continue to resist, every pretence for saying that there is any ground whatever for the statement that persons who are called upon to perform the duty of jurors in Ireland are likely to be placed in any peril whatsoever. Let me point out that the Fenian prisoners in 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1870 were convicted by common jurors. Such a thing as a special jury did not then exist for the trial of such offences, and the Fenian prisoners were convicted by the common jurors of the City of Dublin. Not only so, but John Mitchel was convicted by common jurors in 1848—men who were very well known in the City of Dublin, but of whom half-a-dozen at least are living at the present day. Although John Mitchel was a man most revered throughout the whole of Ireland for his patriotism and the staunchness of his convictions, the jurors who convicted him went absolutely free from harm down to the present day. Then, what is the difference that exists between 1887 and 1865 and 1867? Twenty years ago you had a tremendous organization in Dublin which shook the confidence of the Government in the administration of the law, and it was worked by secret means, with the use of weapons of various kinds. Part of the organization of that Fenian Society included a resort to force when necessary, and the number of the Fenian Body in Ireland at least amounted to 100,000 men, most of them enrolled in the City of Dublin. Yet, notwithstanding those circumstances, the Government were able to obtain the conviction of some 300 or 400 Fenians between the years 1865 and 1868, and I challenge them to say whether one single juror suffered the slightest hurt or harm, either in person, property, or business, in consequence of the part he took in securing those convictions. The right hon. Gentleman opposite knows very well that nothing of the kind occurred. We are now told that special qualifications are required for the jurors who are to convict in cases of treason or treason-felony. The law of England is much more favourable to prisoners on trial for treason than that which exists in Ireland. In England you give 35 challenges to the prisoner, and although you say that you are anxious now to assimilate the law of the two countries what you really do is this. If the prisoner is tried at the Old Bailey he can challenge 35 jurymen; whereas if he is tried in Dublin he can only challenge 20. Hitherto cases of treason tried in Dublin have been dealt with by common jurors, except at a time when we had American prisoners brought up for trial, in which case one-half of the jurors were aliens, the rest being picked out from the common jury class. I cannot remember that there was any difficulty in conducting those trials. The Government obtained convictions, and the common jurors proved to be perfectly capable of understanding the technical charges of the Judges. Although the egg of conspiracy was hatched, so to speak, in America, and the cases were tried in Ireland, the jurors proved themselves perfectly competent to understand the law. Yet we are now told, 20 years afterwards, that although the school boards have been at work nearly ever since, that individuals selected from the common jury panel would be unable to discharge their duty fairly and impartially, or to understand the nature of the directions given to them by the Judges. The real effect of this clause will be this—you may have a panel with 1,000 names upon it, with a full right of “stand by” on the part of the Crown to reduce that 1,000 to 12. The Attorney General will be able to challenge 988, and yet he tells us that out of the residuum he would not be able to get a sufficient number of common jurors to try a case of treason-felony. I contend that this argument is altogether absurd. If the Government are going to rely upon special juries let them abandon their right of “stand by” altogether, and place themselves and the prisoners on the same terms. At the rate, let them give to Ireland the same law as exists in England. Certainly, in view of the fact that the Government would have an illimitable right of challenge, I think they might accept the Amendment. Perhaps hon. Members are under the impression that common jurors in Ireland are really very low people. If any hon. Member who takes an interest in Ireland will turn to a Return obtained by me, he will find that in the very counties in which the Government declare that they are unable to obtain convictions, the number of common jurors is very limited. Let me take the case of the County of Kerry. There are in that county 22,517 voters, and only 1,178 common jurors, or one common juror in every 20 voters. It is the same in the other counties of Ireland. It is, therefore, a great mistake to suppose that common jurors are persons who belong to the lower classes, seeing that in most of the counties of Ireland there is only one common juror to 20 voters. I think, therefore, that it is most unreasonable to say that when a case of treason or treason-felony is brought on for trial before a Court of Justice a common jury would be incapable of dealing with it, and that it is absolutely necessary to deal with it by a special jury.

[Thirteenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think it would have a tendency to clear up this matter if the Attorney General for Ireland will consent to follow the precedent set in the Act of 1882. It was then provided that special jurors should be elected by ballot, in the manner provided by the 19th section of the Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act of 1876. What I wish to know is whether it is intended that the jurors, under this measure, shall be selected in the same manner as under the Act of 1882?

MR. HOLMES: I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the precedent of that Act has been followed, as he will find by reference to the 9th clause of the Bill, which runs as follows:—

“Where under this Act a trial is had by a special jury, the special jurors shall be taken by ballot in the manner provided by the nineteenth section of the Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1876, from all the jurors upon the panel returned by the sheriff from the special jurors' book.”

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): No doubt we are dealing with a clause which bears some resemblance to a corresponding clause in the Act of 1882. But I maintain that it is impolitic to pass the section at all, for reasons which have already been urged in support of the Amendment. May I point out that in the Bill of the Government themselves there is a precedent for limiting the scope of its operation. In the 2nd sub-section of the 4th clause provision is made for a change of venue in certain cases, and the Government have introduced into that sub-section a provision that it shall only apply to a very limited number of cases. The argument which has been urged in the course of this discussion is that if this clause is to pass at all there is no reason why it should be made to apply to cases of treason and treason-felony, and I certainly can see no reason why it should be made to apply to offences which are not specified in Sub-section 2 of Clause 4. The principle of the criminal system of this country is that when a man is charged with an offence he shall be tried by his country. In a striking and even touching form, which is, to the present day, observed in our Courts, when a man is called upon to plead he puts himself upon his country. No doubt, in regard to a certain class of offences, which are of such a character that they shock the moral sense of the community, it really does not matter whether you carry out that theory or not, because from whatever class the jurors might happen to be drawn, we may rest perfectly satisfied that justice would be done. If a man is charged with murder, rape, or arson, or with a serious offence in which no political or agrarian question arises, we may rest perfectly sure that, from whatever class the jurors are drawn, substantial justice will be done. It may be assumed that no person is so degraded as wilfully to convict, or acquit wrongfully, a person charged with such a crime. But when you come to deal with a class of questions in which political or agrarian considerations arise there may be a serious conflict between the Crown and Her Majesty's subjects, and it then becomes essentially necessary that the men who are to be tried should be tried by their country or by their peers. It cannot be alleged that that would be the case if, under this measure, individuals who are charged with political offences, instead of being tried by jury, selected in the ordinary way, are to be tried by a jury which the Crown is to be permitted to select from a small and narrow class. One of the charges which was made against the Government in 1848 was that, in trying the prisoners who were then charged with treason and treason-felony, they filled the jury-boxes with Castle shopkeepers, who had the Lion and Unicorn over their shop doors, and who depended for their livelihood upon the custom of the Vice-regal Court. I trust that the Government will not lay themselves open to a charge of that kind in the future. Public men in Ireland may feel themselves compelled to take the same course which they have taken in past times; and if such a state of things should arise Her Majesty's Government ought not to have it in their power to prostitute the forms of law by putting men on their trial before a tribunal not selected as the law now requires, but from a class of men who are notoriously hostile to the persons who would have to be tried. That is the reason we urge for distinguishing cases of treason and treason-felony from the ordinary crimes which this section will enable the Government to submit to a special jury. I trust my hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) will insist on pressing his Amendment, unless he succeeds in obtaining some concession from the Government on this important point.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I cannot help expressing my regret that the Government have not seen their way to permitting the law of England and Ireland in this matter to be assimilated. By their refusal they have made still wider the chasm which exists between the Irish and English Criminal Law. I regret this the more, because only in very recent years there was a Criminal Code Commission appointed, upon whose Report a Bill was presented to this House proposing—the Commission itself having consisted of four distinguished Judges—that the Criminal Law of England and Ireland should be assimilated to the fullest extent possible. The Law Advisers of the Crown do not seem to be able to give any precise reason why, as the law now stands, there should be a special jury in a case of misdemeanour, but not in a case of treason or treason-felony. However, as a matter of fact, a special jury is only allowed in certain cases of misdemeanour, when the misdemeanour has been brought, by writ of certiorari, into the Queen's Bench Division. In ordinary cases no special jury is allowed; but by law it is allowed under certain restrictions upon an application to the Court by means of a writ of certiorari, and very frequently the Court refuses to grant the application. Why are special jurors allowed in cases of misdemeanour? It is simply for this reason—that the theory of the law is that in cases of misdemeanour the contest is merely a personal one, whereas in the case of a felony direct provisions of the Criminal Law have been violated. For this simple reason a special jury has not been allowed in cases of treason and treason-felony, although, at the option of the Court, it may be allowed in a case of misdemeanour. The theory of the law is that when a true Bill is found against a prisoner charged with treason or treason-felony he ought to be tried by his peers. The Common Law, both of England and Ireland, previous to the Crimes Act of 1882, was that every man charged with such an offence should be tried by his peers. Under this clause provision is made that the prisoner shall not be tried by his peers, but by persons to be selected for the purpose of trying him by the Government of the day. As a matter of fact, it is proposed that the Public Prosecutor, representing the majesty of the law and of the public at large, should demean himself by becoming a political agent of the Government. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has already shown that by the adoption of this provision there will be a great difference in the state of the law, even in regard to challenges. Under these circumstances, I beg to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor).

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I can quite understand why the Government should adhere to their determination in regard to this Amendment if it were an historical fact that there is, on the part of the common jurors in Ireland, either an incapacity to comprehend the law of treason, or an unwillingness to find their fellow-citizens guilty. In the cases referred to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy)—the Fenian cases which occurred between 1865 and 1868—many very complicated charges of treason were brought against the men who were put upon their trial. In some of those cases it had to be proved that overt acts of treason had been committed outside the Realms of Her Majesty. Nevertheless, it was frequently difficult to prove those overt acts of treason which had been committed in America; but, although it was often difficult to obtain evidence to corroborate the testimony of an informer, no case ever occurred where a common jury, in the exercise of its duty, failed to comprehend the law or to bring in a verdict. On the contrary, the common jurors invariably showed full capacity to comprehend the law upon the matter, and they displayed a willingness to convict where the evidence was sufficient, and the charges had been fully proved. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, as well as other hon. Members of this House, must remember those cases. I have a distinct recollection of them myself. The trials took place in some of the principal cities of Ireland, and many of them occurred in the City of Cork, where I was a resident at the time. My experience is, that no class of jurors in that city showed the slightest hesitation whatever in finding verdicts against their fellow-citizens, even against men they had met every day in the week who were engaged in the same class of business as themselves, and with whom they had been on friendly and intimate terms. Notwithstanding the bonds of friendship and the ties of fellow-citizenship which drew them together, they displayed every readiness to bring in verdicts of guilty when the charges were fully proved. These were political offences, and they were tried at a time when the agitation in Ireland was of a purely political character; and therefore, reasoning by analogy, it cannot be said that in the social revolution which is now taking place in Ireland a similar readiness to convict may not be found. Let me point to the example of the Assizes at Cork held in the winter of last year. If the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) were in his place I would appeal to him with confidence to say whether or not the ordinary jurors summoned to serve at the Munster Winter Assizes performed their duty. It is the fact that at the last Cork Winter Assizes common jurors brought in verdicts of guilty whenever the charges against the prisoners were brought home. I have no hesitation in saying that, under this Act, common jurors would be found perfectly capable of comprehending the law, and quite willing to bring in verdicts when the charges were properly substantiated. At the same time, and above all things, it must be made clear to a common jury that no attempt is being made, on the part of the Crown, either to intimidate them, or to do prisoners an injustice. Under all the circumstances of the case, I think Her Majesty's Government ought to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

Question u.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 180: Majority 73.—(Div. List, No. 188.)

MR. W. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I beg to move, as an Amendment in this Clause, to insert, after the word "crime," the words—

"Being either murder, manslaughter, aggravated crime or violence against the person, arson by Statute or Common Law, or breaking into, firing at, or firing into, a dwelling-house."

In moving this Amendment, I do not think it will be necessary for me to detain the Committee with any speech, or at any length to interrupt the business of the Committee. I do feel, however, that the Amendment is an important Amendment, because it raises an important question of principle. At any rate, it raises the question whether the special jury system shall be applied to criminal cases in Ireland, as we understand crime in England, or whether it shall be applied to cases of crime in Ireland as crime may be understood under a Coercion Act. I do not intend to go into the question of Irish coercion. Irish coercion has been proved to be provocative of much trouble both to Ireland and England for many years past, and among all classes there is much discontent with regard to it. It is asserted that there are certain Irish jurors who will not convict; but where special juries are concerned, it is the opinion of the poorer classes in Ireland that too many of them do convict. I will not, however, go into that question. What I object to is that this special jury clause should be applied to offences other than crimes—as we understand them in England, because I regard it as class legislation in its worst form. There is a prosperous class of people in the North of Ireland, and a less well-to-do and very much poorer class in the South and the West. The Government are never tired of telling us that the very prosperous and well-to-do population in the North of Ireland, who constitute a small minority of the Irish people, are in favour of the English connection, while the poorer classes in the South and West are altogether hostile to that connection. The Government tell us that these two classes hate each other with a hatred so bitter that if Home Rule were conceded the North would be placed practically at the mercy of the South. Yet the Government are providing, in this clause, that in every kind of case, not only in criminal, but in political cases, the very people who hate the lower classes in the South and West shall be the people to try them. I may say that no hon. Member of this House more detests crime and outrage than I do myself, and I think that I am speaking in the same sense for every hon. Member on this side of the House; but we say that this clause, under which special juries are to be provided for the trial of offenders in Ireland, will not be applied to criminal cases only. I have no objection to any crime the Government may name being included in the list of offences to be tried by a special jury; but I have a great objection to all sorts of cases connected with politics in Ireland, and connected with the land in Ireland, being tried by juries composed, as they would be, of people who are hostile to the persons whom they would have to try. Another objection I have relates to the power proposed to be given to the Attorney General for Ireland. Of course, I do not desire to make any kind of charge against the right hon. and learned Gentleman who holds that position; but I maintain that it is a tremendous power to place in the hands of any Law Officer of the Crown.

Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary)

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is anticipating an Amendment which stands lower down the Paper. He must confine himself to his own Amendment.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling, and I am sorry that my inexperience in regard to the proceedings of the House should have led me into such a mistake. I will only say that my desire is to induce the Government to draw a distinction between crime as we understand it, and any sort of offence which the Government choose to call crime under this Bill. I think we ought to have had a definition of crime in the Bill itself, and I am persuaded that many would prefer to see trial by jury absolutely abolished in Ireland rather than that certain classes of crime should be tried by special juries. Personally, I should have far more confidence in a trial by the Attorney General for Ireland himself, rather than by the class which will compose the special juries selected under this clause. If the clause be passed in its entirety, the protection which the Government allege that they are giving in providing for trial by jury will be nothing more than a delusion and a snare. There are 56,956 common jurors in Ireland, and only 12,500 special jurors; and the class from which the special jurors are drawn is the very class which is persistently hostile to the persons they will be called upon to try. I believe that if the Government are sincere in saying that they distrust the average Irishman, they ought to have the courage of their convictions and should abolish trial by jury altogether. If they are not prepared to take that extreme step, they ought not to come here and endeavour to throw dust in the eyes of the English people by pretending that they are giving Irishmen a fair trial before a jury of their countrymen, whereas they are simply selecting a small minority of Irishmen, who are opposed to the best interests and wishes of the vast body of the nation, and who will have already made up their minds upon the questions they will be called upon to try. Under these circumstances, I hope that the Government will see their way to meet the objections which I have laid before the Committee in this important matter, and that they will accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3. line 7, by inserting, after the word "crime," the words "being either murder, manslaughter, aggravated crime or violence against the person, arson by Statute or Common Law, or breaking into, firing at, or firing into a dwelling house."—(Mr. M'Arthur.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Amendment which has just been disposed of proposed to exclude certain crimes from the purview of this clause; but the hon. Member's Amendment names certain crimes and excludes others. The hon. Member fears, to use his own expression, that the Government would use this power in regard to special juries, in order to enable them to deal with crimes which are not crimes as we understand the phrase. The allegation is that there may be offences under this Bill which in England would not be known as crimes; and I presume that the hon. Member considers that the crimes which he has mentioned form an exhaustive catalogue of what we in England are in the habit of regarding as crime. If the matter is looked into, however, it will be found that the list is far from an exhaustive one. For example, there are such offences as sheep-stealing, mutilation of cattle, blowing up with dynamite, and many others I could name, which are certainly looked upon as crimes in England, but which are not included in the hon. Member's Amendment. The hon. Member has spoken under a slight misapprehension as to the operation of the Bill. It has been alleged that new offences are created by it. The Government do not admit that; but even if it were granted, special juries would not try crimes which are not now crimes in England and Ireland. Under these circumstances, I cannot accept the Amendment, as I believe that a fair trial would be obtained by the means proposed in the Bill. If it is true that a fairer trial may be obtained with special juries, I see no reason why the clause should not be extended to other crimes which, in the opinion of every Member of this House, are crimes, whether they are committed in England or Ireland. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will not consider it necessary to press the Amendment.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: Of course I did not pretend to say that the list I gave was an exhaustive list; but I gave it because I found it contained in the Bill itself, and because the crimes in question are those in regard to which it is considered difficult to obtain convictions in Ireland.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The Government themselves provide in this very Bill that in regard to the trial of certain crimes English juries shall be brought in, so that, in their idea, there are crimes of sufficient importance to justify their trial on this side of the water. I think it would, therefore, naturally strike hon. Members that such cases as those which have impressed themselves on the mind of the Government as worthy of being tried by special juries should be clearly specified in the way suggested in the Amendment of the hon. Member for St. Austell. I should like the Committee to direct their attention to the fact that other offences in addition to those mentioned here are dealt with in the 2nd clause, the Government having already selected the tribunal, although hon. Members on this side of the House have over and over again declared their want of confidence in that tribunal. Nevertheless, the Government having selected that tribunal, persisted in establishing it for the trial of certain offences by a summary process; and, having done so, they then went on to specify the offences. I think that, under such circumstances, they ought to be content with the tribunal they have established, and, as far as the present case is concerned, they should accept the list of crimes contained in the Amendment. The Government are, in fact, proposing to retain a superfluous and accumulative remedy for certain offences dealt with in the 2nd section of the Bill, although they have already established a special and select tribunal. The effect of this clause will be, practically, to hand over agrarian offenders in the West of Ireland and in the County of Donegal, from which I came, to be tried by the agents of the landlords, or the landlords themselves. The Government are actually handing over to the persons whom they say are the aggrieved parties the power of trying the offenders; and, in addition, the Government have reserved to themselves power, under the 2nd clause, of sending down two special Resident Magistrates for the purpose of trying the same class of offences summarily. I certainly think it ought to recommend itself to the Government that they should not ask for an accumulative remedy which will enable them to try a case by special jurors selected from a particular class whose bias and past offences have caused all the trouble which now exists in Ireland.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): In dealing with this Amendment, I was sorry to find that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not only nothing to say in its favour, but that he at once voted it down. That seems to be a common practice with the right hon. Gentleman. Generally, when an Amendment comes on for discussion, he says—"Oh, yes; but a previous Amendment has already dealt with it." In the last case, he said the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) restricted the power to certain offences; and he now says that although the present Amendment enlarges the number of offences specified in the Bill, it, nevertheless, is a limiting power. What we really desire to do is to limit the power of the Crown by enlarging a certain class of offences. The catalogue of crimes stated in the Amendment is said by the right hon. Gentleman to be by no means of a sufficiently full character. That objection was fully met by the hon. Member for St. Austell, who moved the Amendment, because he made it perfectly plain that it includes all crimes that have no political tinge in them. I recollect the right hon. Gentleman, in an earlier stage of the Bill, stating that he had taken care to exclude from the category of cases which should be sent for trial to English juries, all cases which might have a political tinge. Therefore, if the catalogue of crimes given by the hon. Member for St. Austell is not an exhaustive catalogue, the right hon. Gentleman has only himself and his Bill to blame for it. I certainly cannot understand for what reason the right hon. Gentleman would exclude the consideration of such cases from English juries, and yet leave them to be dealt with by an Orange special jury in Antrim. Probably one reason is that in England Her Majesty's Government dare not try the experiment of setting class against class; and, therefore, they decline to send over political offenders from Ireland to be tried here. At any rate, they know very well that if they had sent them they would fail to obtain a conviction; and I presume it is for this reason that they take special powers for trying them by a special jury in the County of Antrim, being afraid to resort to the process by which they tried Mr. John Dillon, and by which they succeeded in convicting John Mitchel. Let me ask the Government why it is that they decline to set class against class in England, and are yet attempting to do it in Ireland? If English juries are not to be trusted, to use the right hon. Gentleman's own words, with the trial of cases which have a "political tinge," I want to know why jurors composed of Irish landlords and land agents are to be trusted with such trials? I maintain that this Bill is not intended for the punishment of criminals, but for the punishment of political offenders. The persons you will try are those who have been putting into operation the Plan of Campaign against certain landlords, and you will send them for trial to a jury of landlords and land agents, who will have very little difficulty whatever in convicting them. Is this deliberate attempt to set class against class a statesmanlike proceeding? I sincerely trust that the Committee will be wise enough to accept the Amendment. Add as many crimes as you like to the catalogue of real crimes, but refuse strenuously to include political offences.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We have had a statement from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that this clause virtually embodies a similar provision which was contained in the Act of 1882, and we have since had a statement from the Chief Secretary for Ireland that all crimes were embodied in that Bill. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that none of the offences dealt with by the Corrupt Practices Act were triable under the Crimes Act of 1882? I, therefore, wish to know if the right hon. Gentleman proposes in this Bill to include those electoral offences which were excluded in the Crimes Act? I also desire to know whether, if offences of that nature are proposed to be included, there is to be a right to try them under this section by a special jury? Perhaps I may be permitted to put a case. Supposing that Sir Charles Lewis, the late Member for Londonderry, and the present Member for North Antrim, had been indicted for the offences for which he was unseated at Derry. Of course, he would have had a right under this clause to claim to be tried by a special jury; and there can be no doubt that a special jury selected to try him would have been a jury of Orangemen, so that no matter what the nature of the corrupt practices of which he was guilty may have been, the hon. Member would most certainly have escaped punishment. If the Crimes Act had been made a perpetual Act, the provision excluding the Corrupt Practices Act from the operation of the Crimes Act would still have been in force. The Crimes Act, however, was not a perpetual Act; and, although we are told that the present measure is framed, to a very large extent, upon the principle of the Crimes Act, I do not find any provision in it to exclude offences against the Corrupt Practices Act. I must confess that I never heard a more amusing instance of the ignorance of the Chief Secretary for Ireland than that in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of sheep stealing. Now, if there is anything in Ireland for which you can readily get a conviction, it is sheep stealing. The Irish are a nation of farmers, and if it is possible to get a conviction at all, they are ready enough to convict for sheep stealing. I must say that of all the grotesque proofs which have been afforded of the ignorance of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to Ireland, in my opinion his reference to the exclusion of sheep stealing from the crimes enumerated in the Amendment is the most amusing. I think that the good angel of the Chief Secretary for Ireland ought to have suggested to him a "philosophic doubt" as to the necessity for referring to that offence. I fear that the Government are taking a fatal step in not confining their clause to some particular class of offences, and I will give them a reason why I fear so. If you say to common jurors in Ireland that they are unfitted even to be trusted with the trial of the offence of sheep stealing, you practically tell them that they are a class of perjurers unworthy of being believed on their oaths. You virtually tell them—"We may let you try offences such as rape, or picking pockets, but we look upon you as likely to perjure yourselves if we trust you with the trial of other offences." The effect of this will certainly be to make common jurors turn rusty; they will decline to be the instruments for carrying out the ordinary law when they are told that they are unworthy to try other cases, and they will probably refuse to attend the Court or disregard their oaths. It would be far better to abolish the common jury class altogether, or to increase the jury qualification. If you would provide that every common juror must have a £50 qualification you would relieve a good many of them of the trouble of attending Court, and of having to travel many long miles in order to do so. That, I think, would be a much less invidious course, and would relieve the common jury class not only of trouble, but of responsibility. Probably the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will remember what took place in Sligo last year, when a number of jurors were called into that town and kept hanging about in the frost and snow. I see, Mr. Courtney, that you are about to interpose, but "a nod is as good as a wink," and I will not pursue the matter further. I will only ask the Government to consider the importance of inserting some limitation in the clause as to the nature of the crimes to be dealt with. I am quite certain that if the Attorney General for Ireland persists in issuing his fiat to a particular class of persons when it is proposed to bring to trial a certain class of offenders, the common jurors will feel naturally indignant, and will refuse to try the cases which may be remitted to them. Rather than adopt the course which the Government propose to take, I think it would be preferable to enact that all the common jurors in Ireland are perjurers, and that they cannot be depended on upon their oaths. I think that the Government ought to be reasonable, and that they should say, at least, in some distinct manner, what class of offences these special juries are to try. I also wish to know whether it is intended to allow the provisions of this Bill to be operative in regard to offences against the Corrupt Practices Act, with the knowledge that if the Crimes Act had been a continuous measure such offences could not have been dealt with? If the Bill is to be placed on the Statute Book in its present shape, the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, although unrepealed, will remain practically inoperative.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): If I may be allowed to offer a word of advice to the Government, it will be this—that if they wish to facilitate the passing of their Bill they will do so best, when they find that an Amendment moved on this side of the House has to be answered, by putting up somebody to reply besides the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Whatever we may think of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland or the Attorney General for England, and however much we may differ from them, we admit that they are able to argue any point placed before them, and that when they get up they are likely to give the House some reason for the course they take. So far as the Chief Secretary for Ireland is concerned, when he gets up in his place to resist an Amendment it is his invariable practice to make a short speech, in which he generally displays the grossest ignorance of the provisions of his own Bill and of Irish life, and then to sit down after a few observations altogether destitute of anything in the shape of an argument bearing on the particular Amendment before the Committee. Now, as a matter of fact, in drawing up most of the Amendments which have been proposed from this side of the House we have absolutely taken the words of the Government draftsman and put them into our proposals, generally with a view of making one part of the Bill consistent with another. Then the Government get up and absolutely rail at the provisions which have been devised by their own draftsman; and, notwithstanding the fact that we have followed their own words, they refuse our Amendments and endeavour to make them appear ridiculous. A precedent for this Amendment is to be found in the 2nd sub-section of the 2nd clause, and the only argument urged by the Chief Secretary for Ireland against it is, that the catalogue of crimes drawn up by his own draftsman is not sufficiently extensive, and that there is a large number of cases to which it should also be applied. The Government allege that there has been a breakdown in a particular class of cases so far as the judicial system of Ireland is concerned, and what we ask is, that the remedy which the Government prescribe for that breakdown should be limited to the particular mischief they profess to aim at. Another objection against this clause is that, like most of the other provisions of the Bill, it is tainted with the vice of going altogether beyond the mischief which the Government are attempting to cure. What we ask is this—that under this Bill the scandal shall not be permitted which occurred two or three years ago when the Crimes Act was in operation. Under the provisions of that Act, men were brought up at Dublin from all parts of the country, and put on their trial before 12 special jurors of the City and County of Dublin, selected from a class bitterly hostile to the persons who were sent for trial. I well remember the sensation which was produced when an unfortunate peasant was brought up from the County of Mayo to be tried by men who did not understand the language he could speak. When this man was found guilty he was asked to say if he had any reason to assign why the judgment of death should not be pronounced upon him; he made use of words which created a great impression at the time. He said—"This is not a Court of Justice, but a shambles." A similar state of things is likely to happen again if this Bill is persisted with in its present form. Why have the Government in their Bill specified two particular classes of offences? It is because the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the speech in which he introduced the Bill, said that the Government did not wish to provide that political offences committed in Ireland should be tried in England, and, therefore, he has found it necessary to specify different kinds of offences in different clauses. What we maintain is that, under this section, the Government go far beyond the very thing they avoid in the 2nd sub-section of Clause 2. In Clause 2 they provide that political offenders who may commit offences in Ireland shall not be tried in England; but in this section they do something which is ten times worse—they provide that such offenders, although they are not to be tried in England, may be tried by their political opponents in Ireland, for that is really the effect of this section. We have heard it demonstrated that throughout the whole of Ireland there are only 1,700 special jurors. In some of the counties the qualification for a special juror is £150, and, therefore, the special jurors themselves must be limited to the landlord class, and those who are in sympathy with them. That being so, is it not a monstrous thing, when you have expressly declared by a former clause that it would be unfair to try political offenders in England, to do something ten times worse, and try them by their political opponents? I cannot help declaring that the Government have not acted reasonably in the manner in which they have drawn up this clause. If they had followed the form provided by their own draftsman in the preceding clause I do not think anyone would have blamed them; but as this clause now stands, the next time the Government wish to take proceedings against Mr. John Dillon or any other political opponent they will be able to provide that the trial shall be before the Irish landlords and their agents, or the captains and colonels who constitute the bulk of the special juries of the County of Dublin.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): My hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has stated that under the Crimes Act offences connected with the Corrupt Practices Act were expressly excluded from the operation of the Act of 1882, and my hon. and learned Friend asked the Government if it was intended to continue that exemption. Now, the Government complain very often of the length of the discussions which have taken place in this Committee. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Hon. Members opposite say "Hear, hear!" Precisely so, and those cries are specially loud from those who never take any part in our debates. But surely the way to shorten discussion is, at least, to answer questions which are sensible questions, and which appertain to the Bill? We have all of us waited for the Attorney General for Ireland, or the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to rise and give a simple answer to the question of my hon. and learned Friend; but as yet no answer has been given. I will, therefore, repeat the question. Under the late Crimes Act cases arising out of Election contests could not be proceeded against under that Act. What I want to know, then, is, whether the exemption which existed under the late Crimes Act is to be continued in the present Bill or not? That is a very simple question, and I think the Attorney General for Ireland will shorten the discussion if he will condescend to answer it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The object of the clause is written on the face of it. I never shrink from any challenge; but my experience is, that the answering of questions does not tend to shorten discussion.

Mr. Maurice Healy

I will only add, that anything which in Ireland is considered a crime is an offence which may be tried by a special jury under the Bill.

MR. O'HANOE: I am afraid that the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot possibly shorten the discussion, as it is no answer at all. [Ministerial cries of "Hear, hear!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite who say "hear, hear" will only listen to what I am about to say they will find out what my reason is. The right hon. and learned Gentleman commenced by saying that the Bill was obviously intended to refer to crimes only, and thereby he seemed to imply that offences committed against the Corrupt Practices Act and under the Election Law would not be triable under it. But surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that a felony is a crime, and, as every hon. Member is aware, that some of the offences which fall within the Corrupt Practices Act are felonies. For instance, bribery is a felony, and, under this Bill, there would be a power to try a man for bribery at an election by special jurors, who might have been themselves among the bribed. It has been said that the High Court will have a discretionary power of granting a special jury; but what does the clause itself say? It says—

"Where an indictment for a crime committed in a proclaimed district has been found against a defendant, or a defendant has been committed for trial for such crime, and the trial is to be by a jury before a Court in Ireland other than a Court of Quarter Sessions, the High Court shall, on an application by or on behalf of the Attorney General for Ireland or a defendant, make an order, as of course, that the trial of the defendant or the defendants, if more than one, shall be by a special jury."

Therefore, it will be seen that the Court must grant an order for the empannelling of a special jury. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to give the Committee one short answer. Does he intend to send political cases, or cases which, in the opinion of the Court, are political cases, to be tried by a special jury, or does he not? If we are told that, we shall know precisely where we stand, and I ask him to say "yes" or "no" to that question.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 203: Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 189.)

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): Mr. Courtney, I do not propose to proceed with Amendments No. 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 merely because I think they are practically covered by the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and because I do not imagine the Government would be at all disposed to accept them.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): In reference to Amendment No. 16, Mr. Courtney, I should like to obtain from the Government a statement as to whether they think that a change of venue is to be had in all cases, or may be had in all cases, where there are special juries. I think they ought to select the count on which they will go on. They ought to decide whether they will have a special jury or a change of venue. Furthermore, I think that the way in which the Government have mixed up these two clauses or dealt with these two clauses, leaves the matter in a most involved condition. One cannot make out clearly whether any notice is to be served on a prisoner, and one cannot understand whether the Attorney General for Ireland may not go into Court for a special jury, and then having got this make an application for a change of venue. Surely, the Government ought to be content with either having a special jury or a change of venue, and should not be allowed to have both. In order to elicit a statement on the question from the Government, I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, after "be," insert "had without a change of venue."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Government can hardly be expected to accept this Amendment, because it would really limit the steps for obtaining a fair trial. There are certain circumstances in which a special jury would be sufficient, and there are certain circumstances in which a change of venue would be sufficient. [Cries of "What are they?"] The circumstances are that a state of intimidation exists in a district to such an extent that a special jury would not be of much use. In that case a change of venue would be necessary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman know what he has said? We do not understand he is going to change the venue to a place where intimidation exists. What is the good of giving absurd reasons of this kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I ought to say a state of intimidation where the trial would naturally be held.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If you change your venue you will not want a special jury. The Government are taking a most curious course. Either intimidation exists in a place or it does not. If it does not exist you will change the venue to the district. I think the Government are acting in a most unreasonable manner. They, surely, do not mean to contend that all over Ireland intimidation exists? Suppose you change the venue from the South to Belfast where, except amongst the Orangemen, intimidation does not exist. Again, in Antrim, I do not suppose there is any intimidation. If you have a special jury, why should you have a change of venue? The course the Government have taken is most admirably calculated to provoke discussion, because we really cannot understand their arguments.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think that, in this case, we have had another instance of the lamentable absurdity of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in replying to an Amendment to a Bill which he does not understand. Now, what is the answer that the right hon. Gentleman has given? He said there are certain circumstances in which a change of venue would be sufficient, and there are certain circumstances in which a special jury would be sufficient; but there are also certain circumstances in which one would not be sufficient without the other in which both would be wanted. And then he was challenged to name the circumstances under which they wanted both, and he said if a state of intimidation exists. What is the meaning of that? The only meaning of that is that certain circumstances are conceivable in which the Government could change the venue from one district to another district, and that, in the district to which they changed the venue, such a state of intimidation exists that the Government could not get a common jury to convict. That is the only logical conclusion which can flow from the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. He tried to mend his statement by saying that there might be intimidation in the district from which the venue is changed. I do ask that we shall have some reply from some Member of the Government who understands the Bill, and understands what he is talking about? Will the English Attorney General get up and give us some reason for resisting this Amendment? Will any Member of the Government get up and tell us what are the circumstances under which they want both a special jury and a change of venue? That is the point on which we want an answer, and that is the point upon which we have not got an answer yet. It may be that the Government may have some knowledge we have not. It may be there may be circumstances in which one of these remedies is not sufficient without the other, but if that is so we have not been given to understand it. Let them tell us what the circumstances are in which they want both of these remedies. It is idle to suppose the right hon. Gentleman has given us a satisfactory answer.

MR. O'DOHERTY: This Amendment is substantially the same as that No. 20 which stands in my name. As this Amendment has been proposed, of course, I will not move my Amendment, as any observations I might be disposed to make in my own Amendment will be applicable to this. What I specially desire the Committee to understand is, the serious attack which is made upon the jury system by this clause. This is really a juries clause; it is a complete Amendment of the Juries Act. The Jury Law in Ireland has been altered step by step until trial by jury is a mere mockery. Under this clause a man from a Catholic district may be taken for trial to a Protestant district. Not only can a change of venue take place, but the Government can select a special set of prejudiced persons to try the case. As a matter of fact, I would sooner be tried by a court martial than by such a system of trial by jury. If hon. Members for English constituencies would only consider what this clause means, I am persuaded they would not sanction it for a single moment. I do not object to change of venue or to a special jury, provided both remedies are not resorted to in the one case. I do not believe the Members of the Treasury Bench understand the possibilities which may be reached by entrusting such powers as are now proposed to the Law Officers in Ireland. This is an Amendment which ought not to be discussed in the exceedingly light manner in which the Chief Secretary for Ireland seems inclined to discuss it. There is more in the Amendment than the right hon. Gentleman seems to imagine. The disposition on our part to forego the moving of many Amendments which stand in our names appears to have had no salutary effect upon the Government, who still seem inclined to treat us to the most trivial answers. I trust that upon this Amendment we shall go to a Division.

MR. MOLLOY: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland understands the Amendment, for I am sure, if he did, he would not have answered in the short manner he did answer. The Government are to be able to change the venue; they are to have the selection of the whole country to themselves. You can, therefore, send a case to be tried wherever you can get a jury that cannot be intimidated, and from whom you can get a fair trial. If after you have changed the venue you do not think you can get a fair trial from a common jury, you are to have the power to have a special jury. What we are fighting for in this matter is the preservation of trial by jury in Ireland. If you are to have trial by a particular jury selected from a select and particular class you might just as well do away with trial by jury altogether. Granted that if your contention is right—namely, that owing to intimidation certain classes from which common juries are drawn may not be fit to try certain cases, I could understand the bringing in of a temporary measure to meet the evil. But this Bill is not a Bill for a year or for two years, but it is a Bill that is to last for ever; therefore you are attacking the whole jury system in Ireland for ever. It is no use saying that the Bill may be repealed by Act of Parliament; so far as you are concerned it is an alteration of the Criminal Law of Ireland, which is to last for ever. Do you really mean to destroy trial by jury in Ireland? You yourselves have said here over and over again that you believe that in a very short time matters will settle down in Ireland, and the present angry feelings will be allayed. Under these conditions, you are for all time actually putting an end to the jury system. You are providing for the selection of juries in Ireland from a very limited class, a class which it is admitted entertain the most hostile feelings against the vast majority of the people. Thus it is, I do not think the Chief Secretary for Ireland fully understand the importance of this Amendment, and I respectfully ask him to consider it again from the point of view I have endeavoured to set forth. I put it to him seriously whether it is really his intention to limit the selection of jurors in Ireland for all time to a particular class. He may, of course, say the selection we contemplate is not compulsory; but we have not the slightest doubt what will be the result. We know perfectly well that in every case the Attorney General for Ireland will apply for and obtain a special jury, and it must be borne in mind that the mere application for a special jury is quite sufficient. The Judge has no discretion to say whether or not there shall be a special jury. As a matter of fact, for the Attorney General for Ireland to ask for a special jury is sufficient. Unquestionably the juries will be selected from a limited class, and from that class which, unfortunately, in years past has been opposed to the rest of the people in Ireland.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Molloy) in believing that the jury system is injured by this clause. I regard the essence of the jury system as being that 12 men should be found to give a verdict according to the evidence. If this be the object of the jury system, that object will be obtained by the provisions of this clause, and will not be obtained if we limit the provisions of this clause. We decline to give up either of the two expedients for obtaining a true trial—namely, a special jury or a change of venue.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The definition of the jury system which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has given is remarkable for an important omission. The essence of the jury system is that 12 men should be indifferently chosen to try a case; but here they are not to be indifferently chosen. The right hon. Gentleman certainly startled me by some expressions he used in reply to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). He said even when a change of venue is secured, as it may be under this Bill from one county of Ireland to any other of the 31 other counties, it may be necessary to select a special jury on account of the intimidation prevailing in the county. What an idea the Chief Secretary for Ireland must have of Ireland. He seems to fancy that there is a rampant system of intimidation actively at work threatening almost everyone from Cape Clear to the Giant's Causeway. But those who live in Ireland, or those who occasionally visit the country, cannot fail to smile at such an idea. I am sure that even the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) would not contend that it is impossible to find a district in Ireland free from intimidation. Well, if the Government have the power, as they have under the 4th clause of this Bill, to obtain an order of the Court for a change of venue from one place in Ireland to any other place they may choose, surely they will be able to find a district in which there can be no necessity for a special jury in addition to the change of venue? Now, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is contemplated to change in any way the system of challenge. Will the prisoner who is brought before a special jury have the same right of challenge which he obtains now before a petty jury? If the right of challenge is to be denied him, or is to be limited, it would be only in keeping with the declaration of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I think it is only right, before the Committee proceeds further with the consideration of this clause, that we should have some indication from the Government as to what their intentions are with regard to the right of challenge.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should like to say a few words upon this Amendment, although I am perfectly confident it is utterly useless to do so. Unfortunately, we have very frequent occasion in Ireland to know that if this power is given to the Government it will be used in a most grossly unfair manner. ["Oh, oh!"] Upon this point there can be absolutely no controversy. We know perfectly well that in the recent State trials in Dublin—it has been proved, and no defence has been attempted—that the power of packing juries was used to such an extent that efforts were made to prevent a discussion upon the subject in this House. That was the course adopted by the Executive in those trials, and I refer to it as an illustration of the position in which a prisoner will be put under such a clause as this we are now asked to pass, more especially if the Amendment be refused. In the case I have alluded to the offence was committed in the County of Galway. The Crown got the venue changed to the City of Dublin, and even then they were not satisfied, but moved the venue to the County of Dublin, and packed the jury in a most shameful and indecent fashion. What saved me and my Colleagues from conviction was the fact that the Government could not try us by a special jury in the County of Dublin. They came to the end of their tether; they used every advantage they could with the utmost indecency—with the most brazen-faced indecency; but because the law compelled them to go before a common jury, we escaped. If they could have put in force this clause—and I have no doubt it is in view of their experience in this case that they ever introduced this clause—if they could have made an application to bring those conspiracy cases before a special jury of the County of Dublin, there is not the slightest doubt they could have empannelled 12 land agents and secured our conviction. I dare say there are some English Gentlemen who will not credit that the Government would do such a thing; but they have done such things, and they will do them again. What occurred in those trials? Men were put on their oaths who admitted that they were landlords who had suffered from the agitation, and others who were land agents, who admitted that pecuniarily they were injuriously affected by the agitation. If the Government have power to take poor peasants in Ireland, or political agitators in Ireland, on this land question, and place them on their trial before a specially packed jury, I say justice in Ireland will become a mockery. They might just as well—aye, a great deal better, because it would be honest and straightforward—place us on our trial before the Lord Lieutenant, without judge or jury at all. I would rather stand my chance in a trial before the Lord Lieutenant, who knows nothing of law, and who, sitting without any lawyers, would listen carefully to the statement of facts—I would a great deal rather stand my chance in a trial by the Lord Lieutenant than in a trial before a body of bankrupt landlords who take refuge on the outskirts of the City of Dublin. What is the character of the special jurors of Dublin? We know perfectly well that the jury before which we shall be brought under this clause will be largely composed of landlords' agents and bankrupt rent-chargers on the estates of Ireland. The past action of the Government shows that what they will do under this clause, if you refuse this Amendment, is to contend that they are going to give a man a fair trial, to pretend that they are seeking to obtain 12 men who will do justice, and give a verdict according to their oaths and the evidence. These 12 men will be chosen from the men who are out of pocket, or who believe themselves to be out of pocket, through the action of the very men they are called upon to try. Such being the state of the case, I regard this Amendment as a vital Amendment, and I certainly appeal to any fair-minded man to say whether it is not enough power to be put in the hands of the Government, that they should take their choice of either polling for a special jury in the district in which the crime is committed, or, if they think it better to go to another district, to let the unfortunate prisoner have some chance, which he would get, of being tried by a common jury?

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he will answer the question with regard to the intention of the Government as to the right of challenge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We do not propose any alteration.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 153: Majority 69.—(Div. List, No. 190.)

Mr. Dillon

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I now beg to move to insert, after the word "in," in line 10, "a proclaimed district in." I do not know whether the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that in the 4th section they say this—"The trial is to be at a Court of Assize for any county in a proclaimed district." I observe that in the 3rd clause they say—"The trial is to be by a jury before a Court in Ireland other than a Court of Quarter Sessions." Now the right hon. Gentleman answering observations from this side of the House on the last Amendment was evidently under the impression that the Court was not to be in a proclaimed district in Ireland. I move this Amendment in order to make the two clauses agree.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, after "in," insert "a proclaimed district in."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It is impossible for us to accept this Amendment, because it would deprive the Crown of the power of having such cases tried by juries which would not be subject to intimidation.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I do not know whether the Government is really aware of the absurd position in which this clause is left. As the clause is at present drafted, the proposal is this, that if in a proclaimed district which, by reason of intimidation prevailing in it, has been proclaimed, a crime is committed for which a man is committed for trial or any indictment has been found against him, the Government desire to have a change of venue, and they get the trial transferred to a district where, admittedly, there is no intimidation, and which is not proclaimed, they are to have the right of obtaining a special jury. Now, they have not that same right with regard to crimes committed in the district itself. We will assume that there is a case of Boycotting, or of firing into a dwelling, in the County of Cork. The Government obtain a change of venue, and they certify for the County of Down, Cork being proclaimed. When they transfer the case to County Down, they will, under this Bill, have the right to demand a special jury; but supposing a crime of precisely the same description is committed in the County of Down itself, they will have no such power to ask for a special jury in respect of that crime. Can anything be more absurd? It clearly cannot be the intention of the Government to have so unequal an arrangement with regard to crime committed in two different places and both tried in one of those places. Whether this Amendment will actually meet the particular point I have indicated, I do not know; but I think I have said enough to bring clearly to the mind of the Attorney General for Ireland the point I wish to raise.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I now beg to move to insert, after the word "than," in line 10, the words "other than the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, or." I am sure it is only by inadvertence on the part of the draftsman that the necessity for this Amendment has arisen. Every lawyer knows that, in a certain class of cases, when a man is charged with an offence it is within his power to move that the trial be transferred to the Queen's Bench Division. This does not happen in Ireland except on very important occasions, and the Motion is generally made on the part of the Crown. It was made unsuccessfully by the respondents in the case of "The Queen v. Dillon." In England such a motion is very constantly made. A defendant makes an application for the transference of the trial, because he apprehends that in his locality he would not get a fair trial. Now, if a man succeeds in obtaining such a transference of the trial to the Court of Queen's Bench, it will be in the power of the Crown to reverse the action of the Court, and to change the venue. The section is so drawn that it applies to a trial to be held before any Court in Ireland except the Court of Quarter Sessions. I do not think the Government can intend such a state of things to arise. I am persuaded they will act fairly and reasonably, and accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, after "than," insert "other than the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, or."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

[Thirteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): So far as England is concerned there cannot be a trial by a special jury in any case of felony; but it is our intention, by this Bill, that there shall be power in Ireland of having a special jury at the option of the prisoner or of the prosecution.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I should like to point out the result which would follow from the passing of the Bill in its present form. Take the case of a trial for misdemeanour, such as a trial had at Bar for conspiracy. The law in such cases is that though the charges are misdemeanours, and, though the Crown has a right to have a special jury, these special juries are struck on the old system by which the Crown has no right of ordering jurors to stand by, and under which the prisoner and the Crown are on an absolute equality so far as the selection of the jury is concerned. What would happen if this Bill passed in its present form? Let us suppose that a new prosecution is instituted to-morrow against my hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Dillon), and that he was again charged with conspiracy. Suppose the case was tried at the Queen's Bench, the Crown having a special jury empannelled under the old system under this Bill, they have a change of venue or a special jury in the manner provided in the sub-section and would possess an unlimited right of challenging jurors. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will see the necessity of saying something in reply to this statement. We ought to have an answer upon this point.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has ignored the case put before him—I mean the case of "The Queen v. Casey," but the Irish Solicitor General knows it very well. That was a case of conspiracy tried, I believe, somewhere about the year 1876, and the law, as then laid down by Chief Justice May, has been persistently followed ever since. It was then laid down that when your panel of 48 was taken the prisoner had his 12 challenges and the Crown had their 12 challenges, which reduced the number to 24, and then the prisoner, on coming in again, had the right of challenging six more, which made 18 challenges in all.

What would happen if this clause is passed in its present shape? You will be able to have a trial at Bar, and you will be able to have your special jury struck under the old system, but under this clause this is a direct appeal against the decision of the Judge in the case of "The Queen v. Casey." We are being hit in a way that was never intended originally, I believe, and, that being so, I think the least we are entitled to is that when trials at Bar are being had they should be had under the decision of that splendid Conservative authority—Chief Justice May. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will not dispute that, if the Government choose to have an ordinary trial for misdemeanour under this Bill, they can have an unlimited right of challenging jurors; but that if they have a trial at Bar under existing conditions they will be limited to 18 challenges. We should have fair play in that way; but, under this clause, the Government might have a trial and avail themselves of the power of having unlimited challenges. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, going over to Ireland with his heart brimming over with kindness for the Irish people, is going to abandon the right of challenge.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) (Liverpool, Walton): The effect of striking a jury under the old system would be, in the case of a prisoner who chose to exercise his right of challenge, to render it impossible to have a trial at all.

MR. T. M. HEALY: They tried Parnell and O'Connell under the old system.

MR. GIBSON: Yes; but the traversers could render it impossible to have a trial at all under that system, if they chose to exercise their right of challenge. Whenever we have a case which is fit to be brought before the Court of Assizes under the section in its present form, it may be tried before a special jury. When cases are so important that they are not only tried at Assizes, but at Bar, it is absurd to suppose that you should not have a special jury. It has been pointed out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General that there could be no trial by special jury at all, in cases of felony at Common Law. In cases tried in the Queen's Bench it would only be possible, under the old system, to have special juries where the trials were for misdemeanours. It is perfectly true, as pointed out by the hon. and learned Member opposite, that under the old system there were only 48 jurors, and that the traversers had a right to challenge 18.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would like to point out that a very strange result will take place if this clause is carried in its present form. Not only will the Crown be allowed to choose its own jury, but it will be able to choose its own Judge. At present, the prisoner, at any rate, has a chance of being tried by an impartial Judge; but under this clause you will have the power of taking your prisoner before the Court of Queen's Bench, and everybody knows the political characteristics of the gentlemen appointed to the Bench of that branch of the High Court. As I have frequently pointed out before, the people have no confidence in them. Therefore it absolutely appears that no matter what is going on in the country, no matter what political excitement exists, you select not only your own jury, but try a man by your own Judge from the Court of Queen's Bench. This is a thing that I think the English people should thoroughly understand. It is one thing to say that the Crown should have the right of appointing a special jury in order to avoid the possibility of having jurors who would be subject to intimidation; but it is another thing to say that you should have your own Judge as well. That is going a length which I feel perfectly satisfied was never dreamt of by Her Majesty's Government before. Are we to have the dice loaded at both ends? Load them at one end if you like, but do not load them at both. If you frame your laws in this way, you might just as well do away with trial by jury altogether. Set up the gallows in Castle Yard, and let the Lord Lieutenant pick out whom he wants to hang and finish them off out of hand. That would save the Chief Secretary for Ireland a great deal of worry. He looks pained sometimes, and in the way I suggest he might save himself from a great deal of trouble and annoyance. Let him reduce his Bill to one line to the effect I have mentioned. This section which we are now discussing is not a special jury clause at all—I call it a special Judge clause. As to what has fallen from the Solicitor General for Ireland, it is true that in the decision in "The Queen v. Casey" a law was laid down which has worked in a particular manner, but can anyone say that it has worked injustice? Can any right hon. or hon. Member say that anyone is any the worse for it? As I understand the decision of Chief Justice May, it was that the Crown had only 12 and that the prisoner had 18. This decision was rather snorted at by the other Judges afterwards, but they have never attempted to overrule it. I do beg the Government to consider whether they wish to bring the whole of their proceedings into contempt. The Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench have comparatively speaking nothing to do, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, when he is translated there from this House, will have an elegant repose. Do let us know if he is to be made a party to the state of things contemplated by this clause.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The Government seem anxious not only to have an unlimited right of challenge in ordinary cases, but to have the same right in connection with trials at Bar, and to be able to appoint their own Judges to select gentlemen who have been appointed to the Bench simply for political reasons. They may bring a case before a Bench of three Judges, who entertain strong political views, and who would express strong opinions. I will not say whether they would express their opinions rightly or wrongly; but they would, undoubtedly, express strong opinions, and do their best to influence the jury. Under the Act of 1882 it was in the power of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to send prisoners for trial before three Judges. Under the 1st section, those three Judges were to be named by himself in the warrant which he might issue. But we had a number of safeguards provided in that section, when these three very estimable individuals were to try political prisoners. We had, in the 3rd sub-section, provision made for a report, and it was provided that all three Judges should concur in a conviction; and, under a subsequent sub-section, we had provision made for an appeal on all questions, whether of law or of fact, from the decision of those three Judges. We had there a Court of Appeal in which we had greater confidence than in the three Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. As I understand the position of the Government, they want not only to have the benefit of those three Judges, every one of whom can be relied on to convict, but in addition to that they want to rely upon the special juries of the City of Dublin, on the panels of which you find turning up the names of persons who were conspicuous in those trials 30 or 40 years ago. We saw one of those gentlemen come forward not long ago at the trial of one of my hon. Friends. After convicting John Mitchel, 40 years ago, he turned up as bright as a button to convict my hon. Friend. Really the Government seem to be making a humbug of the trials for which they are providing in this clause. If a shred of the Constitution is to be preserved, the Government should take care that the forms of justice should not be prostituted in the sickening way they propose.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: My Amendment simply asks that Government should leave us the one relic of the Constitution which exists in the striking of the jury under the old method. It is the one refuge which political prisoners have left; the one shred of the Constitution remaining to them. We do ask that that shall not be taken away by a side wind, by the indirect effects of this clause.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I think my hon. Friends are straining at a gnat in this matter, because this clause, as it stands, seems to be a perfectly natural consequence, and a perfectly proper consequence of the provisions of the 2nd section of this Bill. There they have provided the law which is to be applied to criminals in Ireland. They have selected the tribunals to try the fact, and selected them with a view to securing what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland calls an effective trial—namely, a conviction. Is it not perfectly natural that the Government should now ask that they should have the power of appointing also special juries and special Judges to try these cases? I think this clause is thoroughly consistent; and I am very glad my hon. Friend (Mr. Maurice Healy) has called attention to the fact that not only is the jury to be selected, not only is the prisoner not to be tried by a common jury, as to which there is an unlimited right of challenge, but the Government are to avail themselves of special juries composed of the enemies of the prisoners; and, further than that, they are to have the power of specially selecting the Judges. I think it is perfectly right on the part of the Government, seeing what the Bill is, that they should do this; but, at the same time, it is clearly right and proper for my hon. Friends to protest against it. Such a complete travesty of trial by law, and such a complete upsetting of the principle of trial by jury, was never known. Why do not the Government abolish trial by jury altogether in Ireland?

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 134: Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 191.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move the Amendment, No. 27, which stands in my name—In line 12, after "Court," insert "if such crime could not have been prosecuted summarily." In moving this Amendment, I want to get out from the Government why they propose to try people by jury, and to try them summarily at the same time. I would point out one important thing in connection with this matter. Take the case of conspiracy—you can prosecute that either by a jury trial or summarily. If you prosecute by jury you can give two years' imprisonment, but if you only prosecute summarily you can only give six months' imprisonment. But now you are going to take power to act in either of these ways. There are several considerations to be taken into account in connection with this matter. For instance, there is the question of prison discipline. If you are convicted of conspiracy, as the law stands at present you do not get hard labour; but the Government seem to be anxious to alter the present rules, and to inflict hard labour in cases of conspiracy. This is really a most important matter. It may be an oversight on the part of the Government. Many things have crept into the Bill through oversight. I would ask the Government therefore, do they want to prosecute people before the magistrates, and do they want, at the same time, to have the option of prosecuting the same people before a jury? That seems to me to be a plain question to which, I think, I have a right to have an answer. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, after "court" insert "if such crime could not have been prosecuted summarily."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I think that some such question was asked upon the Amendment to the second clause of the Bill, and at that time, if I am not mistaken, I gave the answer that I am about to give now. I propose, I need hardly say—because I believe every Member of this Committee knows it before I say it—to retain after the passing of this Bill the power of proceeding against any crime which can now be tried by indictment. It would be a most singular change in the law if, because the Legislature makes certain offences punishable summarily under this Bill, the Government should be prevented from indicting persons for those offences.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not the point. I do not want to prevent you from indicting, but I say that you should not have a special jury for it.

MR. HOLMES: I will come to that in a moment. I want to go step by step. The hon. and learned Gentleman understands that we have introduced certain provisions in the 2nd clause that enable summary jurisdiction to be exercised, notwithstanding that the offences punished are now indictable at Common Law. We propose that if these offences are committed in proclaimed districts and are proceeded against by indictment, as in many cases it may be the bounden duty of the Attorney General for Ireland to proceed against them, that the same privilege should be given to the Crown and to the defendant in regard to the granting of a special jury as a matter of course. I cannot conceive what possible objection there can be to that arrangement. I cannot understand why, if we are to have special juries in the case of a great number of other offences, we should not have them in the case of these indictable offences. In point of fact, it is plain with reference to this very case of conspiracy that the circumstances of such offence are likely to be such as to require juries of more intelligence than ordinary. It seems to me to be most desirable to give the accused person, if he wishes, or the prosecutor if he wishes it, an opportunity of taking cases of this kind before a jury of greater intelligence than a common jury. That being our view we certainly must object to the Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Attorney General for Ireland represents a constituency of the class from which special juries will be drawn. I presume that he would contend that he represents a constituency of greater intelligence than ordinary. But would the people of the country generally consider it a greater advantage to be tried by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency, who belong to the University of Dublin, than to be tried by the ordinary people of the country? The right hon. and learned Gentleman may contend that greater intelligence would be brought to bear upon the question at issue. That may or may not be the case, but the people themselves are the best judges of whether or not there would be an advantage in being tried in this way. The people of the country very much prefer being tried by the ordinary electors of Ireland in preference to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's constituents. By refusing to entertain the proposition of my hon. and learned Friend the right hon. and learned Gentleman is putting himself in this position—he is enlarging very much the powers of special jurors under the Bill, and doing it at a very dangerous time. That is not the worst of it. During the last five or six years we have been greatly extending the liberties of the people, so far as the return of Members to this House is concerned. We have been transferring the power that was formerly exclusively in the hands of the upper class, or the upper branch of the middle class, in a very great degree into the hands of the working men, the farmers and the artisans of Ireland. That is, that task has been undertaken so far as the return of Members to this House is concerned; but now the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, in refusing this Amendment, wants to go in exactly the opposite direction, so far as the law is concerned. He wishes to have the administration of the law taken out of the hands of the common juries, and vested in the hands of the special juries which are drawn from the upper classes and the upper branch of the middle classes. He wants to take the judicial administrative power away from the common juries, away from the great mass of the people, and to transfer it to the higher classes. Well, I would warn the Government that principles of this kind which they begin to apply in Ireland have a tendency to spread and very frequently extend to this country.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out that the hon. and gallant Member is now addressing himself to the whole clause. He is not confining himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

COLONEL NOLAN: Then in obedience to your ruling, Sir, I will endeavour to confine my remarks to the Amendment. The whole argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was that the Government should have power to appeal to the special jury instead of the common jury, and his refusal to accept this Amendment was based entirely upon that principle. He did not talk much for the Crown. That goes without saying. He wanted a strong argument against us, and, therefore, he dwelt mainly upon the iniquity of preventing a defendant from being able to appeal to a special jury when he desired to do so. Well, there are very few defendants in Ireland who would prefer a special to a common jury. Notwithstanding the intelligence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own constituency, I have no hesitation in saying that the people of Ireland would rather be tried by juries taken from their own class than by juries drawn from those people. If a defendant is innocent he would infinitely prefer that, although if he is guilty he might not care where the jury came from—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

COLONEL NOLAN: I thought I was in Order in pointing out that the transference of this power from the common juries to the special juries, which was the whole argument of the Attorney General for Ireland, is a most dangerous principle. If, however, you, Sir, say that that matter belongs to the whole clause, I will reserve my remarks upon the point until the whole clause is put. I would say, however, that to take a farmer from Tuam or Connemara, to have him tried by the residents of Rathmines in Dublin, would be the very wildest course that could be adopted. I would remind the Government that on one occasion the late Sergeant Armstrong gave evidence to the effect that it was a matter of great importance to have prisoners tried by the people themselves. He declared that when a verdict of guilty was given by a jury drawn from the people themselves, a great impression was produced and a sort of thrill ran through the whole Court. That is the result when prisoners are convicted by their own class; but, said the Sergeant, there is no feeling of that kind at all amongst the Irish people when prisoners are convicted by a different class from themselves. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite is departing from a principle laid down by an authority in law which he himself will acknowledge as a very eminent one.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have some difficulty in knowing whether or not I made myself clear to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, because he dwelt almost altogether upon the right of the prisoner to claim to be tried by a special jury.

MR. HOLMES: I said the prosecutor and the defendant.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object altogether to the prisoner having the right to claim to be tried by a special jury. That right led to your unnatural offenders and your Orangemen murderers being tried by a sympathetic jury of their own gang and getting off. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made a point of the prisoner having the right to the protection of the special intelligence of a special jury as well as the Crown. He said the prisoner should have the option of choosing the jury; but will you give him that option against the decision of the Resident magistrates who, to my way of thinking, are not persons of any special intelligence, being mostly ex-policemen or half-pay soldiers? The point the Government have not dealt with is this, that when they have the right of going before their own Resident Magistrates and convicting us before them, they will not do so. They want to convict us before special juries, in order that they may give us two years' imprisonment. Why can they not be contented with giving six months' imprisonment? I think no one should have the right to summarily inflict the punishment of imprisonment upon anyone under this Bill unless he has had some experience of that punishment himself, and thoroughly knows what it means. But to say that you should have an opportunity of inflicting two years, is the point the Amendment touches, and that is the point the right hon. and learned Gentleman has neglected to refer to. I say again, that the proposal to allow the prisoner to avail himself of a special jury is simply an Orange proposal. It is a piece of class legislation. No Nationalist will ever ask to be tried by a special jury of Orangemen and Freemasons. When you have an opportunity of convicting summarily before the Resident Magistrates, why do you want an opportunity of convicting a man by a special jury? I have not at all objected to indictments being preferred. Prefer them if you like; but the Attorney General for Ireland, I say, should not have the right to claim a special jury. At any rate, the Court should have an opportunity of saying—"You might have prosecuted these men summarily." The latter part of the clause says that the Attorney General for Ireland may, as of course, claim a special jury, but this is not a case where he should have the right, seeing that each trial will be one in which he might have proceeded summarily, but has not done so. I wish the Committee to declare that the Attorney General for Ireland shall not have this right, as of course. I think the Committee ought to deal with that point.

Colonel Nolan

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I do trust the Government will give some answer to the arguments which have just been submitted to them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland got up and answered the speech made in bringing forward the Amendment; but he did not answer a single point contained in that speech; and now, instead of making an answer to further observations, he sits dumb on the Front Government Bench, knowing, I suppose, that he has no answer to give. The Government in this matter are displaying a spirit which is really atrocious. They have the right of summary conviction, they have the right of change of venue, they have the right of a special jury, and with all these we are told by the Chief Secretary for Ireland that they intend to preserve in their hands the disgraceful power of jury packing, which they have used with such effect in the past. I protest that this is a monstrous spirit in which to press a Bill of this kind upon the House. Let the Government select one power which they say they want, and content themselves with that. Any one of these powers would, if used at all, be effective in itself. Let them select one power, but do not let them play with cards up their sleeves. Do not let them have half a-dozen of these atrocious provisions that they can use against the unfortunate prisoner in a cumulative way. I deny that there is anything in the enactment with regard to the power of summary conviction that makes it necessary that they should require an additional power of employing a special jury. If an offence has hitherto been an indictable offence, it has always been the practice to deal with it as an indictable offence, and if it has always been an offence for summary conviction, it has always been dealt with summarily. There has been no attempt made in Ireland, nor, so far as I know, in England, to insist upon having two modes of procedure concurrent, and to have power vested in the Crown to select their mode of procedure according to their choice. I challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to give a single reason for retaining in the hands of the Crown this power to select special juries in cases where it is open to the Crown to try offences summarily. Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman put his finger upon a single example; can he point to a single case of the Crown having a right to insist upon a special jury, and also a right of option to try a case summarily? I say that he cannot attempt to point to such a case. That being so, we must only conclude that the Government are so greedy of power, so determined to exercise their powers oppressively, that whereas in the 2nd section of this Bill they have the power of punishing their political opponents with six months' imprisonment with hard labour, they are not content with that, but, putting aside, wish to rely upon extraordinary powers in order to send their political opponents to gaol for two years.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Would the Government object to giving the prisoner the right to select to be tried before two Resident Magistrates instead of a special jury? If a man is indicted, will the Government give him the option of going before two of their intelligent Resident Magistrates rather than going before their special jurors?

MR. HOLMES: Certainly not. It would be wrong to give the prisoner an option of being tried before a tribunal which can only give six months' imprisonment, or before a jury where there would be no such limit. Take the case of an assault endangering life—technically, that might be tried before two Resident Magistrates, but, as I say, it would be exceedingly wrong to give the prisoner the option of being so tried, and of only having six months' imprisonment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But you have the power to change the venue, and you can take such a man 300 miles away, and indict him before a common jury. What is the use of talking to us as if we did not know the Bill? You seem to us to be determined not to give the prisoner a single chance. You have your quiver full of arrows—you have as many poisoned arrows in this Bill as would destroy an entire nation. When we ask you to give the prisoner an option of being tried before two Resident Magistrates, you say—"No; the offence may be too serious." If the offence is too serious to try a man summarily in the South or West of Ireland, you can take him to Antrim or to Down, or where you like. Every time we bring forward an argument something that was trotted out and discarded on a former occasion is resorted to by the Government. It is impossible to get from them any real solid reason for anything. There is evident truth in what is said by Conservative Members outside this House, that they are supporting this Bill neither by their hearts nor their heads.

MR. CHANCE: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would read the 3rd clause of the Bill, he would find that a prisoner, such as he referred to, would not have the option to which he has alluded. The case of an aggravated assault endangering life which he used as an example is not within the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrates, be they good, bad, or indifferent; therefore, I do trust that when they use examples to confound us in our ignorance, they will show a little more knowledge of the Bill themselves than to quote cases which could not possibly come within the clause at all.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 135: Majority 68.—(Div. List, No. 192.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): The object of the Amendment I have now to propose is to give Judges a discretion in reference to those cases in which special jurors are to be selected. We may see the effect of the Amendment by a glance at the clause. As it stands, the clause gives the Attorney General absolute power in any case to move for a special jury. To make such an application is his prerogative. What is the benefit, as the matter now stands, of any appeal to the High Court? The High Court have no jurisdiction. The Attorney General, or, worse still, the deputy of the Attorney General, simply moves, and the moment the application is made the High Court must grant it. Is it to be a mere registrar of the Attorney General of the day? What is the benefit of the Judges sitting on the Bench if they are to be mere puppets, mere talking machines? How is the application to be made? Is there to be the slightest publicity given? Is there to be even the small benefit of the light of public opinion shed on these transactions? Not at all. The Attorney General for Ireland is now in his place. He knows thoroughly well the practice of the Irish Courts, and I challenge him to say whether, under this section, it will not be possible for him, as Attorney General, to walk into the study of any Judge, any morning, and say—"I want a special jury, give me your order." There need be no appearance in Court, no notice to the other side. There is the wretched compensation that the defendant can make such an application. But defendants never do make an application of this description. Who is the Attorney General for Ireland who is entrusted with this enormous power? I

Colo. Maurice Healy

at vary
the.]

do not wish to speak of the present Attorney General for Ireland; I simply speak of the Office. Sometimes people in England make a grievous mistake in supposing that the Attorney General for Ireland and the Attorney General for England have similar functions. As a matter of fact, there are no two officials more unlike in their duties than the Attorney General for England and the Attorney General for Ireland. The Attorney General for England, generally speaking, is not a politician, but a gentleman who secures his elevation to the position by hard professional work, and when he enters the House of Commons, he always acts very fairly and good humouredly. But what is the Attorney General for Ireland? He is the executive agent of a political Government determined to act in defiance of the wishes and wants of the Irish people, and yet he is the man who is to move for special juries. Why, in the name of common sense, are Judges brought into the transaction at all? I have never made any attack upon the members of the Judicial Bench, and if I attempted to do so I could not make a more successful attack upon them than is made by the Government in this clause, for by this clause the Judges of the High Court in Ireland are made mere puppets. Now, do the Government intend the special juries to be bodies of men who are determined to do justice between the Crown and the accused? Often the existence of the Government hangs upon a verdict of guilty. The Government wish to give the matter an appearance of earnestness before the English public by bringing in the Judges. But the Judges are to have no discretion whatever. I greatly regret that the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) and the ex-Attorney General for England (Sir Charles Russell) are not present. I, however, see in his place a Member of the late Ministry, a man learned in legal matters, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler). I put it to him whether within his knowledge of English jurisprudence he knows of a case in which an Executive Officer of the Crown, a political agent, a mere administrator, is able to walk into the study of a Judge and say—"Here, I want a special jury, give me an order." This Amendment of mine is an exquisite specimen of drafting. I say so because I did not draft it. I merely copied it from a Bill with which even the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) must be familiar. The Bill from which I took these words provided that in cases where special juries were summoned there should be notice of motion or a summons to the other side, that the case should be discussed in Court, that the Judges should have a discretion to grant or to refuse the application, that an order for a special jury should not be granted unless the High Court is satisfied that the application for it is not made vexatiously, and that it is expedient for the ends of justice that the trial should take place before a special jury. My Amendment is taken, as far as circumstances permit, from the draft of the Criminal Code which was presented to Parliament by Sir John Holker on behalf of the Tory Party. It is very remarkable that the four learned Judges who drafted this code expressed the wish that in every case the Law of Ireland should be assimilated to the Law in England, and after mature and grave deliberation in respect to cases of special juries, they adopted a section in the words of my Amendment. Why should a different proposal to that made in 1878 be made in 1887? Because the exigencies of Party require a different state of things. The four learned Judges who drew up the Code said they sat from May, 1878, to November, 1879, and considered carefully and deliberately every sentence and every clause of their recommendations. There are the names of four Gentlemen at the back of this Bill. There is that of the English Attorney General, of whom I shall say nothing in particular; there is that of the Irish Attorney General, who will administer the Bill; there is that of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who loves power, and who will, I am sure, make a thoroughly effective use of it; and there is that of the Home Secretary. These Gentlemen put their puny wisdom against the experience of four learned Judges. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 11, to leave out from "court" to end of clause, and insert "on application of either the Attorney General or the defendant on notice of motion or summons to the other side, make an order that the trial of the defendant or defendants, if more than one, shall be by a special jury.

[Thirteenth Night.]

"No such order shall be made unless the High Court is satisfied that the application for it is not made vexatiously or for delay, and that it is expedient for the ends of justice that the trial should take place before a special jury. The court may in such order postpone the trial on such terms as seem just."—(Mr. Mac Neill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Amendment that has just been moved raises a narrow, but, at the same time, an important issue. Similar Amendments stand in the names of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) and of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell). I only regret that it has not fallen to the lot of either of those right hon. Gentlemen to move this Amendment, because I think they would not have entirely forgotten the courtesies which ought to exist between one Member of the House and another, and would have recognized that there may be honourable men practicing at the Irish Bar. The question raised by the Amendment is whether a special jury shall, under certain circumstances, be obtained as a matter of right. I need hardly say that this is a question to which the Government have given careful and mature consideration, and the conclusion they have come to is embodied in the Bill. The clause corresponds in this respect with a clause in the Act of 1882, which introduced into the Criminal Law a practice already established in civil actions. In every civil action tried in this country, it is the right of one or the other party, as a matter of course, to apply for a special jury. There was a time when it was not a matter of course, and when an order of the Court was required; but a change was made, and now it is a matter of right. We have come to the conclusion that it ought to be a matter of right in criminal cases. It is asked why discretion is not given to the Court? Applications for special juries will very rarely be made vexatiously, and it is a very inconvenient thing to have the facts of a criminal case discussed at great length on a preliminary motion of this kind. I know sufficient of the practice in Ireland to know that there would be a discussion in behalf of the defence in every single case of this kind. All the facts would be canvassed—a thing which is to be avoided if it be possible. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Mac Neill) referred at some length to the character of the Attorney General for Ireland. He said he did not refer to me personally, but—

MR. MAC NEILL: I referred simply to the character of the Office.

MR. HOLMES: He said the holder of the Office is a servant of the Executive. That I entirely deny. The Attorney General for Ireland is in the same position exactly as the Attorney General for England. I have had the honour of knowing many men who have held the Office of Attorney General for Ireland, and I do not know any one of them who would take a hint or order from any Member of the Executive. The Attorney General for Ireland acts upon his own motion—indeed, I have never known a hint or order given by the Executive in reference to the discharge of his duties. Whatever is done by the Attorney General for Ireland is done upon his own responsibility, and upon his own initiative. If he does any wrong the Committee may be sure it is his own act, and in no way dictated by any other Member of the Government. There is not a single member of the legal Profession in Ireland, who carries on his work in an honourable way, who would accept the Office of Attorney General subject to the terms and conditions which have been specified by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The simple reason why the Attorney General is mentioned in this clause is that he is one party to the criminal litigation. The Attorney General for Ireland stands in the same position on one side as the accused stands on the other; therefore, if an application is to be made or notice is to be served, it must be done on the one side by the Attorney General for Ireland, and on the other by the defendant. It is asked why we deviate from the Act of 1882. Well, the reason is very simple; we think that, inasmuch the service of a notice would not have the same authentication as an order of the Court, and seeing that it must be acted on by the Sheriff and other officers, it is better to have the order drawn up by the Court. When it is objected that it is an order, as of course, it must be remembered that such things as those are well known in law. That is a small matter; but, as reference has been made to it, I thought it right to mention it. I will not take up the time of the Committee by going into this matter further.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I will certainly draw no distinctions between considerations that apply to the Office of the Attorney General for Ireland and to those that would apply to a similar Office in England, though, of course, it is well known to hon. Members on both sides of the House that in Ireland the Attorney General is much closer in connection with the administration of the Criminal Law than the Attorney General is in England. But I should object to this clause, as it now stands, whether it applied to the Attorney General for Ireland or the Attorney General for England, and I will very shortly state to the Committee why I should object to it. It may, or may not, be a proper thing to give to the Attorney General for Ireland the right of requiring on his own ipse dixit a special jury. That may, or may not, be right; but if it be right to give him that power I do not see why the Court is to be brought into the matter at all, because this clause, as it stands without amendment, requires the Court, not as a judicial Act, not as a matter upon which their judgment and discretion are called in question, but to act as a mere Ministerial register in judicial form, in such manner, as the Attorney General, in his executive capacity, may be pleased individually to determine. Therefore, if it be right that this power should be vested with the Attorney General for Ireland, let it be given to him openly, and let the precedent of the Act of 1882 be followed, by which no reference to the Court at all was contemplated, but according to which it was given to the Attorney General for Ireland to say whether there should, or should not, be a special jury. I am not myself in the least affected by the precedent of the Statute of 1882. I will not say more than this in reference to that Statute. I do not agree that the circumstances were at all analogous to those of the present case. I do not think that the state of things which, it was argued, justified the precedent of 1882, in fact, justified that precedent, and if it did, that state of things does not now exist. I had the pleasure of voting against what was done in 1882, as I should, under similar circumstances, vote against it again. But there is, besides that difference that I have suggested, the further difference, that in 1882 it was admittedly the temporary use of what was called a "hateful expedient" by the Government. It was said to be an exceptional measure, only to be justified by the circumstances of the day, and only to be resorted to for the time, under exceptional temporary circumstances. But the Bill we are now dealing with it is intended to incorporate permanently into the general law of the land; therefore, it does seem to me more important that we should consider closely the powers which are given under it. I say, therefore, first, that if the power is to be given to the Attorney General for Ireland it ought to be given to him directly, and that the Court ought not to be made merely a machine, so to speak, for registering, in a judicial form, his behests. But I object to the Attorney General for Ireland having this power, and I think it is of importance that this should be brought to the attention of the Committee at once. The question of the special jury may be most important. It is very significant that the framers of this Bill have used the same language, practically, as to each important matter—namely, that they have given power to the Attorney General for Ireland, in the first instance, to declare whether the venue should be changed, whether there should be a special jury, and that there should be an order of the Court as of course. My objection, therefore, is this that the power ought not to be vested in the Attorney General for Ireland, and that, if there is to be a reference to the Court at all, the proper form in which that reference to the Court should take is this, that the Court may, for good cause, make the order either for a special jury or to change the venue as it sees fit for good reason. I think the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman deserve attention because, though one may not agree with him, he is at least always clear in what he says. But, in this case, the only argument I heard him use in support of the clause as it stands and against the Amendment was, that the fact of requiring it to be an order of the Court would give it an appearance of greater solemnity. He said that, or words to that effect. But that does not seem to me to be at all a sufficient reason. I do not think it is a proper position in which to place any person of the judicial Bench either in England or in Ireland—the position of merely having to register the will of the Executive Officer of the day—the Attorney General for Ireland, who is a political Member of the Executive Government. I say the reference ought to be if it is a matter that requires the intervention of the judicial authority at all, the direct intervention of the Judge, who shall say whether or not the order is one which should be made. I should very much have preferred if this discussion could have been taken on the Amendment which stands on the Paper, in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry Fowler), or on the Amendment which stands on the Paper in my own name; but as, Sir, the way in which you will put this Amendment will exclude later Amendments to the same effect from coming on, I shall feel bound to support the proposal before the Committee.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I exceedingly regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland should have thought it necessary to import into this discussion, which was distinctly of an academic character, a very considerable amount of heat, and that whilst he accused my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) of forgetting the courtesy due to men holding judicial positions, he did not himself think it a breach of courtesy to express regret that my hon. and learned Friend belonged to a profession of which the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland himself is so distinguished an ornament. I regret very much that any discussion should be carried on in this House in such a manner, and I think that the last thing people who live in glass houses should do is to throw stones. I think it would be well for right hon. Gentlemen if they desired to avoid the aspersion of being merely Peckeniffs to refrain from throwing accusations against hon. Members as to breaches of courtesy in this Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked us why the parties in these prosecutions should not have this right, and he pointed out that though the right was given to the Attorney General for Ireland to have a special jury if he desired it, yet the balance of justice was struck by giving the defendant an equal right to claim a special jury, if he so desired it. That argument is obviously and transparently a fallacy. He might, with an equal amount of reason, say this to a prisoner—"It is true I take power to hang you, but I bring about a balance of justice in the case by giving you power to hang yourself." I am surprised that a lawyer of the experience and ability of the right hon. and learned Gentleman should use such an argument in this House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to argue with us who say that the Attorney General for Ireland should not have this power, and he seemed to speak of civil cases, and of criminal cases alike. But there is a great distinction to be drawn between these cases. Matters in dispute in civil actions in Ireland are, as a rule, of very small importance, only involving a few pounds; and jurors, from whatever class they are drawn, are perfectly capable of dealing with such considerations. Then, again, in cases of this kind, the plaintiff and the defendant stand upon perfectly equal terms, each one having to manage his own case, out of his own resources. They have equal rights of challenge, and have equal facilities for the production of evidence, but none of these analogies exist in a case where the Crown is the prosecutor. The Crown with all its powers, and with all its wealth, and with all the means, creditable and discreditable, by which it obtains convictions, and with its unlimited power of requiring jurors to stand aside, is in a very different position from a party in a civil action. It must be remembered that the Crown is on the side of the Resident Magistrates, and that you have the Resident Magistrates taking one side, and, it may be, poor and needy peasantry standing upon the other. I regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not had regard to the Indictment for Offences Bill of 1879. He was asked to give a reason why the Government had abandoned every principle set forth in that measure,

Sir Charles Russell

but we know that the memories of Ministerialists are very short. They are very fond of talking about continuity of policy—continuity of foreign policy, and so forth—and they should have given us some reason why, in the matter we are now discussing, they have abandoned continuity. They should have told us why they turned their backs upon the Bill of 1879. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he had referred to that Act, would have found that under one of the Sections the Court might be asked to interfere and decide whether special juries should be had, or should not be had, and was entitled to refuse special juries unless it saw that it was expedient for the ends of justice that they should be empannelled. It is a strange thing that the Executive should be afraid of giving, in this Bill, similar powers to those contained in the measure to which I refer. We heard, about half-an-hour ago, a long disquisition, in which the Law Officer proceeded to show that in cases of felony it would be impossible to get a trial if the jury were struck under the old system; that if a trial were taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the prisoner charged with felony chose to exercise his right of challenge, he would be able to defeat the ends of justice. I did not think that argument a sound and true one, and I referred to the section of the Act under which such a state of things was said to be possible, and I found that the law did not bear the construction which the right hon. and learned Gentleman placed upon it. But, apart from those technical questions, there is a larger and deeper question involved. The case of the Government, in introducing this Bill, is that law and order is at a discount in Ireland, that no confidence in the law exists, and that law does not protect those who appeal to its protection. But I maintain that the Clause, as it stands, would act directly against that view, it would destroy confidence in the law, and render the law still less powerful to protect those who appeal to it. That is perfectly obvious. For the first time in Criminal Law it is proposed to make the Judges the merest Ministerial Officers of the Executive Government in thorough mockery of their judicial functions. It is proposed to compel them to do that which the Attorney General for Ireland thinks it right that they should do. I have always understood that a Judge is a person who should sit in a Court, having jurisdiction to decide according to his conscience, and according to the law, and to administer justice impartially between one side and the other. Though that distinction may apply to future trials where the prosecutor is not the Crown, yet I would point out that it is proposed by this clause that where the Crown puts forth its power to obtain a conviction against an unfortunate peasant, the Judge should no longer be independent, but should be degraded into acting as a mere tool of the Executive Government. We have had allusion to the Act of 1882. Right hon. Gentlemen who are so fond of appealing to those Acts, however, are not willing to agree with the section of that Act at all; because, in the 4th section of that Act, I find that by notice served upon either party, a special jury shall be had, and no application to the Court is necessary. I hope we shall be troubled no more by incorrect applications of an Act the principle of which the Tory Party 18 months ago abandoned once and for ever. I hope we may have some clear explanation from Her Majesty's Government as to why, in dealing with this Bill for the first time, they depart from the principles of a measure which a Committee of Tory Members brought forward, and which was revised by a Committee of Judges, most of whom were Tories, and which was amended under the patronage of the Tory Government. I should like to know what benefit the Government expect to obtain from the degradation of judicial offices in Ireland, at a time when they say that law and order is weak, and requires to be strengthened in that country. I must say it seems to me that theirs is a very peculiar way of strengthening law and order; and I must say I trust that we shall have some more moderate and reasonable defence made for the Bill as it stands than that which we have heard from the Tory Law Officer, who gets £9,000 a-year, and governs the whole of the judicial machinery in Ireland.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I assume that orders for special juries, which have been referred to, are obtained in the Court in some way or other?

MR. HOLMES: I think that in Ireland they are moved for in Court, and not in chambers; but the application is of a formal character.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: The Committee having accepted the principle that there should be special juries when circumstances seem to require it in the classes of cases in Ireland which have been referred to, the point is whether special juries should be granted as a matter of course on the application of either the Attorney General for Ireland who represents the prosecution, or of the counsel for the defendant who is to be put on his trial; or whether the granting of the special jury should be a distinct act of judicial discretion on the part of the Court. That appears to be the real issue; and, for my own part, I desire to enforce the view that this granting of the special jury should be a matter of judicial discretion, and not a matter of course. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland raised two arguments, both of which are weighty. His first was this—he said—"You are entitled in civil procedure to a special jury as a matter of course, and why should you not in criminal matters or questions of as great importance have the same right?" The answer to that is, that the essence of criminal procedure is that a man shall be tried by his peers—by people in his own rank of life, who may be assumed to have sympathy with the circumstances, and with the facts that surround the offence with which he is charged—I do not mean to say sympathy with the offence, but sympathy with the circumstances surrounding the parties. I think that is a sufficient distinction as between a civil and a criminal action. A civil action in this country is, as a rule, merely a matter of money; but the assumption in the Criminal Law in this country is that criminal charges are of a much graver nature, and, as affecting individuals in their ordinary capacity as members of the community, they should be tried by their peers. I must say that the other objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have a little more force in it—namely, that there is a danger of all the facts of the case being brought out preliminary. Would that be so? Under Palmer's Act I never knew any practical inconvenience to arise from the statements of the facts coming before the Court, and for the reason that the application for the Court would be, not on the merits or demerits of the case, but as to whether there would be a probability of an ordinary jury discharging its duty without fear or favour; and in considering a point of that sort the influence which the prosecution would have on the one side might be considered no more than the influence the prisoner might have upon the jury on the other hand. No doubt, the Government have fully considered this matter, and there is not the slightest doubt that the majority of this Committee will vote according to the view of the Government. But so far as the Act of 1882 goes, I, like my hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell), shall not be bound by that Act. I fought many a battle against that measure; I resisted many of its clauses, just as I am resisting this Bill to-day. I dislike that Act; the Government professes to be guided by it in some respects, but they are now departing from it. They are introducing another plan because they say it is a better one. I must say I think that their mode is an improvement on that of 1882. The question is, if there is a probability that there cannot be a fair trial before a common jury, that question should not be settled by either of the litigants—either by the Crown, on the one hand, or by the prisoner, on the other, the matter should be considered and decided by the Court. If a special jury is awarded, it should be awarded by the Court, for, under those circumstances, the verdict would be more likely to be acceptable than would the decision under the circumstances proposed. I do not think the Crown would act vexatiously; but I think that both sides would try to get a jury that they would consider consonant with justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): It seems to me that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) has made a very clear and simple statement of the law, and that he expresses a firm and candid opinion that those who hold the Office of Attorney General for Ireland should not be hampered or influenced in pursuing their course of public conduct by any such motives as are suggested by those who move these Amendments. I fully admit the very great importance of this question, and particularly the aspect of it to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) has directed attention. But I may say, after considering this matter very carefully, that there are serious objections to having, as has been suggested, a preliminary discussion in Court for the purpose of deciding whether or not there should be a special jury. Now, the question of the removal of defendants under a change of venue is an entirely different matter from this. The former Act only applies to cases of changes of venue, and it has nothing whatever to do in this regard. The Government have considered that in dealing with the class of facts which would be likely to give rise to the necessity on one side or the other for an application for a special jury it is very undesirable that there should be a preliminary trial or inquiry, which must, to a very large extent, involve both parties in a disclosure of their case and the facts upon which they rely in such a way as to indicate the merits. But what are the facts? The application is to be made either on the responsibility of the Attorney General for Ireland of the day, who is presumed to do his duty impartially, and who is thoroughly conversant with the facts of the case, or it is to be made on the responsibility of the advisers of the defendants, who also are perfectly acquainted with the pertinent facts. This is fair to both sides. And then one word more with regard to the suggestion that the Courts are in some sort of indirect manner affected adversely by the proposal in this clause. So far as the assertion that the dignity of the Court would be endangered is concerned, I say that the Government has put forward their proposal simply because they think that it is exceedingly desirable that a matter of this character should be done formally by the orders of the Court, and should not be done by giving notice on the responsibility of one side or of the other. When the matter has been done in that formal way it would be regarded as an important step, and one that would not be taken hastily and without consideration. The Government certainly consider that where equal right of applying is given to both prosecutor and to defendant it is not at all desirable or in the public interests that there should be a preliminary inquiry or discussion. That being so, the Government are unable to accept this Amendment, because it would remove the responsibility from the shoulders of the Attorney General for Ireland in Office, and it would deprive the defendant of rights which he has under the clause as it now stands. For these reasons it is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment.

Mr. Holmes

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I am not myself an admirer of the jury system when it is perverted from its proper purpose. However, I am strongly of opinion that the jury system is a good system when the defendant is tried by his peers without fear or prejudice; and I mean by peers those who are pretty much on a level as regards social position and the like with the accused. It is quite clear to me that a jury composed exclusively of special jurors is not a fitting tribunal for the trial of prisoners coming from a class to which such jurors do not themselves belong. These juries are bodies in which inhere very great social responsibility, if they fairly dispense justice between man and man. But, of all tribunals, the packed jury is undoubtedly the worst, and I think the Government should take some care against the institution and nurture of such a gross abuse. Yet it seems to me that the Bill of the Government is aimed against the jury system in its original and proper sense of trial by peers. It was said that the object of the Amendment was to insure that justice would be done; but if you have packed juries—

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. Member (Sir George Campbell) is discussing three Amendments at once. The question is whether the special jury is to be obtained as a matter of right by either prosecutor or defendant, or whether the matter is to be left to the discretion of the Court.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I think that the remark I was making just now would have applied especially to this question of special juries, because it does seem to me that if you have a jury devoid of the sense of social responsibility as peers of the accused, not justice, but injustice, will be done. As to changing the venue and the like,

I myself believe that that might be a benefit to a man in a high station of life, but certainly not, in many cases, to the poor. For these reasons I support the Amendment, and I hope the Government will see their way to so modify the clause as will prevent the adoption to pernicious purposes of the special jury system.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not think, Sir, that the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) can have even himself accepted seriously the line of argument which he pursued. For my part, I cannot understand why it is that Ministers of the Crown persist in making statements and weaving arguments which have no tendency to clear up the matters in discussion or to answer the objections which have been made from this side of the House in regard to these Amendments. It is a very hard, it is a very difficult matter indeed, for us to take as a really serious argument the assertion of the Government that they considered they were doing equal justice all round in this matter, because they gave the same right to the defendant which was given to the Attorney General for Ireland. Does the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) suppose or pretend that any person in Ireland of our way of thinking is going to apply for a special jury? He must surely see the absurdity and the preposterous character of such an idea. But then, on the other hand, the members of the Orange Party can apply for a special jury, and this provision is for the benefit of Orangemen, and expressly left in in order that the Orangemen may apply for such a jury as in their case will greatly lessen the risk of conviction. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite must know that this right given to the defendant, which the Government put forward as a justification for the method of this clause, is absolutely no right whatever, and I say that it is a perfect mockery to talk about the same right being extended to the prisoner as is extended to the prosecutor. Now, let us take an illustration. We have an Amendment in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), which we intend, if necessary, to press to a Division, expressly omitting the words "or defendant," and seeking to deprive the defendant of the so-called right which the Government propose to give the defendant, simply because we know quite well that it is absurd to suppose for a single moment that any one of the same way of thinking as the Irish Members would apply for a special jury. If it were necessary for me to bring home conviction in such a matter as this, the absurdity of which must be obviously evident to all fair thinking men, if it were necessary for me to take an illustration of the empty pretence of this proposal to give a pretended right to the defendant, I have only to ask the Committee to turn to Clause 4, where it will be found that the Government put forward, as a benefit to the defendant, to get a change of venue, and yet no such provision is made, although in this case a power of the sort proposed would be a benefit to a defendant. In Clause 3 persons are entitled to apply for a special jury, which, unless they happen to be Orangemen, will inevitably convict them. In Clause 4, where it is urgently needed, no such right is pretended to be given to the persons affected at all. I ask the Government, is there any force whatever in the argument put forward by the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster), that equal rights were given to the defendant and to the prosecution. It is perfectly evident to anyone who understands the dodges of the Law Officers that the Government are very determined to have what the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), in an unguarded moment, called an "effective trial." The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not say a fair trial—he dropped the mask; and the object of the clause he made clear was to secure a course of conviction fas or nefas. If there is an honest Judge amongst the very few such who adorn the Irish Bench—"Order!"] —I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite why, if they consider the Irish Judges honest, they will not leave it to the discretion of those Judges in the administration of this affair? It is hon. Members on the other side who distrust or suspect the Irish Judges, because they will not allow to the discretion of those Judges the decision whether the venue should be changed. What the Government want is that every power shall be in the manipulation of the Executive in Ireland, in order that everything may be safe and secure against their prisoners.

Sir George Campbell

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 106: Majority 109.—(Div. List, No. 193.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move, Sir, that the clause should be amended by omitting the words "or a defendant." These words would give the defendant a right to have a special jury which would convict all defendants but Orangemen; and in order to get rid at once of all the pretence of fair play on the part of the Government, I move the omission of these words. Something similar to this clause was moved in the Act of 1881-2, but we did not then understand the purport of it. However, within the last few years we have gained considerable experience and of such a character as makes us very chary about the benefits which the Government offer to their opponents. I call this portion of the clause, myself, the unnatural offences portion. When Mr. Samuel Walker, as a Member of the late Government and the Solicitor General for Ireland, defended certain political defendants, a bitter attack was made upon him by the class who would benefit by the special juries. This unnatural portion of the clause was the shelter of Cornwall and the other scandalous creatures, who committed acts more loathsome than the beasts of the field, and yet these persons were defended by eminent Tory gentlemen, some of whom are now on the Judicial Bench, and some of whom now sit on the Treasury Bench in this House. Unnatural creatures are the only persons in Ireland who would agree with this provision puffed forward under the guise of fair play. It is no harm in Ireland, it is no dishonour to the Bar, or to anyone else, to defend these people. It is dishonourable to defend murderers, or people accused of conspiracy, but to defend unnatural offenders is one of the great privileges of the Bar in that country, although we know that these blackguards are infamous wretches that the tongue shrinks from describing in adequate language. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is looking very virtuous at this moment. No doubt, he is greatly shocked by what I am saying; but I am determined to tell the truth whether it annoys anybody or not. The more the truth annoys hon. Gentlemen opposite, the better I am pleased. All I have to say is that this clause is for the Freemason, Orange, and unnatural offenders class. I say it is to be passed in the interests of this gang. The Freemason gang in Dublin, and the Orange gang in Dublin, have availed themselves of it, and the unnatural offenders have availed themselves of it, and have secured joyful acquittal. I remember that the foreman of the special jury who tried the case of Fernandez, stated at the conclusion of the trial, when an acquittal had been secured, that the prisoner left the dock without a stain on his character. All these men were the heroes of the special jurors in Dublin, and this will give the Committee some idea of who the individuals are whom the Crown looks upon as worthy of being appealed to on special juries. I suppose it was the Crown who advised that these men should be put on the special juries. So far as the pretence is concerned, that this clause is designed in the interests of justice and in the interest of liberty, we spurn it, and spit upon it, and say it is well worthy of the source from whence it comes—for the Orangemen, as I say, availed themselves of it, the men who murdered Philip McGuire availed themselves of it, for it enables them to put men into the box who sympathize with their actions. It enables these people to put men into the box whom they have no necessity to challenge. I remember in one of these cases, when a man was challenged, the Judge took up an attitude, which I should think was adopted for the first time by one in his position, for he said—

"Who are you challenging here? You are challenging Mr. Mackintosh, the musicseller; why are you challenging him?"

Mr. Mackintosh, I may observe, has since become a bankrupt; therefore he was probably a very proper man to have upon a special jury. I would ask the Government why they did not procure the conviction of the murderer of Philip McGuire, whose head was smashed in with a stone in Monaghan for having voted for me? "Oh!" said one of these eminent gentlemen, "Philip McGuire had a thin skull." It was not a murder at all, because the man's skull was unusually thin. It is to be distinctly understood that, so far as we are concerned, you are moving this provision in the Bill in the interests of this class of persons to whom I refer, just as you have inserted in the measure a saving provision in regard to unlawful associations, in order to prevent Orange societies from being proclaimed when the Liberal Party comes into Office; for we know that, although you have given Parliament a veto in this matter, the House of Lords will undo whatever may be done in this Assembly. To say that you insert this provision in the Bill in order that people who hold popular opinions may obtain the protection of special juries, is simply to talk bosh and nonsense, and no one knows that better than the authors of this beautiful provision. I say this provision is a fraud. If the foul scoundrels whom rain was sent from Heaven to destroy are to be protected in a special manner, let it be done on the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland; do not let it be done by this Bill. If the Orange murderers are to go scot-free, let it be done by the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman himself shrinks from the responsibility of conniving at the escape of these scoundrels. He wishes them to find the opportunity for themselves, well knowing that they will succeed in doing so—well knowing that they will seek in the jury-box the protection of men whom, the moment you see them there, you know perfectly well the kind of verdict they will give. We can tell, the moment we see these special jurors in the box, what they will do. We can scent out their verdicts, just as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland thinks he can scent out the verdicts common jurors will give in the case of Nationalist prisoners. I say that this system of providing defence for these wretched and abominable offenders is devised for the sake of saving the Irish Attorney General. The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not wish to take upon himself the loathsome task. It would give those in Dublin Castle the credit of complicity—of conniving at these offences. Some people place murder in one category, and would place these abominable offences to which I have adverted in another. For my own part, as I have said before, I would rather stand in the dock with a Joe Brady than be acquitted from the dock with Cornwall and Fernandez. I would rather be convicted of murder than have had part or lot in the crimes committed by Cornwall, your official, by Fernandez, your military gentleman, or by French, your detective director. It is to be remembered that these were your own officials, the men of whose skill you boasted, the men who have been in your employ for 20 or 30 years. We remember that French wrote a letter from prison saying that he had worked a case so close up to the wind that he had won the approval of Her Majesty's chief Crown Officials. I say you may denounce murderers in Ireland, but we have our opinion of the gentlemen who catch the murderers. For my part, I hold that the men who entrap the murderers are more loathsome and contemptible and desperate than the murderers themselves. I beg Sir, to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, leave out "or a defendant."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): We, Sir, are now entering upon a new phase of the Government tactics, when we find that they do not even rise to defend the provisions of their own Bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly not.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I ask, is this a reasonable proceeding on the part of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite? The right hon. and learned Gentleman has previously stated that this provision is to enable us to have equality. Yes, Sir, the sort of equality involved in the maxim, "Heads I win, tails you lose." Heads I win, if the Crown appeals to a special jury for the trial of a Nationalist. Tails you lose, if a prisoner applies for a special jury on his own behalf. The Nationalist will be convicted by a special jury; the Orangemen will get off. That is the sort of equality that this particular provision is intended to bring about. I maintain that this clause has two designs—first, to convict Nationalists; and, second, to get off Orangemen who assault and murder Nationalists. That is the object of this clause, and I, for one, protest not merely against the form of the clause, but against the pretence that it is adopted for the defence of public liberty in Ireland. I can well understand that, at any rate, the Irish portion of the officials on the Front Benches opposite have some hesitation in rising to defend this clause. They cannot attempt to deny one of the facts that have been set forth in support of the Amendment. They cannot attempt to deny that almost the only occasion on which this provision was made use of under the Crimes Act was when it was used by criminals of the kidney of French and Cornwall. These gentlemen made use of this provision in order to put into the jury-box to try them, men of the special jury class of the City of Dublin, their own friends and sympathizers, who of course, did the work which it was intended they should do, and sent the prisoners out free "without a stain upon their character." Now it may be fairly urged, as it has been urged to-night, that when you have a special jury set in motion on the fiat of a great public official like the Attorney General for Ireland, you have some guarantee that the arrangement will not be abused; but what guarantee have you in this case, where the special jury is set in motion, not on the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland, not with the sanction of any Court—because the Court is a mere marionette in the matter, which must grant the order that is asked for—not with the sanction or on the fiat of any official whatsoever, but simply at the request of the criminal himself, who may desire to be tried by his pals of the special jury class? I do protest against the clause in its present form, and I particularly protest against the silence of the Treasury Bench, who have not attempted to rise to defend this most iniquitous provision.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny S): We have arrived at a new stage of the discussion of this Bill, when the Treasury Bench, and those behind who call themselves a party of English Gentlemen, sit silent when an Amendment of this kind is moved and supported by such arguments as those we have heard, and they are, I presume, prepared by their votes to give protection in the special way proposed to a class of criminals whose character I will not venture to describe. We have disposed of that part of the clause by which the Judges of the Court are to be made mere executive officers to carry out the will of the Government and of Dublin Castle, and now we have arrived at the further stage when the High Court of Justice, as it is called in Ireland, has, upon the application of men such as have been described—men who have taken part in the government of Ireland, and there may be such men existing still—to act as protectors and abettors of these people in enabling them to escape from justice. I think that no Government could possibly be in a more degraded and horrible position. We see these men, Members of the Government sitting on the Bench opposite, absolutely dumb, asking the Committee to afford protection to a class of criminals who would be scouted out of any country on the face of the earth laying any sort of claim to a sentiment of Christianity.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Will not the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland say what there is to be said in reply to the contention of hon. Members who have supported this Amendment? I, myself, am not at all sure that, from his own point of view, a perfectly satisfactory answer cannot be given, and I think the time of the Committee will be saved if it were given now.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I think if the right hon. Gentleman had heard the speech in which this Amendment was moved by the hon. Member opposite, which I cannot believe he did—

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I did.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then he cannot be surprised at no reply being made by the Government.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 229; Noes 98: Majority 131.—(Div. List, No. 194.)

AYES.

Addison, J. E. W.	Baden-Powell, G. S.
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	Baggallay, E.
Ambrose, W.	Baird, J. G. A.
Anstruther, Colonel R.	Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.
H. L.	Balfour, G. W.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Barry, A. H. Smith-

[Thirteenth Night.]

Bartley, G. C. T.
 Barttelot, Sir W. B.
 Bates, Sir E.
 Baumann, A. A.
 Beach, W. W. B.
 Beadel, W. J.
 Beaumont, H. F.
 Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.
 Bentinck, Lord H. C.
 Bentinck, W. G. O.
 Beresford, Lord C. W.
 De la Poer
 Bethell, Commander G.
 R.
 Biddulph, M.
 Bigwood, J.
 Birkbeck, Sir E.
 Blundell, Col. H. B. H.
 Bond, G. H.
 Bonsor, H. C. O.
 Board, T. W.
 Bristowe, T. L.
 Brodrick, hon. W. St.
 J. F.
 Brookfield, A. M.
 Burghley, Lord
 Caine, W. S.
 Caldwell, J.
 Campbell, R. F. F.
 Chamberlain, R.
 Charrington, S.
 Clarke, Sir E. G.
 Coddington, W.
 Coghill, D. H.
 Commerell, Adml. Sir
 J. E.
 Compton, F.
 Cooke, C. W. R.
 Corbett, A. C.
 Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
 Cranborne, Viscount
 Crossley, Sir S. B.
 Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
 Cubitt, right hon. G.
 Currie, Sir D.
 Curzon, hon. G. N.
 Dalrymple, C.
 Davenport, H. T.
 Davenport, W. B.
 De Cobain, E. S. W.
 De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
 De Worms, Baron H.
 Dickson, Major A. G.
 Dimsdale, Baron R.
 Dixon, G.
 Donkin, R. S.
 Duncombe, A.
 Dyke, right hon. Sir
 W. H.
 Ebrington, Viscount
 Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
 Egerton, hon. A. de T.
 Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
 Elliot, G. W.
 Elton, C. I.
 Feilden, Lieut.-Gen.
 R. J.
 Ferguson, right hon.
 Sir J.
 Field, Admiral E.
 Fielden, T.
 Finch, G. H.
 Finch-Hatton, hon.
 M. E. G.

Fitzgerald, R. U. P.
 Fitz-Wygram, General
 Sir F. W.
 Fletcher, Sir H.
 Folkestone, right hon.
 Viscount
 Forwood, A. B.
 Fowler, Sir R. N.
 Fraser, General C. C.
 Fulton, J. F.
 Gathorne-Hardy, hon.
 A. E.
 Gedge, S.
 Gent-Davis, R.
 Gibson, J. G.
 Giles, A.
 Gilliat, J. S.
 Godson, A. F.
 Goldamid, Sir J.
 Goldsworthy, Major-
 General W. T.
 Gorst, Sir J. E.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Gray, C. W.
 Grimston, Viscount
 Gunter, Colonel R.
 Gurdon, R. T.
 Hall, C.
 Halsey, T. F.
 Hambro, Col. C. J. T.
 Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Hamley, Gen. Sir E. B.
 Hankey, F. A.
 Hardcastle, E.
 Hardcastle, F.
 Havelock-Allan, Sir
 H. M.
 Heath, A. R.
 Heathcote, Capt. J. H.
 Edwards
 Heaton, J. H.
 Heneage, right hon. E.
 Herbert, hon. S.
 Hill, right hon. Lord
 A. W.
 Hill, Colonel E. S.
 Hill, A. S.
 Hobhouse, H.
 Holland, rt. hon. Sir
 H. T.
 Holmes, rt. hon. H.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Howard, J.
 Howorth, H. H.
 Hozier, J. H. C.
 Hubbard, E.
 Hunt, F. S.
 Isaacs, L. H.
 Isaacson, F. W.
 Jackson, W. L.
 Jarvis, A. W.
 Kelly, J. R.
 Kennaway, Sir J. H.
 Kerans, F. H.
 Kimber, H.
 King-Harman, right
 hon. Colonel E. H.
 Knatchbull-Hugessen,
 H. T.
 Knightley, Sir R.
 Knowles, L.
 Lafone, A.
 Lambert, C.
 Lawrance, J. C.

Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
 Lees, E.
 Legh, T. W.
 Lewis, Sir C. E.
 Lewisham, right hon.
 Viscount
 Llewellyn, E. H.
 Long, W. H.
 Low, M.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Lowther, J. W.
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, right hon.
 J. H. A.
 Mackintosh, C. F.
 Maclean, J. M.
 Maclure, J. W.
 McCalmont, Captain J.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Mallock, R.
 Marriott, right hon.
 W. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N.
 Story-
 Matthews, rt. hon. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mayne, Admiral R. C.
 Mills, hon. C. W.
 Milvain, T.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morrison, W.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir
 J. R.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Newark, Viscount
 Noble, W.
 Norris, E. S.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 Norton, R.
 Paget, Sir R. H.
 Parker, C. S.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Plunket, right hon.
 D. R.
 Plunkett, hon. J. W.
 Pomfret, W. P.
 Powell, F. S.

Puleston, J. H.
 Quilter, W. C.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Rasch, Major F. C.
 Reed, H. B.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
 Robertson, W. T.
 Robinson, B.
 Ross, A. H.
 Selwin-Ibbetson, rt.
 hon. Sir H. J.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sinclair, W. P.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Tapling, T. K.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Townsend, F.
 Trotter, H. J.
 Verdin, R.
 Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Webster, R. G.
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Wilson, Sir S.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wroughton, P.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Glam.) Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)
 Acland, A. H. D.
 Acland, C. T. D.
 Allison, R. A.
 Atherley-Jones, L.
 Blane, A.
 Broadhurst, H.
 Buxton, S. C.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Cameron, C.
 Cameron, J. M.
 Campbell, Sir G.
 Campbell, H.
 Carew, J. L.
 Chance, P. A.
 Clark, Dr. G. B.
 Cobb, H. P.
 Connolly, L.
 Conway, M.
 Conybeare, C. A. V.
 Cremer, W. R.
 Crossley, E.
 Dillon, J.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Ellis, J. E.
 Ellis, T. E.
 Evelyn, W. J.
 Evershed, S.
 Ferguson, R. C. Munro-
 Finucane, J.
 Foley, P. J.
 Fox, Dr. J. F.
 Fuller, G. P.
 Gill, T. P.
 Gladstone, H. J.
 Haldane, R. B.
 Harrington, E.
 Hayden, L. P.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Healy, M.

Healy, T. M.	O'Doherty, J. E.
Hooper, J.	O'Hanlon, T.
Hoylo, I.	Pickersgill, E. H.
Hunter, W. A.	Pictou, J. A.
Jacoby, J. A.	Pinkerton, J.
Kenny, C. S.	Plowden, Sir W. C.
Lalor, R.	Power, P. J.
Lawson, Sir W.	Power, R.
Lawson, H. L. W.	Priestley, B.
Lefevre, right hon. G.	Provand, A. D.
J. S.	Pyne, J. D.
Lewis, T. P.	Roberts, J.
Lyell, L.	Rowlands, J.
Macdonald, W. A.	Rowntree, J.
Mac Neill, J. G. S.	Russell, E. R.
M'Arthur, A.	Schwann, C. E.
M'Arthur, W. A.	Sheehan, J. D.
M'Cartan, M.	Shirley, W. S.
M'Carthy, J.	Stuart, J.
Mason, S.	Sullivan, D.
Molloy, B. C.	Summers, W.
Morgan, O. V.	Tanner, C. K.
Morley, rt. hon. J.	Tuite, J.
Neville, R.	Waddy, S. D.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.	Wallace, R.
Nolan, J.	Wardle, H.
O'Brien, J. F. X.	Wayman, T.
O'Brien, P.
O'Connor, A.	TELLERS.
O'Connor, J. (Tippry.)	Biggar, J. G.
O'Connor, T. P.	Sheil, E.

Question put, "That the words 'or a defendant' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 94 : Majority 134. —(Div. List, No. 195.)

MR. W. H. SMITH : I now claim to move "That this Clause stand part of the Bill."

THE CHAIRMAN : There remain on the Paper several Amendments to the words of the clause, and several Provisoes to be added to the clause. Some of these have been decided by the Divisions already taken, and, therefore, will not come on for discussion. None of the remaining Amendments to the words of the clause are of sufficient importance to demand discussion ; but out of the Provisoes, as far as I can ascertain on the very short examination I have been able to make, there remain two, or perhaps three, questions that might require some debate, although it is possible there may be no doubt as to what the result will be. Amendment No. 44, which gives to the defendant power to elect to be tried by a single Judge instead of by a special jury, is one which, perhaps, might bear discussion, although it cannot be conceived that such a power would be thrown on a Judge. The other Provisoes to which I have referred are 48 and 52, dealing with the question of challenges. I think, before the Question is put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," some opportunity should be allowed for the discussion of these proposals.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think I should have an opportunity of moving the Amendment which stands in my name. I have already, on a previous Amendment, expressed my opinion that a jury composed exclusively of special jurors is not a fitting tribunal for the trial of prisoners coming from a class to which such jurors do not belong. After your expression of opinion, therefore, Mr. Courtney, I shall be very brief, and will simply express a hope that the Government will accept this Amendment, which is based upon the prevalent practice in Scotland.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, leave out "special jury," and insert "jury of which one-third shall be special jurymen."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): After the expression of opinion by the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Courtney) I think we ought to act upon it. The Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend behind me (Sir George Campbell) is one which might on other occasions lead to a discussion of a useful character ; but, as we object entirely to this Bill, it is not expedient to attempt to amend it with a view to reforming the whole of the jury system. I hope my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment to a Division.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL : I have no wish to press the Amendment to a Division ; I am content to leave it in the hands of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN : Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment be withdrawn ?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL : No ; I do not wish to withdraw it, but to leave it in the hands of the Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): After your expression of opinion Mr. Courtney, I will not move Amendment No. 36 which stands in my name. In regard to Amendment No. 44, I am sorry it should have drawn an expression of opinion from you ; but I must say that I think it only reasonable if a prisoner regards his jury with disfavour that he should have the option of being tried by one Judge. There is no Judge so bad but you can put points to him in the full assurance that they will, at any rate, receive consideration; but in the case of a jury composed of 12 Orangemen the circumstances are very different. There is nothing so disheartening as attempting to put points to such a jury. It is like talking to the Treasury Bench. You cannot get them to reply to you except by means of the clôture. I simply propose that, if the prisoner elects not to be tried by the jury which has been empannelled, he shall have the option of throwing on the Judge the duty of trying him. You cannot say that Judges as a class are liable to intimidation. There is a precedent for my Amendment in the last Crimes Act, one of the provisions of which was to the effect that three Judges should act without the option of a jury, and without any intervention from the prisoner himself. It is an entire misnomer to call this body a jury; you ought to call it a trap-door or something of that kind. It is not a jury; it is 12 Orangemen. Under these circumstances, I submit that the prisoner ought to have the option of trial by one man of intelligence. The Judges are, at all events, paid to be intelligent, while the jurymen are not. Indeed, in the majority of cases, the jury are brought forward and selected as partizans; and yet after a prisoner has been convicted by them you will have the supporters of the Government going round and saying that he has been convicted after due processes of the law, and is, therefore, proved to be guilty. Nobody in Ireland will believe that prisoners convicted before such tribunals are guilty. If the prisoner says, "I ask to be tried by the Judge," then he will have been tried by his own tribunal. I do not assert that a prisoner in Ireland would often adopt this mode of procedure; for, as a rule, the Judges are distrusted. But we believe that there are some fair Judges in Ireland. For instance, there is the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes). He is most unfair in this House, but I would much rather be tried by him than by several of the present occupants of the Irish Judicial Bench. We shall doubtless be met by the argument that the responsibility ought not to be put on the Judge, and that, if that was so, the Judge must resign and sacrifice an income of £3,500 a-year. Well, let the Judges resign. There are plenty of men at the junior bar who would throw themselves into the breach. At any rate, there will be no lack of Judges to carry out this Amendment, which, in my judgment, is one that ought to be passed. The prisoner ought to have some alternative presented to him, instead of that of being tried by an Orange tribunal which might be composed of 12 agents or 12 landlords.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 14, after "jury," insert,—
 "Provided, that if such special jury shall have been empannelled, the defendant may elect not to be tried by such jury, and the trial shall proceed then and there before the Judge sitting to try the case, whose finding shall be as effectual, to all intents and purposes, as would have been the finding of the jury before which the prisoner elected not to be tried."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Gentleman must see that the result of the Amendment would be entirely to undo the procedure in respect of special juries. Instead of giving the prosecution the power of having a special jury, it would enable the accused person to say that the case should not be tried by a special jury at all, but by the Judge without a jury. I do not mean to say that if this Amendment were passed Judges would not do their duty, or that under certain circumstances it would not be an advantage to have a criminal case tried by Judges; but I can hardly imagine a more extraordinary proposal than the one we have got here. In the first place, the accused person is to see the jury empannelled—

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is the whole point.

MR. HOLMES: And then, as a last resort, to say that he will be tried by the Judge without the jury. We have discussed this particular clause upon the question of special juries the entire evening, and this Amendment seems to me to be far from the spirit of what we have already done, and cannot be accepted.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): In the course of the evening one of the main arguments on the Treasury Bench has been that the object of the clause is that a fair trial may be obtained, and the Attorney General is given the power under the clause to apply for a special jury in lieu of an ordinary jury. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland seems to think it extraordinary that if the accused person sees a jury empannelled which he believes is not likely to give him a fair trial he should then ask for what, in his opinion, would be fair; and, for this reason, the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks the Amendment an extraordinary one. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) this evening drew an analogy between certain cases in the Civil Courts and those under this Criminal Bill; but the right hon. and learned Attorney General must know that in civil actions, if you do not apply for a jury, you are tried by a single Judge—you have to apply for a jury to get one. Therefore, we have it there are cases tried in this country where you may be tried by a Judge without a jury, and these are cases identical with those to be tried under the provisions of this Bill. I cannot see why the Amendment is extraordinary, or one on which there should be any surprise. The Government desires that the Attorney General should have power to change the proceedings in Ireland to obtain a fair trial. The Attorney General is able to see the panel of the common jury before making his selection of the special jury; and why, after the accused has seen the special jury, whom he believes to be a jury not likely to give him a fair trial, is there anything extraordinary, or to be surprised at, that the accused in that case should ask for a trial which would be, in the words of the Bill "more fair?" That which is demanded in this Amendment is that which exists in this country in all civil actions.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think it would be gross blasphemy to alter the old form of trial by which a man called to plead put himself on God and the country, and that a prisoner should be called upon to place himself in those words before a special jury. I think it is only fair and reasonable that an Irish peasant should be entitled to appeal from 12 landlords or half-pay captains, their religious and political enemies. This, alone, is sufficient to recommend the Amendment. But we have another reason. In the Act of 1882, that has been so often quoted, it was enacted that a number of crimes specified in the Act should be tried before a tribunal of three Judges selected by the Lord Lieutenant. This is a very strong case in favour of the Amendment, because, under this Amendment, a prisoner would elect of his own accord to go to the Judge. I would rather be tried by the devil himself out of hell than by a jury of 12 landlords.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must pay more attention to the decencies of debate.

MR. CHANCE: I am quite ready to withdraw the expression; but I merely expressed my opinion that no tribunal is so utterly vile, unjust, and corrupt as a jury of 12 Irish landlords. If that is irregular I regret it, for the sake of the Rules of this House.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I am not surprised the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland should refuse the Amendment, nor am I surprised at the reason. We listened at an earlier period of the debate to a statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) that the Government wanted to give equal rights to the prisoner and the prosecutor; and, if that is so, surely we are met with arguments without a shadow or a shade of ground for them. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland said it would be unheard of and unusual that the prisoner should have the right, after seeing the jury empannelled, to appeal from that jury to a Judge. But it is not customary in this country to take away the chance of a prisoner by bringing him from his own country and placing him for trial before a class of men inflamed by political passions and then packing a decidedly hostile jury. Therefore, if our proposition is unusual, surely it is much less strained and unusual than the proposition of the Government in this Bill? But what had the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to say in answer to our statement? Does he mean to say it is a dangerous preference to give to an Irish prisoner to leave his case in the hands of an Irish Judge? Does he not know that nothing but the dire experience we have had of the unscrupulous character of packing juries would have induced us to propose the Amendment at all? Do the Government adhere to the proposition that when a prisoner considers his case so desperate, and sees the jury box occupied by men who, as I might say, are thirsting for his blood, they would deny to the unfortunate wretch the right of appealing from the jury to the hands of a Judge rather than trust to a jury whose verdict is a foregone conclusion? And, talking of this, I am not trusting to my own judgment, for what did the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland say in a previous debate upon this matter? He said in an unguarded moment—I recollect his statement—

“It is very difficult at present, in the political temper in which Ireland is, to empanel a jury that would give a fair verdict, so high is political passion.”

But that is equally true on both sides of the case. What he admitted was, that political passion ran so high on both sides that no matter what side you took the jury from the verdict was a foregone conclusion; and, that being his contention, you deny the right to the prisoner of appealing to the Judge. I say in this as in many other discussions in regard to which complaint is made of prolongation, that they are prolonged because we are not met fairly; we are denied the concession we ask; but no argument is brought forward why it should be denied us. The right hon. and learned Attorney General did not give a single reason for denying it, and we are met simply with flat denial.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): It is very hard to please the Treasury Bench in drawing up Amendments. Sometimes we venture to pass strictures upon the occupants of the Judicial Bench, and we are then met with rebukes; but when we draw up an Amendment that would enable a prisoner in certain cases when put upon his trial to elect to be tried by a member of the Judicial Bench in Ireland we are told that the Judicial Bench is not considered good enough to perform such a duty. What we claim is this—that when a prisoner saw the jury box packed with 12 persons whom he knew would convict him, he should have the right of saying—“I will not be tried by a gentleman on the jury; I will be tried by the Judge who is sitting before me, and in whom I have more confidence than in the 12 gentlemen on the jury.” The right hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to imagine there was something unheard of and extraordinary in the notion that a prisoner should have that right; but I cannot see anything extraordinary at all in it. What are the facts? Why do the Government tell us that they have no confidence in the existing tribunal? Because, they say, the common jurors in Ireland either sympathize with the class of crime, or are intimidated from bringing in just and impartial verdicts. No charge of that kind can be made against the members of the Judicial Bench; and, it cannot be alleged that the Government have no confidence in the members of the Judicial Bench; and, that being so, I ask what good reason can be given for denying the prisoner this small privilege of appealing, as I may call it, from a jury formed of 12 of his enemies to a member of the Irish Judicial Bench? I cannot see anything so extraordinary in the proposal. We have already had a precedent in English legislation for handing over trials of this kind, not to one Judge, but to three; and, that being so, I do not think this Amendment is open to the charge that is made in respect of it. It really seems, no matter what is the character of the Amendment, if it is proposed from this quarter of the House the Government are determined to oppose it, and to take a negative attitude, no matter how reasonable it may be.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 227: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 196.)

MR. A. H. D. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I was glad to hear your ruling a short time ago, Mr. Courtney, because had it not been for such ruling the important question of what is sometimes called jury packing could not have been raised now; indeed, it could not have been raised during the discussion on any part of this Bill. This is a Bill to amend the Criminal Law, and it is, also, a Bill which is to be of a permanent character. It surely would be almost a scandal that a point of this kind should not be subjected to at least a brief discussion. This Amendment seems to me to be specially important because you have a limited class of jurors in any case, and it would be a very small concession to make that the Crown and the accused person should stand on a level in the matter of challenge. Now, the comparison of England has often been made, but everybody knows that the practice of making jurors stand aside in England is on a totally different footing altogether from what it is in Ireland. Even the Government organs in Ireland have said that trial by jury for political or quasi-political offences is a sort of make-believe and pretence, and often jurors have petitioned in favour of an amendment of the law. We know that after a recent case at Sligo the non-Catholic jurors petitioned in favour of an amendment of the law, declaring that the present state of things tends to promote social discord. The real point is that, considering the limited number of jurors which the Government have to deal with in this case, they might reasonably make an exception. Probably, as the qualification is so high, it would be but few who would be affected in this particular way, but still it would be worth while to modify the law in the way I suggest. We have been told that the object of this clause is to secure a fair trial, and we may simply ask the Government, do they intend to remove, as they may by this small concession, what is a scandal, and what has been a scandal for years in Ireland, besides being a cause of constant irritation; will they grant this small concession in favour of the poorer class of the Irish people who may be prosecuted under this Act, and whose interests they are constantly telling us they desire to serve? I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Mr. Dillon

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 14, after "jury," add, "Provided always, that upon the trial of any person under this section, the Crown shall not have the right to require any juror to stand aside, but shall be entitled to challenge peremptorily six jurors if the trial be for a misdemeanour, and twenty jurors if the trial be for a felony or treason."—(Mr. A. H. D. Acland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It is impossible for us to accept this Amendment. We could very well understand an Amendment of this kind being proposed if we were discussing a general Jury Bill; but, as we have said over and over again, we ask the House to enable us to have a special jury under the circumstances that are mentioned in this particular clause, but we do not profess to reform generally trial by jury. The law in England and Ireland, with reference to the power of the Crown to order jurors to stand aside, is precisely the same. The Crown has the right, under the Common Law, to exercise this right until the panel is exhausted. That is a power which has been exercised by successive Attorney Generals most fairly and most justly. In moving this Amendment the hon. Member (Mr. A. H. D. Acland) appears to assume that this power has been exercised in an improper way. I deny that assertion altogether. This power has never been exercised in Ireland in later times except with the object of getting a fair and impartial jury to try a case, and the result of the exercise of the power has been to get fair and impartial jurors. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members opposite may say "Oh, oh!" and may jeer; but I ask them, in what particular case was a jury empanelled by any person representing the Crown in Ireland that acted unfairly towards a prisoner? I know that in this House many cases have been cited by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite; but it has been shown again and again that the juries found verdicts in pursuance of the charges of the learned Judges, and that there was ample evidence to sustain the verdicts. If this power has been exercised as far as the memory of man goes back fairly and justly, and if the result of the exercise of this power has been to empanel juries of fair and impartial men, it is as well that the right should be retained.

Mr. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): Of all the extraordinary answers which have been given by the Government in the course of these discussions, I think the answer just given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland is the most extraordinary. This clause makes the greatest change that has ever taken place in the history of this country in regard to trial by jury. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman is not aware that this is a clause which materially affects the clause in Magna Charta as to trial by jury. I ask the attention of the Attorney General for England to this point. I have always understood that the clause in Magna Charta referring to trial by jury means that a man shall be tried by his equals. Now, this clause distinctly proposes trial which is not trial by a man's equals. I am truly astonished at the reception which has been accorded this Amendment by the Attorney General for Ireland. I have no doubt that before long we shall hear cases cited of miscarriage of justice at the hands of special juries in Ireland, of whom the Attorney General for Ireland speaks so favourably. I have not sat very long in this House, but I have heard many cases cited in which it is quite clear special juries in Ireland have acted unfairly and partially.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think it is quite evident the Committee is absolutely unaware of the state of the facts in Ireland. The Government seem to want not trial by special jury, but trial by the residuum of the special jurors. In the first place, the Lord Lieutenant is empowered to take what panel he likes. In the Act of 1882 he had to take 200 men, and out of that number find 12 men. Practically, the challenges were of a limited character; but even under that section the Crown challenged, at the trial of Joseph Poole, 70 men, and one juryman said afterwards, when he asked, "Why did you commit Poole when you knew he was innocent?" said, "Why, we should have convicted him had it been proved he was in Australia." At the trial of Michael Welsh 40 jurors were challenged, and I defy any man who reads the evidence of the trial to say there was sufficient evidence to hang a cat on. Michael Welsh did not understand the language in which the evidence was given. The evidence was translated by a policeman, and Welsh went before his God protesting in the only language he understood his innocence. In the Maamtrasna case anyone would have convicted on the evidence; it was proved afterwards, however, that the evidence was perjured. I always said the jury acted properly on the evidence, but in that case you challenged an extraordinary number of men to try and convict men whom we believed to be innocent. Take the case of the Crossmaglen prisoners; we are told the jury followed the direction of the Judge. Nothing of the kind; they followed it when it was in favour of conviction. Judge Lawson, one of our greatest foes, charged the jury in the case of one man, named Bernard—I cannot recall his surname—in favour of an acquittal, but the jury convicted the prisoner. Lord Spencer released the man after six weeks. In the case of a man, named Geoghan, the jury did not follow the direction of the Judge. The challenges in this case were enormous. To tell me that you ought to have the right to reduce the panel to a residuum is absurd. In the County of Kerry, the most disturbed district in Ireland, you have only 200 special jurors. That shows how limited the character of the class of special juries is; one man in 30 is a special juror, and in the face of this limited, select, primrose class you are still to have the power of cutting the panel down by the system of unlimited challenge. I am told this is English law. If it is English law it is not English practice, and we want the English practice. It is unfair to this House to say that we are getting English law in this matter. In the face of the facts, can you wonder if by-and-bye what you call law is not respected? No jury was ever packed or found fault with for convicting a prisoner until the Crimes Act was passed. Under that Act you invented a special convicting jury, and then an unfortunate man was cruelly attacked near his own house, a terrible occurrence which shocked everybody. When you put up 12 men as sub-gods, as men who are to uphold law and order in Ireland; and when it is said to the people, here are your enemies, here are the friends of the Government; when the entire patronage and power of the country is given into the hands of a gang of thieves; when these men are paraded before the crowd, can you wonder that afterwards these men are Boycotted or intimidated? You yourselves are playing for crime in Ireland—you are devising the best method of provoking crime in Ireland. I do not mean to say that crime will take place, because it is impossible to predicate what will happen when one does not know the exact effect on the Irish people of the fact that the great body of the Liberal Party is standing by the Irish nation? If this Bill were being passed under ordinary circumstances, I do not hesitate to say you would have a large crop of crime within a month of its passing; but now the people see they have obtained the sympathy of a large mass of the English people, and in the desire to cultivate still further that sympathy, it may be that you will not have the crime in Ireland which, under other circumstances, you would have. You talk in this matter about special juries, but it is not a special jury after all; it is a jury composed of 12 men selected from the special jurors, and these 12 men the enemies of the people. We offered to go before a Select Committee of our enemies in this House, because we were so satisfied nothing could be proved against us. That was our own option, however. But take the case of a man who is brought up, and knowing this Bill has been passed by the foul combination which enables it to be passed—["Oh, oh!"] I am speaking of the combination of Members—I will say, if you like, unholy combination. Take the case of a man who is brought up, and who sees 12 men put into the box for the purpose of convicting him. If you have unjust convictions, as you undoubtedly will have, I ask you will it improve the temper of the people? What will be the effect upon the people of carrying a man from one end of Ireland, for instance, to Dublin to be tried, and probably to be convicted? Perhaps the people of his district will not believe him to be guilty. They will be inclined to take the law into their own hands, and then the English people, not knowing the facts, will be terribly surprised to learn that there is crime in the district to which the man belongs. The people of this country will not be able to trace crime to its source; and the occurrence of crime will be used as an additional argument against us. There is no option, under this section, but for the Court to grant a special jury when the application is made for one. You give the prisoner no chance; but you make his conviction as certain as the fat of the Attorney General for Ireland. I say this is a state of things which it would not be possible for the Tory Party to bring about if they had not support upon the Opposition Benches. When the matter comes to be considered soberly the blame of this section will, undoubtedly, be laid not so much at the door of the Tory Party as at the door of the Liberal Unionists, who are the real people who are responsible for the passing of this Bill.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): It is monstrous for the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) to stand up and deliberately assert that the power of packing juries has not been used improperly. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not know perfectly well that for the last 30 years the Irish Executive have never failed to use this power in the most improper and indecent way in every political trial? Every man in this House knows it perfectly well. What were the words of The Dublin Daily Express, the organ of the landlord party in Ireland, when commenting on this Bill? I can recall the words very well. The Dublin Daily Express said—"This is a time for plain speaking. Trial by jury in Ireland for many years has been more or less of a make-believe, and inasmuch as it is now impossible to have recourse to the various devices by which the Government got satisfactory juries in the past, we must have some new legislation to enable the work to be done." This is the commentary of The Dublin Daily Express; that organ was frank enough—it admitted freely that trial by jury in Ireland had been a make-believe. But the Attorney General for Ireland, when he comes before an English audience, finds it necessary to put on a cloak of decency and respectability, and deny that juries are packed in Ireland. Does he forget altogether how he got one of his own henchmen to prevent a discussion on this question in this House? He challenges us to bring instances in which juries have acted improperly; but when I made an attempt to bring forward instances my mouth was closed—when I had all the evidence in my possession my mouth was closed by the most discreditable trick possible. It was plainly proved to the people of England, who, I venture to say, take my side in the controversy, that the Government dreaded to go into the matter, and that it was manifestly a matter which ought to be fully discussed. You have just heard from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) of cases in which the juries were shamefully and disgracefully packed against prisoners. Since those cases we have had the Sligo case. Anyone who has looked into that case must have been ashamed of the proceedings. Poor Catholic peasants, who had committed a crime, if crime it was, under great provocation and circumstances of the greatest cruelty, were dragged from their own County of Galway to the Winter Assizes at Sligo, and placed on their trial before juries composed of Orangemen, or composed at least of Protestants; 30 or 40 Catholics were ordered to stand aside for no other reason than that they professed the same religion as the prisoners. No effort was made to explain away or defend such action on the part of the Crown. The Attorney General for Ireland may say that the verdicts returned were true verdicts; but I venture to affirm that if such proceedings as took place at Sligo took place in England, Scotland, or Wales, no jury would convict. Every political case in Ireland is made an occasion for jury-packing. I do not wish to go into particular cases. I might do so at considerable length—my own case would occupy me for an hour and a-half. True, in that case, the Crown failed, but that failure was not due to the fault of the Attorney General for Ireland. He did his best, and no more flagitious case of jury-packing ever took place. He packed the jury openly, and he failed to convict solely because he had not the power to go before a special jury specially drawn, but was obliged to take a common jury of Dublin. He did his best; his conduct on that trial was illegal and disgraceful in the highest degree; and yet he can stand up here and declare that the Crown has never used its power to pack a jury. The Attorney General for Ireland based part of his answer on an extraordinary proposition. He said the Amendment does not naturally grow out of the clause, because we are not proposing to reform the Jury Laws—we are simply dealing with a particular case. The Amendment only deals with particular cases in which you deprive a prisoner of the little protection he has in Ireland. It applies to no other cases. The Amendment does not propose to deal with the whole of the jury system, but only where you take away the little protection a prisoner has in his right to be tried by a common jury in the place where the venue ought to be laid. In this case, and in no other, will the Amendment affect the power of the Crown, which, notwithstanding what the Attorney General for Ireland says, everyone with experience knows is habitually used by the Crown most improperly in Ireland. No matter what the Attorney General for Ireland says about the law in Ireland being similar to that in England it is notoriously not the practice in England, though it is systematically the practice in Ireland. I do not believe the English people would submit for a moment to the packing of juries by the Government as they are packed in Ireland, much less when accompanied by the tremendous power of the change of venue. There is no use in mincing words on this matter. I was perfectly earnest in supporting the last Amendment before the Committee. The object and purpose of this clause is to place the political opponents of the Government on trial before men who would like to see us all dangling at the end of a rope. We hear this expression of their sentiments from conversations carried on in railway carriages and elsewhere, when they do not know that a member of the National Party is present. It is the truth. It is the talk of dinner tables; they express their feelings in common conversation, and say that if there were a rope round our necks they would like to pull at the other end. Is it reasonable to place us on trial—as we shall be placed on trial if this Bill passes—before men who use such language? Do you really mean to carry out such a system? Do you know what you are doing when you vote for such a clause? I am not exaggerating in the slightest degree when I tell you the effect of the clause. You are giving power to the Government—power they will use—to place us on trial before men who habitually use such language, who would convict us without a shadow of a shade of evidence, who would gladly, to use their own words, hold the end of a rope if our neck were at the other.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I recollect hearing some time ago, either from the Attorney General for Ireland or the Chief Secretary for Ireland, a statement that no records were in existence from which the Government could give a Return to the House of the number of jurors challenged in agrarian cases, and I assume that it is in the belief that there is no such record in existence that we have had the statement that there has been no misuse of the power of challenge by the Government. I do not know if the record exists now—possibly it has been destroyed—but I know there was such a record, and I speak from a copy I have when I say that in Green Street in cases, some of them cases of murder and so forth, not bearing any definite political complexion, 60, 70, and in one case 72, jurors were ordered to stand aside, so that a jury might be obtained that could be relied upon for a conviction. In addition, I may mention a fact of which, possibly, the Chief Secretary for Ireland is not aware, that a Government official is known as “Peter the Packer,” and is a recognized practitioner in Green Street. Again, I may mention that a brief of the prosecuting counsel in a quasi-political trial has been obtained, and contains a list of jurors, and opposite some of the names is written the word “sturdy”—which means, I presume, that the man is reliable for a conviction—and opposite the names of other jurors who were challenged appears the letter “C,” and it is a fact that each of these men was a Catholic. It is futile, then, for the Attorney General for Ireland to stand up here, little as some of the Committee know of Irish affairs, and say that the right of challenge has never been abused. The Attorney General for Ireland has some special knowledge and experience of his own in the case of the trial of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and some of his friends for advocating the Plan of Campaign, and I happened to be solicitor for some of the accused; and I may tell the Committee that, while all the accused taken together had six challenges, the Crown directed 28 men to stand aside, and in no single instance did they attempt to show that the juror was unfit for his duty by reason of bias or anything else. Of course, they did not gain a conviction, but it was not the fault of the prosecution. When I asked the question of the Chief Secretary for Ireland he refused to lay on the Table any record of the results of an inquiry I knew had been made as to the politics and qualifications of the gentlemen on the panel. He did not deny there had been such an inquiry. I am sure he would not deny it if he knew it to be the fact. It is known as a fact; and, that being so, the Committee must not be deceived into the idea that these powers have always been exercised in a reasonable spirit. If the Government retain this power to get rid of jurors who are biassed, then they have a very bad case, for there is nothing in the world to prevent a juror being “challenged for cause,” and, using the facilities the Crown has to discover the previous record of a juror, there would be no difficulty in proving to a Crown Judge that a certain person was an improper person to be on the jury panel. But I may be reminded that in the prosecution of the hon. Member for East Mayo the Government failed to procure a verdict. I know the reason, and there can be no harm in stating it. There were two jurors of the same name, and pretty much of the same appearance, the one an Orangeman and the other a Catholic. The first juror called was promptly challenged, and while sitting in Court fell into conversation with his neighbour. Mr. Peter, the “Packer,” cocking his eye round the Court, settled in his own mind this was the Nationalist; but he was mistaken, the Orangeman being directed to stand aside, the other man being put upon the jury. That is the reason why a conviction was not obtained. As an illustration of the class of men obtained for special juries, I may mention an anecdote or two. I recollect a conversation I had with a gentleman, a constituent of the Attorney General for Ireland. He knew me well, and had known me for years. He was a perfectly steady, sober man. I remember that in course of conversation he expressed his abhorrence of farmers who did not pay their rent, and when I asked what remedy he would apply to the state of things he recommended the shooting of the nearest priest, and the flogging of the farmers’ wives and daughters. It is men of that stamp who get on the special jury panel of Dublin. Another anecdote I had from a counsel who prosecuted, of a man who was convicted of a murder upon evidence which, in the opinion of the counsel—a Conservative, a constituent of the Attorney General for Ireland, no friend of ours, Dr. Webb—was of the most flimsy character. He asked a juror how he could possibly convict a man on such evidence, and the juror replied he did not care a straw about the evidence; that he convicted the man for the purpose of making an example; and a second juror said that he was prepared to convict him if it had been proved the man was in America when the murder was committed. These are the jurors upon whom the Crown place reliance, and when I state these things on my own knowledge, or on the statement of a gentleman, no friend of ours, I ask the Committee to judge whether the Crown ought not to be required to show cause why a man should not be on a jury. They have Judges not unfavourable to them. Why, when you take the unfortunate peasant prisoner away from his peers to be tried by landlords, why not extend to him that fair play you always allow to a prisoner in England, challenging man for man until the six are exhausted, and then show cause why a juror should be excluded? Bad as the law is in Ireland, nothing can alienate the people more from it than to see the Crown thus playing with loaded dice. I trust we may get some support even from Members on the other side, and if we cannot break the silence on the other side, and get some reasons for the support of the clause, that they will follow us into the Lobby.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): Looking at the Returns that show each county and city special jury, I find that the statements of hon. Members who have supported the Amendment do not exaggerate the species of selection that goes on in Ireland. The agrarian question in Ireland is not a question of six or of 10 years old; it was strong in Ireland in 1872, when the Jury Act was passed; and I ask the attention of the Committee now to the distinction there drawn, in order to let them see what in 1872 was done for the purpose of preventing small farmers from having positions on juries. It shows that it was in the contemplation of the Government that the administration of justice should be in their hands. The qualification for common jurors is freeholders of £10. For leaseholders likely to fall into the hands of landlords it was doubled; but if a man might possibly have a leaning towards the tenant if he was not freeholder or tenant on lease, if he was a tenant from year to year, then the qualification was £40. This is with regard to common juries, and that is the class of persons that would be peers to the persons usually to be tried. But common juries are, under the Act of 1872, special juries with respect to persons charged with agrarian offences. To the special jury, as constituted under the Act of 1872, comes a Proviso, inserted at the instance of the late Lord O'Hagan, by which the qualification of a special juror is in some cases four, in some cases five times as much as the highest qualification of a freeholder. In Antrim, where a freeholder of £10—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is scarcely keeping to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I certainly would not have gone into this if I were not going to make my point, that there has been a process of selection going on to the absolute exclusion of all persons the Crown could have reasonable objection to; and, therefore, there is no claim by the Crown to an unlimited right of challenge. Step by step I was going to show, though, perhaps, rather tediously, how this had been done, and, in that sense, was referring to the origin of the Jury Act in Ireland. As I said at an earlier period in this Committee, the passing of the Jury Act was in consequence of the Sheriffs empannelling creatures of their own, and a self-working panel was established; but the effect has been that special juries are now prepared to try certain offences from among the very men whom the Sheriffs, when they had the power, selected. It is a modest proposal to ask that the Crown Prosecutor shall have the right of challenge limited to this specified amount in cases where there is no question of the juror being biassed, or disqualified by prejudice. If the hon. Member had proposed that the right of challenge should be unlimited on the part of the accused, and limited on the part of the Crown, he would have appealed with strong reason to the sympathies of fair-minded men; but when he asks that there shall be the same right on either side, then, having regard to the history of juries in Ireland, to the process of selection that has gone on, and to the manner in which the right of challenge has been abused, it is a modest and reasonable proposal. I would ask the Committee to remember this—that if ever a question arises between landlord and tenant to be decided by civil action before a Judge and jury, counsel invariably recommend the landlord by all means to serve notice for a special jury, saying that is the way to try agrarian disputes by civil action. Now, if they are to get this for the trial of criminal cases, nothing has ever been passed in any Coercion Bill so completely reversing all my ideas of fair play as to allow this unlimited right of challenge in addition to allowing these special juries.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 218: Majority 128.—(Div. List, No. 197.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 3 stand part of the Bill."

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I certainly do not intend to occupy the time of the Committee at this late hour (12.35); but in one word I desire to say, before this clause passes, that I protest against it most earnestly, in the name, at any rate, of one part of the United Kingdom—of my own constituency. They, I know, feel that a clause like this will remove trial by jury from the influence of the average opinion of a district and place it in the hands of the landlord class. We are, by this clause, removing trials for alleged offences in a proclaimed district from the jurisdiction of the average opinion of that district, and are putting them within the jurisdiction of average landlordism, which is, in other words, the average opinion of a particular class. How we can expect to produce peace and contentment in Ireland by imposing upon the people of that country a measure which we should not tolerate ourselves without insurrection by violence surpasses my comprehension. Never in the history of this country has any such oppressive law been passed without producing a spirit of violent rebellion; and if it does not produce this in Ireland, it is only because of the extreme smallness of the population, and the disarmed weakness of the people. On these grounds I most earnestly protest against the passing of this clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish, Sir, to suggest to the Chief Secretary, as he was out of Order in making a statement upon this clause earlier in the Sitting, that perhaps he would like to make it now. He would be perfectly in Order now. He may not be aware of that fact; therefore I rise for the purpose of letting him know.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 211; Noes 83: Majority 128.—(Div. List, No. 198.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I beg to move, Sir, that you do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

MOTION.

EAST INDIA AND CHINA MAIL CONTRACT.—RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Contract dated the 18th day of March 1887, for the conveyance of the East India and China Mails, be approved."—(Mr. Jackson.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the debate. At this late hour (1 o'clock), as many Members, I understand, wish to speak upon this subject, it would be very inconvenient to proceed.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Dr. Clark,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FIRST OFFENDERS BILL.—[BILL 189.]

(Mr. Howard Vincent, Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill, Sir Henry Selwyn-Ibbetson, Mr. Hoare, Mr. Addison, Mr. Hastings, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Molloy.)

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,"—(Mr. Howard Vincent,)—put, and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER: Are there any Amendments?

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): No.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Sir, we have got Ireland excluded from this measure; but I have not the smallest doubt when this admirable Bill reaches the House of Lords there will be an application to re-insert Ireland, as is always done in such cases. I wish to ask the Government and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Howard Vincent) whether, when this Bill comes back from the House of Lords, they will undertake to remove any such Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): Shall I be in Order, Sir, in moving the re-committal of this Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question has been put, that it be now considered.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: I was informed by the Clerk at the Table that I could move its re-committal at this stage.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question now, there being no Amendment, will be that the Bill be read a third time; and upon that Question being put from the Chair the hon. Gentleman can make a Motion.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Has the Motion been put from the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: I will put that Motion. I will ask the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill when he proposes to take the third reading, and on that Question the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke) can make a Motion.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I hope the House will allow the third reading to be taken to-night.

MR. SPEAKER: It is competent for the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke), when I put that Question, to make a Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: I hope the House will not now read this Bill a third time; and if it be competent for me to move that it be read a third time this day three months I will make that Motion. But perhaps the simplest course for me to pursue now will be to move the adjournment of the debate, in order that we may have a better opportunity than we can have, at this time of the morning (1.55), of considering this measure. I say "considering" this Bill, because, though it has been read a second time, and has been committed and re-committed, there are, I believe, many Members of this House who voted for it under a misapprehension of what its real effect is. None of us, I think, can have forgotten the incisive speech in which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) condemned this Bill, root and branch, when it was brought in. He said that from beginning to end of it there was nothing good; but that, if it were possible, he would, at the request of the promoters, do something to render the Bill as harmless as possible, though he did not hold out much hope that he would be able to render even that small service to its promoters. The Bill subsequently re-appeared in this House, and I suppose that, owing, perhaps, to the pressure of work from which we know the right hon. and learned Gentleman has suffered, he was unable to give the attention to the Bill which he promised the promoters he would endeavour to give; because, while he declared that it was a very harsh measure, and that he would try to remove its harshness, at the same time preserving what he presumed was the object of the promoters, when the Bill came back to this House it was a harsher measure than when it went out of it. But if I give an instance or two in proof of that, perhaps—["Oh, oh!"]—I hope I am not trespassing too much on the time of the House; but it does seem to me that the liberties of a good many people will be affected by this Bill, and it does seem to me that we are at liberty to discuss it, although there is another Bill on the Orders which other hon. Members wish to consider. The object which the promoters of this Bill have in view is to reform persons who, for the first time in their lives, commit some criminal act—an act of so trivial a character, and committed under such circumstances, that the Court before whom they are tried and convicted may think that justice would be done and the interests of society satisfied by releasing them at once without any punishment. This is the class of offenders intended to be reclaimed by this Bill, and the way in which the promoters of this Bill propose to reform these offenders is by subjecting them afterwards to provisions to be found in the most stringent Act on the Statute Book. ["No, no!"] Somebody says "No, no!" I do not know whether he has read that Statute. It is a Statute against hardened criminals—the

Mr. T. M. Healy

Prevention of Crime Act of 1871, with the amending Act of 1879. That Statute provides that these criminals shall report themselves to the police—that they shall from time to time—every month—send in a report of their residence, where they are, and shall altogether be kept under the thumb of the police for a considerable period. What, in point of fact, the Legislature said in the Act of 1871 to the criminals is, in effect, this—"You are such a hardened criminal; you have been so often convicted; your offence now is of such a grave character, that not only must you be severely punished, but since the only associates you have belong to the criminal classes, society must be protected against you after the sentence we have passed upon you expires, and therefore we impose on you police supervision." What the promoters of this Bill say to first offenders is, in effect, this—"You are not a hardened criminal; you have not been convicted before; your offence is so trifling that we are going to let you out without any punishment at all; your associates are not criminals; society does not require to be protected against you; therefore we will subject you to police supervision"—and police supervision of a much severer character than that imposed by the Act of 1871. I wonder whether my right hon. and learned Friend below me (Mr. Matthews), who said the Bill was too stringent when it was first introduced, has ever read it and compared it with the Bill of 1871. The hon. Member for Central Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) cannot have compared the two. In the Act of 1871 there is a regulation that prescribes that a person under police supervision shall report himself every month to the police authorities, but it is only the males who have so to report themselves. The Legislature shrank from imposing this in the case of women; but when the promoters of this Bill introduced it, in what form did they introduce it? They introduced the provision of the Act of 1871, including the exception; but when the Bill re-appeared in the House it no longer contained the exception. Consequently, under the measure as it now stands, a young woman—some domestic servant, for example, discharged—who, for some trifling act of misconduct, has been tried, convicted, and, in order that she may go into service again and reform her character, might be compelled to do that which the Legislature in 1871 shrank from imposing on the most hardened criminals of her sex. Men in this House have voted for this Bill under the impression they were voting for an act of mercy. An hon. Friend who was beside me just now said he would support me; perhaps he is in another part of the House. [A laugh.] The hon. and learned Attorney General laughs, but I do not think it is a very laughing matter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I assure the hon. Member I did not laugh.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: It was a sound, then, that I mistook for laughter; but I have no doubt he will see the justice of my remarks, as he is fully acquainted with the effect of the various Statutes upon the subject. Another reason why we should adjourn this debate and have an exhaustive discussion upon the third reading is, that the Bill professes to create a class of amateur authorities, responsible to no one, and over whom there is no control whatever, and upon whose report the first offender may be subject to at least a year's imprisonment with hard labour. That is a power which should not be entrusted to such an authority. If hon. Members look at the 1st clause, Subsection 3, they will see that not merely may the Court order the offender to report himself to such authority, but that such authority may delegate his power to someone nominated by himself. That is to introduce a new principle into our English law, and to create an authority that ought not to be created. And what is the Bill to do; what is the necessity and reason for it? The hon. Member for Central Sheffield has done me the honour of communicating with me on several occasions, though I regret to say that, owing to some action on his part, I found it my duty to lay this matter before the House. I thought I should have had an opportunity of going into the matter in Committee. The hon. Member assured me, before breaking up for the Whitsuntide Recess, that he did not intend to go on with the Committee until well after Whitsuntide; but on the 21st of last month my hon. Friend took it in Committee and passed it through Committee, after I was fully assured by him that it was not to be taken. I ought to have been here during the Committee. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; well, I was asleep. I relied on the assurance given me by the hon. Gentleman; and after sitting up until 4 o'clock in the morning every day that week I went into the Reading Room and fell asleep. When I asked the hon. Member afterwards when he would put it down for third reading, he said he would, if he could, put it down for some day when I could not be present, or when I was not likely to be present. I have gone through sufficient points now to show the House why we ought not rashly, and without further discussion, to pass this Bill to-night. There are other points which I could go into—some of them very serious. The whole policy of the Bill is a complete reversal of what I think the sensible and reasonable policy of our present law. What happens now? When first offenders have been tried and convicted, and their faults are of such a character that the Court thinks they should be let out, they are let out on their own recognizances to come up for judgment when called upon. Does the hon. Gentleman think that proceeding is a failure? For my part, I think it a great success. Everyone who has any acquaintance with our Courts knows that when a prisoner is discharged, to come up for judgment when called upon, the Judge addresses him thus, and says—"John Smith, the effect of this is that you will now be discharged. If you behave yourself well, and lead henceforth an honest and respectable life, you will hear no more of this." And, as a rule, no more is heard of this man; he sinks into the mass of respectable fellow-subjects. The law thinks it is better he should so sink, rather than be perpetually harassed afterwards by police supervision. The policy of the promoters of this Bill is the exact reverse of the policy of the present law; it would result in preventing them from becoming respectable persons again. I now beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That this Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Radcliffe Cooke,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT REGISTRATION BILL.—[BILL 231.]

(Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Howard Vincent, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Codrington, Mr. Lawson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 11 (Debtors' Act, 1869, to apply in certain cases).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): When this Bill was first submitted to me I had not sufficiently considered the provisions of this clause. Since then I have had the opportunity of doing so, and, on the whole, I think the proposed alteration of the law is too severe, and, therefore, that this clause must be omitted. It depends upon the non-registration of a deed, and, in my opinion, it is too severe a step to make it a criminal offence when credit is obtained simply because some legal step has been omitted; and I therefore beg to move the omission of the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 11.—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): The proposition may be too severe—I do not venture to say it is not; but does the hon. and learned Attorney General mean there is to be no penalty whatever for obtaining credit after a man has passed away his property by a deed? [Sir RICHARD WEBSTER: Not registered.] Not registered! but he has got rid of his property and business, and obtains credit by what is practically a fraud. It was to prevent the obtaining credit in this way that the clause was allowed to be introduced in this form. All the Chambers of Commerce attach some weight to it; and, therefore, to omit the clause altogether and put in no other I think is rather more than can be expected.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I am sorry I did not explain myself fully. This clause really would not effect what the right hon. Gentleman desires. I agree with him that this system of obtaining credit when a man has passed away his property should be stopped; but that will be dealt with under the Bankruptcy Law. This is where a man has obtained credit when he has not registered a deed. The object of the Bill is to secure registration of such deeds, and if you are going to deal with the general offence of obtaining credit you should deal with that under some general Bankruptcy Law, and not in a Bill in which you say that in order to make the deeds valid they shall be registered.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The effect of not registering a deed is that you do not disclose it; non-discovery pure and simple is not either false pretence or fraud; but if this clause were passed, a creditor, who was assured of the existence of a deed, could, on a technical point, though the deed was discovered, obtain a conviction for misdemeanour. Undoubtedly we are in a difficulty, because there is no trick more common nowadays than for people to settle with creditors behind the back of the public, and then come and get credit; but I should think that a clause that would render these arrangements void, and compel them to pay creditors in full, would be sufficient to meet that. I think it would be highly improper to create an offence of this kind. If it is to be done, it should be done in some general Bill; therefore I shall support the Motion for the omission of the clause.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): This clause was inserted in consequence of a Resolution carried unanimously by the Chambers of Commerce; but I think I am correct in saying that in the Bill, as originally framed, there was no such clause. Seeing that objection is now taken to it by the Attorney General on behalf of the Government, and, as I am told it cannot possibly be conceded, I feel I must not press the point.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 14 (Local registration of abstract of deeds).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I have an Amendment to the clause. In page 4, line 40, at the end of Sub-section 2, I beg to move the insertion of the words—"This section shall not apply to Ireland."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 40, at end of Sub-section 2, insert the words—"This section shall not apply to Ireland."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 15 (Affidavits).

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 5, line 3, after "any," leave out "Commissioners," and insert "person;" and in page 4, line 42, leave out from "Master of," to "or before," in page 5, line 3, and insert "the Supreme Court of Judicature in England or Ireland."

On the Motion of MR. CHANCE, the following Amendment made:—In page 5, line 4, to leave out "Court," and insert "Courts."

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 4, after "Judicature," insert the words "Ireland or England."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I think that is rendered unnecessary by my Amendment just passed.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I do not think so, as I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will find by reading on to the context.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: May I, as a mere matter of drafting, venture to suggest that it should read "England or Ireland?" This will conform to other clauses.

Amendment amended, and, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Fees).

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 5, line 13, after "1875," insert "as regards England, and the eighty-fourth section of 'The Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877,' as regards Ireland;" and in line 14, leave out "this section," and insert "these sections respectively."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Rules).

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment made:—In page 5, line 19, leave out “and regulations.”

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCE, the following Amendment made:—In page 5, line 20, after “1881,” insert “as regards England, and ‘The Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877,’ as regards Ireland.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I think the Committee will remember that Clause 4 was postponed for the purpose of drafting the new clause which I now propose to substitute. It is practically the same, with the difference that in the original clause there is a mixing up of the enacting and interpreting part, and it was suggested that these would be better divided into two clauses, a course which recommended itself to the promoters. It was suggested by those who consulted me, and I do not think there is any objection to the new clause. It explains that the Act should include only deeds executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors, and by changing the language of the fifth line I have put this beyond doubt; and, save this alteration, the clause is the same as the original Clause 4.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Postponed Clause 4 omitted.

New Clause:—

(Application of Act.)

“(1.) This Act shall apply to every deed of arrangement as defined in this section executed after the commencement of this Act.”

(Deeds to which the Act applies.)

“(2.) A deed of arrangement to which this Act applies shall include any of the following instruments, whether under seal or not, executed by, for, or in respect of the affairs of a debtor for the benefit of his creditors generally (otherwise than in pursuance of the Law for the time being in force relating to bankruptcy), that is to say:—

“(a.) An assignment of property;

“(b.) A deed of or agreement for a composition; “And in cases where creditors of a debtor obtain any control over his property or business:—

“(c.) A deed of inspectorship entered into for the purpose of carrying on or winding up a business;

“(d.) A letter of license authorising the debtor or any other person to manage, carry on, realise, or dispose of a business with a view to the payment of debts; and “(e.) Any agreement or instrument entered into for the purpose of carrying on or winding up the debtor's business, or authorizing the debtor or any other person to manage, carry on, realise, or dispose of the debtor's business, with a view to the payment of his debts.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

—brought up, and read a first and second time, and added to the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment made:—In page 5, after Clause 17, insert the following Clause:—

(Interpretation terms.)

“In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—‘Court or a Judge’ means the High Court of Justice and any Judge thereof; ‘person’ includes a body of persons corporate or unincorporate; ‘prescribed’ means prescribed by rules to be made under this Act; ‘property’ has the same meaning as the same expression has in ‘The Bankruptcy Act, 1883;’ ‘Rules’ includes forms.”

Schedule.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the Schedule struck out of the Bill.

Preamble.

MR. CHANCE: The Preamble requires some slight amendment, owing to the omission of the Schedule that has just passed.

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCE, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, line 2, leave out the word “trader;” and in line 4, leave out the word “Act,” and insert the words “Acts in England and Ireland.”

Preamble, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 283.]

M O T I O N S .

OYSTER AND MUSSEL FISHERIES PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Baron Henry De Worms, Bill to confirm an Order made by the Board of Trade, under “The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868,” relating to Poole (Wareham Channel), ordered to be brought in by Baron Henry De Worms and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 279.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS

(NO. 5.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Local Government Districts of Chesham and Hindley, the City of Norwich, and the Richmond and West Kent Main Sewerage Districts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 280.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS

(NO. 6) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the City of Bath, the Local Government Districts of Birstal and Dalton-in-Furness, the City of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and the Borough of Southport, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 281.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS

(NO. 7) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Borough of Blackpool, the Improvement Act District of Bournemouth, the Borough of Dewsbury and the Local Government District of Heckmondwike, and the Improvement Act Districts of Milford, Rhyl, and West Worthing, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

[Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 282.]

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1873)

AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. B. Balfour, Bill to amend "The Law Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873," ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. B. Balfour, Sir Lyon Playfair, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Haldane, and Mr. Edmund Robertson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 284.]

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES)

(NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mundella, Bill to promote Intermediate Education in Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mundella, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Richard, Sir Hussey Vivian, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Stuart Rendel, and Mr. William Abraham.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 285.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 8th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [217]

[Fourteenth Night]—R.F.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Local Government (No. 8)* [286]. Second Reading—Tramways (No. 2)* [271].

VOL. CCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to move—

"That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Manchester Ship Canal Company to raise a portion of their capital by means of preference shares, and that Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. Jacob Bright, Sir James Fergusson, Sir Henry Roscoe, the Honourable Alan de Tatton Egerton, Mr. Addison, and Mr. Elliott Lees do prepare and bring it in."

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton)—I object to the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: This is not a stage of a Bill, as the hon. Gentleman will perceive; but it is only a Motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders. When the Question is put, the hon. Member can take any action in regard to it which he thinks proper, but he cannot secure the postponement of the Motion by simply objecting to it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Manchester Ship Canal Company to raise a portion of their capital by means of preference shares, and that Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. Jacob Bright, Sir James Fergusson, Sir Henry Roscoe, the Honourable Alan de Tatton Egerton, Mr. Addison, and Mr. Elliott Lees do prepare and bring it in."—(Mr. Houldsworth.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Perhaps some Member of Her Majesty's Government will make a statement to the House in regard to this very important matter. I presume that the object of the Bill is to enable interest to be paid out of capital.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: The Motion which I have ventured to propose is one of a very simple character, and I think I can, in a very few words, place the House in full possession of the facts of the case. The House will be aware that the Manchester Ship Canal Bill was passed by Parliament two years ago for the construction of an important undertaking which is considered of vital importance to the interests of Lancashire. During that time efforts had been made to raise the necessary capital, and I am not here to-day to say to the House that those efforts have in the slightest degree been unsuccessful. On the contrary, I am in a position to say that very nearly £4,000,000 have been subscribed in Lancashire alone, out of the £8,000,000 of the share capital that is required for this undertaking. I may remind the House that this is a very large undertaking, involving a sum of not less than £10,000,000, of which £8,000,000 are to be share capital, and £2,000,000 borrowed capital.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): I am unwilling to interrupt the hon. Member, but, perhaps, he will allow me to make a suggestion, which I think will save the time of the House, and will only involve a very short statement from me. I see that ~~there are three~~ Motions down on the Paper in reference to this Bill in the name of the hon. Member. The first is for the suspension of the Standing Orders, in order to enable the Bill to be brought in. The second is for the suspension of further Standing Orders, so that a Motion may be made "that the Bill be now read a first time;" and the third is a Motion for the second reading of the Bill. Now, the first and second of these stages may be taken to-day without provoking much discussion; but the third stage cannot be taken if any Member objects to it, and must of necessity go over until to-morrow. No doubt, when that Motion is made, there will be a discussion upon it, and therefore I think it may be for the convenience of the House to agree to the present Motion, and to permit the first and second stages of the Bill to be taken, on the understanding that the discussion upon the whole merits of the Bill will be taken on the Motion to read the Bill a second time. The Motion to suspend the Standing Orders in order to enable the Bill to be brought in is in itself a matter of some importance; but I think the first and second Motions may be agreed to, in order to save the time of the House. The discussion, which I presume will relate to the financial condition of the concern, can be fittingly taken on the proposal to read the Bill a second time.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: I am perfectly ready to assent to the course proposed by the hon. Member being taken.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Before that proposal is accepted by the House, I should like to say a word or two. I think that the proposal made by the Chairman of Ways and Means is not, under the circumstances, an unreasonable one — namely, that the first and second Motions which stand in the name of the hon. Member for North-West Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) should be adopted now; but I would suggest that, instead of the discussion being taken to-morrow upon the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, it should be postponed for at least a week, because this is the very first occasion on which these three Notices have appeared on the Paper at all. Personally, I knew nothing of them until, by mere accident, I discovered them when I opened my Parliamentary Papers this morning. Many hon. Members who are interested in the question knew nothing about this Bill, and I think it is desirable that ample time should be afforded for considering it. Therefore, I hope the House, while adopting the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means, will modify it to this extent, that it will adjourn Motion No. 4 for the second reading for a week.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I hope the House will consent to the suggestion which has been made by the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). The only motive for pressing this Bill forward rapidly is that the promoters have almost no time left at their disposal. It is absolutely necessary for them to raise the whole of their capital before the 5th of August, or the whole scheme will collapse. They see their way to raising it, if they can obtain the powers proposed to be given by this Bill, and the whole matter will then be settled. If, however, the discussion on the second reading is postponed for a week, it will very much imperil the success of the scheme.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Baron H. DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I think it would be for the convenience of the House that a measure of this importance should be postponed from to-day until this day week. I express no opinion with regard to the merits of the Bill itself; but I may point out to the hon. Member for North-West Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) that the Board of Trade have had no notice whatever that the Bill was coming on, and as it involves questions of enormous importance, I cannot consent to any arrangement to rush a matter of such great magnitude through the House without Notice.

Mr. Houldsworth

Mr. WHITLEY: The proposal now made by my hon. Friend (Mr. Houldsworth) on behalf of the promoters of this Bill is one of the most serious which can occupy the attention of this House. My hon. Friend proposes, by the Bill, to enable the Manchester Ship Canal Company to raise a portion of their capital by means of preference shares upon the undertaking which has already received the sanction of Parliament. I will remind the House that when the Company introduced their measure originally, they failed to carry it, and when it was subsequently submitted to a Select Committee, the Committee made it a condition upon which the consent of Parliament should be given to the Bill, that the Company should raise £5,000,000 of capital before commencing their works. At the present moment, according to a statement contained in a paper which I hold in my hand, the Company have only raised £3,000,000, and they now propose to alter the whole of the conditions which were made with them by the Committee when they granted the Bill. They propose, in fact, to raise a portion of their capital by preference shares in connection with an undertaking in regard to which the original capital has not been subscribed. Now, I venture to think that such a proposition was never before made to this House, and I think it is one which really requires a great deal of serious consideration before the House consents to sanction so new and so important a principle, and to suspend the Standing Orders in a way that has never been previously proposed. The undertaking given by the Company when they obtained their Bill was that they would raise a capital of £5,000,000 in advance before they proceeded to commence their works, and power was given to them to pay interest out of capital while the works were in course of construction. Not content with that privilege, they are now seeking to introduce a new principle, and one which must be regarded as even more objectionable, and that is the principle of raising money by means of preference stock upon an engagement to pay interest out of the original capital. I do think that this is a very serious matter.

My hon. Friend asks the House to suspend its Standing Orders in order to enable this Bill to be brought in, and if that proposal is assented to, the effect will be to take away from the Standing Order Committee their power and duty of expressing an opinion upon the measure. I certainly cannot help thinking that this House, without possessing the slightest knowledge whatever of the matter, should not be asked to suspend the whole of its Standing Orders. It is a very dangerous principle which my hon. Friend proposes to introduce. I, therefore, feel it a sense of duty to move the rejection of the proposition which has been made by my hon. Friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not necessary to move the rejection of the Motion. The question is—"That the Standing Orders be suspended," and that Motion may be met by a negative.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I feel it right to say that, although I asked some Member of the Government to make a statement in reference to the matter, I take no objection to the proposal.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the first time,"—(Mr. Houldsworth),—put, and agreed to.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I now beg to move—"That Standing Orders 62, 204, 223, and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a second time." I am very anxious to proceed with the Bill as rapidly as possible; but I have no objection to the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means that the discussion on the Motion for the second reading should be taken to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Standing Orders 62, 204, 223, and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Houldsworth).

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): If the Motion for the second reading is objected to by any hon. Member it must of necessity stand over.

Mr. HOULDSWORTH: The suggestion made by the hon. Member was that it should stand over until to-morrow; and, although I should have preferred to take the second reading now, I will make no objection to that course being adopted. Another suggestion has, however, been made by the Secretary to the Board of Trade—namely, that the second reading be postponed until this day week. I shall be perfectly ready to accept a compromise, and postpone the Motion until Monday. It is of the utmost importance to make rapid progress with the Bill. I believe the matter stands in this position—That the whole capital for this important undertaking can be raised if we pass the Bill within the next two or three weeks. If it is postponed beyond that time, and the powers of the promoters should lapse, the whole of the enormous expenditure which has been incurred in getting the Bill through Parliament will be entirely thrown away. I should, therefore, be glad to make this compromise. I have no wish in any way to take the House by surprise; and if the promoters had not been driven into a corner it would not have been necessary to press forward this Bill.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think that the compromise suggested by the hon. Member for North-West Manchester is a perfectly reasonable one. I know it is possible that the right hon. Gentleman opposite may object to the time of the House being consumed on Monday in a discussion upon a Private Bill, but I am informed by those who ought to know, that the time likely to be occupied in this business will not be very long. If a further delay is insisted upon, it may be fatal to the Bill, and, therefore, I hope the Government will consent to the course proposed by the hon. Member.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I have no wish to offer any factious opposition to the measure; but the matter is one of very great importance, not only to the House, but to the Department with which I am immediately concerned. The Board of Trade has never been consulted at all in regard to the Bill. The first notice I had was when I saw this morning the three Motions of the hon. Member for North-West Manchester on the Paper. No notice whatever had previously been given to the Board of Trade. I might have met the hon. Member's proposals by moving that the Bill be referred to the Examiners, or to the Standing Order Committee. I do not wish to act in any unreasonable way; but I think that it is only fair to ask for a week's time in order that both the Government and the House may take this very important measure into consideration. Under these circumstances, I do not think that I ought to consent to the compromise proposed by the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I trust that the Government will accept the proposal to take the second reading on Monday. The Government themselves admit the importance of the measure, but its importance rests upon the financial arrangements proposed; and, seeing that even a few days delay may imperil the whole scheme, and that it may be equally satisfactorily dealt with on Monday as on Wednesday, I trust the Secretary to the Board of Trade will give way.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: With the indulgence of the House, I will say that, on the clear and distinct understanding that the discussion upon the Bill will not occupy a long time on Monday, the Government will consent to its being taken on that day.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Q U E S T I O N .

COAL MINES—THE COLLIERY ACCIDENT AT MOTHERWELL.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether his attention has been called to the coal pit accident at Motherwell, by which three men were killed and others injured; and whether he would cause an immediate inspection to be made as to the cause of the accident?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I only know of this accident from what I have seen in the newspapers. I have not yet received any official information; but I have telegraphed to the Inspector to at once inspect the colliery, and to make an immediate Report.

Mr. Houldsworth

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th June.]

[FOURTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SPECIAL JURY AND REMOVAL OF TRIAL.

Clause 3 (Order for special jury).

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.), in moving as an Amendment in page 3, to leave out in line 15 to line 18, inclusive, the words—

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business, be it enacted—”

said: The passage to which I object precedes the enacting part of the clause as a preamble. The statements contained in it are false and absurd, and as this preamble does not affect the enacting part of the clause, I think it may well be omitted. The Government propose to secure the trial of persons charged with political offences by one section of the community in Ireland, and they declare in this preamble that it may be expedient to change the venue in order to secure more fair and impartial trials, and to relieve jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business. Whatever view may be taken of the necessity of securing more fair and impartial trials, the pretence that this Bill will relieve jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business is ridiculous, because in no case, with one exception, throughout the entire history of Ireland, has any juror been subjected to injury or harm in consequence of having acted as a juror. That one case is all the Government have to go upon, and no other juror who has given a verdict in favour of the Crown, either in 1848, 1865-6-7, 1870, or in the three years of the last Crimes Act, although hundreds of jurymen have been concerned, has ever sustained injury. In the case of the solitary juror who was attacked—Mr. Field—the men were caught and hanged. Therefore I maintain that to ask the Committee to place on the Statute Book a formal declaration of this kind without the slightest pretence for it is asking a great deal too much. It will not add one hair's breadth to the enacting provisions of the Bill, nor can it accomplish any good object the Government can have in view. To ask the Irish Members quietly to assent to a useless and needless libel upon their countrymen is to ask them to do what it is impossible for them to do. No doubt Her Majesty's Government may force the Committee to accept this preamble, for they have their majority and can do very much as they like. Nowadays, except in the case of legislation introduced by some amateur, the old practice of prefacing a Bill with a preamble has been altogether abandoned. I believe the last instance was the case of the Hares and Rabbits Bill. Nobody nowadays thinks of inserting a preamble in a Bill, and unless the Government are proud of their own drafting, the least they ought to do is to omit this preamble. I therefore hope the Government will accept my Amendment. In Ireland, there is not one man in 20 who possesses the qualification of a common juror, and there is not one in 50—I believe the exact number is one in 64—who possesses the qualification of a special juror. I think it is quite enough to ask us to leave in the hands of this gang of landlords and land agents the power of trying the cases which will arise under the provisions of this measure, but to ask us to assent pro forma to this libel upon our countrymen is asking a great deal too much. The Government, in this measure, are seeking to entrust the lives and liberties of the Irish people to the members of secret societies, in the hope that by that means they may practically stamp out those liberties, and it is a gross absurdity to call upon us to assent that trials by jury in Ireland are unfair and impartial, and that a necessity exists for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business. I beg to move the omission of the first four lines of the preamble.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “Whereas,” in page 3, in line 15, to the words “be it enacted,” both inclusive, in line 18.—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

[Fourteenth Night.]

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Government have no objection to raise to the course which the hon. and learned Member has pursued. They can quite understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman feels it his duty to make a protest against this preamble, but there is nothing unusual in prefacing a clause by a preamble. In the present case, the preamble explains one of the chief grounds upon which the Government ask that the Bill should become law. The hon. and learned Gentleman appears to think that persons who serve in Ireland as jurymen run no risk, and the hon. and learned Gentleman says it is an historical fact that no jurymen has run any danger to his life, property, and business by acting according to his oath in the jury box. The hon. and learned Member is perfectly aware that the Government have always laid it down that one of the chief grounds justifying the Bill is that a fair trial cannot be obtained at the hands of a jury in Ireland. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, that is one of the grounds for the introduction of this Bill. There is, therefore, nothing new in the declaration we have put on the face of the Bill, and experience proves the absolute necessity of provisions of the character of those contained in this clause. Experience obtained under previous Crimes Acts, and experience obtained every year at the Criminal Assizes held in Ireland, has abundantly proved that if you want to have justice done by a jury in Ireland a change of venue is absolutely necessary. That being our view—a view supported by experience in Ireland extending over a good many years—I do not see how it is possible to modify this clause, nor do I see any adequate ground for withdrawing the preamble, which clearly explains the grounds upon which the Bill has been introduced.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman, I presume, by way of a pleasant interlude, dropped one important expression—namely, that he does not see any grounds for modifying the clause. Are we then to understand that in this question the opinion of the Unionist Members is to be disregarded? Are we to understand that although Lord Derby, one of the chief Unionist supporters of the Government, has declared that the exportation clause to England is an absurd provision—are we to understand that in the judgment of Her Majesty's Government, no attention ought to be paid to the views of the noble Lord and his brother Unionists? This clause declares—

"Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business."

I wish to ask the Government whether this is the way they mean to defend the clause—namely, by simply dropping a statement from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that they neither intend to withdraw this preamble, or any other part of the clause. This statement certainly conflicts with the assertion which has been prominently put forward as to an understanding between the Liberal Unionists and the Government in reference to the change of venue to England. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary tells us that the Government do not see their way to the withdrawal of the preamble or any other part of the clause. In making that statement, does the right Gentleman mean to forestall the discussion of the 2nd sub-section of the clause? Is he now announcing the determination of the Cabinet; and if so, do they intend to make it a vital matter? Of course, if they make it a vital matter, the Unionists will abstain from opposing them. So elastic are their consciences, that they will vote against any proposal which the Government assert to be a vital matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I certainly did not intend to convey that the Government would not accept an Amendment in any part of the clause. What I intended to say, and what I adhere to, is that we must disclaim any intention of abandoning the principle embodied in the preamble of the clause, and in the clause itself, that a change of venue under certain circumstances is absolutely necessary.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The right hon. Gentleman says that the Government can see no adequate reason for abandoning this preamble. Let me try to give them one, and that adequate reason is that the withdrawal of the preamble would save the whole of this discussion without in any fashion changing the Bill. The preamble is no portion of the enacting part of the Bill at all. The enacting part would be equally effective without it. It contains a number of statements which are naturally disputed on this side, although they are affirmed by the Government. If the Government insists on having these statements retained in the Bill, it will be only fair that we should discuss, one by one, whether they are true or not. I maintain that the Bill would be just as effective without these four lines, and would be just as complete, good or bad. They add nothing whatever to the Bill, and are mere verbiage.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I quite agree with the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). It may appear to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary desirable for this Committee to affirm the statements contained in the clause in regard to Irish juries; but if the Government are determined to insist upon that, then we, on this side of the House, are equally determined to discuss them. What earthly object can the Government have in adding to the general offensiveness of the measure, and placing on record, as a sort of historical proposition, a declaration of this character? I should have supposed that the Government had quite enough on their hands without insisting upon the affirmation of propositions with regard to the past history of Ireland. I should have thought they would have desired to proceed with the remaining parts of the Bill. It seems, however, that there is not enough to satisfy them without insisting upon pressing forward these offensive and obstructive propositions. I am perfectly ready to enter into the questions from the historical standpoint. It is alleged in this preamble—

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business.”

But did the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary attempt to instance a single case where there has been danger or injury to the life, property, or business of an Irish juror when a Coercion Act was not in force? In Ireland, whenever you have found the life, property, or business of a juror in danger, it has always been when the country has been governed by exceptional laws. In no part of the history of Ireland is there the smallest evidence of intimidation having been practised towards jurors when the law administered in Ireland was the same law which was being administered in England. Therefore, it is only natural that we should feel a great and strong objection to having such a statement as this placed on record in a Bill of this kind, and that it should be accepted as proved by this Committee. I am astonished to find that Members of the Government are not more desirous of giving real information to their Friends upon this complicated and difficult Irish Question. I should have thought that they would have been anxious to give accurate information upon the question, instead of displaying their ignorance in this blind and stupid fashion. If they intend to continue in this course, I am afraid it will never be possible to bring about a termination of this eternal Irish Question. Let hon. Members look to the debates which took place in this House in the years 1838 and 1839, when Lord John Russell was the Leader of the Liberal Party, and when he was resisting the attempt then made to enforce coercion. The only four years in the history of Ireland, since the Union, during which coercion was abandoned and the jury system was administered as it is administered in England, according to the testimony of Sir Thomas Drummond, the Irish Secretary of that period, the Law Officers of the Crown, the Lord Lieutenant, Lord John Russell, and the whole Executive, were years of progressive improvement. According to the testimony of those gentlemen, from the day and hour in which the system of packing juries and unfairly administering the law ceased, crime steadily, and even rapidly, decreased. I think it was in March, 1839, that the experiment of administering the Jury Law in Ireland as it is administered in England was, for the first time, undertaken, and the experiment was crowned with the most complete success. Indeed, a condition of things was brought about under the new system for a parallel to which we must look in vain under the working of Coercion Acts. It is, therefore, a monstrous thing for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to introduce into this measure a declaration as to the past history of Ireland which will place on record the assertion that in the opinion of this Parliament it is necessary and expedient to protect the lives of Irish jurors when we have on record in the most undeniable manner that during the only four years throughout the whole of the century that the Jury Law of Ireland was administered in the same spirit as the Jury Law in England the Executive and the Ministers responsible to the people of this country for the Government of Ireland declared that there had been great progressive improvement in the administration of law and justice, and that the success of the experiment fully confirmed the hopes that were entertained of it. Is it either just or reasonable to expect that we shall quietly submit to the gratuitous insult directed against us for which the Government can allege no reason whatever? Her Majesty's Ministers are not content with forging chains for the Irish people, but they desire to insult them into the bargain.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) last night wished, on the part of the Government, to make a statement in regard to the whole of this clause, which statement you, Mr. Courtney, ruled to be out of Order. But he refuses to do so now that we are dealing with a preamble, which, seeing that it raises the whole question of the clause, would afford a legitimate opportunity for doing so. The right hon. Gentleman persistently refuses to tell us what the intentions of the Government are. I object to this preamble for three reasons. In the first place, because it is a lie on the face of it. It alleges that under the present law Irish jurors are unable to discharge their duties without endangering their lives, property, and business. Upon that state of facts we take absolute and complete issue with the Government, and we assert in support of our position the unquestionable fact that in no instance but one—namely, in the case of Mr. Field, has any injury ever occurred to any juror in Ireland in consequence of his conduct in the discharge of his duty in the jury box. It must also be remembered that in the case of that Gentleman he was a jurymen selected under the Crimes Act of 1882, and under a system which this Bill seeks to carry even still further. No doubt, Mr. Field did suffer injury in consequence of his action as a juror; but the criminals in that case were promptly and speedily brought to justice and punished. Therefore, the allegation contained in this preamble is absolutely and positively false, and on that ground we object to the insertion of such a preamble in an Act of Parliament. I have never seen any use made of a preamble in a legal argument, except sometimes to confuse an issue which may have been raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, says that this preamble serves the purpose of setting forth on the face of an Act of Parliament the reasons which have induced Parliament to pass it. Now, I take the liberty of saying that that is a thing which Parliament should never do. Parliament should be content to lay down, in plain language, what it intends to do, and it is idle to set forth their reasons on the face of the Act itself. This question of preambles is a very old question, and one which was discussed by a learned and distinguished Judge—Lord Bacon—some 200 or 300 years ago, when preambles to Acts of Parliament were much more common than they are now. My recollection of the language used by that distinguished man is that he condemned the practice on the ground that the function of Parliament was not to set forth reasons for what it did, but to state simply, clearly, and intelligibly, what it intended the law to be, and then to leave to courts of law the function of interpretation. My third objection to this preamble is that it is not expressed in good grammar. The preamble says—

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business.”

I take it that what is meant is this—

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland for the purpose of securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business, be it enacted,”

and so on. This is only a very small point, but it is another instance of the scandalous manner in which the Bill has been drafted. It also shows the hurry with which the measure has been introduced. Upon these matters I do not think that satisfactory reasons have been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to justify the Committee in rejecting the Amendment, and I would ask some Minister of the Crown to give some more intelligible reason for the opposition of the Government to the Amendment.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I might concur with the view expressed by the hon. Member who has just sat down as to the general virtue and efficacy of preambles, but I am not sure that this is an occasion when that matter can be very satisfactorily discussed. What is perfectly clear is, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary does not believe in his own arguments on this particular preamble, because he stated that the Government desire the present Bill to bear on the face of it the reasons why such an Act has been passed. If that argument is worth anything at all, it is an argument in favour of having a preamble to the Bill as a whole, as was done in reference to the Crimes Act of 1882. If it was worth while to have this provoking preamble to this clause, much more was it worth while to have a preamble to the whole Bill. I therefore submit, Mr. Courtney, that the right hon. Gentleman can have no very great faith in his own argument. The attitude of the Government in inserting this preamble, and then in adhering to it at this moment, is an excellent illustration of what we mean when we charge the delay which has taken place in getting this Bill through upon the want—I do not wish to use a harsh word—upon the want of competency displayed by those who have had the conduct and management of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman must have known that to insert a preamble of this kind would be to provoke hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to dispute and challenge it. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), that it adds nothing to the efficacy of the Bill. It does not make the Bill one atom stronger, more effective, or more operative in any single respect, but it is a pure piece of wanton and idle provocation. The right hon. Gentleman appears to be somewhat surprised that hon. Members below the Gangway should resent the insertion of an allegation of this kind, and there again he shows that want of appreciation which marks the whole policy of Her Majesty's Advisers—a want of appreciation of the mind and the working of the imagination of the people of Ireland. They do not seem to think it enough that they should inflict these exceptional disabilities and hardships upon the Irish people, but they must needs add superfluous and disputed allegations. They do not seem to be aware that a preamble of this kind must necessarily insult and wound the feelings of the Irish people. For themselves, they can gain nothing by it. That is perfectly clear. Although I have been glad to have the opportunity of pointing out what we mean by the inefficient conduct of this Bill on the part of Her Majesty's Government, at the same time, I think the matter of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has been so much discussed at previous stages that I would recommend my hon. and learned Friend not necessarily to withdraw the Amendment, but to enable the Committee to proceed, as rapidly as possible, to a Division in which I, for one, shall have the pleasure of following him.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Oh, no. That will not do at all. The Government have put this preamble in their Bill, and they have put it in because they think it of importance. Hon. Members from Ireland think it is of importance too, and the matter must be properly discussed. I hope, therefore, that the discussion will go on for an hour or two. I am very sorry for the Government. I think there never was a Government which gave itself so much unnecessary trouble. The whole of this Bill is a piece of unnecessary trouble. They ought to have brought in a Bill of one clause saying—“Henceforth Ireland shall be ruled at the will and pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant.” They might have discussed that point in one or two nights and got it settled, and by that means they would have saved the rest of the Session for those beneficent measures which they are so anxious to bring forward. I think the little discussion we have had this morning has been most instructive. It is instructive, because it will show who are the real obstructives. There [pointing to opposite Benches] sit the real obstructives. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who has brought in a preamble in an unusual manner, which is of no value whatever, except to irritate the Irish people by putting an insulting sentence into the Bill. I think that the Irish Members have a perfect right to discuss the Amendment as long as they are able to do so, and I hope they will not withdraw it; but will go on with the discussion until that happy moment when the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House comes down and speaks the word of fate which will put an end to the discussion.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I have always considered the Whiteboy Clause the most obnoxious clause in the Bill, and that there is a most serious attempt in the second clause to interfere with the social life of the Irish people. Certainly, I still look upon that clause as even a more objectionable one than the fourth clause which we are now discussing. Then if a preamble is necessary at all, why should there not be a preamble prefixed to the most important clauses of the Bill. Why—as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) has asked—is there no preamble prefixed to the beginning of the Bill itself? Here we have a preamble taken out of its place and inserted in a portion of the Bill in which no preamble has ever appeared before, as far as I know, in the history of any measure whatever. Moreover, it is not inserted for the purpose of making the Bill more effective; but for the purpose of making it more insulting to the Irish people. I listened to the remarks which were made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman had quite made up his mind what to do with the latter portion of the clause. A suspicion crossed my mind that he was somewhat anxious that the Committee should spend a considerable amount of time in these harmless preliminary skirmishes, in order that he might arrange his plans for compelling a complete surrender in regard to the latter portion of the clause. I am very glad that this discussion has taken place, because it has placed the Government in a most unenviable position before the country and the world. The Government themselves cannot deny that these words were absolutely unnecessary. I am not a lawyer myself, and, therefore, I am bound to speak with modesty of the amateur attempts of the Chief Secretary to explain and expound the law; but I see that the right hon. Gentleman is at the present moment buttressed by two very able lawyers—the hon. and learned Solicitor General for England (Sir Edward Clarke) on one side, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) on the other. I now see approaching the portentous form—using the term purely in relation to the ability of the hon. and learned Member—of the Attorney General for England, and there are also present on the Treasury Bench the Home Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland. There are consequently five lawyers sitting there to support one layman, and I ask whether a single one of those five lawyers will rise in his place and declare that this clause, even if it be carried exactly as it stands, will add one particle or iota of strength either to the clause to which it is a preamble, or to any section of the Bill? I look upon that as a fair challenge. If the words add no effectiveness to the measure surely there is no necessity for rendering it wantonly and uselessly provocative and insulting. I hardly know at present whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland regards these words as really insulting to the Irish people or not—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No.]—I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. He does not think so. I am afraid that my hon. Friends sitting around me are not of the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, and with all respect for the Chief Secretary for Ireland, I will venture to assert that we are rather better judges of what the feeling of the Irish people is than he is himself. The right hon. Gentleman is not an Irishman by birth, nor is he an Irishman by adoption. The right hon. Gentleman has taken very good care not even to visit the country which he assists in governing. I do not find fault with the right hon. Gentleman for avoiding scenes of political conflict and turmoil in his holidays; but, at the same time, when we have a Chief Secretary for Ireland so absolutely ignorant of the country who is paid £5,000 a-year for governing it. [An Hon. MEMBER: Not £5,000, £4,500.] Well, the difference is not very much, and it is immaterial to my argument. I am not in receipt of anything like that sum, but I know that if I were I should have felt it my duty to do something to acquaint myself with the condition of the country for governing which I was so liberally paid. If not, I should certainly not feel prepared to stand up in face of the united representation of the people of Ireland, and declare that a clause in a particular Bill is not insulting, which they say is both provoking and insulting. If this preamble is persisted in, I think it will be our duty to discuss each one of the several and different propositions which it contains. Let me call attention to the fact that this preamble does not consist of one proposition only, but is a statement of several propositions, to each of which the Irish Members offer a most decided and uncompromising challenge. The first statement is that it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland. Well, we altogether deny that statement. It is not true that a fair trial cannot be obtained in Ireland, except in the case of the Orangemen, where we find the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland takes very good care to procure an acquittal by not fixing their place of trial in some county where the trial could be properly conducted. The second statement is that it is intended to secure more fair and impartial trials in Ireland. I have two answers to that. I say, in the first place, that trials in Ireland, either for fairness or impartiality, will compare favourably with those which take place in England, Scotland, and Wales, or in any other civilized country in the world. In the second place, we are not to accept a proposition of that nature as a mere academic proposition of the Chief Secretary; on the contrary, it is one which is made in grim earnest. The Irish are among the most peace-loving, the most orderly, the most well-conducted, and the most virtuous people in the world, and yet it is proposed, in this preamble, to proclaim Ireland to the world as a country filled with crime. What I maintain is that it will be impossible to obtain a fair and impartial trial by the measure which the Government are now proposing. If I were to propose a preamble to this clause—and I have as much right to propose a useless, wanton, and unnecessary preamble as the Government—I should say that this clause was expedient, in order to secure more unfair and partial trials; and I think I should be able to prove that proposition. A fair trial means a trial of a man by his peers, so that there may be a perfect parity and equality between man and man. The proposition of the Government is altogether opposed to that, because it provides that a man shall be handed over to trial, not by his peers, but by his religious, political, and social antagonists. Moreover, it is proposed to send the Irish peasants before such a tribunal at a moment when there is something like civil war between class and class. The third part of this preamble I object to still more strongly. It says that this clause is necessary in order to relieve jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business. I deny that jurors in Ireland are in any danger of their lives, property, or business. I maintain that jurors in Ireland have done their duty too well, rather than too ill, as between the Government and the people. I know many men in Ireland, men of strong Catholic and Nationalist sympathies, who have found political prisoners guilty solely against their feelings, even in cases where I myself would never have found a political prisoner guilty. I hold that as long as a man abstains from crime he should be at liberty to do what he can to secure the freedom and liberties of his country. At the Fenian trials, Catholic after Catholic, and Nationalist after Nationalist, went into the jury box and found men guilty time after time, although their only crime was that in despair of the future of their country they thought strong measures were necessary. The whole history of Ireland, as far as political trials are concerned, is a history not of a wanton disregard, but of a too scrupulous regard for the administration of the law. Compare the history of political trials in Ireland with the history of political trials in England. Hon. Members with short memories, and an imperfect historical knowledge, are in the habit of pointing out that persons charged with crime in Ireland have been acquitted because politics were mixed up in the accusations made against them. Has that never occurred in England? Let me remind hon. Members of the time when a plot was hatched against the life of the late Emperor Napoleon by Orsini, and when an attempt was made to assassinate him on going to the Opera House in Paris. The Government of France accused the people of this country on that occasion of harbouring, associating with, and stimulating the conspirators to assassinate the reigning head of the French Empire. And the charge was just, because there is no doubt that Orsini's conspiracy met with considerable sympathy in this country. Indeed, I believe it is a fact that even some Members of this House were charged with assenting to and encouraging, if not actually, at any rate partially, in various other ways the persons who were guilty of this crime. [Sir EDWARD CLARKE dissented.] I see that the Solicitor General for England shakes his head. Do I understand him to mean a denial of my proposition? I should like the Solicitor General to commit himself to such a denial, because I believe I should be able to prove my case fully. I think the Solicitor General himself is old enough to remember the trial of Dr. Bernard. What was the charge against that gentleman? It was one of conspiracy to assassinate the Emperor Napoleon. Dr. Bernard was acquitted of that crime, although the evidence against him carried conviction to the minds of all impartial men, and the verdict of acquittal was received with tumultuous cheers; and in a very short time afterwards, when one of the ablest and most powerful Ministers this country ever had—Lord Palmerston—got up and introduced a Bill giving the Government power to deal with such conspiracies in future, it was opposed by so honoured a man as Mr. Cobden, who acted as Teller on the Division which proved fatal to the Government. It pains me very much to differ from the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne upon this question, but I confess that I feel bound to take the advice of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker mouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) rather than that of the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne. This preamble contains propositions which the Irish Members are bound to resist. We are absolutely called upon to discuss these propositions, and, for my part, I advise my hon. Friends to discuss them up to the moment when the modern—although I can scarcely say Olympian—Jove comes in and puts an end to the discussion.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I sincerely trust that the Government will not be so infatuated as to insist upon this preamble. Of what possible use can it be except to add insult to injury? It may be said that it has not been introduced with the intention of insulting the Irish nation, but I maintain that a greater insult could not be offered to a nation. For, observe, its language is not confined to agrarian or political times, but it declares in so many words that an Irishman is incapable of doing justice. Thus it is an indictment against the whole Irish nation, alleging that Irish jurors will not do justice. If such an imputation were attempted to be conveyed against the impartiality of Welsh juries, I am satisfied that every Welsh Member would sit up all night to oppose it. I have heard it said that a Bill which requires a preamble stands self-condemned. But if a preamble is necessary at all, why not put it in its proper place at the beginning of the Bill? It seems as if the Government have been afraid of expressing their own thoughts, and they have thought that by smuggling these words into the middle of the Bill, they would get them passed unchallenged.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I think it must be conceded that precisely the same rule, and precisely the same principle, should be applied to a preamble, whether it is placed at the beginning of a Bill, where we would naturally expect to find it, or whether it is placed at the beginning of a clause in a Bill. Let me invite the attention of the Committee to the remarks which are made by the late Sir Erskine May upon this point, on page 560 of his work on the established usages of the House in regard to the postponement of the preamble of a Bill when it comes at the beginning of a Bill. He says—

“By a Standing Order of the 27th of November, 1882, it is provided that in Committee on a Bill, the preamble which has been postponed until after the consideration of the clauses without Question put.”

Sir Erskine May then proceeds to say—

“This course is adopted because the House has already affirmed the principle of the Bill on the second reading, and it is therefore the province of the Committee to settle the clause first, and then to consider the preamble in reference to the clauses only. By this rule the preamble is made subordinate to the clauses, instead of governing them."

The Government, by asking us to vote this preamble, before we have settled the clause which it precedes, are reversing the rule laid down by Sir Erskine May, and they are asking us to make the clause subordinate to the preamble, instead of the preamble being, as it ought to be, subordinate to the clause. Now, I submit that by following the very unusual, if not unprecedented course of placing the preamble where it ought not to be—namely, in the middle, instead of at the beginning of a Bill, the Government are directly violating the spirit of a Standing Order of this House.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I am sorry that the Government refuse to accept the Amendment. No reason has been assigned for the insertion of these words. They get all they require by means of the enacting portion of the clause without this preamble at all. The propositions contained in the preamble, as has been ably shown by my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), are not based upon facts or experience. We have heard a good deal about the difficulty of obtaining convictions in Ireland, but that is altogether contrary to my experience. At the Winter Assizes which have been held in the City of Cork, or at the ordinary Assizes which have taken place in other districts, a power of this kind has certainly not been required, and time after time the Government have been able to obtain the conviction of any prisoner they have considered it desirable to send for trial. In many cases, looking at the matter dispassionately, I am of opinion that the Government have obtained convictions where the jury have been more influenced by prejudice than by evidence. I have known of cases where persons convicted at the Cork Assizes have been sentenced to death, and the sentence has been carried out. I recollect on one occasion having been present an hour after an execution had taken place, and I then saw the corpses of men who died protesting before God, with the Sacrament on their lips, that they were innocent of the charges which had been made against them. I make no complaint against the jurors for the verdicts they have returned, but I mention the fact simply as an argument, to show what it is possible to do at the present time under the ordinary law, and as an argument against the provisions of this clause which are to come on later. I maintain that the clause itself is altogether unnecessary. Unfortunately, we are in the position of having to discuss the necessity of the clause before we are invited to discuss the clause itself. As a matter of fact, we are invited to a sort of double-barrelled discussion. I think I am not overstating the case when I say that there are, at the present moment, some 250 or 260 persons undergoing penal servitude and various terms of long imprisonment less than penal servitude, from the County of Kerry, who have been convicted at the Kerry and Cork Assizes. This fact abundantly proves that there is no necessity for a change of venue, for nothing further could be done if the prisoners had been taken to Dublin or Belfast to undergo their trial. Indeed, I think anyone who dispassionately inquires into the matter will say that in many of these cases a conviction would scarcely have been obtained from an English jury. We see these things taking place day by day, and I challenge the Government to point out whether or not there is, at the present moment, a man in gaol awaiting his trial because they do not know where to secure a fair and impartial trial. If they could do that there might be some reason for these insulting words. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says they are not insulting. I fully admit that he does not intend them to be so; but the Chief Secretary must allow me to say that it is quite possible that whoever drafted the Bill was an Irishman, and the instinct of a Dublin Castle Irishman is the same wherever you find it. Not a word would he utter, not a sentence would he place on the paper which would not in itself be a distinct insult to the Irish people, whether he wished it to be so or not. This preamble says—

"Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland."

I think we have shown conclusively that it is not expedient, and that there is no necessity whatever for amending

[Fourteenth Night.]

the law in that direction. It may be a little convenient for the Government, but when they use such a strong word as "expedient" I think they ought to show that there is an actual necessity for it. It must be remembered that in adopting this change of venue in Ireland, the Government are running in the teeth of what is recognized as the spirit of the ordinary law. I find myself drifting into an anticipation of what is to follow when we come to consider the enacting part of the clause itself; but the irregularity I am guilty of is chargeable to the Government for putting in the clause an unnecessary preamble, and thereby inviting irregularity. As a matter of fact, the Government are anticipating, in a most inconvenient way, the discussion which must follow afterwards in its natural place. What do the Government want with a preamble? That they will be able to get the preamble we know perfectly well; but they will only get it with the trouble of applying the closure and forcing us to silence. No doubt they will be able to get the entire clause by resorting to the same means; but they wish to have it stated in the Bill, and send it forth to the world that no fair and impartial trial can be obtained in Ireland, a statement entirely unjustified by the facts. The speech which the Chief Secretary made upon introducing the Bill may be called the real preamble of the measure, and it amounted to this—"Whereas I have been told a certain number of fables and stories in regard to the administration of justice in Ireland; whereas I know nothing about Ireland; whereas I intend to know nothing about Ireland; and whereas I pride myself on my incapacity to know anything about Ireland; therefore, I declare that a Crimes Bill is necessary." That would have been a fitting preamble to the Bill. As to the clause itself, there is no limit to the discussion which might be initiated upon it. Can anyone pretend that it is fairer to take a Kerry peasant to Belfast or to Dublin, and to get him tried by a jury of Orangemen, or by a jury of broken-down landlords, than to try him in the county in which his alleged offence has been committed. Some of these so-called broken-down landlords never had any land at all; but they deem it a fashionable thing to swagger about and say that they could easily treat their friends with champagne if they could only get their rents. The moment these persons see a frieze coat on a peasants' back they say—"This is one of the men who are stopping the payment of rent, and if he is not guilty of the offence with which he is charged he is undoubtedly guilty of something else, and therefore it is just as well to convict him." It is too much to ask us to swallow this clause on the assertion and assumption that its object is to secure a fair trial. The Government say that it is necessary to adopt a provision for a change of venue, and unfortunately the matter is one over which the Irish Members have no control. They are certain to be outvoted upon it; but it is going too far for the Chief Secretary to require us to assert by a vote of this House that this clause is necessary in Ireland in order to secure a fair and impartial trial. I think that by this time the right hon. Gentleman ought to have discovered that, whoever has drafted the Bill, has adopted the very worst principle so far as the acceleration of the progress of the measure is concerned. There is no doubt whatever what the game of Her Majesty's Government is. They make a hollow pretence of desiring to get on ahead. They tell us from time to time that we are obstructing the progress of the Bill; but they know that we are helping them in the game they desire to play. As a matter of fact, they rejoice in the opposition which the Bill has received, because they are afraid of undertaking any other kind of legislation. Unhappily, we are in such a position that we can take no other course. Personally, we care very little for your Coercion Acts; but we have to stand here to defend the poor and helpless people of Ireland, and we cannot forego the use of every weapon which may ward off as long as possible the application of the coercion that is to be imposed upon them. Certainly, we cannot agree with this preamble; we do not believe that there is a word of truth in it, and, except under the pressure of extreme compulsion, we shall resist its adoption as long as we have the power.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I think the discussion which has taken place has made it pretty clear that, in introducing this clause for the amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland, their only intention has been to relegate the trial of indictable offences to a particular class of jurymen. I think that the 1st clause of the Bill might have been looked upon as an adequate preamble to the rest of the provisions. I fail to see why this preamble should have been held over until this clause was reached. In my view, the 2nd clause is a worse clause than the one we are now discussing; but it would seem that, in drafting the Bill, the Government have been naturally struck with the necessity of providing some means for justifying the extraordinary nature of the provisions of the Bill. Indeed, in the 1st clause, which deals with the preliminary inquiry, there are several phrases which are only consistent with such a genesis of this measure. The clauses themselves appear to have been mixed up by the draftsman in a higgledy-piggledy fashion, without any regard to connection. I propose, however, to deal with the matter as a lawyer ought to deal with the effect of the words which I understand to regulate the clause. If this, in the opinion of the Government, is a preamble which is a necessary and useful part of the clause—if they consider that it means anything at all—why did not they introduce it at the beginning of their Bill? In my view, this clause has been introduced in order to exclude Ulster from the operation of the measure. It is a matter of public scandal in Ireland that in Party trials in Ulster one side invariably gets off, while the other side is unjustly convicted. That is perfectly notorious, and is as much a part of the history of trials in Ireland as the alleged failure of trials for agrarian offences in other parts of Ireland. Even the Judges themselves have been compelled to confess that the trial of offenders in Ulster has been as complete a failure as the trial of agrarian offenders in the South and West of Ireland. Nevertheless, what do we find in this Bill? It is intended to confine the operation of the Bill to proclaimed districts, and the Government will not dare to proclaim Ulster. They have consequently excluded from the operation of the Bill one of the places where trial by jury has proved to be a failure. In the face of the notorious failure of prosecutions against Orangemen in Ulster, I fail to comprehend why these clauses should be confined to proclaimed districts. It only shows that the Government are not honest in their desire to remedy the evils which they declare to exist. I am afraid that they are actuated by something lower and more insidious than a desire to amend the Criminal Law, and that they have behind some object which is worthy only of Dublin Castle. Let me refer the Committee to the paragraph in the clause which commences at line 30, and which, in my opinion, proves the crafty and insidious character of this preamble. In that part of the clause permission is given to—

Mr. Edward Harrington

“The defendant, or any defendant, if more than one, in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time, to apply to the High Court to discharge or vary any such order for the removal of a trial, upon the ground that the trial can be more fairly and impartially had in a county other than the county named in the order of removal, and thereupon the High Court may order that the trial shall be had in that county in which it shall appear that the trial can be most fairly and impartially had.”

When an application of that nature comes to be discussed before the High Court, the Counsel for the prosecution will be able to quote the preamble as an expression of the opinion of the Legislature, and it will be quite sufficient to state certain things, and simply refer to the preamble, without giving anything like a reasonable amount of proof that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. I maintain that this clause is dishonestly intended to exclude Ulster, and that it is craftily drafted in order to prevent a defendant from obtaining a right to a change of venue, and to place him in the hands of his enemies. There is one class of people who are constantly tried in Ulster by juries with whom they have been historically for a large number of years at feud, and, undoubtedly, such prisoners are not able to obtain a fair and impartial trial. They are simply—to use the expression employed by a prisoner in an agrarian trial, “driven into the shambles.” I have read of an Irish speaking witness who in Ireland 200 years ago refused to attend a trial at Dungannon on the ground that if he was found in Court he was certain to be tried and executed the next day. That is the tradition and experience which certain classes of the Irish people have of trials in Ulster. They know that in the past they have been unable to obtain a fair trial there, and yet the Government provide them with no protection in the shape of securing a change of venue. If that is true of a large portion of Ulster, why are the victims of this unfair and impartial system of the administration of the law not to have the protection of a change of venue? Yet there is no particle of power of that kind given in this clause. If the Government say that there is a necessity for inserting this preamble, I contend that it should contain propositions which would be fair to both sides.

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The further we proceed with the Bill the more convinced I am of the correctness of the opinion I have already expressed in condemnation of the measure, that its introduction is a disgrace and an indignity to this House. Certainly the new preamble we have now under discussion is the worst specimen of all the worst characteristics of the measure which have yet come under our notice. My objection to this preamble, and the reason why I venture for a moment to trespass upon the attention of the Committee is, that it is improper to insert phrases in an Act of Parliament—which is generally presumed to be an embodiment of wisdom and of truth—which are utterly divested either of wisdom or of truth. We do not, of course, expect much wisdom from the Representatives of the Irish Government on the Treasury Bench, but we do expect more truth and honesty from them, than to thrust into the measure a preamble which bears on every line of it a lie. I think that it is time English Members should protest against the indignity which is placed upon them in being compelled to pass such a preamble into law. The absence of wisdom on the part of Her Majesty's Advisers is, I think, sufficiently indicated by the turmoil and the heat of this discussion which their absurdity has provoked. The Government, whatever they may say to the contrary, are the real obstructives to the progress of the Public Business of the country. This Bill is a measure to foster and promote obstruction, and they have introduced it because they know that if they had attempted any other legislative measure they would have been brought into conflict with those crutches—the Unionist Members, on whom they have now to depend for support. In my opinion this clause, and, indeed, the whole of the Bill, will be a direct provocation and instigation to violence and crime in Ireland, although I will not go so far as to say that it is a part of the policy of Her Majesty's Government to do whatever they can to drive the down-trodden and ignorant peasantry of Ireland into irregular and criminal courses. The Chief Secretary has never been able to justify the introduction of this Bill by anything better than anonymous anecdotes and idle tales, which have over and over again been contradicted and disproved. And yet he continues to repeat them in official papers, as if they had never been denied. His Unionist supporters do the same; and I took the liberty of assuring the electors of St. Austell that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) was down there to propagate his policy by repeating these false stories, and I am here to repeat the same charge. I merely mention this as a specimen of the dishonesty by which the proceedings of the Government in connection with this Bill are characterized. They do not hesitate, no matter what contradiction is advanced in this House, to reiterate their calumnies. There has been no proof alleged by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) this morning in justification of this preamble, which is directly levelled against hon. Members on this side of the House, and the people of Ireland generally. This preamble amounts to nothing more or less than an insult to the Irish nation, but it is all of a piece with the policy of Her Majesty's Government. We need not be surprised at anything Her Majesty's Government do. However irregular, and unconstitutional, and revolutionary their proceedings may be I should not be surprised. If we recollect the policy laid down by the Head of the Government last year, it is perfectly obvious this insult is deliberate and intentional; it is simply in pursuance of the declaration by the Marquess of Salisbury at the meeting at Her Majesty's Theatre last year, in which he compared the Irish people to a set of Hottentots. It is hardly worth while discussing whether a preamble is necessary and expedient or not. I think that verbiage of every kind, especially in an Act of Parliament, should be avoided. The less we have of unnecessary words in this Act of Parliament the better it will be for Her Majesty's Government; but if we must have a preamble at all, I think we have a right to ask that it should be put in its proper place, and I therefore suggest to Her Majesty's Government that it would be wise to postpone the discussion of this preamble until we can take it at the regular time—namely, when all the clauses have been gone through. That is not an unreasonable suggestion; because they have already postponed some important parts of their Bill until a more favourable opportunity arises for their discussion. Whether that opportunity will ever come remains to be seen. The Government only got through before the recent short holiday Section 2 of the Bill by means of throwing over the most important part of that section.

Mr. O'Doherty

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must address himself more directly to the Question. He is rambling about in a most extraordinary fashion.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will bow to your ruling at once, Mr. Courtney; but perhaps I may say I was only offering a suggestion and giving my reasons for it. If that suggestion is out of Order, I will offer another which, I hope, will not meet with your censure; and that is, that if the Government think it essential that we should have a preamble to this clause, the preamble should run somewhat differently from that they have placed before us. I think this would form a preamble quite as useful and much more truthful than the present, "Whereas the tyrannical Tory Government is bolstered up"—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is trifling with the Committee.

MR. CONYBEARE: Well, Mr. Courtney, as the preamble I was going to suggest is not one, apparently, that is likely to receive your sanction, I shall certainly not press it upon the Committee.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): There was once a distinguished statesman who said he was unable to draw an indictment against a whole nation. I do not know whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) regards that statesman with the respect which his name receives from others. I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman probably looks down upon him with that pretty air of simpering superiority with which it seems to me he is accustomed to survey mankind from China to Peru in general, and from Donegal to Cork in particular. I, however, cherish the deepest respect—respect which I hold in common with all intelligent men—for the name of Burke and the opinions of Burke, and I am not able to join with him in drawing an indictment against the whole Irish nation. I feel that incapability simply because no evidence has been brought before me to justify the indictment. If the Chief Secretary for Ireland insists upon making this general charge against the Irish people, I think, when challenged, he ought to have brought his evidence for the indictment. He has done nothing of the kind. I have listened here with great attention to these Irish debates, as attentively as any Member of this House, and I have heard nothing adduced in the way—I shall not say of convincing evidence—but of evidence at all, to justify such a general and sweeping charge as is contained in the preamble to this clause. We have received nothing from the Chief Secretary except his own personal assurance that he knows that there cannot be fair and impartial trials in Ireland, and that jurors are in danger of their lives, property, and business. But, Sir, we from Scotland have had some experience of general assertions from the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in matters of a similar nature. I shall not, because it is not strictly in Order, allude to them further than to say this—that having been in controversy with the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to the rapacity of landlords in the Western Islands of Scotland, and having received a categorical contradiction from him, I think that in face of the statement of the Skye Commission, in which it is proved that landlords have been exacting from their tenants rents from 100 to 120 per cent beyond the true value of their land, the right hon. Gentleman's personal assurances must come to me with a diminished power compared with what I might at one time have been disposed to regard them. If we are to have historical disquisitions inserted into this Bill, if we are to turn the Committee of the House of Commons into an historical association for the time being, our historical disquisitions should at all events be accurate, and we should have evidence produced and have an opportunity of discussing it. I have no desire to enter into any such discussion; I hold that the whole matter is irrelevant. The proposed insertion of a preamble of this description is altogether an excrescence upon the proper business of this Committee. We have nothing to do with it. We are here, not in the interests of scientific criticism or historical investigation, but simply in the interest of practical legislation, and we have enough to do with difficulties in that department without launching out into the mare magnum of large and undefined and irrelevant inquiry. The Government are involving us not merely in a matter of ordinary history, but in a matter of difficult and delicate scientific investigation, because in the way in which it is put the question is raised as a question of natural history rather than of civil history. The right hon. Gentleman refers to the peculiar constitution of the Irish nature; because his statement is one upon which there is proposed to be based an enactment for all time. His statement is not founded upon certain accidental peculiarities in Irish history, but upon certain permanent characteristics of the Irish nature. The proposition which the Chief Secretary seeks to establish really come to this—that there is something in the permanent nature of Irishmen which makes fair and impartial trials in that country impossible, and that continuously and for ever exposes jurors to danger to their lives, property, and business. Well, the evidence that I require to convince me of the truth of such a proposition is not simply a few narratives, or even a few historical facts, that may have been gleaned by the Chief Secretary, or by any Committee of this House who may have investigated the matter. We ought to have a special Committee of ethnologists empowered to call for persons, papers, and records. The whole matter, to my mind, is worse than ridiculous. I think there is not only a ridiculous side to it, but a tragic one; and I and others heartily join with the Representatives from Ireland when they resent this preamble as a wanton and deliberate insult to their nationality and to themselves. Nothing can be more insulting than to place a permanent record anywhere against the impartiality, and against the fairness and the order of a whole people. This preamble is insulting in the very last degree. I am afraid that possibly the fact that it is an insult is in the view of the Government a recommendation for it, because I have sat long enough in this House to see that the attitude—the mutual attitude—of the Irish nation and Dublin Castle is one which is unique in the history of civilized society. I require no further evidence than I get from what passes across the floor of this House to know that Dublin Castleism is an insolent and arrogant tyranny. I do not wonder at the spirit of resentment which often animates the Representatives from Ireland who sit on this side of the House, and which impels them to take action and make statements which possibly an absolute standard of abstract propriety would, even in their own minds, occasionally incline them to condemn. I can make every excuse for them when I see the provocation which they daily and hourly almost encounter from the evil spirit of Dublin Castleism. And here we have that spirit in what I may call its perfect embodiment. We have the flower, if there can be a flower proceeding from so degraded a stem—we have here the formal expression of the insolent and unauthorized tyranny which is the animating spirit of what I ventured to call Dublin Castleism. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) the other day declared that one of the chief causes of the so-called obstruction in this House was what he called the arrogant speeches that are made in this House by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I understand he further intimated that in his place in Parliament he would not scruple to make good the assertion he had made outside, from the fulfilment of which promise I expect a most edifying and interesting passage of arms between the two right hon. Gentlemen. I, in all seriousness, unite my voice to that of others who have spoken upon this matter in entreating the Government not to persevere in a course which can do no practical good, but which must lead to great practical mischief, and which I can only characterize, if persevered with, as puerile obstinacy indulging in a spiteful and indefensible malignity.

MR. CLANCOY (Dublin Co., N.): I think that after the challenge thrown out by my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) we should have some further reply from the Government. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Wallace) that the object of the Government in this preamble is to deliberately insult and exasperate the people of Ireland. There might have been a useful object in this preamble from their point of view if they could have answered the challenge of my hon. Friend (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), if they could have said that this preamble would add anything whatever to the Bill. As they have not answered the challenge, we are entitled to assume that the Bill is complete without this preamble. We are driven by necessity to the conclusion that the only object that they can have is to insult and exasperate and annoy the people of Ireland. We ought not, however, to be surprised at this attitude of the Government, because it is their habitual attitude in respect to the discussions upon this Bill. It might have been thought that upon minor points of this sort the Government would be inclined to give way to the united representation of the Representatives of Ireland. I feel no surprise that they have not acted on that principle—the principle of their existence is opposition to the Irish Representatives. That is the reason why they are seated on the opposite Bench—that is the reason why they are backed up by their friends the Liberal Unionists, and I shall be wholly surprised if, on any point at all, they yield to any representations made by the great majority of the Irish people. A good many reasons have been given why this preamble should be resisted; but my great objection to this preamble is that it is a lie. The words “for securing more fair and impartial trials” imply that trials in Ireland, especially for political and agrarian offences, have been fair and impartial in the past. If that be implied, all we can say is that the statement is an unfounded and notorious falsehood. Go back as far as you like, and it will be impossible to prove that any trial for political or agrarian crime in Ireland has been free from partiality. Undoubtedly this clause is needed to stereotype the practice of Dublin Castle in poisoning and polluting the fountains of Justice, and turning the Courts of Justice into shambles. The present preamble is one which contains an unfounded falsehood, and is intended to mislead and misrepresent the state of things in Ireland. That being the case,

I have no hesitation in opposing this preamble, and in continuing the discussion upon it until the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) chooses to put an end to it by the new method of getting rid of debate.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I can readily understand the object of this preamble when I read it in conjunction with the whole of the section. The powers given by the 4th clause must be exercised within the purview of this preamble, and the preamble lays down that it is necessary virtually to remove trials from one county to another for the purpose of—

“Securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business.”

Then the 4th clause goes on to enable the Attorney General to certify. The certificate will be virtually an insistence that the Court shall change the venue of the trial from one county to another. And now the real object of the preamble comes in, because when the section goes on to give an appeal from the order of the Court it throws upon the defendant the duty of moving that the trial can be had more fairly and impartially somewhere else, and on that appeal the Court will, no doubt, quote this preamble as a legislative declaration that the change of venue was absolutely necessary. If we go on to read the language of the latter portion of the section, we discover that once the Attorney General has shifted the trial out of the county in which it ought naturally to be held, even the High Court of Appeal will have no power, in the face of the words of the clause, to send the trial back to the original county. They can send a trial from one county to another, but they cannot send it back to the original county. This preamble lays down two things. The first is that the change of venue is necessary “for securing more fair and impartial trials;” and, secondly, that jurors in a proclaimed district are now subject to “danger to their lives, property, and business.” Although in the clause there is a great deal as to fair and impartial trials, there is little or nothing which deals with danger to lives, property, and business. I do not see the object of having such a preamble as this—of laying down a statement and then abandoning it. Therefore, for that reason alone I think the preamble ought not to be passed. In addition to that, I do not see why the preamble should be introduced in the middle of a Bill, when the Bill itself has no preamble whatever. If the preamble were in its usual place undoubtedly it would be subjected to long discussion. I cannot see that this preamble can have any really beneficial operation—the only operation which it can have is to tie the hands of the Court of Appeal.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): Mr. Courtney, it is unquestionably the duty of the Irish Members to protest against this gratuitous insult upon themselves and their country; and I think that in our protest we shall have the support of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who have acted with us hitherto in opposing this Coercion Bill, and to whom we, as Representatives of the Irish people, are indebted for their very strenuous endeavours to resist the coercion proposals of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) pointed out very properly the result which will flow from this preamble. He said that if the Government continue to persist in retaining this preamble there will be a certain waste of time of the Committee, and considerable exasperation of the Irish Representatives. I think he was justified by the result in making that remark. Even from the point of view of the Government, would not the clause be quite as effective if this preamble were omitted? The preamble will not add to the efficacy of the Bill, and it will not expedite the working of the Bill, while it conveys a most gratuitous insult to the people we represent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has said that, as far as he is concerned, it is not intended to offer an insult to the Irish people. Well, Sir, he makes that statement; but I think the action of Her Majesty's Government with regard to Ireland does not confirm the position the right hon. Gentleman has taken up. We, the Representatives of Ireland, say that this preamble does contain a great insult upon the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman contradicts that assertion; but I think it will be granted that we are more competent to speak for the Irish people than the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has no acquaintance with Ireland, and he does not take the proper means of obtaining such an acquaintance. In the course of this debate my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) complained of the right hon. Gentleman not making himself more acquainted with Ireland; perhaps it would be better if he would spend a little more time in Ireland. But, after all, I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman does not remain long in Ireland, because I imagine that living there must be a most disagreeable duty to him; living in Ireland must bring him face to face with the sickening scenes of barbarity that are perpetrated in that country, with the direct approval of his own Government. Though I disapprove of the rôle played by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and by the Government in this matter, I have a certain amount of pity for the right hon. Gentleman, because I recognize that he has undertaken a most impossible task.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. P. J. POWER: I will not pursue that line of argument, Mr. Courtney, as it meets with your disapproval. Now, this preamble sets forth that it is the intention of the framers of the Bill to lessen intimidation, and to get fair trials in Ireland. We maintain that there never has been intimidation practised towards jurors in Ireland when the ordinary law has prevailed in that country. I think the Blue Books presented to this House will prove that no intimidation has prevailed in Ireland in respect to jurors who conscientiously exercised their rights when the ordinary law has prevailed. Perhaps while the ordinary law has not prevailed, and while we have had exasperating Coercion Acts at work in our country there have been some cases of intimidation. It is necessary that the Committee should remember that cases of intimidation really do not occur while the ordinary law prevails, but only when the ordinary law is superseded by a Coercion Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Government wish us to go back to that state of extraordinary law of coercion when intimidation does prevail. I know the cases to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has alluded—they occurred under Coercion Acts which produced a state of things like the state of things which this Bill will produce. As pointed out by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the East Division of Edinburgh (Mr. Wallace), this preamble insults the Irish people, and insults them in the grossest possible way. It makes the assertion that not at one fixed period are the Irish people unfit to perform the duties of jurymen, but it makes the assertion that for all time hence they are incompetent to perform those duties. It makes the assertion that the Irish nation cannot be trusted on their oaths, and that if they are to be put into the jury-box they will commit perjury. These are some of the reasons which make it our duty to protest, while we are allowed, against the imposition of this further insult upon our people. The Government say they do not wish to insult or to outrage the feelings of the Irish people; but I think that their every-day action proves such is not the case. The Prime Minister never opens his mouth in public without insulting the Irish people in the grossest possible way. This preamble says it is the intention of the Government to obtain more fair and impartial trials than they can obtain under the existing law, and they want us to go back to a state of things that existed some four years ago. If hon. Gentlemen opposite wish to know how the jury system worked under the Crimes Act of 1882, I beg of them to read a speech delivered in this House during the Autumn Session of 1884 by the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke). The hon. and learned Gentleman made a really able speech in what is known as the Maamtrasna Debate, and he criticized the very modes adopted to procure convictions which his Government now wish to re-enact. He went into detail on this subject, and proved that the very system which his Government now wish to re-enact produced perjury and produced the very greatest miscarriages of justice. For these reasons, and for many others which have been urged by Members on this side of the House, it is our bounden duty to oppose the fresh insult which this preamble throws on our people; and in doing that we feel sure that we shall be supported by our Liberal Friends who have acted so loyally with us in withstanding other insults flung at our people.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Mr. Courtney, it is very seldom I get up in this House to congratulate Her Majesty's Government. However, upon the present occasion I must most sincerely congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for having, in the most gratuitous manner, offered a typical insult to the Irish people. It must strike the most superficial observer—and goodness knows there are superficial observers enough of this 1887 Coercion Act—it must strike the most superficial observer as extraordinary that this is the only clause in the Bill with a preamble. What is the object of this preamble? There is no preamble to the Bill. Then why have this insinuation—this series of insinuations—because we find there are three distinct insinuations brought forward in this preamble? Is it merely to try and make us more angry than sometimes we cannot help feeling? I defy anyone sitting on these Benches not to feel angry at the gratuitous insults which are poured upon the Irish nation and their Representatives. This is a mere wanton insult upon our people, and I sincerely hope that even yet the Chief Secretary, who has sat through this debate, will be led into the right path, and give up this silly emanation from what I must call a vacillating and feeble intellect. Now, this preamble is divided into three sections. First of all, it wants to amend the law relating to the place of trial; and, secondly, it seeks to secure more fair and impartial trials. I am persuaded the first portion of the preamble will not be acted upon in its integrity. You will see that in the case of offences committed in certain districts—say, in Kerry, Clare, and possibly in Tipperary and Connemara—the venue will be changed. Speaking as a Protestant, I affirm that in the cases of Catholics an endeavour will be made to secure trials by Protestant juries, by men who are inspired by the same description of dislike and hatred towards a section of the Irish people which distinguishes the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Catholics will be handed over to men who differ from them in religion and politics—handed over for execution, be that execution of the major or the minor degree.

[A laugh.] Well, if a man is hanged, that is execution in the major degree. I am perfectly certain, from what I have seen in connection with change of venue in the case of political offences, that this clause will be worked most improperly. To change the venue is practically to hand the people over to their enemies. Now, the second object of the clause is to secure more fair and impartial trials. If you take Catholic peasants from Connemara or Kerry to Dublin, to be tried by the same tradesmen in and about the suburbs of Dublin, and who, as a rule, are Protestants, instead of securing a more fair and impartial trial you will do exactly the reverse. When the second reading of the Bill was proposed we were treated to a series of anecdotes from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. When those anecdotes were analyzed the right hon. Gentleman had to retreat from the position he took up. No one made him retreat more precipitately than the midwife of Galway, whom the right hon. Gentleman has been afraid to face, for he has never gone over to Ireland since that highly intellectual lady has prepared a warm reception for him. The anecdotes are too trifling to obtain any credence from rational people. I sincerely hope that hon. Members opposite will see that practically this preamble is a stupid, silly, and foolish production, and that they will use their influence with Members of the Treasury Bench, who are responsible for its production, to get it withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): From time to time during the discussion of this Bill we have had what appears to be a bitter complaint from the Government Bench of the unnecessary consumption of time taken up in the consideration of these clauses. Now, it seems to me that the attitude of the Government with regard to the particular question before the Committee is proof positive of the absolute hollowness and insincerity—I will not say falseness—of the representations which have come from the Government Bench with regard to obstruction. There is no preamble to this Bill at all, large as is the scope and drastic as are the provisions of the Bill. As to this particular clause, it has been considered necessary, or a pretence of considering it necessary is made, to introduce a preamble which does not carry anything further than it would be carried without it—a preamble which has absolutely no affect whatsoever upon the Bill, and for the presence of which not one jot of justification has been adduced. If the preamble were omitted the clause would be equally strong, and the interpretation of the clause by any Judge would be equally simple. Moreover, the preamble is wantonly and gratuitously offensive, offensive in a very peculiar way. It alleges not merely that impartial trial cannot be had, but that the whole class of jurors in Ireland require protection in respect not only to their peace of mind, but to their property, their person, and their lives. To libel the whole people of a country in this gratuitous manner is a thing which is unparalleled in the drafting of a Bill. If anything in the way of a preamble were necessary in connection with this section, it ought to have been introduced in the beginning of this portion of the Bill, because a few lines further up you have the heading—"Special jury and removal of trial." That is where the preamble ought to have been brought in if necessary at all. But I merely rise to emphasize this particular view, which I challenge anyone to dispute or disprove, that the insistence of the Government on the retention of these words, which are offensive and unnecessary, is a signal exemplification of their old policy as carried out in connection with this Bill. They pretend they object to obstruction. They themselves have been obstructing for more than two hours to-day. What is the true policy of the Government? It is this—they want to see the time of the present Session consumed; they are glad to see the time of Parliament consumed as it is now being consumed over this particular Bill. Why? Because it does not suit them to have the Bill got out of the way. They are desirous that the whole Session should be taken up, because they are not themselves prepared to bring forward any other measure they can hope to carry. If this Bill is got out of the way, there is no other point of union between them and the so-called Liberal Unionists. That is the reason why we have seen the Government carrying on the gross and unjustifiable piece of obstruction that has been practised since the beginning of the present Sitting until now—10 minutes to 3 o'clock. I hope the country at large will realize the significance of the position the Government have taken up to-day, which has simply resulted in a profitless waste of half a Sitting, when the Sitting is limited, as it is on Wednesday. We have not had one single word of justification or of reason from the Government in explanation of their attitude. My explanation is this—and I challenge anyone to dispute it—the Government want the time of this Session of Parliament to be consumed over this Crimes Bill, because they are unable usefully to occupy the time of the House with any measure of their own which they can reasonably expect to pass. From time to time, to suit their own malignant policy, they think it necessary to make a show of irritation at what they are pleased to call obstruction. Their irritation is a mere pretence; it is a mere profession held out before the country in order to intensify the hostile feelings which prevail in this country in regard to Irish affairs. But the people of England, having now turned their attention to the matter in a manner they never did before, will be, I believe, able to appreciate the significance of the attitude of the Government, and the hollowness of the charges of obstruction which they make.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Mr. Courtney, I do not wish to stand between the Committee and a Division for more than a few moments. The Government are not in a position at the present moment to apply the cloture, but we are perfectly satisfied with the discussion which has taken place. We are still more satisfied with the contrast between the attitude of the Government in insisting upon unnecessary phraseology, and our attitude in bringing the debate to an earlier close than we may have been expected to do.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 116: Majority 64.—(Div. List, No. 199.) [3.10 P.M.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I desire now, Mr. Courtney, to move an Amendment which does not appear upon the Paper. It is to omit the two enacting paragraphs of the 1st sub-section of the clause. I move this Amendment for the purpose of raising a point again which I have already raised in the form of a Question. I asked yesterday the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) what necessity there was for this provision at all, and I drew his attention to a case which recently came before the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland—a case in which a man belonging to Kerry was charged with murder and returned for trial. He was an Emergency man, and it was said he could not get a fair trial in Kerry. An application was made to change the venue to Cork, and it was granted by the Court of Queen's Bench. I raised the point yesterday whether it was not the case that the power of the Queen's Bench was limited. I asked the right hon. Gentleman at the time, if the Courts of Law in Ireland had that power already, what was the object of this sub-section designed to give power that existed already? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that until the proper time came and the point was raised on the details of the Bill he could not give an explanation of the intentions of the Government in inserting this sub-section. He said he should show that in his view the powers the Courts of Law had at present were not sufficiently extensive, or that some obstacle existed in the way of their efficiently exercising their powers. Well, I now wish to obtain the explanation the right hon. and learned Gentleman said he would give of this proposal to introduce into an Act of Parliament, in the form of a new enactment, a provision which he says is already practically the existing law.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 19, to leave out the words "Where an indictment for a crime committed in a proclaimed district has been found against a defendant, or a defendant has been committed for trial for such crime."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Where' stand part of the Clause."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): There exists at the present time a machinery by which a change of venue can be brought about in certain cases at Common Law. The debate on the second reading went on that assumption, and I made that statement at the time to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell).

[Fourteenth Night.]

I pointed out that a Common Law case might be removed to the Queen's Bench; that when there an application might be made to enter upon the record a suggestion of change of venue; and that the record might thus be sent down to a particular place for trial. The complicated character of the machinery is such as to render it almost impossible to have a change of venue at Common Law under ordinary circumstances. The time which is consumed is considerable, and that alone is a great objection; accordingly, we find that both in English and Irish law the occasions on which this machinery has been put in motion have been very few. On some occasions the Crown has made application under the provisions of the Common Law in Ireland, with a view of having a change of venue; but it has not been successful more than once or twice. Now and then a change of venue has been allowed on the application of accused persons, because no resistance has been offered by the Crown—the Crown having come to the conclusion that in the interests of justice the application should be agreed to. In a murder case from Cork, I put it to hon. Members whether there would not be as much chance of getting a fair trial in Dublin as in Cork itself? [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, I have given the reason why the Government think it necessary to have the alteration in the law proposed in this Bill; and when we come to discuss the various Amendments to be moved to this clause we shall be able to show that, unless the complicated character of the existing machinery for bringing about a change of venue is considerably modified, it cannot be considered reasonably effectual for its purpose. We shall be able to show, generally, that the machinery which exists at the present time must be altered, and that there are other difficulties at present which render a free exercise of change of venue impossible. Such is our object in introducing this clause, and I trust that hon. Members opposite will be satisfied with this explanation, and will allow us to make progress with this section. I trust there will not be a long discussion on the question raised by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. M. Healy).

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I quite concur in the observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there should not be a long discussion; but he will permit me to say that on the subject before the Committee he has not been so argumentative as he usually is when answering questions from this side of the House. I failed to gather from his speech any reason for making a new legal provision for bringing about change of venue, having regard to the existing provisions of the law. The only tangible thing which I can find in his speech is that he says the procedure under the existing law is of a somewhat complicated character. I object as much as anyone to having a legal procedure in any case which is notoriously complicated; but if there is any class of case which would warrant complicated procedure, it is this case of changing the venue in which a prisoner is to be tried. If the scenes that were enacted under the Act of 1882 are to be repeated, and if unfortunate people from Connemara are to be brought up for trial, I, for my part, shall not regard it as of any advantage to disturb the safeguard which is at present thrown over the liberty of these people in the shape of the complex procedure which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has described. The obtaining of changes of venue will be facilitated by doing away with the complex machinery to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman will see for himself the difficulty of maintaining his position in this argument as to complex procedure. He must see perfectly well that no argument founded on considerations of that kind will be sufficient to warrant such an enactment as this we are discussing; therefore, he has hinted, and he has done more than hint, at some further difficulties of policy that stand in the way of the free exercise of the law as to change of venue. He has stated that, apart from this consideration of complex procedure, there are difficulties in the way of a free exercise of change of venue as it at present exists. I invite him to say what those difficulties are. I have referred him to a particular case. The only ground alleged for change of venue in that particular case was the fear that an impartial trial could not be had in the venue where the trial was originally to take place, and the Government have themselves alleged in this very clause that the ground on which they seek changes of venue under the machinery provided by this Act is because of the fear that impartial trials cannot be had. Is this allegation a sufficient ground for increasing the facilities for change of venue? Is this the difficulty which has to be added to that of complex procedure? The right hon. and learned Gentleman has stated that on a previous stage of this Bill he dwelt more fully on this matter. I regret that I had not the opportunity of hearing what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, for what he says is generally worth hearing; but I venture to say that if he did not, in reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), put forward any more reasons than those he has briefly mentioned to-day, I do not think he could have made out any ground for the introduction in this Bill of a change of venue. Our case is a simple one. The Government admit that under the existing law they have the power to change the venue—that is the case now made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He has not pointed out a single difficulty that exists in the free exercise of this power beyond this one difficulty, which he describes as complex procedure, but which I should describe as a series of obstacles most properly thrown in the way of this change of venue by the Courts of Law, in the discharge of their duty of protecting the liberty of the subject and of seeing that this extreme and extraordinary power is not used to oppress people by changing the venue from their own part of the country and cutting them off from their resources and from their districts, taking them to be tried by persons who are strangers to them in every point of view, differing from them in language, in religion, almost in nationality, and alien to them in thought and sympathy. I say the right hon. and learned Gentleman has failed to make out a case for this clause. He has failed to show that there is any ground for strengthening the present law. He has failed to show that the present law is defective, and on that ground I do not think the Government are justified in wantonly hampering and overloading the Bill with this provision.

Mr. Holmes

MR. HOLMES: You must have some power of changing venue, and I only repeat to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. M.

Healy) that unless an alteration is made in the law, it will, in practice, be impossible to obtain such a change in venue in many criminal cases where it may be desirable to exercise it. I regret that I am not able to answer questions put to me as clearly and as satisfactorily as the hon. Member (Mr. M. Healy) desires. So far as this point is concerned, however, it is admitted that we are not now to discuss the policy of the clause on the Amendment proposed. I would submit, therefore, that it will be to the interest of all parties for us to go to the consideration of some Amendment upon which there can be something like a profitable discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman need debase himself by saying that he is not able to give as clear and satisfactory answers as might be desired. For my own part, I think the answers we receive from him compare most favourably with the replies we receive from his right hon. Colleague, for he, at any rate, is always able to confine himself closely to the point, which other Ministers, as we have seen to-day, are unable to do. Why, Sir, do we raise this point which is now under discussion? It is a substantial point. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that no change of venue in a serious criminal case has ever been had; but he seems to forget that an Emergency man can get the change of venue with the greatest facility. The absurdity of the thing is that although Emergency men are able to obtain a change of venue when they desire it, we are not able to do so. Why should we not have the same privilege? I agree that it would not be reasonable to prolong this discussion; but, at the same time, it is necessary to point out that on no subsequent Amendment can the Committee discuss the particular point now raised. We have now had an answer from the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He always does manage to give us some answer, but from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary we get no answers at all—we hear from him nothing but verbiage. I would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I withdraw the Amendment; but, at the same time, I must say that I do not consider that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given me a satisfactory answer at all.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg, Sir, to move, in page 3, line 19, to amend the clause, by inserting, after "where," the words "after the passing of this Act." This Amendment comes, I think, with great force now that the Government have got the power to obtain special juries. In all the cases mentioned in the 4th section you can have a special jury, and you can send men for trial and have a choice of venue—in conspiracy cases, for instance, you can send men for trial to the County of Dublin. You can try men for conspiracy wherever any part of the conspiracy is supposed to have taken place, where, in fact, the least act of conspiracy is said to have taken place. In that particular case they have, I will venture to say, power to obtain that which, from their point of view, will be about the best special jury possible to select anywhere. I cannot even except the North of Ireland, for I think it would be difficult to get 12 men in that part of the country to combine in favour of anything that would injure the tenant right in their district. I do not think you could get them. But I will not occupy more time in moving the Amendment than what is necessary to enable me to call attention to this—that in all cases mentioned here which have already occurred where indictments have been granted, or the prisoners have been committed for trial, the Crown has deliberately chosen to put the venue in a particular place, and take the trial before common jurors. A section has been passed which enables them to change common jurors for special jurors. I think it a fair thing to say that the retrospective action of the clause should be limited in extent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland yesterday, in reply to a similar Motion, asked whether it was proposed that there was to be immunity for all offences committed before the passing of this Act. Nothing of the sort, Sir. The Government have a most tremendous machinery under the 3rd section for punishing everything of that kind, and in the 2nd clause they have a radical change in the method of trying the offences. I put it to every Member of the Committee whether the change made by the 2nd section, affecting trial by Stipendiary Magistrates, with limited power of punishment, is not a much less serious change in the procedure in the trial of a prisoner than while continuing the punishments that the Common Law metes out to particular offences, unmitigated in the slightest degree, to put a man on trial under a change of venue? The argument upon which a retrospective policy was condemned in regard to the 2nd clause applies with much greater force when we come to speak of change of venue.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 19, after "where," insert "after the passing of this Act."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): One of the main principles which has guided Her Majesty's Government in the preparation of this Bill has been the conviction that, for some time past, it has been impossible in certain parts of Ireland to get a fair trial. We may be right or we may be wrong in that opinion, but we have constantly maintained it; we advanced the argument on the first and second reading. The argument has been replied to, and the House has decided that our view must prevail. Assuming that we are right, and that for some time past it has been impossible to obtain fair trials in Ireland, it would be manifestly foolish and absurd on our part, having regard to the general character of the Bill, if we were to pass a provision to prevent the application of this clause—by which we hope to give fair trial—to the case of a crime committed to-morrow, or next week, or the week or the day before the Act comes into operation, and prevent the application of what we consider a fair trial to such crime. If there is any basis at all for the contention of the Government, you should not exclude from the operation of this Bill offences which we maintain are now going unpunished by reason of this difficulty of obtaining a fair trial. We ought to be able to avail ourselves of this clause in prosecuting any unpunished offenders for crimes recently committed, or persons who may commit crimes before the Bill becomes law.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The general policy adopted in passing

Mr. Maurice Healy

Bills in this House has always been not to make them retrospective. When you do make measures retrospective, it is desirable that you should have sufficient grounds for so doing. Assuming that the case the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers to were made out; assuming—which we do not admit—that the contention of the Government that it has been impossible to obtain fair trials in the past is well-founded, and that convictions have not been obtained where they ought to have been obtained, is it, I ask, advisable to make your Bill not a Bill for the prevention of crime, but one of vengeance? Is it advisable, I ask, to let a measure of this kind have about it a great deal of the spirit of revenge? In the answers given from the Front Bench opposite, in the course of the last week or two, we have heard that crime is diminishing in Ireland. The Government take glory for that as if it were their doing. They admit that crime is diminishing in Ireland. The object of all criminal measures is to prevent crime—the object of this Criminal Bill is to prevent crime—but if crime is diminishing in Ireland, that is still another why you should not make the re retrospective. It is lowering character of the Bill to make it retrospective. I put it on the ground of public policy—if you want to prevent crime, let the past be past. You will find that course of action of much greater assistance to you than that you propose. To deal with retrospective crime you ought to be satisfied with the existing procedure, instead of raking up the past after this Bill becomes law. It is because I think it bad policy to make this Bill retrospective, and not because I want to protect anyone who may deserve punishment, that I support this Amendment. I strongly maintain that it is extremely bad policy, wherever it can be avoided, to allow a Bill to deal with what has already happened.

MR. O'HANNE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland says it is impossible to have a fair trial in some parts of Ireland. I deny the accuracy of that statement; but even if it were a good reason, why does he—when his case is that it is impossible to obtain convictions in certain parts of Ireland, and in certain parts only—make this clause apply retrospectively to the whole of Ireland? Obviously the course he is taking is inconsistent. Some months ago the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Colleague attempted to get a conviction against my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and others for advocating the Plan of Campaign; and having failed in that conviction, although a jury of the County of Dublin was employed, and although care was taken that none but men of considerable substance got upon the jury, the right hon. and learned Gentleman now desires, under this clause, to have the power to send such a case, say, to the County of Antrim. I know the sort of jury you would get in the County of Antrim very well. Speaking to someone very well acquainted with the feeling in that county some time ago, I was assured that if we were taken to the County of Antrim for trial the jurors of that county would only be too anxious to hang us, whether they had evidence against us or not. Those are the sort of people to whose tender mercies the right hon. and learned Gentleman desires to have power to send Nationalist prisoners to for trial. I think the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman is inconsistent with the wording of this clause. The clause says—

“Where an indictment for a crime committed in a proclaimed district has been found against a defendant.”

If the only cases in which a change of venue is to take place are cases where crime has been committed in a proclaimed district, it is evident that you cannot properly give a retrospective action to this clause. I respectfully submit that crime committed in a proclaimed district is not crime committed in a district that is not now proclaimed. If that is so, it would seem as if this Amendment is not necessary at all. But in the discussion of the 1st and 2nd clauses we found that the words “committed in a proclaimed district” meant committed in a district that might afterwards be proclaimed. That interpretation seemed to me an abuse of the English language, and if the point were to be raised in an English Court of Law I have not the slightest doubt that that would be the view taken by the Judge. We should not trouble ourselves about it, because we should know that the monstrous construction put upon the words by the Treasury Bench would not be confirmed by the Court. But there is a great difference between Courts of Law in England and Ireland. There is a familiar likeness between the Courts of Law, and the individuals presiding in them, in Ireland now and those you had in England some 300 years ago. I have not the slightest doubt that in the Irish Courts the precise reading of this clause which we hear on the Treasury Bench will be held. It is that which has rendered it necessary to move this Amendment. The Amendment would have been perfectly unnecessary but for the lead given by the Treasury Bench to those who will have to administer this Act. I think this Amendment should be inserted in the Bill to show that the measure must be administered in Ireland as it would be in England or in any other civilized community.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The analysis of crime in Ireland for the past six months shows that the number of cases to which this clause could be applied must be exceedingly small. The number of prisoners at the Winter Assizes would have conferred on the Government a power practically analogous to that sought for in this section. It would have enabled them to take criminals from Munster to Cork, from Leinster to Dublin, and from Ulster to Belfast. Under that arrangement, the Government once a-year are enabled to change the venue of trials, and therefore we have practically a clear slate up to the last Winter Assizes in December last, and we are only concerned with offences committed since the last Winter Assizes, and these, owing to the almost complete absence of crime in Ireland, are few in number. The question of this clause being retrospective, therefore, is not of importance in regard to the number of cases that are likely to come under it; but the principle involved is a very serious matter, because, as my hon. Friend has said, it practically reverses the whole of the policy of previous legislation, which has been to make Acts of Parliament apply to cases arising after those Acts were passed, and not to anything of a retrospective character. Of course, the argument of the Government in reply to that is that this is a mere matter of procedure; that they create no new offences; and that it would be absurd to except from the operation of the improved procedure any offences, whether committed before the passing of the Act or not, and to prevent this improved procedure from being availed of for the purpose of bringing criminals to justice. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has very properly put the case of a crime that might be committed the week or even the very day before the passing of the Act. He says it would be absurd to rely on the old broken-down judiciary in Ireland for the prosecution of a person for such a crime; but that is not a fair argument; because, in the case of a crime committed just before the passing of the Act, they would not have to rely on the old broken-down judiciary. They have got, under Clause 3 of this Act, a most important qualification of the old machinery. They have got the power of empannelling a special jury in any particular case, and the Committee has already refused to declare that that power shall be restricted to offences committed subsequent to the passing of the Act. It is absurd to say, therefore, that in agreeing to this Amendment the Government would be relinquishing the power of punishing offences committed before the passing of the Act, or that in dealing with those offences they would be compelled to fall back upon the old procedure. I think that is a complete answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman upon that point. I think we are entitled to an answer from the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the point raised by my hon. and learned Friend. I think we ought to know whether it is intended to deal retrospectively with such cases as that in which my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) was concerned. One of the last of the cases which may occur prior to the passing of this Act is that of my hon. Friend, and unless this Amendment is accepted that case would unquestionably come within the powers granted by this clause. We want an answer from the Irish Government upon this point. Do they mean to use the powers of this clause to obtain against my hon. Friend a conviction which they were unable to obtain under the old law? They have announced that their policy will be to administer the Act so as to punish offences committed before the passing of the Act, and they would be within the lines of that policy if they proclaimed the County or the City of Dublin, and tried my hon. Friend under this clause. They would be within their rights in doing that; but I think all would agree with me that a fouler use of a judicial process could not be devised than to use the machinery placed in their hands by this clause in such a way. I do not think any fair-minded man will venture to suggest for a moment that such a use of this power of changing the venue would be a fair, or proper, or reasonable exercise of that power. That being so, I do think that my hon. Friend is quite justified in asking the Government to give us some declaration of their intention upon that point. Do they mean to so misuse and to abuse this power of changing the venue as to apply it to such a case as that of my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo? Do they mean to attempt, by hook or by crook, whether by this power of changing the venue or not, to obtain the conviction they were not able to obtain under the old law? Do they mean to send my hon. Friend down to Belfast, or to Down, or to send him off elsewhere, for trial before a special jury? I do think this is a most important point. From one point of view I say the Amendment is not of vital importance, because the number of cases it would affect are limited; but as regards this course of action generally it is of vital importance, and as regards the operation of the clause upon my hon. Friend it may be of vital importance. I do think we are entitled to some declaration from the Government as regards the class of case to which I have referred. We are entitled to know whether they do or do not intend to use this power against my hon. Friend.

Mr. Chance

MR. O'DOHERTY: Before we go to a Division upon this Amendment, I wish to point out that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) would give some answer on the point now raised he would probably save a discussion on the next Amendment. I rather intended to deal with that point on that Amendment. With your permission, Sir, I would say that if the words "after the passing of this Act" are inserted after the word "found," the two Amendments will be covered. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not fairly interpret what I put forward. He spoke of our wishing to give immunity to those offences committed between the passing of this Act and a week or a day prior to it. I spoke of treating offences under this clause so far back as the finding of a true bill by the Grand Jury, and I should not put such cases in the category of offences committed up to within a short period of the passing of the Act. I referred to cases where the Crown had taken proceedings, had gone to the Grand Jury, framed an indictment, and had, perhaps, failed before the petty jury. I mentioned that the Crown had a special jury to go to. The right hon. and learned Gentleman deals with the matter as though we want to prevent all retrospective action whatever under this clause. I only dealt with two particular cases. The action the Government can take now in respect of crimes committed before the passing of the Act will still be open to them. I only object to their taking action under this clause in regard to cases which they could deal with now, but which they will not deal with—in reference to which they are refraining from taking action until they have this Bill. I know they are waiting for this measure in some cases. I wish to save only cases in which the Crown have already taken proceedings; but in no way would the proposal save a man who has committed an offence between this and the passing of the Act.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 214: Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 200.) [4.10. P.M.]

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I wish now to move an Amendment, in line 19, after "where," to leave out to "or," in line 20, inclusive. My wish is to compel the prosecution to make a motion for it before they are allowed a change of venue. I contend that they should be required to make their motion to change the venue before they have gone to the Grand Jury and had an indictment found, even in the future. That, I think, is an altered aspect of the case. I admit that we have disposed of the question as to whether or not the clause is to be retrospective. It is to be retrospective; but I say that the Crown should be compelled to give justice to a defendant. If they want to change the venue, they should move for an order for such change before they take a man before the Grand Jury. They have no right to double the expense of the defendant, who may have prepared, and in all probability will have prepared, to meet his accusers in one place, and will have in the end to go to another place to be tried. Why should the Crown be allowed to obtain a change of venue after they have taken a prisoner before the Grand Jury? It seems to me it would involve great hardship if they are to be allowed to send a prisoner up for trial in one place, and then, when the trial has really been entered on there, send him elsewhere, after an application to the Court of Queen's Bench to change the venue.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 19, after the word "where," to leave out to the word "or," in line 20, inclusive.—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): So far as I can understand from the hon. Member, he says he moves the Amendment on the ground that if an indictment is found against a man, and after that the venue is changed, the prisoner will be put to a considerable amount of expense. In reply to the hon. Member, I would remind him that there is a clause in the Bill which provides for the payment of expenses. The costs that would be incurred by reason of the change of venue would be paid under that clause. The provision is similar to one in the Act of 1882.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I should like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a question upon this Amendment. I should like to know what opportunity will be allowed to a prisoner to appeal to the Court against a proposed change of venue from the town where he has made his arrangements to conduct his defence, and what time will be allowed him?

MR. HOLMES: It will be observed that it is provided in a subsequent part of the Bill that after an order is made to change the venue an application can be made to the Court within a prescribed period asking it to alter the decision.

Mr. O'Doherty

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): There is nothing in the first paragraph of the clause to describe the procedure. If there were, I should say the answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given is a good one. We think that cases of the kind which have been already described may arise. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may say that the decision on the last Amendment disposed of the question of the retrospective action of the clause, but take this case—a man is charged with murder, an investigation takes place before the magistrates and he is returned for trial. In the general run of cases there is a considerable interval between the time a man is returned for trial and the time an indictment is found. Is it not a monstrous thing that the Government—the Executive—having a long interval of that kind at their disposal, should deliberately wait until an indictment is found, and make their application for a change of venue at the last moment? The result of that would be to put a man to unnecessary expense, and possibly to prevent his getting those he knows and trusts in his own locality to defend him. A change of venue at the last moment might dislocate all his plans and preparations. That being so, are we not reasonable in asking that the Crown should not be allowed to wait until the last moment before making the application for change of venue? Are we not reasonable in asking that in, some form or other, some check shall be put on the Crown? If they make up their minds to put this clause in operation, should it not be done at some fixed time before the trial begins? I do not think anything more reasonable than that could be proposed, and I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has given a satisfactory answer to the point. Can any practical difficulty arise owing to giving a prisoner due notice of change of venue? I do not think so, but it seems to me that great difficulty may result from the defective manner in which this clause has been drafted. I do not see that there is anything in the clause which would prevent a Judge sitting under Her Majesty's Commission at Assizes from saying if he chooses I will go on with the trial. There is nothing in the section which will prevent a trial being delayed until a prisoner has had an opportunity of taking the decision of the Court as to whether the order for change of venue is right or not. Would it not be reasonable to insert in the clause some express Proviso that pending the trial of this motion—pending the hearing of this application for change of venue—the trial should not proceed? The right hon. and learned Gentleman may say it is absurd to suppose that any Judge would think of going on with a trial while a motion of that kind is pending; but strange things sometimes happen in Ireland, and for myself I have not complete confidence in what Irish Judges would do. At any rate, I desire that precautions should be taken against the discretion of the Judges. There should be some express Proviso preventing any miscarriage of justice inserted in the clause itself. We say that there is reason to think that if the Crown Counsel elected to make a change of venue, even on the morning of the trial, he would be able to do so. There is a final point which I wish to mention as regards the inconvenience that would result from the change of venue. What is there to protect the prisoner from the trial taking place at an unreasonable time after the venue has been changed? There is not a word in the clause to provide that any interval should elapse between the time when the change of venue is ordered and the time when the trial commences. We do ask that the prisoner should be protected in this respect. Some Proviso should be introduced to the effect that a reasonable interval should elapse between the order for the change of venue and the time at which the trial is to take place. The cases which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has referred to do not bear on this point. I think we ought to have some more satisfactory reply from the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has made a mistake in what he said with reference to the costs. I have looked through the 16th clause, and I think that, whilst it clearly provides for the expenses of the second trial, it in no way makes provision for the expenses incurred by the change of venue. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has admitted that these expenses ought to be provided for, but has said that they are provided for. Now, I point out to him that the expenses already incurred are not provided for. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will consent to make it perfectly clear that they will be provided for, I will withdraw not only this Amendment, but my other Amendments down to No. 6.

MR. HOLMES: What the Crown undertakes to pay is the additional cost incurred in consequence of the change of venue. They could not undertake to pay all costs, but only the additional costs that arise by reason of the change of venue. If we were to pay the costs of what have been called the abortive proceedings, we should be going further than we could be expected to go.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move the next Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy)—namely, in page 3, line 19, to leave out "a crime," and insert—

"Murder or manslaughter, attempt to murder, aggravated crime or violence against a person, arson, by statute or Common Law, or firing at or into a dwelling house."

This is an Amendment which follows the precedent of that moved yesterday on the previous clause, and it limits the classification to which this change of venue shall apply to a particular class of offences. Whatever ground the Government could urge for refusing to assent to such a proposal in respect of Clause 3, I think it would be very difficult to urge any reason which would be accepted by the Committee for refusing to agree to it now, because it simply applies to Sub-clause 1 of this section a definition which the Government have themselves declared to be proper and reasonable in the case of Sub-clause 2. The Government, in drawing Sub-clause 2, have expressed their view that the power to change the venue from Ireland to England should not apply, except in the particular classification described by the Amendment. Now, that being so, what possible reason can they urge for refusing to limit Sub-clause 1 to the same class of offences? I really think, Sir, that there will be some difficulty in replying to this argument. I could very well understand the Government to argue that in regard to both Sub-clause 1 and Sub-clause 2 the number of offences would be somewhat extended. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) suggested one offence yesterday which might, perhaps, be reasonably included in both sub-sections—namely, blowing up with dynamite. But we are not at present discussing whether a particular offence shall or shall not be included in the category, but whether it shall be limited to a particular class of offence. Now, if you admit that Sub-section 2 must be limited to a particular class of offence I think it follows that Sub-section 1 must also be so limited. No reason exists why you should extend the provisions of Sub-clause 1 one jot or tittle beyond the limits of Sub-clause 2. That is the reason why I press this Amendment. I have only to say in addition that I think the Government have acted very wisely in limiting Sub-clause 2 in the manner they have done. As I understand it, they have limited the sub-section to crimes of what I may describe as a non-political character, crimes that violate the moral law, and which shock persons, no matter what their political views may be. They have declared that it is a proper thing to limit Sub-clause 2 in this way, and that it is not reasonable or expedient that political offenders should be tried by being transferred from Ireland to England. If that be so, surely it is also reasonable and expedient that political offenders should not be transferred from one part of Ireland to another. It is not an improper thing to ask that the Government should not take powers to try political prisoners in Belfast, for instance. That would be a far more dangerous and improper venue than an English one. The principle on which the Government, as I understand, have proceeded in regard to Sub-clause 2 ought to be applied also to Sub-clause 1.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 19, to leave out the words "a crime," and insert the words "murder or manslaughter, attempt to murder, aggravated crime or violence against a person, arson, by statute or Common Law, or firing at or into a dwelling house."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a crime' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight):

Mr. Maurice Healy

I think I might almost appeal to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway as to whether it is necessary to repeat the discussion on this Amendment. The arguments brought forward in support of it yesterday are almost the same as those which could be used in its favour to-day. However, I will answer what the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) has said. The reason for limiting what he calls Sub-clause 2 really does not apply to Sub-clause 1. That which has been pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is really an exceptional matter. The change of venue from one county to another, both in England and Ireland, when it has been applied under the old procedure, has been applied to all indictable offences, and it is not necessary to alter that practice now.

MR. CHANOE (Kilkenny, S.): We are always ready to accept, if it be possible to do so, any suggestion from the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster), because he always states a case fairly; but we do feel it necessary to press this Amendment. I cannot conceive why the Government should decline to limit this particular sub-section to the same offences as those to which they limit Sub-section 2. I think I might appeal to the common sense of any Member of the Committee to say that the Old Bailey in London would be a far more impartial tribunal than a jury headed by Justice Lawson or Justice O'Brien. An English Court would probably be presided over by a Judge like Justice Stephen; and I would draw attention to the fact that when an Irishman, who was tried before Justice Stephen for a dynamite offence, and who was sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude, was asked whether he had anything to say as to why sentence should not be pronounced, he said he had to thank the Judge for the fair and impartial trial which had been accorded to him. I do not think that any such episode ever occurred in an Irish Court, and I do not think that any prisoner in Ireland could, with any sense of decency or fitness, thank an Irish Judge for the protection accorded to him. I would also remind the Committee of the feeling which exists in the North of Ireland. Prejudice has been created against us in the English Metropolis by the libels which have been circulated by the London Press. But judging from the conversations one hears in railway carriages, and so on, the people of London would be looked upon by us as angels compared with those in the North of Ireland. If, therefore, it is necessary to exclude from the constituents of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) in London the trial of certain offences, it would be necessary to exclude them also from jurors in the North of Ireland. This becomes doubly necessary when you have trials by jurors who would really be grand jurors. The position is this—you are sending to the jury men who, in addition to being landlords, are bitter anti-Nationalists, and whose every verdict may put money into their own pockets. I cannot see how the Government, having applied this limitation to Sub-section 2, can now refuse to apply it to the 1st sub-section.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 130: Majority 101.—(Div. List, No. 201.) [4.45 P.M.]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.), in moving as an Amendment, in page 3, line 20, to leave out the words "or a defendant has been committed for trial for such crime," said, that he thought it was only reasonable that an indictment should be found against a defendant in the locality where the crime was said to have been committed before there was a change of venue. It seemed to him that defendants were at least entitled to that protection, and he hoped therefore that the Government would accede to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 20, to leave out the words "or a defendant has been committed for trial for such crime."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I agree that an indictment may, in some cases, be found before there is a change of venue; but the adoption of this Amendment would necessitate the finding of an indictment in all cases in the county where the offence was committed, and to that I could not consent.

VOL. CCOXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: The observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would apply equally to cases where the change of venue is from Ireland to England, as to cases where the change of venue is from one county in Ireland to another. I must say I think that if men are to be brought for trial from Ireland to England, the least guarantee we can have for the fairness of such a proceeding is, that the indictment should be first found by an Irish Grand Jury. I would ask the Government whether they intend, in the case of English trials, that Grand Juries shall find the bills in Ireland?

No reply being given to the question,

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.), in moving as an Amendment in page 3, line 22, after "Assize," to insert "other than a Winter Assize," said: The Government have already the power to change the venue, for the purposes of the Winter Assizes, to any town in the same province wherein the crime was committed. In the exercise of that power they have, for the convenience of the counsel engaged in the cases, brought unfortunate people, together with the witnesses to be called on these trials, from Waterford to Dublin, a distance of 200 miles. Having got this extraordinary power to change the venue at the Winter Assizes, what more do you want? You can hold the Winter Assizes in any county of a province that you please; and, being able to do that already, it seems quite unnecessary, even for your own purposes, to take the additional power which this clause would confer upon the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 22, after the word "Assize," to insert the words "other than a Winter Assize."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The power proposed to be conferred upon the Government by this clause as it now stands is necessary, because it might happen that the town fixed upon for holding the Winter Assizes is peculiarly unsuitable for the trial of a particular case. Belfast, for instance, might be the town for the Winter Assize; and not only has the hon. and learned Gentleman himself said that particular cases should not be allowed to remain for trial in Belfast; but I, myself, have said that if I had had the power to prevent it, I would not have allowed a particular case to have been tried in Belfast. The same thing may be said as to the trial of particular cases in the county of Tyrone and other counties. As there may thus be cases in which it is not desirable that trials should take place at the Winter Assize town appointed for a province I must resist the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There are two ways in which the difficulty raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman may be met. One is not to make Belfast a Winter Assize town, and the other is that if you do make it a Winter Assize town, and it is undesirable to try a particular case there, you should then postpone the trial of that case to the ordinary gaol delivery in the spring. Or you might before December obtain an order for a change of venue from the Queen's Bench Division, and then you will not be troubled by the provisions of the law with respect to the Winter Assizes and gaol delivery. I would submit with confidence to any Tory Member opposite that if you group the five counties of a particular province into one county for the purposes of a Winter Assize, that gives you all the change of venue you want. I ask, therefore, why is this further provision for a change of venue wanted? The reply is, that there may be some cases which might not be properly triable in a particular county. To that I answer—"Why, then, try them in that county?"

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The very case to which the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has referred is in direct contravention of his argument against this Amendment. He evidently alluded to the case of the Walkers, when he said that if it had been in his power he would not have had them tried at Belfast. But they were, in fact, tried at Armagh, and not at Belfast. Moreover, they were tried at the Spring Assizes, and it was because they were tried at the Spring, and not at the Winter Assizes that there was not the power to change the venue. Now, what does the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean? He means this—that the Government contemplate a state of things arising in Ireland under which such will be the state of turmoil and excitement—that in a whole province there will not be a single spot where it will be safe to try a prisoner. That is what the argument of the Government comes to. Therefore, it amounts to this—that the Government have so little confidence, even in their special jury system and their right of unlimited "stand-by," that they now declare they anticipate a state of things will arise in Ireland under which they cannot rely on being able to try prisoners in any county of the province in which the offence is said to have been committed. Instead of limiting their Bill to what, from their point of view, may be its legitimate objects, they are, in fact, seeking to extend it to all cases.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 230: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 202.) [5.10 P.M.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork), in moving as an Amendment, in page 3, line 23, after "county" to leave out the words "or borough," said, the clause as it stands is without meaning; it is even nonsensical. In the boroughs of Ireland there never has arisen the smallest necessity for a change of venue. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite will, I am sure, bear me out in this—that from time out of mind, whatever may have been the state of things in the counties of Ireland, there has always been the greatest peace and quietness in the boroughs. In a great number of cases during recent years the Judges in boroughs have been presented with white gloves, in consequence of there being no prisoners for them to try. I am sure that if we had a list of the instances in which this has occurred the Committee would be astonished at the small amount of crime or disorder which has existed in these boroughs. That being so, and such being the state of things existing in the case of the Irish boroughs, what is the necessity for branding these places, which are always so free from crime, with this disgraceful imputation—that the Crown cannot trust their juries to do justice in criminal cases. Or, why should the Government say that they find it necessary to have a change of venue in order to get a fair trial? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will not deny the facts I have stated; nor will he contest this further fact, that the Executive Government of Ireland have such a high opinion of, and so much confidence in, the jurors of Irish boroughs, that they always resort to those boroughs when they want to get an impartial trial. It is one of the constant complaints of the jurors of the City of Cork, that while the Winter Assizes Act enables the Government to fix trials where they choose, they have invariably selected the jurors of the City of Cork for discharging the functions of jurors for the whole province of Munster. They have, in fact, transferred to the jurors of Cork the criminal work of the whole of Munster at the Winter Assizes. That being the opinion which the Government entertain of these jurors, why should a slur be cast on them by saying that the Government think it necessary to ask Parliament for power to remove trials from boroughs. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman will have great difficulty in defending this provision, or in showing that there is any reason for extending to boroughs the provisions which are applicable to counties. I must say, however, that I have placed this Amendment on the Paper without any great anticipation of its being agreed to; for the attitude which the Government have assumed seems to render it very improbable that they will assent to any Amendment proposed from this quarter of the Committee. But, as the Representative of an important Irish Borough, I did not think it right to let the occasion pass without protesting against the imputation cast on the boroughs of Ireland.

Mr. Holmes

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 23, to leave out the words, "or Borough."
—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or Borough' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Holmes) (Dublin University): I admit that what the hon. Member has said about the jurors in boroughs is generally true. He has said that in his experience he has never known of any necessity arising for a change of venue from boroughs. But I can tell him of a case within the last 10 months in which it was desirable to have a change of venue from a borough. I allude to the case of the Borough of Belfast. There was extreme excitement there within the period I have named; and I was told by the Crown Solicitor that it was impossible to get convictions in certain cases. I should have been very glad if the power to change the venue given by this clause had then existed, and could then have been used with reference to the borough of Belfast. Under these circumstances, I cannot assent to the Amendment; but must adhere to the present provisions of the Bill.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I maintain that there is no necessity for this provision. In the case of Quarter Sessions, it is always in the power of the Crown to say—"We won't prosecute at Quarter Sessions. We will have the case sent to the Assizes;" and when this is done, the County Court Judge always sends the case to the Assizes. But, if he were to refuse to accede to the application of the Crown Solicitor, the Attorney General can enter a nolle prosequi, have the case reheard, and have it sent either to the Winter or other Assizes. The case cited by the Attorney General for Ireland as an argument against me is an argument in my favour. If he thinks that a Borough Court of Quarter Sessions is not a proper tribunal for the trial of any case, let him give directions to his subordinates that such a case should be sent to the Assizes, and tried there.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 111: Majority 104.—(Div. List, No. 203.) [5.30 P.M.]

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 38.]

(Mr. William McDonald, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Chance, Mr. Clancy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to ask if the Government have any objection to the second reading of this Bill being taken, not now, but at an early date, with a view to the probability of the Government Bill on the same subject not being brought on, or not being taken up in time to be passed this Session. The Act of 1880 will expire at the end of this year, or at the end of the then next Session of Parliament. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that some Act on the subject should be passed—[“Order, order!”]—I am only making an inquiry as to the intentions of the Government. This Bill is founded on the lines—[“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the Bill.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I may say that this Bill was only circulated this morning. I have not yet had time to read it, and I cannot, therefore, say what course the Government will take with respect to it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Will the Government allow the Bill to be read a second time, if they find that they cannot proceed in the present Session with their own measure? [“Order, order!”]

[No reply.]

Second Reading deferred till Thursday 23rd June.

MOTION.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 8) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Borough of Burnley, the Urban Sanitary District of Folkestone, the Local Government District of Garw and Ogmere, the Rural Sanitary District of the Newport (Mon.) Union, and the Borough of Stafford, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 286.]

House adjourned at one minute before Six o'clock.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 9th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) (43), discharged.

Third Reading—Hyde Park Corner (New Streets)* (79), and passed.

SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

(NO. 43.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL said, he had been requested by the Government to postpone the Committee stage of the Bill, and of course he had no alternative but to comply with that request. The Bill was read a second time on the 9th of May, the Committee was then put off to this day at the request of the Government, and now a further postponement was asked for. The Government having assented to the second reading, he had no right to assume that they were in the least opposed to the objects of the Bill, and it was only a question of the way and the machinery by which those objects should be attained.

EARL BROWNLOW said, that on the part of the Government he had to thank the noble Lord. The fact was the Bill dealt with a matter of great importance, and, having quite lately assumed the responsibility of representing the Home Office in that House, he had to ask the noble Lord in charge of the Bill to give him a little time to master the facts of the case and the questions that were involved.

Order discharged; House to be in Committee on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 9th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—*Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts Amendment [270].

Committee—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [217] [Fifteenth Night].—R.P.

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment * [225]; Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2) [176], and passed.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Report—Water * [250]; Local Government (No. 2) * [261]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 3) * [260]; Local Government (Gas) * [259].

QUESTIONS.

NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES — CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES —THE FISHERY DISPUTES—A NEW COMMISSION.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made towards a settlement of the Anglo-American Fisheries disputes since the despatch of the Marquess of Salisbury's proposals of the 24th March; whether it is correct, as reported in The Times of Saturday last, that the Canadian Government has, on the advice of the Imperial Government, agreed to propose the appointment of a new Fishery Commission, to meet a Commission to be appointed by the United States; and, whether, in the event of such an arrangement being arrived at, it is intended that the Imperial Government shall be represented by Special Commissioners?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No reply has been received to the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, and it would be premature to announce what course may be taken.

MR. GOURLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the latter part of his Question.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have received no information which would enable them to say whether the statement is correct.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND) — MISCONDUCT OF AN "EMERGENCY MAN."

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.), asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any affidavits to sustain the allegation that an emergency man named Denis Lynch, engaged at the eviction of a tenant named Barrett, at Monkstown, County Cork, while under the influence of drink, presented a revolver at a number of women in Barrett's house, though no resistance was being offered to the eviction; and, if so, what steps the Executive will order in the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, he had received affidavits on this subject since answering a Question previously put by the hon. Member. As regarded the concluding portion of the Question, he had nothing to add to the reply he gave the hon. Member before.

MR. HOOPER: Does the right hon. and gallant Gentleman remember stating in this House, three weeks since, that the police could find no information to justify these allegations, though it is stated in one of the affidavits made by the tenant's wife that she informed the Head Constable that the man was guilty of this conduct, and that she was able to substantiate these charges on oath? Under these circumstances, will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman warn his subordinates not to deceive this House by giving false information in these matters?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the answer he gave on a previous occasion was that the proper course for the parties who were aggrieved to pursue was to proceed by warrant.

MR. HOOPER: If the Head Constable was aware that the woman had stated that this man was guilty of this conduct, was it not his duty to suggest the proper course for the woman to pursue?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was not aware whether the Head-Constable did so or not; but it was no part of their duty to give advice on such matters.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—GLEBE LAND PURCHASERS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the Land Commission in Ireland has lately instituted proceedings for arrears against several of the glebe land purchasers; and, whether, if so, he will cause these proceedings to be suspended until the Government are in a position to state what measure they intend to introduce for the relief of these men?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: It is the fact that the Land Commissioners have been obliged to commence proceedings for the recovery of arrears due by certain glebe purchasers. The Government are extremely anxious not to press unduly upon such purchasers in hard cases; but they can hold out no hope of any remission of the debt due to the State. The subject of the glebe purchasers is under consideration; and the Government will be prepared to make a statement with regard to it by the time when the Irish Land Law Bill, now being considered in "another place," is introduced into this House.

MR. DILLON said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not answer the point of his Question, which was this—proceedings were now in progress against certain of these glebe purchasers, piling costs upon them, and threatening them with evictions for sums which they were not able to pay; and what he wanted to know was, whether the Government would not consider the desirability of suspending these proceedings until such time as they were placed in possession of the measures of relief?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the action of the Land Commissioners must, of course, be guided by the circumstances of each case. In hard cases they will, no doubt, suspend proceedings, so far as they justly can, pending the promised statement of the Government.

GREENWICH PARK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he will state the total area of Greenwich Park; from how much of the Park the public are excluded, and for what purposes; whether any individual makes any profit from any of such parts of the Park; and, whether he will state the quantity of land used with the Ranger's House; by whom the land is actually held; and under what conditions as tenant or otherwise?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The total area of Greenwich Park is 185 acres and 24 perches. The public are excluded from 1 acre 3 roods 29 perches, occupied by the Royal Observatory; 15 acres 2 roods 1 perch of deer enclosure; 1 acre 2 roods 18 perches of nursery gardens; and 3 roods 25 perches for the reservoir. Besides these, there is the Ranger's lodge and the grounds attached to it, 16 acres and 28 perches. This is held by Lady Mayo, widow of the late Earl of Mayo, as a "grace and favour" residence. No individual makes any profit on any part of the Park.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether any portion of the last mentioned 16 acres was sub-let? He was informed that this was the case.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not think that was the case; but he would make inquiries into the subject.

HARBOUR LOANS—MEMORANDUM OF BOARD OF TRADE, 1886.

MR. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay upon the Table of the House Board of Trade Memorandum of 5th March, 1886, also Letter of 19th of same month, referred to in Treasury Minute of 4th May, on Harbour Loans, recently presented to the House, and any correspondence with Board of Trade respecting said Minute?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I will consult the Board of Trade, and if they do not object, I shall not oppose a Motion for a Return of the Memorandum of March 5, 1886, and of the Board of Trade Letter to the Treasury of the 19th of the same month; but as the recent Treasury Minute about Harbour Loans embodied the results of a conference between the various Departments concerned, I see no object in laying subsequent correspondence on the Table of the House.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, his point was whether the Board of Trade did not think that the collateral security asked by the Treasury should be dispensed with in certain cases?

MR. JACKSON said, he thought the hon. Member would find the Board of Trade's view expressed in a letter which he had evidently full knowledge of, and which was referred to as the letter of the 19th of March.

CEYLON—DOCK ACCOMMODATION AT COLOMBO.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government, in considering the question of dock accommodation in Indian waters, have received any Reports on the capabilities of the Colombo Harbour for the construction of docks suitable for the largest ironclads; whether the central position of Colombo for vessels from all parts of the Indian seas, together with the completion of the Colombo Breakwater, and the recent vote by the Ceylon Legislature of a sum of money for the defences of the port, have been considered in reference to this question; and, whether Her Majesty's Government would be disposed to grant a subsidy, or afford any other encouragement to a Company providing the funds for such a purpose?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): A Report has been received by Her Majesty's Government from Sir James Cooke, who designed the Colombo Breakwater, as to the special suitability of constructing a graving dock fit to receive Her Majesty's ships at Colombo. For this purpose it is considered highly desirable that the harbour should be completed by the construction of a northern arm, which has for the present been postponed. The new defences about to be constructed at Colombo have not been decided on with reference to the proposed graving dock; but will, of course, be of advantage to that project. An offer, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, to aid in the construction of the graving dock was referred to the Governor of Ceylon last November, and was communicated by the Governor at the end of December to the Colombo Chamber of Commerce, but nothing further has been done in the matter at present; and my Predecessor, writing in January last, told the Governor that, while still awaiting a reply to the despatch of November, he considered that the question of the completion of harbour works and the construction of a graving dock must be postponed till the Colonial Revenue could better afford this and other public works. Pending the receipt of a reply from the Governor, I can express no opinion as to whether the proposed scheme can be entrusted to a private Company; but, in such case, no guarantee could be given by the Colonial Government.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) INQUIRY COMMISSION, 1887—COMPOUND RATING OF OCCUPIERS.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in the Report of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Inquiry Commission, 1887, page 12:—

"It might be supposed that in these congested districts the majority of the occupiers are rated under £4, and are not liable, therefore, for the payment of poor rates. It was stated in evidence, however, that a custom prevails in some of these western unions of joining together a certain number of small occupiers, valued severally under £4, as tenant 'in Co.' on the rent roll. Thus, although they occupy distinct holdings, the aggregate value of the 'Co.' tenancy is raised to above £4, and the landlord is able to evade his liability for the entire of the poor rate which he would have to pay if the ratings were separate. We found other cases, noticeably on the property of Lord Sligo, where no reduction in respect of poor rates was allowed in the rent to tenants above £4, and where the tenants valued below that amount were also obliged to pay all rates. This arrangement appears to be opposed to the principle of the Act of Parliament; and, although it is a fact that in some cases the rent has been reduced by the Land Commissioners in consequence, still, as rates have a tendency to rise in these years of depression, it is likely that the tenant, whose rent was reduced some years ago, will bear an undue share of public taxation."

and, whether the Government propose to take any steps with a view of protecting the tenants from these alleged contraventions of law by certain landlords?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): As my attention has been particularly called to this matter, the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer it.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS: I would remind the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Chief Secretary stated that when any question of policy arose he would himself answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! Colonel King-Harman.

Several Irish Members (to Mr. J. E. Ellis): Go on.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS: Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Colonel KING-HARMAN: Where tenants in Ireland are rated under £4 the landlord cannot throw upon them the obligation of paying any portion of the poor rates, and if the landlord on any pretext attempts to contravene this provision, I am advised that the existing law is sufficient to protect the tenants; nor can the landlord evade his legal obligation by joining together a number of occupiers who are rated severally under £4.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was not aware that in Glenbeigh and other places the landlords had most shamefully evaded their legal obligations in this respect?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was not aware that any such charge was made in the case of Glenbeigh. He was only aware of its having been made with regard to Galway, and, he believed, in some parts of County Mayo. He never heard of the matter before with regard to Glenbeigh; but he would inquire, and give the hon. Gentleman what information he could obtain.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) inquired, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was not aware that the practice prevailed on the estates of Lord Bantry, Mr. Rowland Winn, and on several other estates in the South of Ireland; and, whether, as a landlord, he (Colonel King-Harman) did not know as a fact that the practice was common in Ireland?

MR. CONYBEARE asked the Attorney General for Ireland, whether there were no means of bringing these landlords to justice, if it could be proved that they had been guilty of these illegal acts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) replied that if the hon. Member would put him in possession of any circumstances which he thought would be a foundation for legal action, he would very carefully consider the statement put before him and would give an answer upon it; but he certainly could not answer an abstract question of this kind, of which no Notice had been given.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) asked, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be good enough to look over the records of the Local Government Board, and to see the Report which was made before the Commissioners in the case of—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—THE EVICTIONS AT BODYKE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the descriptions in The Pall Mall Gazette of the evictions at Bodyke, and in particular to the statement that one of the bailiffs more than once threw his crowbar through an opening made in the walls of the houses, regardless of the fact that there were women and children inside; whether these men are men of respectable character; or, if not, whether they are in any, and how many, cases convicts or ex-convicts who have been in prison for various crimes; whether these men are employed by the Sheriffs or by the landlords' agents; and, whether, in any case, he will order that they shall be kept under more effective control, in order to prevent murder from being added to the other horrors of the evictions?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: I have been unable to obtain the information necessary to answer this Question, owing to the short Notice given.

MR. CONYBEARE: I shall repeat the Question, and I desire to put it to the Chief Secretary, and not to the Under Secretary.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION 1882—THE EAST COAST DRIFT NET FISHERIES.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further communication has been received from the Belgian Government relative to the enforcement of the provisions of the North Sea Fisheries Convention of 1882, with the view of preventing a recurrence of the depredations on the East Coast Drift Net Fisheries; and, if not, whether he will direct Her Majesty's Representative at Brussels to urge the Belgian Government to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government, in order to give effect to the suggestions contained in the recommendations of the Committee appointed by the President of the Board of Trade in December last?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with that of Belgium on the subject ever since the Report of the Board of Trade

Colonel King-Harman

Committee has been received. The Belgian Government have cordially entertained suggestions for the better prevention of infringements of the Convention; and Her Majesty's Government will not fail to support the chief recommendations of the Committee.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—ARTERIAL DRAINAGE—THE BARROW VALLEY AND THE BANN DRAINAGE)—THE SUBVENTION OF £50,000.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government have yet decided as to the particular mode in which the £50,000 proposed to be taken for public works in Ireland is to be expended; and, whether, in view of the immense damage annually caused by floods in the valley of the Barrow, in insalubrity induced thereby, the impossibility of properly draining such places at Portarlinton, and other centres of population, and the strong representations made by a series of Commissions and other authorities on the subject, he will cause arrangements to be forthwith made for carrying out a general scheme for dealing with the main channel of the Barrow, from Mountmellick to Carlow, in the present summer?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) also asked the right hon. Gentleman, with reference to the disposal of the £50,000 to be given to Irish works, and to his statement that the Government would at once direct the necessary surveys to be made, in order to enable them to decide how far they could carry out the recommendations of the Irish Public Works Commission in regard to arterial drainage. Is he aware that two Government surveys have been made as to the Bann drainage, that two Royal Commissions have reported in favour of the work, and is it intended to make a third survey of the Bann now?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor), the greater portion of the £50,000 will be devoted to the development of arterial drainage in Ireland. It is the intention of the Government to undertake at once the surveys recommended by the Royal Commission as a preliminary to the establishment of Conservancy Boards and the execution and maintenance of drainage works in the several river basins. In addition to this, we shall proceed with the execution of such works upon the rivers specially mentioned in the Reference to the Royal Commission, and of which the Barrow is one, as can be carried out without legislation, pending the introduction of a measure giving effect to the principal recommendations of the Commission next Session. In the present state of Business it would be impracticable to legislate on the subject this year; but the Government are in communication with the Royal Commissioners, who are at present in Ireland; and I can assure the hon. Member that there will be no delay in commencing such operations as can be undertaken with our present powers, and, in the opinion of the Commissioners, can be advantageously executed in the present year. As it seems unlikely that the whole £50,000 can be devoted to drainage works during the year, we propose to spend about £1,000 on works on the West Coast, commenced or contemplated by the Piers and Roads Commissioners appointed under the Relief Act of last year. A sum of £5,000 will also be devoted to promoting the improvement of the breed of cattle and horses in Ireland, which is seriously deteriorating; and the Government will avail themselves of the agency of the Royal Dublin Society in giving effect to that purpose. With reference to the Question of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), the shortness of the Notice has prevented my consulting the Royal Commissioners, on whose Report we are acting in instituting the proposed survey, with regard to it. The Government accept the opinion of the Royal Commission as to the desirability of further drainage operations on the Bann, and the nature of the work to be undertaken. The real difficulty in the case of the Bann lies in the variety of authorities whose concurrence is necessary, and in passing the requisite legislation. In any case, however, it will be necessary to prepare a detailed scheme for carrying out the plans of the Commissioners before work can be begun. The principal object of the proposed surveys is the delimitation of the catchment basins of the several rivers, with the view to the establishment of Conservancy Boards.

This will be necessary in the case of the Bann, as in that of other rivers.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman could state how much of the £50,000 would be spent on the drainage of the Bann?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was not at present in a position to give the information asked for. He expected a reply from the Commissioners, and as soon as he received it he would communicate with the hon. and learned Member, and let him know the precise amount which would be expended on the drainage of the Bann.

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.) wished to know if any, and how much, of the £50,000 would be appropriated to the improvement of harbour accommodation in Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN said, it was not contemplated to devote any of the money to this purpose, except a portion of the £4,000, which it is proposed to devote to certain piers, roads, and harbours on the West Coast.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN CAMPAIGN, 1885—THE KHEDIVE'S BRONZE STAR.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the British and Indian Troops, and the New South Wales Volunteers, employed in the Soudan in 1885, will receive the Khedive's bronze star for their services?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): Her Majesty has approved of all the troops (including the Indian Contingent and the New South Wales Volunteers) who have received medals for service in the Soudan in 1884, 1885 and 1886 wearing the bronze star which His Highness the Khedive is about to confer.

THE MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES) — LORDS LIEUTENANT OF COUNTIES.

MR. J. ROBERTS (Flint, &c.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government have power through the Lord Chancellor or otherwise if they think fit, to place gentlemen on the Commission of the Peace for Counties, independently of the action of the Lord Lieutenant of the county?

Mr. Goschen

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The power of placing gentlemen upon the Commission of the Peace is vested in the Lord Chancellor on behalf of the Crown. The ordinary course is for the Lord Chancellor to act upon the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, whose local knowledge and whose position as representative of the Crown in the county point him out as the fittest person to submit names to the Lord Chancellor for his approval.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1889.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What communications have taken place between the French and English Government in regard to the country taking part officially in the French Exhibition of 1889; and, whether he will lay these communications before the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I have already informed the House that the Correspondence will be laid upon the Table. It is in the printers' hands.

WAR OFFICE—TRANSFER OF LIEUTENANT GORDON TO THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in consequence of the transfer recently of Lieutenant Gordon from the Royal Marine Artillery to the Royal Engineers, Lieutenant Gordon now takes rank before the 193 officers who have obtained their commissions in the Royal Engineers since February, 1883; whether those 193 officers have each been placed one step lower in the corps of Royal Engineers as the result of that transfer; whether there is any precedent for such a transfer in such a manner to the corps; whether the transfer of Lieutenant Gordon was made with the assent of the Deputy Adjutant General Royal Engineers, and on the recommendation of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief; by what Minister, as Secretary for War, the transfer was approved; and, in what manner this transfer was legalized, in the absence of any provisions in the Royal Warrant permitting such a course to be pursued?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My answer to the first two Questions of my hon. Friend is yes. There is no precedent for such a transfer. It was made with the assent of the Deputy Adjutant General Royal Engineers, and on the recommendation of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. It was approved by my Predecessor and by myself. The grant of Army rank is legally a matter of Royal prerogative. But I may say generally that this case is entirely exceptional; and that the corps of Royal Engineers gladly welcome among them the nephew of so distinguished an officer as General Gordon.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—LONDON SCHOOL CHILDREN IN HYDE PARK.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether arrangements under the cognizance of Government are being made for securing the safety of the large number of London school children, amounting to many thousands, whom it is proposed to assemble by voluntary effort in Hyde Park for the Jubilee Celebration on the 21st June; and, if so, what will be the nature of the arrangements?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Commissioner of Police that he has received a communication from the Secretary to the Children's Jubilee Committee, and that the necessary police arrangements will accordingly be made, due regard being given to the fact of the assembly of so many young persons. His Royal Highness the Ranger and the Chief Commissioner are both members of the Committee, and are assisting with their advice.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—CIRCULAR OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camoerne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a letter, in the following form, has been issued to the Royal Constabulary in Ireland:—

"Circular.

"Royal Irish Constabulary Office,

"Dublin Castle, 14th May, 1887.

"Queen's Jubilee.

"The Inspector General has received applications from members of the Force in several counties for permission to raise a fund in celebration of the Queen's Jubilee. He has freely consented in such cases to subscriptions being raised, on the understanding that the officers or men should contribute as individuals, and that no person in authority should organise the effort. Although the Inspector General would not have felt warranted in moving in the matter himself, yet, as he has been applied to upon the subject, he thinks that it will probably meet the wishes of such members of the Force as desire to contribute to suggest a course by which their moneys should go to form a general Constabulary Fund rather than that it should be divided into a district or local fund. He would, with that view, propose that any subscriptions given by members of the Force should be forwarded through district officers to the County Inspectors, who could then send them to the Bank of Ireland, which has consented to act as treasurer for 'the Royal Irish Constabulary Jubilee Fund.' With the view of securing that the subscriptions should be perfectly voluntary, the Inspector General directs that no application whatever be made to either officers or men in the matter. In the event of the project being taken up by the Force, either generally or in a more or less extended manner, a committee of the subscribers could hereafter arrange details relative to the object to which the money might be devoted.

"A. Reed, Inspector General;"

whether the applications above referred to as having been received by the Inspector General have been made by the men, or merely by the officers of the Force, and how many such applications have been received; and, whether it is the fact that the district officers are requiring to have the names of the subscribers and the amounts given by each; and, if so, whether he will direct that the above Circular shall be acted upon strictly, and that no application whatever shall be made to either officers or men in the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: The Circular alluded to was issued by the Inspector General in consequence of representations which reached him at various times, both verbally and through the Press, and finally on application, on the subject made by two County Inspectors representing the officers and men of their counties. There does not appear to be any reason to doubt that the district officers will observe the instructions conveyed in the Circular. The Government see no necessity to give the direction suggested.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to lay before him a letter giving details of cases in which the instructions have been evaded, and will he take action upon it?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Certainly, if the hon. Member will send the letter to the Chief Secretary it shall be attended to.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Can the right hon. and gallant Gentleman explain how it was that the Chief Secretary stated on Tuesday that no such Circular was ever issued?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Certainly, Sir; the Question asked by the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) was whether a Circular had been issued by the Inspector General to the different police stations in Ireland calling upon the men to subscribe funds for the purchase of a horse and jaunting car as a Jubilee offering to Her Majesty. No such Circular was ever issued.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, Sir, the Chief Secretary's statement was a mere quibble.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I consider the interruption of the hon. and learned Member to be disorderly and un-Parliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do I understand you to rule, Sir, that the word "quibble" is un-Parliamentary?

MR. SPEAKER: I consider that the interruption of the hon. and learned Member was disorderly and un-Parliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it the interruption I am to withdraw?

MR. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. and learned Member to withdraw the expression he used.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Very well, Sir. [Cries of "Withdraw!" and "Name!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and learned Member withdraw the expression of which I complain?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it the word "quibble?"

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and learned Member said that the Chief Secretary had been guilty of a quibble. He must withdraw that expression.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the word "quibble" is un-Parliamentary, I will withdraw it.

MR. SPEAKER: This is a matter of some importance. The hon. and learned Member interrupted a Question asked by another hon. Member in a disorderly manner, and he said that a statement made by a right hon. Member of this House was a quibble. I ask the hon. and learned Member to withdraw that expression?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, sir.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—THE 43-TON GUN.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether, on or about 28th August, 1885, a third 43-ton breach-loading gun broke down at the proof butts, Woolwich, in the metal in the middle of the breach; and, whether both design and specification for all such guns have been radically changed; if so, was that change necessary, if it was (including change in specification), does he still adhere to his statement that the 43-ton guns in question are serviceable?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter): No 43-ton gun broke down at the proof butts at Woolwich on or about the 28th of August, 1885. On the 26th of August a vent slide failed; but this did not put the gun out of action, and a new vent slide was fitted on in half a minute. Changes have been made both in the design and specification of the 12-inch breach-loading guns since their original design in 1881, and these changes were necessary. Two additions are being made to Marks I. and II. 12-inch breach-loading guns, with the view of bringing them into conformity with the steel guns of new design. They are being chase-hooped, and that part of the bore specially attacked by the gas is being lined. The guns are believed to be perfectly serviceable.

WAR OFFICE—ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—SURGEON MAJOR SANDFORD MOORE.

DR. TINDAL ROBERTSON (Brighton) asked the Secretary of State

Colonel King-Harman

for War, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the case of Surgeon Major Sandford Moore, submitted to him by the Medical Director General?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The production of this Report would create a very undesirable precedent; and I regret, therefore, that I am unable, in the interests of the Service, to meet the wishes of my hon. Friend.

WAR OFFICE—CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—EXTRA QUEEN'S CADETSHIPS.

DR. TINDAL ROBERTSON (Brighton) asked the Secretary of State for War, If, in commemoration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, he will recommend that a few extra Queen's cadetships be granted during the present year?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The establishment of Queen's cadets is limited, and the nominations granted have hitherto been found sufficient to meet the claims of all who were eligible for the boon. Under these circumstances, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief does not see any sufficient ground for recommending an increase in the number of Queen's cadetships in connection with the Jubilee.

DEER FORESTS (SCOTLAND)—GARBAT BEN WYVIS.

DR. R. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he has any further information regarding the intended addition of the sheep farm of Garbat Ben Wyvis to the extensive deer forest of Mr. Shoolbreed; whether he is aware that the proposal has caused intense dissatisfaction throughout the West Highlands; and, whether, in order to allay the popular excitement, the Government can take any steps to delay the proposed afforesting until the Crofter Land Commission had visited the district?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Having received no Notice of this Question, I am unable to answer in regard to the questions of fact; but I may point out to the hon. Member that any sheep-farm land which is added to deer forest is by that action made more free to be dealt with for the increase of crofter holdings than if it remained in sheep farm; but, in any case, the Government have no power to interfere in matters relating to the Crofters Act of last year, these being exclusively in the hands of the Crofter Commission, and of the Courts of Law on appeal from the Commission.

UNITED STATES—EMIGRATION OF HIGHLAND CROFTERS.

DR. B. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any official Correspondence has taken place lately between our Ambassador in the United States and a representative of the United States Government, with the object of arranging for the emigration of Highland crofters; whether the latter intimated that the sending of emigrants who were likely to become a public charge would be regarded by his country as an unfriendly act; and, whether the alleged Correspondence will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Correspondence has passed with reference to immigration to the United States, but not with special reference to Highland crofters. It was intimated by the Minister of the United States that immigrants sent out by Governmental agency, or likely to become a public charge, would not be acceptable. The Correspondence will be laid upon the Table.

POST OFFICE—CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—THE OFFICIALS.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Postmaster General, If he will give postal and telegraph officials an opportunity to participate in the Jubilee Celebrations of the 21st instant by arranging for a partial suspension of their work, as is the case on Good Fridays and Sundays?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have already given orders that on the day fixed for the celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee the Post Office arrangements throughout the Kingdom shall be such as to afford to the postal and telegraph officials as much relief as possible. In the Metropolis there will be one early and one late delivery of letters, and corresponding collections, instead of numerous collections and deliveries; also one delivery and one collection of parcels. Many of the post offices will be closed altogether. In the country there will be, for the most part, one delivery and one collection of letters and parcels, and the rural postmen, after completing their delivery, will be allowed to return at once to their starting points, as on Christmas Day. Throughout the country generally the post offices will be closed for postal purposes after the first delivery until the time for the making up of the evening despatches. I regret that, owing to the exigencies of the Service, complete relief cannot be given to the telegraphists on the day of the Jubilee.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES—KING GEORGE'S SOUND — THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as reported in the newspapers, that at the recent Colonial Conference the War Office raised objections to assisting in providing for the defence of King George's Sound; and, if so, whether he can state the reasons for these objections?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Yes, Sir; the matter is easily explained. The list of coaling stations now being defended was framed originally by the Royal Commission on the Defence of British Possessions Abroad. That Commission went very completely into the whole question, and selected a certain number of stations, which it described as of first-rate importance, and the defences of which it recommended should be at once undertaken. King George's Sound was not included. That case was considered, but was decided to be of secondary importance. This list was approved by the Treasury, and laid before Parliament. A large sum still remains to be spent before the defences even of these first-class stations are complete; and the War Office accordingly, when represented at the Colonial Conference, did not feel justified in promising to furnish at once an expensive armament for King George's Sound—first, because to include any place not upon the list would necessarily have entailed large expenditure in other cases similarly situated; secondly, because it would have had neither Treasury nor Parliamentary sanction; and, thirdly, because it would have recognized a principle against which the Treasury has always contended—that the Imperial Government should bear any share in the expenditure necessary for the land defence of Australia.

COAL MINES REGULATIONS—COLLIERY ACCIDENT IN LANARKSHIRE

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that another fearful colliery accident has occurred in Lanarkshire, resulting in the loss of three lives and seriously injuring others; and, whether he will order an inquiry to be made into its cause?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have just received a Report from the Inspector of the district, who has already inquired into this accident. He informs me that the accident was due to the neglect of the engine-man, who failed to put in a key, whereby the winding drum got disconnected from the engine, and the cage, with the men in it, ran down the pit. The engine-man is in custody.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY) — ACCOMMODATION FOR MEMBERS OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will inform the House what arrangements he has succeeded in making for the purpose of according to Members of the House who are widowers or bachelors, privileges akin to those which have been granted to Members who have wives, whereby the former may be permitted to attend the Jubilee ceremony at the Abbey accompanied by lady relatives?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that I sympathize with him in his desire that Members of the House who are so unfortunate as to be widowers or bachelors should have the privileges akin to those which are granted to Members who have wives. The Committee to whom this question has been referred have not found it possible at present to endue them with the same privileges. I will now state to the House, as far as the arrangements have yet gone, what is proposed to be done. The Lord Chamberlain has arranged to find places for Members of Parliament, accompanied by their wives, who have sent in their names to the Speaker's Secretary, or will do so before Saturday, the 11th instant, and a space in the North Transept of the Abbey, containing 570 seats, will be numbered and reserved for Members of this House. Provision will be made for the Speaker, the Chairman of Ways and Means, Ministers, ex-Ministers, and Privy Councillors to sit as far as may be possible together in the front seats. The remainder of the seats will be allotted by ballot to those Members who have sent in their names by the 11th instant. It is expected that levée dress will be worn by Ministers, ex-Ministers, and Privy Councillors; but for other Members of the House the dress will be optional. The House will remember that all these arrangements are solely in the hands of the Select Committee appointed by the House. This is all the information I am able to give the House at the present moment; but the list is not yet complete. Two days remain during which Members may send in their names; and as the seats at the disposal of the Lord Chamberlain and the Committee are exceedingly limited it is impossible for me to state more than I have done at the present time. The Committee will meet on Monday to make their final arrangements.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION BILL.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the terrible disaster at Udston Colliery, and the still more recent accident at Motherwell, he will so arrange the Business of the House as to allow the Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Bill to be proceeded with not later than 10 o'clock this evening?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he fully entered into the desire of the hon. Member and other hon. Members who took an interest in this very important matter; but he was not able to say more than he said on Tuesday, that if a discussion could be taken after half-past 11 or 12 to-night, he would be very glad if that could be done; but to report Progress on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill at 10 o'clock would be impossible.

An hon. MEMBER hoped the Government would not consent to take the Bill at so late an hour.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was entirely in the hands of hon. Members who took an interest in the question. The Government desired that the Bill should be proceeded with, subject to the understanding that hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the matter should have an opportunity for such discussion as was thought necessary.

MR. MASON said, that he was anxious the Bill should be taken to-night at any hour, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would assure them this would be the case, so that Members interested in the Bill might remain in their places.

MR. BURT (Morpeth) hoped that unless the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury could see his way to afford an opportunity for a reasonable discussion, he would state the Bill would not go on at all.

EVICIONS (IRELAND)—EVICIONS AT BODYKE—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF THE CONSTABULARY.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question, of which he had been unable to give the right hon. Gentleman private Notice. He desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman had his attention been called to a statement in The Pall Mall Gazette of that evening, with reference to the evictions which were being carried on at Bodyke, and which was as follows:—

"It is true that Pat Walsh's mother, of 80, was bludgeoned in his house as she sat in her chair by a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who formed one of the volunteer storming party, and she has at this moment the marks of the baton in the shape of a bad black eye."

[Laughter.] Some hon. Members might laugh; but he regarded the matter as too serious for laughter. The report continued—

"She (Mrs. Walsh) is bedridden, and was lifted up by her daughter-in-law to be evicted, and the two blue bruises above and below her left eye upon her poor old wrinkled face, form the most pitiable sight imaginable. While her son was led off to gaol in handcuffs, she sat in a chair on the road wailing and rocking her wounded and aching head backwards and forwards in her hands."

He wished to ask the Chief Secretary, Whether he would take immediate steps to punish the constable for his brutal conduct, and prevent any recurrence of such a state of things?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I know nothing about the attack alleged to have taken place, nor have I seen The Pall Mall Gazette of to-day; but I am sorry to say that scenes have taken place, in the course of the resistance to the police at Bodyke, of a most disgraceful character.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary a Question of which, unfortunately, I have not been able to give him Notice, Whether it is true that the police at Bodyke have acted as bailiffs and been the first to enter the houses, instead of the officers of the Sheriff; and, whether it is true, as we have frequently been assured, that no such conduct will be tolerated; and whether, if this statement be true, the Chief Secretary will take immediate steps to prevent a repetition of such illegal action?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt, Sir, that if the police went into the houses in consequence of these houses being illegally defended, they acted in accordance with their duty.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RETURN FOR APRIL AND MAY.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the Return of reported outrages in Ireland of April and May, which the Chief Secretary promised before the Whitsuntide holidays, was not yet in the hands of the Members?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is at the printers. I do not know why it has not been issued, but I will inquire into the circumstances.

COAL MINES REGULATION—THE UDSTON COLLIERY ACCIDENT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): With reference to the inquiry to be made into the Udston Colliery accident, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will exercise all the powers which Viscount Cross' Act enables him to use in reference to the inquiry—that is to say, whether he will appoint persons of special knowledge to assist the Inspector in the investigation under Section 3, Sub-section 1, of the Act; whether he would for that purpose appoint a representative of the Lanarkshire Miners' Union; whether he will exercise the power vested in him of requiring the Inspector to call for documentary evidence as to the last inspection of the mine, in whole or in part; whether he will allow representatives of the men to visit the scene of the accident in company with Her Majesty's Inspector, as well as the owners, manager, and officials of the mine?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I informed the hon. Member, or some other hon. Member, two or three days ago, that I had issued directions that representatives of the men should accompany the Inspector, and have an opportunity of seeing all that had gone on in the pit, and forming their own opinion and conclusion upon it. With regard to the Commission, it is not yet signed. My present intention is that it shall consist, according to the Statute, of an Inspector of Mines, assisted by Gentlemen of the Scotch Bar. I will consider the suggestion of the hon. Member as to having any additional Member upon the Commission; but I do not think it desirable that the Commission should be too large. The range of the inquiry will be the very fullest that the law permits.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it is not a fact that among the whole body of the miners of Lanarkshire there is a strong desire that they should be represented by a member of the Union on the Commission, to assist the Inspector?

[No reply.]

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

NOTICE OF INSTRUCTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I wish, Sir, to give Notice that to-morrow, at half-past 4 o'clock, I shall move an Instruction to the Committee on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, the effect of which will be to name a period at which the Committee will report the Bill to the House.

Mr. Conybeare

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, by the indulgence of the House, I should like to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. Surely this is an extremely short Notice for a proposal of so extremely strong—which is the least offensive word I can find—a description. The House has been sitting since last Monday, and the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues must, I presume, have made up their minds as to the course they intended to pursue; and it seems to me that it would have been more consistent with the great importance of the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman makes, and more respectful to the House, if he had given us a longer time to consider his proposal. I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to postpone the Resolution for one more Sitting—until Monday.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman himself must have expected the Government to make a proposal of this character; for, in answer to a Question addressed to me by the hon. and learned Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) on Tuesday last, I did, in effect, give Notice that it would be the duty of the Government to make a proposal of this kind to the House. It has not been possible for the Government to arrive at any definite decision on the question until to-day; and they will put the form and terms of their Notice on the Paper in the course of the evening.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: May I ask at what time the right hon. Gentleman proposes to make this Motion?

MR. W. H. SMITH: At half-past 4 o'clock, the usual time. The right hon. Gentleman is aware of the fact that all Motions in regard to the Business of the House are taken before the Orders of the Day are entered upon.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will now state what is the period he refers to?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I cannot.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): As to-morrow is not a Government day, it would certainly be more convenient if the right hon. Gentleman could give the terms of his Motion, because surely we are entitled to at least 24 hours' notice, so that hon. Members might be able to give Notice of Amendments to the Motion.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The terms of the Motion will be handed in to the Clerk at the Table before the close of the Committee this evening in ample time for hon. Gentlemen to be fully informed of its purport.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How?

MR. W. H. SMITH: From the Clerk at the Table.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand, Mr. Speaker, that it will be possible for Members to obtain copies of the right hon. Gentleman's Notice to-night?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not customary to give copies of Motions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That being so, I would again ask the right hon. Gentleman what the Government intend to do?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I will give an answer at the close of the Committee this evening.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) wanted to know whether the Notice given by the right hon. Gentleman could be considered regular in view of the great importance of a Motion of this character, and the natural desire of hon. Members on his side of the House to prepare Amendments which would be impossible on so short a Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: There is nothing irregular in the course proposed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th June.]

[FIFTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SPECIAL JURY AND REMOVAL OF TRIAL.

Clause 4 (Change of place of trial).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork), in moving as an Amendment, in page 3, line 23, after "district," to insert—

"And there has previously been a trial for such crime in the county or borough in which the same was committed, at which trial the jury has disagreed," said: The object of this Amendment is to prevent, as far as possible, the extreme hardship in this provision. It will be in the mind of the Committee that we have already passed Clause 3 which provides that where an indictment for a crime committed in a proclaimed district has been found, or a defendant has been committed for trial, and the trial is to be by a jury before a Court in Ireland, other than a Court of Quarter Sessions, the High Court shall, on the application of the Attorney General or by the defendant, direct that the trial shall be a special jury. That being so, it is only reasonable, if the Government are to have the power of changing the venue in the way suggested by this clause, that there should be some provision to restrict the power to change the venue to cases in which there has already been a trial and the jury have disagreed. Let me point out that, as the clause now stands, the Executive will be able to drag prisoners from one end of Ireland to the other—from the County of Kerry, for instance, to Ulster and vice versa. There was a somewhat similar provision in the Crimes Act of 1882, but the only case, as far as I believe, in which it was exercised, is one with which the Committee will be familiar owing to the constant allusions which have been made to it in this House—namely, a case in which a number of Irish-speaking Connemara peasants were removed from Mayo to be tried in Cork, and in that case there had previously been a disagreement on the part of the jury. Surely it is only reasonable to ask the Government, before we give them the powers provided in this section, that there should be circumstances which will bear some parallel with those of the Act of 1882, and that it shall be shown that some attempt has already been made to secure the administration of justice in the county where the offence was committed. I entreat Her Majesty's Advisers to give a fair consideration to the reasonable Amendment I now propose.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 23, after the word "district," insert the words "and there has previously been a trial for such crime in the county or borough in which same was committed, at which trial the jury has disagreed." —(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Mr. Maurice Healy

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Amendment moved by the hon. Member is to the effect that there must have been a previous trial and a disagreement on the part of the jury before the venue can be changed—in fact, that there has been an abortive trial. The object of the Government is to provide that the venue may be changed, because there is reason to suspect that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the district in which the crime has been committed, and if we restrict the operation of the clause to cases in which there has been a previous trial our object might be altogether defeated. For these reasons we cannot assent to the Amendment.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to forget the powers which the Government will have of ordering persons to stand by whose motives they have reason to suspect. I think it will be altogether impossible, under such circumstances, to place 12 men in the box who would agree to acquit a prisoner. Such an apprehension is altogether preposterous, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman must have a very low opinion indeed of the intelligence of this Committee, or he would not venture to make such a suggestion. I quite agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that an abortive trial is a most unsatisfactory thing. It is most desirable, when a man has been tried by a jury, that the jury should find whether he is guilty or innocent; but we must not lose sight of the extraordinary powers which are given to the Government by Section 3. Under these powers, I cannot see that there is the slightest danger of such a mishap as an abortive trial occurring. Unfortunately, however, notwithstanding the low estimate which the Attorney General for Ireland seems to have of the intelligence of the Assembly he was addressing, the Government are sufficiently powerful to pass their Bill by the use of the closure.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): All that is asked in this Amendment is that a trial shall have taken place in the district where an offence has been committed, before the venue can be changed to any other part of the country. It has already been pointed out what was done in the case of the Mayo conspiracy. In that case a trial took place where the offence was committed, and, that trial having proved abortive, the venue was changed to Cork. The result was a second disagreement, but the prisoners were put upon their trial again, and, having to go to Mayo in order to bring up their relatives and witnesses, they certainly had not a fair chance of obtaining an acquittal. It is quite evident from the non-acceptance of the Amendment that the Government have no desire to procure even an appearance of justice. Such provisions as these must destroy all confidence on the part of the people in the administration of the law. If the Government really desire to make progress with their Bill, they would show a disposition to accept reasonable Amendments of this kind. But it appears to me that they have no desire even to observe the slightest semblance of justice.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): In reference to the Amendment No. 16 on the Paper, standing in my name, the object of which is to extend the jurisdiction to any division of the High Court, I do not propose, at this stage, to move it, because I think the matter may be more adequately dealt with on the 11th clause, which defines the mode of procedure for offences against the Bill. Nor do I intend to move the Amendment No. 18, which gives a discretionary power to the High Court, because I think that that Amendment is covered by No. 19 which stands in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for England.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): My Amendment proposes to leave out all the words of the first sub-section from the word "Ireland," in line 25.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is an Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) which will come before that.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I propose to move, in page 3, line 24, an Amendment to provide that the application for the change of venue shall be made in open Court. I think that it is necessary to provide that such an application should not be made in Chambers, but that it should be made in public, so that the nature of the application would be quite open and clearly understood.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 24, after the word "application," to insert the words "in open Court."
—(Mr. Mac Neill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Government feel bound to oppose the Amendment, which would introduce an entirely new practice in these cases. It is our intention to follow the usual course of practice.

MR. MAC NEILL: All I desire is that the public should be able to judge of the propriety of the application as well as the Attorney General.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This opens an entirely new question. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that he is to go in private to a Judge of the High Court, and perhaps, sitting over a glass of punch, apply for an order, and that the public are to have no information about it? We know that at present barristers are able to go to the Judges privately in regard to some of the matters concerning the procedure of the Court; but it is a monstrous proposition to provide that a serious application of this nature in questions affecting the lives and liberties of the Irish people should be made privately, even to a Vacation Judge.

MR. HOLMES: I do not suppose it is at all likely that an application would be made to a Judge over a glass of punch; but what I say is, that a Motion of this kind may be made with perfect propriety if it is made in accordance with the ordinary practice of the Court, and the Government, therefore, cannot consent to alter the clause.

MR. MAC NEILL: We ought to be able to judge of the propriety of the application as well as the Attorney General. The words "The High Court" do not mean the High Court of Justice sitting with all the dignity of Judges on the Bench; but it means a single Judge sitting in his own chambers, in his own study, and acting at any time of the day or night. Under such circumstances, is the Attorney General or his representative to be at liberty to walk in and obtain an order by simply saying—"See, Judge; give me this order." Such a provision means a total absence of any public investigation in reference to the application, and there is a possibility that an order may be given for a change of venue, which would not have been granted if there had been notice given to the public. If a Motion were made in open Court it would also prevent an appeal to the High Court to discharge or vary the order. I fail to see why the proceedings under this Coercion Bill should not be fair and above-board, and the Irish Members are determined to do their best to prevent anything being done in a surreptitious or underhand manner. The Attorney General knows perfectly well that this is to be a secret application. The definition of the expression "The High Court" is simply that it is to mean the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and I challenge the Attorney General to tell the Committee what the real object of this provision is.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I have now to move in page 3, line 25, to leave out after the word "Ireland," the following words:—

"And upon his certificate that he believes that a more fair and impartial trial can be had at a Court of Assize in some county to be named in the certificate, shall make an order as of course that the trial shall be had at a Court of Assize in the county named in the certificate.

"The defendant or any defendants, if more than one, may in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time apply to the High Court to discharge or vary any such order for the removal of a trial, upon the ground that the trial can be more fairly and impartially had in a county other than the county named in the order of removal, and thereupon the High Court may order that the trial shall be had in that county in which it shall appear that the trial can be most fairly and impartially had."

If the Committee consent to the omission of those words, I propose to substitute words to provide that the High Court, on application by or on behalf of the Attorney General for Ireland,

"Or of the defendant, may for good cause order that the trial shall be had in some other county or borough."

Now, the Government, in framing the Bill, have obviously thought that this question of the change of venue may be one of very great consequence, and I am quite prepared to admit that if it is of great consequence in the interests of the Crown, which interests are supposed to be and ought to be the interests of the public, it is equally a matter of great interest to the accused. It is a very serious matter that, without any safeguard or protection, a man charged with an offence, not according to the ordinary Criminal Law and the administration of the ordinary Criminal Law, shall be deprived of the venue in which the offence has been committed, and that his trial shall be removed to an entirely different place altogether, away from his friends, and where it may be difficult for him to procure evidence which may be of the greatest possible importance to him. The Government, in the way in which they have framed the clause, show that they consider the matter to be one of consequence; but as the clause stands the question is to be decided on the mere ipse dixit and at the will of the Attorney General in the first instance. All that the Attorney General has to do is to instruct some counsel or solicitor on his behalf to make an application to the High Court, and on his certificate that he believes a more fair and impartial trial can be had in some other place than that in which it would in the ordinary course be had, the learned Judge before whom the application is made is, according to the clause as it stands, entirely deprived of any judicial discretion whatever in the matter. By this clause the Judge is bound to make the order on an application being made to him, and on the production of the certificate of the Attorney General that he thinks it right a change of venue should take place. Now, I say that this is an unbecoming course of proceeding with regard to the Judge himself. I know it may be said that there is a right of appeal given by the next part of the clause. The next part of the clause says that after an order of the Judge has been made upon an ex parte, or it may be upon a secret application, and under circumstances which may prevent any information being given to the Judge upon which he might be able to exercise his judgment, the defendant against whom the order has already been made shall have conceded to him the right within a prescribed time, and in a prescribed manner, to apply to the Court to vary the order. Now, I want to know what is to be said against the proposition contained in my Amendment, which is the natural, the simple, the straightforward, and the just principle to be adopted in such a matter—namely, that the original application shall be made by the Attorney General, or by the defendant, in open Court, and that thereupon the Court may, for good reason, order that the trial shall be had in some other county or borough. What can be the object of resisting so reasonable an Amendment? If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has no desire to prejudice the question in accordance with any suggestion which may have been made to him, I would ask him, in fairness and in reason, what is to be said against that proposition? If the Attorney General desires to change the venue, let him make an application; but let it be made in open Court on due notice, and let him satisfy the Court that he has good grounds for making it. In that case, no doubt, it would be granted; but if he is unable to show good grounds, why should he have his order upon an ex parte statement, without the persons accused having an opportunity of showing cause against it? Of course, if the Government intend to offer a non possumus to every Amendment proposed, whether that Amendment is reasonable or unreasonable, or in the direction of justice or not, it would save a good deal of time if they would say so at once. Personally, I repudiate altogether that the Chief Secretary means to convey any such desire, and if not, then I claim that no answer whatever can be made to this Amendment. I know that a great many things have been stated inside this House, and still more outside, in regard to the obstruction of this Bill; but I am certain that there has not been a single Amendment advanced from this Bench for which the strongest reasons have not been adduced. For my own part, I have not voted for one, nor spoken on behalf of one, which I did not consider to be of a substantial and bona fide character. If they do not wish to have the whole force of public opinion directed against this wretched measure the Government ought to evince some desire to maintain, at least, an appearance of fairness, and to consider favourably proper and reasonable Amendments.

Mr. Mac Neill

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 25, to leave out all the words after the word "Ireland," to the end of line 37, and insert the words, "or of the defendant, may for good cause order that the trial shall be had in some other county or borough,"—
(Sir Charles Russell,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'and upon his certificate that a' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): My hon. and learned Friend has called upon the Chief Secretary to answer the appeal which has been made to him; but as there are technicalities which are connected with the matter which it is desirable to explain my right hon. Friend has asked me to reply. The hon. and learned Gentleman has spoken under the idea that some suggestion has been made that the Amendments moved from the Front Bench opposite have been of an obstructive character. Now, Sir, we are far from entertaining any feeling of that kind, and, so far as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself is concerned, there can be no doubt that the Amendments which he has moved have been of a reasonable character, and have been Amendments which, beyond all doubt, require discussion. Indeed, I have all along admitted not only the reasonable character of the Amendments from the Front Bench, but also that many of those which have been proposed in other quarters have been reasonable. The present Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman unquestionably raises a subject which it is desirable to have discussed and decided by the Committee; and, therefore, as briefly and as clearly as I can, I will explain the reasons which have induced the Government to ask for a change of venue in the terms of this clause. I admit that if the object of the clause were simply to make a change in the machinery for bringing about the change venue—if that were the only object of it, the Amendment would not only be a reasonable, but a fair and proper one. In other words, if it were simply intended to introduce into Ireland the machinery which exists in England under Palmer's Act, the mode suggested by the Amendment might be fittingly adopted—namely, that either the prosecutor or the defendant, in open Court, should make an application for a change of venue, and that at the end of the discussion the Judge should give his decision. But we have proceeded all along on the basis that in certain parts of Ireland exceptional circumstances have arisen, and it is not proposed now to amend the machinery of the law, but to amend the law itself. When we come to the conclusion that the circumstances of Ireland require that the Crown should have the means of changing the venue, we looked about for the means by which that amendment of the law should be carried out, and we found that the circumstances bore a considerable analogy to those under which the Crimes Act of 1882 was passed. In that case the Legislature, having regard to the circumstances, have laid down certain provisions of the law, and we have a right to consider that what they did was, at all events, prima facie reasonable, although hon. Gentlemen opposite were strongly opposed to the action then taken. What was done in that case was to provide that the Attorney General, by a mere certificate, without certifying any facts, should have power to apply for a change of venue, and should get an order of the Court sanctioning such change of venue. In other words, there was a final thing done on the mere certificate of the Attorney General. The Attorney General was to give a certificate that a change of venue was required, and thereupon the order of the Court was to be made. On full consideration of the subject we came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to follow precisely and exactly the precedent of the Act of 1882, but that the powers conferred by that measure should be amended in the interests of the accused persons themselves. What is the process which at the present time we say it is desirable to adopt? We say that, in the first place, a certificate shall be applied for by the Attorney General stating that he believes a more fair and impartial trial can be had at a Court of Assizes in some county to be named in the certificate. I know it will be stated that a certificate is a matter of form; but I do not believe that such a certificate will be a matter of form at all. It is alleged that the action of the Attorney General will be governed by the Executive, and that he will not be guided by his own conscience and views of right in directing a change of venue.

[Fifteenth Night.]

Mr. Holmes

I will only say that no application will be made for a certificate without a most careful consideration, and after taking into account what the Attorney General ought to certify, and whether a fair and impartial trial can be had in another county. Not only must the circumstances be such as to raise a doubt whether a trial in the county where the offence was committed would be fair and impartial, but also whether there is another place where, beyond all doubt, the case could be tried more fairly and impartially. If the allegations contained in the certificate are right, it will be only reasonable and proper that the venue should be changed. As to the argument that the Attorney General would be governed by the Executive, and that he would not exercise his own conscientious judgment in the matter, let me ask what earthly motive the Attorney General can have for certifying what he has no reason to believe—namely, that good ground exists for changing the place of trial where in reality there is no such ground? Personally, the Attorney General, who bears the character of prosecutor in Ireland, can have nothing whatever to gain. Although the circumstances of the case may be attended with a considerable amount of difficulty, it cannot be asserted that any person who may occupy the position of Law Officer of the Crown will have any motive to attempt to do anything unfair in regard to a change of venue. However impartially and conscientiously an Irish Law Officer acts, he is always subjected to the most violent attacks; and, therefore, he has every reason to induce him to avoid doing anything unfair. If the Attorney General ever has any temptation at all, it is to do less than his duty rather than more. He knows that he may incur odium for doing less than his duty; but he has no temptation whatever to do more. And let me tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that, so far as the Executive are concerned, the Attorney General will be altogether free from their control or influence. He may be mistaken in the judgment at which he arrives; but what he will do will be done upon his own account, and he cannot be made responsible by any Member of the Government for the way in which he exercises his judgment. That being so, and the venue having been changed by the order of the High Court, it is then provided by this section that—“If the accused has reason to believe that the trial could be more fairly and impartially had in a county other than the county named in the order of removal he may, in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time, apply to the High Court to discharge or vary such order; and thereupon the High Court may order that the trial shall be had in that county in which it shall appear that the trial can be most fairly and impartially had.”

That is the machinery we are providing in this clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite asks—“Why do not you go to the Court in the way in which it is now approached and make a direct motion in open Court that the venue be changed?” In that case, he says, it is not likely that the Judge would direct a change of venue without good cause. He would require substantial evidence of a convincing character, which could only be given by a long series of facts, to show that it was impossible or improbable that a fair trial could be had without a change of venue. The circumstances of the case may be perfectly clear to the Crown and to persons outside the Court; but it would be difficult to prove them in the way the law requires in a Court of Justice. Such evidence, I maintain, would not be forthcoming in a disturbed district. The same causes which would render a change of venue desirable would operate in preventing the Crown from obtaining that evidence, and, as a necessary consequence, the Court would refuse to make an order. As a matter of fact, the application could only be based on general hearsay. It would be obviously impossible to give facts to show that the jurors of a particular county were not likely to do justice, and under those circumstances the Court would be practically coerced into refusing the application. It is perfectly well known that there are certain counties in Ireland in which difficulty exists, and in which jurors refuse to do their duty when a certain class of criminals is brought before them. But how could that fact be proved in the way in which a Court of Justice would require it to be proved? Information has been received again and again that jurors have been intimidated; but it is impossible to get together such evidence as would enable a Court, under the circumstances, to grant a change of venue. In point of fact, the same reasons which exist in a county in regard to preventing jurors from doing their duty would prevent the Crown from obtaining evidence to satisfy the Court that a change of venue was necessary. Therefore, if it is desirable to have a change of venue at all we must alter the mode of procedure. Let me point out that up to the present moment the Crown has never, except in one or two instances, succeeded in getting the venue changed. But although that difficulty exists on the part of the Crown, I do not think any difficulty exists in any part of Ireland which would prevent an accused person from showing that a change of venue would be an injury to him. I think that that can be clearly and easily shown. He would be surrounded by a number of persons whose sympathies would be with him, and who would be willing to come forward and state any fact which would clearly show that a change of venue would be an injury to him, and they could show it in the form of an affidavit in a way to satisfy the Court that to make an order for a change of venue would be injurious to the interests of the defendant. As the clause now stands, if the defendant applies to the Court to vary or discharge the order for the removal of the trial, the onus will not be placed upon the Crown of showing that it is impossible to get a fair and impartial trial; but the accused person, whose case might be prejudiced by a change of venue, will never experience any difficulty in obtaining evidence to show that the change would be injurious to his interests. As to the right of appeal against the certificate of the Attorney General for a change of venue, the hon. and learned Gentleman says there is no analogy for a provision of this nature. There is, however, an analogy in a well-known class of cases—namely, civil actions, which often involve issues quite as important as may be involved in some of the offences under this measure. In civil actions the plaintiff selects his own venue; but the defendant is entitled to have it changed on showing that it is expedient to do so in the interests of justice. Therefore, there is an analogy for this mode of procedure in what takes place in reference to a large class of cases that are now tried by a jury. I may add that experience shows that when a defendant applies for a change of venue on the ground that passion or prejudice may be excited against him in a particular locality the Crown has always granted the application, except where there was reason to believe that it was made merely for vexatious purposes. I have pointed out that at present there cannot be any effective change of venue except by means of such machinery as this, and we must choose between the machinery of the Act of 1882 and that which is now suggested. Our proposal is to alter the machinery of the Act of 1882 in a manner favourable to the accused. We allow an appeal to the defendant. The Government have most carefully considered the matter—not only the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but the other Members of the Government—and for these reasons I trust that the Committee will not accept the Amendment which has been moved by my hon. and learned Friend.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I am not going to discuss the precedent of the Act of 1882, for I altogether repudiate any argument based on that Act. I repudiated them yesterday, and I will not waste the time of the Committee by repudiating them again. At the same time, I frankly admit to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the present clause is a great improvement on the Act of 1882. The Act of 1882 simply places it in the power of the Attorney General to obtain a change of venue without giving the defendant the power of appeal, whereas the present proposal confers that power. I should like to follow the right hon. and learned Attorney General through his argument, because it seems to me that it leads to a contrary conclusion to that which he has arrived at, and on his own bases the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General is perfectly justified. The position of the matter is this. The defendant, as a matter of right, is entitled to be tried in the county where the offence has been committed. The analogy which the right hon. and learned Attorney General has given as to a change of venue in a civil cause does not apply. Any right which the defendant in a civil action may have must depend upon the general law. That has no relation to the rights which prisoner or prosecutors may have in criminal trials. I presume that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland will not dispute the fact that at present any prisoner charged with a criminal offence is entitled to have the place of trial in his own county.

MR. HOLMES: I quite admit that; but by the Common Law in civil actions the defendant had the same right.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: The allegation is that, in certain counties in Ireland, it is impossible to obtain a fair trial; and, therefore, the Government ask to have the venue changed in order that justice may be done. For the sake of argument, let me assume that to be the case, and that there is a necessity for a change of venue. Does that justify the present clause? The Government have been fond of asserting that the law of Ireland ought to be the same as that in this country. Now, some 30 years ago, owing to its being found impossible to obtain a fair trial in the case of a celebrated murder in the county of Stafford, Lord Campbell introduced a Bill into Parliament to enable, under such circumstances, the place of trial to be changed; but that Act placed the power of granting such change of venue in the hands of an impartial tribunal. Lord Campbell did not vest in the prosecutor, or in the prisoner, a right to determine where the case was to be tried; but he vested the authority in the hands of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, the enacting a procedure which deprives a man of his right to be tried under the Common Law in the place where the alleged crime was committed is a very serious step; and, therefore, in the case I refer to, the Legislature determined that it should not be vested in either of the parties to the case, but, on the contrary, that it was a judicial decision, to be arrived at by a properly qualified judicial tribunal. I will not argue the question whether a fair trial can or cannot be had in Ireland. I am assuming the premises of the Government, and that a case has arisen in which a change of venue should take place; but my point is that an independent tribunal—namely, the High Court of Justice—should decide whether it should take place or not. The right hon. and learned Attorney General says that there might be great inconvenience and great delay; but he cut the ground from under his feet when he said that under this very clause the defendant will have a right of appeal, because the granting of an appeal would give rise to much greater delay. I do not charge the Government with any intention to act unjustly in the matter. They say—"What we propose is that the Attorney General shall have the right to change the venue on his own certificate, he being one of the parties in the case." I impute no motive to the Attorney General; but it is certainly his duty to obtain a conviction if he can, and the Government—and I think nobody will see it more clearly than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself—must have been struck with this injustice which has prevailed in previous legislation. They evidently recognize the unfairness of leaving the matter entirely in the hands of the Attorney General, because they now propose that the defendant, in a prescribed time and in a prescribed manner, may apply to the Court to confirm or set aside the order for the change of venue. In other words, the Court must make a formal order for a change of venue; but on an appeal against such formal order the question may be fully argued. It will be said that by this means the Government arrive at the same terminus by a different train. No doubt that is so; but they throw the onus upon the prisoner of proving that the venue ought not to be changed, whereas the onus should rest upon the prosecutor, seeing that the Government are attempting to deprive a man of his legal right of having it proved that the venue ought to be changed. There is another reason; and that is the matter of costs. You throw upon a poor defendant the costs of an expensive legal appeal; whereas, in the other case, the wealthy prosecutor—namely, the Crown—would have to prove to the satisfaction of the Court that there was a necessity for a change of venue. In fact, in many cases of this kind, it might not be necessary for the defendant to appear at all; because I take it that the High Court in Ireland would not consent to make an order, even upon the ex parte application of the Attorney General, if it was not satisfied with the evidence brought forward in the case. In such case the cost of the application would be thrown upon the Crown instead of being placed upon the man who is defending his rights. I would put it to the Government whether, if they are anxious to get on with the Bill, it is not desirable that they should accept the Amendment, which would certainly sweep away a large portion of the clause? Nor is there anything in it except in regard to the mode of procedure, for we both arrive at the same end. The right hon. and learned Attorney General admits that it is not enough to make the order, but he says that the order must be, in the first instance, put as a matter of course. We say—"Do not make it a matter of course, but let the Attorney General go to the Court with his evidence to show that a fair trial cannot otherwise be obtained." We might, then, be content to allow the rest of the clause to go; and, therefore, not only in the interest of justice, but to save the time of the Committee in discussing the Bill, I trust the Government will accept the Amendment. I do not think the right hon. and learned Attorney General will be inclined to meet all the Amendments with a non possumus. He has not done so hitherto, but he has accepted several Amendments which I have had the honour to propose. I certainly do not look at the question from the standpoint of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He thinks that there should be a Bill; I think that there should be none at all; but if there is to be a Bill, it is not desirable to make it unnecessarily harsh. Therefore, I ask the Government to accept this Amendment as an improvement in the law, as he proposes to amend it, and as an analogy to the law which prevails in this country in precisely similar circumstances.

Mr. Holmes

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Government would only be too glad, if they could, to accept the Amendment, and, indeed, any course proposed to the Committee so temperately as that which has just been proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. But there is the greatest practical difficulty in the way of the Government in accepting it, and they feel themselves precluded from doing so, because they not only see very grave objections to such a course, but having regard to the effective character of the clause, and on that ground alone, they feel compelled to refuse the appeal which has been made to them. I do not propose to speak at any length upon a subject which has been so ably dealt with by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes); but there are one or two points upon which I think I may say a few words. The hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Sir Charles Russell) referred to the hardship on the prisoner of removing him and all his witnesses to another part of the country on account of the expense; but so far as the witnesses are concerned, and that is really the material part, hon. Members must be aware that we have made provision in the Bill of such a nature that the prisoner will not suffer in that matter, seeing that the costs of the witnesses will be defrayed by the State. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) said that by the clause as it stands the onus of disproof is thrown upon the defendant; that by so doing he will be involved in costs which ought to be borne by the Crown, and that we are compelling a poor peasant to undergo great expenditure in order to defend himself. But let me point out that if that objection is valid at all, it is equally valid against the clause as it would stand if the Amendment were carried. If the clause were amended, as the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes to amend it, the course of procedure would be this. The Attorney General would move for a change of venue. That proposal would be resisted by the prisoner, and the cost of resisting it would have to be borne by the defendant in exactly the same manner.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: No; not at all.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: If the application were not resisted by the defendant, it would be because the change of venue was right.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Not at all.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to continue my observations? What I maintain is that the two cases lie exactly on all fours, and that in each every element of hardship is got rid of. The hon. and learned Member has pointed out that under Palmer's Act the exact machinery he wishes to introduce in this Bill is actually in force, and that the Court is required to pronounce upon the merits of the case. But is there no distinction to be drawn between what happens in England and what happens in Ireland? In England, if it is found that a change of venue is necessary, it arises from special circumstances relating to the crime, or to the persons charged with the commission of the crime. Therefore, it is required that such circumstances should be proved in Court, and consequently the rules of evidence must apply, and it is competent for the tribunal to give a sound and accurate opinion. But that is not the case when, to use an Irishism, we are dealing with an abstract condition which is not the moral condition of the whole of the country. That is a matter which a Court of Law bound by the strict rules of evidence is not competent to decide, and experience has universally shown that, whatever may be the opinion of Judges and competent persons, you have never been able to obtain a change of venue, or been able to show that the condition of a particular county was such that a fair and impartial trial could not be obtained. It cannot be seriously maintained that the failure of the change of the venue under the existing law is due solely to the fact that every observer of events outside the Court turned out to be mistaken. The real reason, as has been ably pointed out by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, for the proposal we make is that the Court will be precluded from taking that kind of view of the circumstances of the case which every practical man would take who is not bound by the rules of evidence, but would be guided by a common-sense view of the facts of the case. Therefore, if we look at the question from a practical point of view—if we know that a fair and impartial trial by jury is impossible unless there is a change of venue, I apprehend that we must take the machinery we suggest, unless we are to fall back upon the worse and more partial machinery which was agreed to by the House in 1882. The system which we now suggest has been tried in a harsher form than we now propose, and no substantial injustice has ever been suffered.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: That is a monstrous statement.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Therefore, seeing that it will be possible in every case to make an appeal and require legal evidence to be given that a change of venue is necessary, and that when the principle of change of venue was tried in a harsher form than we now suggest no inconvenience resulted, the Government are of opinion that no object is to be gained by assenting to the Amendment, and, therefore, they must oppose it.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland went much further than the clause of the Bill. The clause in the Bill anticipates an application to the High Court; it does not, I presume, mean that the application to the High Court should be a farce. Would it not be more easy to enact that the Attorney General by his own fiat should fix the venue wherever he pleases? It would then have been easy to add that the defendant might then go to the High Court and apply to have the venue fixed elsewhere for reasons stated, because it is the presumption, under the clause, that the High Court would really hear the application and will do something upon it. But when I listened to the argument of the right hon. and learned Attorney General I found that nothing of that kind was intended; and I also found that it was intended that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, for reasons known only to himself, should certify that a trial in a particular case should only be had in the place he chooses to name, and therefore there is no necessity for the interference of the Court. The fact that a change of venue has been ordered by the Court would arouse a prejudice against the man who is required to apply to the Court by way of appeal to vary or discharge the order already made. I can understand the argument of the Government, if they mean that the Attorney General ought to have the right to fix the venue wherever he pleases. That is an argument which, although I might not have been disposed to accept it, would have been perfectly clear; but here you go through the farce of making the High Court a party to what the Attorney General does without affording the slightest possibility of examination by the Court. I have had some experience as to the change of venue in criminal proceedings, although, of course, I do not compare my knowledge with that of the Legal Advisers of the Crown; but where notice has to be given by the Attorney General to the defendant or prisoner of an application that is about to be made, he must furnish the defendant with copies of the affidavits on which the application is to be based. It then rests with the defendant to say whether on such affidavits he is content to leave the matter to the Court, or whether he will answer. But the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland says—"We cannot give evidence in support by affidavits." Affidavits in reference to a change of venue are generally made on information of belief. I have had some experience of such affidavits, and I undertake to say that I never heard any application made to any Court, except, perhaps, in Ireland—for I know very little of that country, and I am afraid that peculiar things are done there—but certainly I never heard any application made to any Court in England in which some of the paragraphs did not begin with the words—"I have been informed and verily believe." The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland says that we ought not to go to that length; but that we ought to set aside all the rules of evidence. If that is so, why not return a verdict at once without any prosecution at all? Give to the Courts, which are usually governed by the rules which regulate evidence in matters affecting a change of venue in criminal trials, a very wide and liberal discretion. At present the Courts hold themselves bound by the strict rules of evidence both in regard to one side and the other, and outside legal technicalities it cannot be denied that the discretion they enjoy is invariably exercised fairly and impartially. Then, if you are to have the High Court introduced into your clause at all, give them the opportunity of exercising their discretion in the first instance. If the Government did not intend that the defendant should have any appeal at all, if they had followed the precedent of the Act of 1882—a precedent which I certainly should have voted against if I had been permitted at that time, but, unfortunately, my right to vote was denied me—if they had followed that precedent their Bill would be illogical, because they say that the defendant has a right to be heard, and the only thing they do is to put upon him the extra cost of securing a hearing. He is without the affidavits which ought to justify the making out of an order, but he is put to the cost of preparing affidavits to justify the Court in discharging the order. I did not quite understand the whole of the argument of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland. He said that the Government had been compelled to adopt the present fashion of enactment in consequence of certain technicalities which he said he would explain. I listened for those technicalities most attentively, but I failed to hear them. What was it I did hear? I heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman allege that the Government found it impossible to get the evidence they wanted. That is not a technicality; but we are told that because the Government find it impossible to get the evidence they want, it is necessary that the High Court should make an order for a change of venue on the mere certificate of the Attorney General. The right hon. Gentleman opposite asks what earthly object the Attorney General would have in certifying incorrectly. Of course, he personally could have no object whatever, and it is ridiculous to suppose that the mere costs would be any inducement, even to a pettifogging practitioner, to make an application which was not justified by a sense of justice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Oh, dear no.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I am sorry to hear it, but, at any rate, I acquit the right hon. and learned Gentleman of any such desire on his own part. If the certificate of the Attorney General is to determine the change of venue, do not let the High Court come in at all. Let the clause run that the Attorney General by his fiat may name some county where he considers a fair and impartial trial may take place. I say nothing about the cost; that is comparatively a trifling matter; but of course if the defendant is required to appeal it would be necessary to employ counsel to argue legal technicalities, and that expense would be saved if the Legislature were to provide that the fiat of the Attorney General should in Ireland be equivalent to an order granted in England upon a writ of certiorari. As the clause now stands the Government virtually say that the Court is not to be trusted with the power of fixing the place where the trials take place, but that the judgment of the Attorney General is much better. That means that while the right hon. and learned Gentleman is Attorney General his judgment is to overrule everything else;

but it is to be a very different thing when the Attorney General ceases to be the Legal Adviser of the Government and happens to become a Judge. The Attorney General, as a matter of fact, is to be the only Judge in the mysterious manner known to himself, but utterly incomprehensible to other people outside. The Government ought to submit to one of two things. They ought either to say, "It must rest with the Attorney General where the case is to be tried," in which case he would issue his fiat directing the trial to be had in a particular county, or the application should be made in open Court, and fully argued before the Judge who is to hear it. In my opinion, all formal side Bar rules ought to be swept away. I do not know whether they exist in Ireland. [MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes; they do.] Then I am very sorry to hear it, and all I have to say is that it is one of the many things that exist in Ireland which ought to be got rid of. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says that there is only a sentimental hardship upon a prisoner in the course proposed to be adopted under this clause. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I do not say that.] I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would do me the justice of saying that I have no wish to misrepresent him. I understood him to say that he would deal with the question of occasional hardship to a prisoner, and I further understood him to contend that there was really no hardship whatever, except one of sentiment. Of course I may be wrong; but I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not think that I desire to fasten upon him the use of a form of words which he repudiates. As to the question itself, in my view there is very serious hardship inflicted upon the prisoner. It would be a very wicked wish to wish that the right hon. Gentleman himself might be a prisoner, so that he would be able to appreciate the position; but I am quite certain that if the right hon. Gentleman found himself in that position, he would know that there was a great deal more to consider than a mere question of cost in regard to being tried 200, 300, or 400 miles away from the place in which he had been arrested. The question is not always one of the simple cost of taking the witnesses where they are to be examined on the trial; but there is very frequently the much higher cost of the pain and trouble of finding evidence at all, and of procuring witnesses who are able to say what the facts of the case are. If you change the venue in the way this clause proposes, you surround the prisoner with people with whom he has never been brought in contact before, and he has no facilities whatever for producing evidence that would tell in his favour. On the other hand, if you try a man in the county where the alleged offence has been committed he is able to take care of himself, as I myself know from experience. I have been subjected to prosecution; but, fortunately, I have always been able to take care of myself. But an ignorant peasant, a vicious man, if you will, with no knowledge of legal technicalities or the Law of Evidence, will, undoubtedly, under the provisions of this clause, be placed in a position of very considerable difficulty.

Mr. Bradlaugh

MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I must say that when I first saw the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) my inclination was to support it; but on further consideration, and especially after hearing the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, I have come to the conclusion that there is one important fact which has been lost sight of which has decided me to vote against it. If we were discussing an abstract question as to what the course is which we ought to pursue, I should say that we ought to follow the practice laid down in Palmer's Act, and that there should be a direct application to the High Court of Justice, either by the Crown or the prisoner. But I cannot forget that this clause is introduced under special circumstances, and that it is to have no effect whatever except in a district which has been already proclaimed, and proclaimed, let it be borne in mind, by the Executive authority directly responsible for the government of Ireland. [Laughter from the Irish Members.] I am perfectly well aware that hon. Members from Ireland regard an assertion of that kind as perfectly ridiculous; but, nevertheless, the fact remains that we are now considering a Bill which presumes, at any rate, that there are districts in Ireland so disturbed in their character that it is necessary to proclaim them; and when once you arrive at the fact that these powers are not to apply at all except to a district already proclaimed I think you will get rid of a good deal of difficulty. Under such circumstances, allow me to call attention to the words of the Amendment, which propose to give the defendant the power to move to have the trial fixed outside the proclaimed district. The idea of supposing for a moment that any person charged with an offence, and that offence of an agrarian character, would ever desire to move the trial out of a proclaimed district is simply absurd. No doubt, it does appear hard, at first sight, that the onus of proof should be upon the defendant, and that the defendant should be called upon to apply to the High Court to get the original order rescinded. But it must be recollected that in principle this is exactly the course which is pursued under Palmer's Act, and that whatever expense is entailed in consequence is thrown upon the defendant. An order for a change of venue having been made, it is for the defendant to show that that change of venue will be unfair to him; and in that case he is required to appear personally or by counsel to argue the question, and in such a case exactly the same costs are thrown upon the defendant as he would be compelled to incur if the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney were adopted. As a matter of fact, the proposal now made by the Government is a very considerable improvement upon the practice laid down in the Act of 1882; and, personally, I am of opinion that if the High Court decides that a particular case ought not to be tried in a proclaimed district the Court would never think of removing the trial from the most Southern extremity to the most Northern. It certainly appears to me that no hardship will be involved in the case of the defendant having to instruct counsel to resist the application of the Attorney General; and, having regard to the fact that before an application of this kind can be listened to at all the district must have been proclaimed, I think there is no reason to fear that the judgment of the Court would not be in favour of directing that the trial shall take place in a locality where the trials shall be fair and impartial. For these reasons I cannot support the Amendment.

[Fifteenth Night.]

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down has given one of the most extraordinary reasons I ever heard for supporting the provision contained in this clause. He says that he had intended to support the Amendment, but that he declines now to do so because the provision is only to apply in a proclaimed district. Now, who is to decide what is to be a proclaimed district? It is to be the Lord Lieutenant and the Attorney General for Ireland, or, in other words, Dublin Castle. As for myself, I entirely repudiate the precedent of 1882. We are none of us infallible—not even the youngest of us—and we all know that a good many things have happened since 1882. Surely if the argument of the hon. and learned Member who spoke last, or the argument of the Chief Secretary, applies at all, it will apply just as strongly against the clause as it at present stands. We lawyers know what the legal costs are of resisting a legal application of this kind, and we know also what the costs are of making a counter application. There is, however, another consideration which ought not to be lost sight of; and that is that costs may, under this particular clause, be entailed in regard to an application which ought to have been altogether unnecessary: whereas if the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Charles Russell) is adopted, it will not be necessary for the defendant to appear at all, and therefore he need not incur any costs whatever. I should like to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland really knows what an order under this clause would cost the defendant? Does he know what the cost is of a simple appearance in the case of an order which is regarded as a matter of course? The only argument urged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, seems to me to be the strongest possible argument in favour of my hon. and learned Friend's Amendment. They both contend that it is improper to obtain legal evidence in favour of a change of venue in cases contemplated by the clause; but that the application must be based upon moral evidence. Now, what I contend is, that if it is impossible to obtain legal evidence in support of the application, that is the strongest argument that can be urged in favour of the Amendment. If the Amendment is not accepted, I am really disposed to think that the best plan would be to take the course of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), and in trials which come under this clause to take the verdict first and hear the evidence afterwards.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am glad to find that there is at least one hon. Member who sits on the Tory Benches opposite who, on the first view of this clause, would have been disposed to vote against those who may be called the professional advisers of this Bill. I regret that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Forrest Fulton) has seen fit to change the opinion he originally entertained, and I lament that he should now restrict his purview of this clause to cases in which the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council of Ireland shall have proclaimed a district. It is quite evident to my mind that the proclamation of a district can have nothing whatever to do with the circumstances of the case. So far as depriving a prisoner of his right to a fair trial is concerned, especially where an allegation is made that an unfair trial is likely to take place, if hon. Members will look at the provisions of this Bill they will see that it is altogether within the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant to declare whether a district is to be proclaimed or not; and, so far as the costs are concerned, if a defendant makes an appeal he is only to be allowed costs after all the expenses have been incurred. What is to be the position of a man who has been brought under the provisions of this Act for resisting the payment of a rent of £4 or £5 a-year? How can a man in such a position incur the cost of bringing up the witnesses who would be necessary to support his case. Therefore this provision would be an absolute nullity. How is it possible that he should incur the cost of taking witnesses from Donegal to Cork? The clause says that—and the Attorney General emphasized the fact that this provision is only to be carried out because such dangers now exist. The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say that, so far as he is personally concerned, he has always acted in an independent capacity. So far as his independence is concerned, I know nothing whatever of it; that is a matter for his own inner conscience; and it is not one of which the House of Commons can judge in any shape. He told us that personally he was prepared to exercise these powers with the greatest impartiality; but, unfortunately, we know how such powers have been exercised in other instances. There have been three examples very recently. What occurred in the trial at Sligo? The people declared that the jury panel was packed, and when a public meeting was held to protest against the steps which had been carried out in reference to the trial, the Mayor of Sligo, standing on the steps of the Town Hall, was attacked.

“It is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business,”

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is entering into matters which have no real relation to the Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: I am sorry if I have transgressed; but I was really anxious to show what, under this provision, the Attorney General might be able to do. Let me call attention to a case of a prosecution that occurred in Cork under the Dynamite Act, when the Attorney General availed himself of his right to challenge 20 of the jury, whereas the prisoners could only challenge six. What was the course pursued by the Crown in that particular case? The Government left out the word "felony" in the indictment in order that they might reduce the number of challenges allowed to the prisoners to six; and in so doing they committed, wilfully and maliciously, an act which the lowest and meanest mind would not commit. I challenge the Attorney General to rise in his place and state whether that was not the fact.

MR. HOLMES: I cannot say what was done in that particular case, because I had nothing whatever to do with the empannelling of the jury; but I am informed by the Solicitor General for Ireland that there was a technical mistake in omitting from the indictment the word "feloniously." Moreover, that technical flaw resulted in the fact that the indictment was quashed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes; upon an application by the prisoner.

MR. CHANCE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has only involved himself in further difficulty. The charge was a most serious one, and, in the end, it was shown that the Crown had indicted a man for an offence which was a statutory felony; but the omission of the word "felony" was so fatal an error that the indictment was quashed. I leave English Gentlemen sitting on that side of the House to judge whether by these tactics the position of the Crown, as Public Prosecutor, was not disgracefully abused. I am further reminded that in the case to which I am calling attention the prisoner was entitled to a copy of the affidavits, but it was not until he stood in the dock that he even heard the indictment against him read. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to have a somewhat short memory; but there was another case in which his Colleague who is now sitting beside him (Mr. Gibson) acted for him—namely, the trial of my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon), for having put forward the Plan of Campaign. In that case the venue was changed to Dublin, in the belief that the Crown would be readily able to secure 12 subservient jurymen, and in his burning solicitude for a fair trial the Crown Prosecutor directed no less than 28 jurors—respectable citizens of Dublin—to stand aside, while he allowed to the defendant the right of challenging six only. We all know how these powers are exercised, and the gross abuse of them is one of the reasons which induce me to support the Amendment. We are now told that it will be sufficient to justify the Court in assenting to a change of venue that there should be a statement made upon evidence, which may simply amount to general hearsay. The Attorney General seems to forget—his memory, I am afraid, is very short—that not long ago one of his own nominees, in a case in which the hon. Member for East Mayo was concerned, made statements which were subsequently shown to be altogether destitute of foundation. So also, in applications under this clause for a change of venue, the statement that the Crown may have a difficulty in securing a fair and impartial trial may be the most misleading assertion that can be imagined. Nor must it be forgotten that the Crown has enormous funds at its disposal. Indeed, it is notorious that in connection with the administration of justice the Crown spends upwards of £300,000 a-year more in Ireland than is spent in England according to the same extent of population. Not only is that the case, but the Irish Executive utilizes the Secret Service Fund for the commission of crime and outrage in Ireland, instead of checking it. Who are the persons who will be prosecuted under this measure? Prisoners whose only crime will be that they have defended their miserable cabins; that they have protected their aged and infirm parents from the brutality of the police, and defended their wives and daughters from outrage—prisoners who have no resources whatever, but against whom the whole power and majesty of the law will be arrayed. Reference has been made to civil actions, but in such cases you do not find the intervention of the Crown, the action being one that is simply between the parties. Further than that, when the venue is changed, the defendant has the same number of challenges as the prosecutor, and is not placed at the disadvantage of knowing that the Crown can select 12 men to try the case from whom a conviction is almost a matter of certainty. I am sorry that there are Members of this Committee who are prepared to justify the action of the Irish Executive. I trust that there are Members of the Tory Party who will examine the matter for themselves, and will hesitate before they consent to give a blind and silent vote. Let me say one word as to the difficulty of placing evidence before the Court. Under a Tory Code, settled by a Tory Commission, appointed by a Tory Government in 1879, provision was made which placed the defendant and the prosecutor on a footing of equality whenever an application for a change of venue might be made. It cannot be pretended that in 1879 Ireland was less disturbed than it is now, and if the difficulties which existed in 1879 were not insupportable I do not see why they should be insupportable now.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I am glad to find that it is conceded by hon. Members on both sides of the House that this is an important issue. It was quite an agreeable change to hear an hon. and learned Member on the other side of the House express his views upon the matter instead of those Law Officers of Ireland of whom we had become absolutely tired, and there has been not only a uniformity of argument, but an absolute uniformity in regard to the persons who have reason on the part of the Government to express it. So far as the Attorney General for Ireland is concerned, his achievements to-day surpass anything he has hitherto attempted, and he has quite outshone himself. His statement was that under Palmer's Act, whenever an application has been made for a change of venue, the Court has always refused the application, the real fact being that it has always been impossible to give a satisfactory reason for a change of venue whenever an application of the Crown has been seriously challenged. The Attorney General for Ireland is to be a party with the Lord Lieutenant in proclaiming a district, and the moment a district is proclaimed you say that he is to have a right to say that there shall be a change of venue. I am glad to find that the proposal is one which in the abstract is resisted even by the hon. and learned Member for West Ham (Mr. Fulton), and I am sure that the arguments upon which it is based by the Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary for Ireland are altogether unsound.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): My hon. Friend says that he is tired of hearing the Law Officers of the Crown. I cannot say that I share in that feeling, for there is one Irish Law Officer whom we have not yet had an opportunity of hearing at all—the Solicitor General for Ireland. I think it is an insult to the Irish Members that that hon. and learned Gentleman should have been required to remain silent on the Tory Benches, while the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who knows absolutely nothing about the Bill, should be put up time after time to give legal information to the House. So far as the question of costs is concerned, I am afraid that whoever drafted the Bill has kept in a provision by which what may be called a species of fat is to be provided for outside members of the Irish Bar, who are to act as devils to the Attorney General for Ireland, and receive odd briefs. Reference has been made to the fact that a provision of this kind was contained in the Act of 1882; but it has not been stated that that provision was passed at a moment when the Irish Members had been kicked out of the House. As a matter of fact, it was agreed to when the Irish Members had been suspended, and with all its imperfections undiscussed and undebated, and without one single Irish Member having had an opportunity of saying a word upon it. If the First Lord of the Treasury carries his own Motion for the closure, the same farce will be enacted again, and any provision the Government like to insist upon will be carried without debate and without discussion. If the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) were here, I would ask him whether, in his present zeal for economy, he thinks it right that Irish barristers should be enabled to pocket substantial fees simply for going into Court and making motions which must be carried as a matter of course? In this Jubilee Year of Her Majesty, are you going to be so princely in regard to fees and pickings for Irish counsel that, as a matter of course, you will give them a fee of two guineas where one would suffice? No doubt the Attorney General for Ireland occupies a position which requires a lot of keeping up, but it must be borne in mind that this is an expenditure which does not go into his pocket, but into the pocket of outside and inferior men, who deserve no consideration whatever. Unless the House wishes to add something to the already bloated pockets of the Irish Law Officers, I do not see why it should not be sufficient to declare that the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland should be sufficient, and that the order for a change of venue should be made as a matter of course. It must not be forgotten that in many cases these crumbs which may fall from the table of Dives will only find their way into the pockets of the Lazaruses who act as the jackals of the Attorney General for Ireland, a class of animals for whom nobody has an overwhelming amount of respect. I, therefore, trust that the Government will see their way to omit this part of the Bill, and that they will provide that the simple fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland shall be sufficient to justify a change of venue.

Mr. Chance

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): As far as I can understand the object of the clause, it is to procure a fair and impartial trial; but so far as the impartiality is concerned, everything is to be left to the Attorney General for Ireland, and all the facts of the case, instead of being left to both sides, are to be left to one side only. It seems to be a sufficient answer to any proposition made by the Government to say that it is to be carried out by the Attorney General for Ireland, and no one is to question the angelic character of the Attorney General for Ireland, at any rate until he happens to leave the Government, when, of course, he will be replaced by some other right hon. and learned Gentleman who will be entitled to the same angelic description. For the purpose of explaining my view of the matter, let me assume a case. The Government think it proper to prosecute me for some offence and the Attorney General for Ireland undertakes the prosecution in the ordinary way. Now I presume that when the Attorney General of Ireland goes into Court, he forgets altogether that he is a Member of the Government, and he has no regard for that fact either in the course of the trial itself, or in preparing for it. In that case, he will simply occupy the position of counsel and will do his best for his clients, and the first thing he desires to do is to secure an impartial trial. It may be the view of the Attorney General for Ireland that an impartial trial can only be had in the County of Down, but that may not be the view of the late Attorney General for Ireland, who may have been retained. Then I cannot understand why the Attorney General for Ireland, whose relations with the Government are practically at an end the moment he goes into Court, should have rights and privileges which are not to be enjoyed by the counsel for the defence. It seems to me that if any advantage is to be given at all it ought, in fairness and on principle, to be given to the man who has to defend himself against an accusation. What I ask for in this case is, that the two counsel engaged in it shall have identically the same rights and the same privileges; whereas under the clause as it stands, the Government and their supporters desire to give in a trial before a Superior Court an advantage to one counsel only, because he happens to be a Member of the existing Government, to the disadvantage of the prisoner, and a privilege which would not be given to any counsel if he did not happen to represent the Attorney General for Ireland. That seems to me to be grossly unfair so far as the administration of justice is concerned. And now let me deal with the second part of the clause. It is quite clear that in the majority of prosecutions under this measure the Attorney General for Ireland cannot attend to them himself, and, therefore, he cannot be personally conversant with the conditions under which a particular trial may take place in any particular district, so as to be able to say of his own knowledge that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. He has, therefore, to depend upon the knowledge of somebody else. I am quite prepared to admit that the Attorney General for Ireland himself is an angelic character in the highest degree. I do not say that jocosely, but I allow that he is a fair, honourable, and upright man. It is clear, however, that he can know nothing personally of the conditions under which a trial can be instituted. Then, on whom does he rely? He is bound to rely upon the Crown Prosecutor; and the Crown Prosecutors, like other bodies of men, may be good, bad, or indifferent. As a matter of fact, for some years a Crown Prosecutor who had more to do with political trials than anybody else was Mr. George Bolton. I simply mention the name of that gentleman, because it is so well known to the House, and the course taken by him in reference to the administration of justice in Ireland is well known. Well, if this Bill is passed, as I have no doubt it will be, Mr. George Bolton is a man who will give the information to the Attorney General for Ireland upon which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is to issue his certificate, and make his declaration that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. There are other George Boltons in Ireland, for the Crown Prosecutor, as a rule, is attached to Dublin Castle, and he is bound to have a bias in favour of one particular side, and a very strong bias too. Now, I say distinctly that if the Attorney General for Ireland is to obtain his information from gentlemen like Mr. Bolton, whose bias is notorious, and who is still, I believe, one of the Crown Prosecutors in Ireland, although he has been condemned by every Government who has been in Office for the last five years, although he is a gentleman who has been proved up to the hilt to have indulged in improper practices, although it is notorious that he has been a dishonest Crown Prosecutor—and because he was a dishonest Crown Prosecutor the Government removed him from a portion of his duties—nevertheless, the Attorney General for Ireland will not deny that, under this Bill, he may have to rely upon statements made by a gentleman of that character, in order to justify him in issuing a certificate that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in a particular locality. As a matter of fact, the Attorney General for Ireland is bound to fall back upon the Crown Prosecutor; and here we have a case in which a Crown Prosecutor has been proved, both by the late and the present Government, to be dishonest. Yet it is upon the information supplied by a Gentleman of that character that the Attorney General for Ireland is to have the privilege of removing a trial to whatever part of Ireland he may think proper. Viewing it as a matter of justice and principle, how can any hon. Member in this House defend the claim which is made by the Government, that the Attorney General for Ireland, acting under the conditions I have described, is entitled to have this privilege, while a similar privilege is to be denied to the late Attorney General for Ireland, no matter how good the case he may be able to bring forward, and however clearly he could establish that a trial in a particular district would not be a fair and impartial trial so far as his client is concerned? I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. and learned Member for West Ham (Mr. Fulton) say that at one time he felt disposed to vote for the Amendment, because one does not expect an hon. Member on that side of the House to vote for any Amendment, good, bad, or indifferent, proposed from this side. But when the hon. and learned Member rose to explain his views, what was the defence he made for his altered action? He told us that if this clause were to be applied to the whole of Ireland he would vote for the Amendment. His only excuse for refusing to take that course, beyond the angelic character of the Attorney General for Ireland, is the fact that it is only to be applied to a part of Ireland.

Mr. Molloy

MR. FORREST FULTON: I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon; what I said was, that this power of changing the venue is only to be exercised in the case of a proclaimed district.

MR. MOLLOY: Quite so; but that does not alter the case one iota. If it is unjust and wrong to apply this principle to the whole of Ireland, it is equally unjust and wrong to apply it to part. It cannot be denied that, even in regard to the proclamation of a district, the Lord Lieutenant is to act largely, if not entirely, upon the advice of the Attorney General for Ireland, and if the Attorney General for Ireland, for purposes of his own, chooses to proclaim a particular district, that fact does not render the application of this principle one whit the less unjust. If it is unjust to apply it to the whole of Ireland, it is manifestly unjust to apply it to part. If privileges are to be given to counsel on the one side, it is only equally right that they should be given to counsel on the other side, and for these reasons I shall feel it my duty to resist the clause to the utmost of my power.

Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 177; Noes 142: Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 204.) [7.25 P.M.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move to leave out the word "more," after "a," in page 3, line 26. As the clause is at present drawn, all the Attorney General has to certify is that a more fair and impartial trial can be had elsewhere than in the county in which the crime is committed. I wish that he should be called upon to certify that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county in which the offence has taken place. That is an intelligent proposition, and I shall be greatly surprised if the Government decline to accept it. It is quite possible there may be cases in which more fair and impartial trials can be had elsewhere; but that is not a reason why you should change the venue if a fair and impartial trial can be had in the county in which the crime takes place.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, after the first words "a," to leave out the word "more."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'more' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It seems to me, and I think no one will deny the proposition, that in the interest of the public, the Crown, and anyone who is anxious to see justice fairly and impartially administered, every trial should take place where the most fair and impartial trial can be had. The Government are of opinion that a trial can be more fair and impartial in one place than in another, and that, in my opinion, is a good ground for removing a trial. Assuming that we all desire that trials should take place under the most fair and impartial circumstances, it is perfectly sufficient for a certificate to be made that a more fair and impartial trial can be had in one place than in another.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I have never questioned the proposition which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has laid down that the form provided under this section is a sufficient form. What I complain of is that it is too sufficient. I entirely take issue with the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to what the policy of this clause should be. I entirely deny that what the Government are looking for is an ideal venue. Of course if it was the general policy of law that you could not have a trial unless you had a venue open to no conceivable objection—an ideal venue—the right hon. and learned Gentleman's contention would be perfectly intelligible. But what I say is this—that before you turn your back upon the present Constitutional doctrine that a person shall be tried in the county in which the offence is committed, it should be shown that in that county a fair and impartial trial cannot be obtained. That ought to be the foundation of an application for a change of venue. I maintain that, as the clause is at present drawn, it would not be competent for the Attorney General to make out that case. He might go into Court and admit that a fair and impartial trial can be had in the county, but say that, in his opinion, a more fair and impartial trial can be had elsewhere, and on that ground ask for a change of venue. It is absurd that the Government should ask for this power, and unreasonable to expect Parliament to grant it. Let the Government be content to leave well alone. If they have a county in which they can have a fair and impartial trial, why go speculating as to whether they can get a better trial elsewhere. They ought to remember that all things are not perfect in this world, and that even when this Bill comes into force they need not expect a state of perfection to prevail in Ireland. I maintain that if the Attorney General is satisfied that a fair and impartial trial can be had in the county in which the offence was committed, he ought to be content, and not go elsewhere to see if he can get a more fair and impartial trial.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 85: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 205.) [7.50 P.M.]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move to omit the words in line 27, "some county to be named in the certificate," and insert, "the County of the City of Dublin." The object of my Amendment is that the Attorney General should nominate the particular county to which the venue shall be changed, and that he should not be left to take us to Belfast, Derry, or some other places which he admits to be unfit places for the trial of certain cases. I may remind him that, so far as the Act of 1882 went, all the special jury trials took place in Dublin, with the exception of a few which came off in the City of Cork. Now, Sir, the City of Dublin contains, I have no doubt we shall be told, the great mass of the special jury classes. I do not know any other venue that contains so many except Belfast, and I am sure the Attorney General for Ireland will not tell us he is going to take us to Belfast. I may be told also that the City of Dublin venue would not always be the most suitable venue. I presume the Attorney General for Ireland could, if he liked, go to the Court and show cause. Let him put in a provision that he shall show cause. Allow me to point this out, that it was a City and County of Dublin venue which tried, for instance, the Phoenix Park cases; it was a mixed venue of the City and County of Dublin which tried all the recent political cases in Ireland. Except in the County and City of Cork I do not know where else the Government can get a sufficient number of special jurors to pack a jury. Take the County of Cork County Clare I think you have the same number. Outside the City of Dublin you have really not sufficient special jurors qualified to act. Now, so far as the whole South of Ireland goes, I admit that my Amendment is really of no importance, but it is all-important as it is now decided we are not to be dragged to Ulster and to be tried there by members of Orange lodges and secret societies. I think now that a day is to be fixed for the termination of this Committee. I shall put down an Amendment providing that no person who is a member of any secret society shall be allowed to serve upon a special jury. If you take the case of Ulster you will find that every special juror is a member of a secret society. He is either a Freemason or an Orangeman. In this country Freemason Lodges are mere dining clubs, but in Ulster they have always a political bias—though a Catholic can join a Freemason Lodge—and these Lodges become cliques of persons of a particular class. An organization which in England really does not mean anything at all, but which is very like the Ancient and Independent Order of Buffaloes, in Ireland has a bias of a very objectionable character. In the same way Orangemen would always prevail in Belfast juries, therefore I think it is a reasonable thing that the Attorney General should be compelled to choose the County of the City of Dublin as his venue, and then he should, if he likes, have power to show cause why it would be proper to change the venue from the City of Dublin.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, to leave out the words "some county to be named in the certificate," and insert, "the County of the City of Dublin."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'some county to be named in the certificate,' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I cannot but think that it would be very unfair to throw all the work which these trials will entail upon the special jurors of the City of Dublin. There are a great number of counties in Ireland situated at a great distance from the County of the City of Dublin, and it would be unreasonable to bring prisoners to Dublin from these counties, unless their expenses were paid. It is quite impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The Attorney General for Ireland has been very brief indeed, and very curt in giving his reasons for objecting to this Amendment. But to my mind, if I were on the Government Bench, and desired to give honest and straightforward reasons for objecting to this Amendment, I think I could give two reasons which would have a deal more cogency than the right hon. and learned Gentleman's. There is one reason perfectly obvious. No doubt, most of the jurors of the City of Dublin are men of great probity, and also men of considerable independence, and, taken from the Government point of view, they are men against whom it would be very difficult to advance anything improper; but, unfortunately for the Government, they are not men altogether of one class of mind and political belief. The real reason why this Amendment will not be accepted is that, although the City of Dublin was good enough under the Crimes Act of 1882, under the new Crimes Act it is the intention of the Government to bring prisoners from the South and West of Ireland to Antrim and to Armagh, and such like venues, try them before 12, I will not say Orangemen, but landlords, agents, or Government hangers-on, and half-pay captains. There is another very strong reason why this Amendment should not be accepted from the Government point of view, and it is this. It is an unhappy state of things, from their point of view, that all the Judges upon the Irish Bench cannot be depended upon. The Judges take certain Assizes, and it might be very awkward and inconvenient for the Government if prisoners were dragged to trial before Judges like the Chief Baron, for instance. The Chief Baron and two or three others of the Irish Judges might not give that assistance to the maintenance of law and order which, in the opinion of Dublin Castle officials, they ought to give. Therefore, it is that under this clause power is taken to delay applying for a change of venue until the last moment, until the Assizes are out and until the Crown is in a position to discover that there is a good and sound Judge to be had in certain places, to which places, of course, they will send political prisoners. The Government unquestionably will pick out the Northern venues in which sound Judges, from their point of view, are found to be presiding. These are, to my mind, the real reasons why this Amendment will not be accepted.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Mr. Courtney, the consideration of the Attorney General for Ireland for the convenience of Irish jurors is really very touching. I am sure the jurors will be greatly edified by his attitude towards them. But perhaps I may be allowed to call attention to the way in which the Government have treated Cork jurors in holding Winter Assizes at Cork for the whole province of Munster. Nearly every year for 10 years the Winter Assizes have been held at Cork, although the Government have power to vary the place from time to time. I put a question upon this subject to the Government, but in regard to it, I received very scant courtesy indeed. In the matter of the Cork Winter Assizes, the Attorney General considered the convenience of the learned counsel prosecuting the prisoners, and the learned Judge who was to leave Dublin to try the prisoners, of importance paramount to the convenience of the jurors of Cork. In that state of things, I am not disposed to attach very great weight to his commiseration of the wrongs that have been inflicted on the jurors of the City of Dublin. We take the right hon. and learned Gentleman's declaration of sympathy as worth very little indeed. Now, what are the arguments which may be urged in favour of this Amendment. It appears to me they are many and weighty. In the first place, the City of Dublin is the centre of the legal system of Ireland, it is the place where the bulk of the civil business is done; indeed, I think it could be shown that nine out of every 10 record trials which have taken place in Ireland for the past 10 years have been tried in the City of Dublin, because, since the Judicature Act came into force, the trial of records in the City of Dublin has been a matter of great convenience. Then, Dublin being the capital of Ireland, is very convenient as regards travelling to and from it. It is easy of access, there are great facilities concerning Dublin in the way of trains and other conveyances, and considered from the point of view of the convenience of witnesses and other persons, Dublin is a very convenient place for a trial. Then, again, the burden of judicial work is cast on the shoulders of a larger number of persons in the City of Dublin than it is in any other portion of Ireland. Dublin is the largest City in Ireland, and of course the number of jurors in Dublin is larger than that elsewhere. That being so, Dublin is in that sense the place best fitted for the trial of the cases which will arise under this section. Although to change the venue of these cases to Dublin would inflict some inconvenience and additional work upon the jurors of Dublin, that inconvenience and additional work would be less than that thrown upon the jurors of any other district. Now let me test the value of the declaration of the Attorney General for Ireland by his own action within the past six months. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had himself to choose venues within the past six months. He was fixing the Winter Assizes over a vast area of Ireland, an area extending over the greater portion of Leinster and some portion of Munster. What he did was to try in Dublin prisoners of no less than seven counties in Ireland at the last Winter Assizes. So far from considering the feelings of the unfortunate jurors of Dublin he cast that additional burden upon them without the smallest compunction. Prisoners from counties so remote as Waterford were tried in the City of Dublin. It does appear to me that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should give some consideration to this Amendment. I think he might reasonably have taken into consideration the precedent pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy)—namely, the precedent of the Crimes Act of 1882. There is no doubt it was not compulsory on the Executive to select the City of Dublin in every particular case; but so great was the convenience of the City of Dublin, and so strong were the arguments that could be urged in favour of it, that in every case, with very few exceptions, the City of Dublin was selected by the Irish Executive of that day as the place in which to try cases from all parts of Ireland. Really, the difficulty is not to find arguments for this Amendment, but to find arguments against it—not a new experience in respect to the progress of this Bill. I certainly consider that the Government are acting unreasonably in refusing this Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think I should make it clear that I only moved this Amendment in order to elicit the opinion of the Government in regard to the place of trial. I do not mean to say that the City of Dublin is always the best venue; but what I wanted was some declaration from the Government as to the bringing of prisoners for trial, say, from the South to Ulster. I should like to ask some of the Members of the Government who are in their places if they have ever examined the Return showing what the facts are as regards special juries. We will take the case of the County of Leitrim. There are 110 special jurors in this county, in which there are 15,000 voters or householders. You have 110 persons to whom you are going to entrust the entire administration of law and order in the whole of Ireland. There is no county, except the County of the City of Dublin, in which there are 1,000 men who in future will have any interest or concern in the administration of justice. You have reduced the special jury class in Ireland to such a condition that nowhere, except in the single instance of the County of the City of Dublin, where there are 1,300, are there 1,000 men who in future will have anything to say in the administration of the law. It is right that Englishmen should thoroughly understand this state of affairs. In some of the counties there are 100, 121, 182, 233, 271, 50, 112, 113, and so on, the average being one special juror in 50 voters. In addition to that, you cut down the special jurors still lower by the system of unlimited challenge, so as to bring the thing down to what has been called a residuum. I must confess that I should not like to be a special juror, for by what you are doing you are really converting the special juror class into lightning conductors for popular passion. Fortunately, they will be shielded, to a large extent, by the feeling of appeasement which the people entertain owing to the proposals which have been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone).

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): It is just possible that one of the reasons why the Attorney General for Ireland objects to the venue of the County of the City of Dublin, is that by an Act passed, I think, under a Tory régime, some few years ago, the City of Dublin recovered the power it formerly possessed of electing its Sheriff, and that since then it has always elected Nationalists, whether Protestants or Catholics. The people of the City of Dublin have, through the election of the Sheriff and Sub-Sheriff, clearly shown of what their political views are, and now it is on account of the prevalence of Nationalist views that the Government fight shy of the City of Dublin venue for the trial of political offences. I dare say that if we proposed the County of Dublin, instead of the County of the City of Dublin, there would not be such a great objection. In the County of Dublin they have, as High Sheriff, a rack-renting landlord—a gentleman who has made himself extremely prominent in the landlord ranks, and they have, in addition, a Sub-Sheriff of the same kidney—a man who has not only identified himself with the landlord party, but who has so far mixed himself up in illegal proceedings as to get himself reported to this House for corruption and bribery at an election—practised in the interest of the landlord minority in his constituency. It is as well that the real reason for the refusal of this Amendment should be stated in debate. The County of the City of Dublin has been, in past years, the venue for all these trials. If you go back to the beginning of the century you find the City of Dublin the venue for all political and agrarian trials of importance; and coming down to 1848, the trials for treason and treason-felony all took place in the same venue. The Fenian prisoners were tried in the City of Dublin. All the prisoners convicted under the Crimes Act of 1882 were tried in the City of Dublin; but of late years—since the Corporation of Dublin got into the habit of electing Nationalists as High Sheriff—the Government have fought shy of the City of Dublin. In the case of the last State prosecutions, the Crown first fixed the venue in the City of Dublin. But they thought better of it, and removed the venue to the County of Dublin, where they endeavoured—though unsuccessfully—to pack the panel, by the aid of the landlord Sheriff, and that corrupt official the Sub-Sheriff. The Attorney General for Ireland professes great concern for the jurors of the City of Dublin; but we can understand exactly the value of that concern. He need have no concern on that point. I may remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that even in the City of Dublin the Crown, under the present law—notwithstanding the presence of a Nationalist High Sheriff and a Nationalist Sub-Sheriff—have, and always will have, a certain number of men who will be only too proud and too happy to act as convicts of Nationalists under all circumstances. There are many gentlemen in Dublin, well known to Dublin Castle, who hang up the Lion and Unicorn over their shop doors, and who no doubt expect to receive from the Parliamentary Under Secretary (Colonel King-Harman), in this year of the Jubilee, a medal for their services. These men will always be at hand to try political prisoners. They will be looking out anxiously for the appearance of their names in the lists. They will not object if they are called upon every day in the year to serve upon juries in political and agrarian cases. Their great glory and boast in their Freemason and Orange Lodges is that they have so many Nationalist scalps in their net. In the case of every successive prosecution you will find these men hanging round the Courts, wanting to be put upon juries, and, I venture to say, protesting loudly if they are not put upon juries. I am afraid it is a mere pretence on the part of the Government that they have any great concern for the jurors of the City of Dublin. If there is any use in urging any reasons in favour of this Amendment—and I hardly think there is, seeing the state of the Government Bench, and the attitude of the Representatives of the Government present—I venture to say there is just one reason why Dublin City is about the one venue in all Ireland which ought to try such cases as will be brought up under this Act. The cases to be tried will be cases arising out of disputes concerning land, and surely the fittest community to try cases of this sort is a constituency which is not agricultural or rural, but urban. The City of Dublin, as far as I know, is the only place in Ireland, not even excluding Belfast, where you can get a sufficient number of jurors unconnected with the land, and, therefore, to a certain extent qualified to try these cases impartially. I urge this upon the attention of the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster). It is a solid argument and reason which ought to be taken notice of, and it is offered with a sincere desire to convince him if I can. I think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) was somewhat out in his impression that the Government intended to make use of the other counties of Ireland besides Dublin and the Northern counties. No doubt, the Attorney General for Ireland in stating his case said something to lead to that impression. But I am afraid there are only two places in the whole of Ireland to which the Government will venture to send political or agrarian cases. They will send them to two places, and to two places only. They will send them to the town of Belfast, where Orangemen will greatly predominate on the juries, or they will send them to South Dublin, where they can, by judicious manipulation of the panel, secure a jury of rack-renting landlords to do what they want. I have no doubt that if they want convictions, they will obtain them under this Act, but their gain will be the ruin of the system they uphold.

Question put and agreed to.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I beg to move, in page 3, the insertion of the words ("not in Ulster,") after "county," in line 27. The object of the Amendment is, of course, very clear. The Attorney General for Ireland himself has said it would not be fair to move a trial from the Southern Provinces into the Province of Ulster. The whole of the arguments advanced by the Government in favour of this section have been entirely based upon the words "more fair and impartial trial." Now, as the Government admit, it would be unfair to move a trial from the Southern Provinces into Ulster. I take it for granted they cannot have any particular objection to the insertion of the words "not in Ulster." Speaking of Ulster in a former debate, the present Attorney General for Ireland said that Province was the most law-abiding part of Ireland. Owing to what has happened since then, he has changed his opinion to a very large extent, and admits now that a fair trial would not be had in cases arising in the Southern Provinces. Still another Gentleman may very soon succeed the right hon. and learned Gentleman in his Office, and what we want to guard against is, that there shall not be any attempt on the part of a future Attorney General to get "a more fair and impartial trial" in the Province of Ulster. We know very well that those who will be special jurors in Ulster entertain the most violent views upon anything which appertains to politics and religion; and, therefore, it would be most unfair to submit to them any case from another Province of a political or agrarian character. No one who has any knowledge of Ireland would, for a moment, suggest that the trial in Ulster, of a political offender from the South, would be fair and impartial. The Government can have no valid reason for refusing this Amendment, especially since the Attorney General for Ireland has admitted its propriety.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, after the word "county," to insert the words ("not in Ulster").—(Mr. Molloy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I venture to think that this matter of the change of venue must be decided according to the facts of each case. I can imagine that Ulster would be a proper place in which some trials should take place, and in which a fair and impartial trial might be assured. It is impossible to foresee every event; and, therefore, it would not be right to pick out any of the Provinces, and say that in that Province a trial shall not be held. We must assume that people will do their duty—"Oh, oh!"—I am quite aware hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway do not assume anything of the kind; but I, in my position, am obliged to assume that the Government will not use the clause improperly, and, for the reason I have given, it is impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): If the Government will accept the Proviso standing in the name of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr.

Commings), which is to the effect that no man shall be taken out of his own Province, except the County of the City of Dublin, the whole point will be met. This Amendment compels the Government to exclude Ulster altogether. That, of course, would not be fair, because some men might prefer to be tried in Ulster. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) has said the Government will not act improperly. Why cannot we have "propriety" inserted in the Statute? We all intend to act honestly, and we do not think it an insult to have notions of propriety laid down in the form of the Ten Commandments. It is no insult to anybody that the Ten Commandments are in existence. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has said it would not be a fair thing to take any man from a Southern county to a Northern county for trial. Will he allow us to quote that expression in the Courts? I never knew a Bill conducted on such principles as this. We have had "Will-of-the-wisp" kinds of arguments advanced by the Government when we meet them in respect to one argument, they fly to another, and subsequently they rake up the first as fresh as ever. I do beg the Government to say they will allow no man to be taken out of his own Province for trial, and perhaps it would be better to take the discussion upon this subject upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commings). Let me give a couple of instances of the bias of Ulster jurors. In the case of Bernard Smith—I forgot the man's surname the other night—one of the Crossmaglen prisoners, Judge Lawson directed an acquittal, but the jury convicted the man. In the same way, Judge Lawson made a distinction in the case of a man named Geoghan, but he also was convicted. Smith was released in a few weeks, but it took the Government two years to make up their minds whether Geoghan was guilty or not. At the end of two years they released him. It is just possible that some time or other the Friends of the Government will wish there was some such provision as I suggest. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman), may be glad sometimes that men cannot be taken out of Ulster to be tried. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), if he made a fiery speech when there is a Home Rule Government, might prefer to be tried in Ulster. The senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), in a letter he wrote to The Times yesterday, declared that Ulster forms a separate nationality, and yet it is to this separate nationality we are to be dragged for trial if the Attorney General for Ireland thinks fit. I would rather be tried in the City of London with The Times blasts operating on the jurors than be tried in Belfast. Everybody in the Committee must know what kind of justice a poor Nationalist would get in Belfast. I greatly fear that if these clauses are carried out in their integrity the people may be driven to retaliatory measures of a very violent nature.

MR. MOLLOY: I was not aware the question is to be brought up in another and a better form. I will, therefore, ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. COMMINGS (Roscommon, S.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name—namely, in page 3, line 29, after "certificate," to add—

"Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall empower the removal of any trial from any one of the four provinces to anywhere outside of such province, except the County of the City of Dublin."

This Amendment, I think, scarcely requires explanation. The promoters of this Bill maintain that they are actuated by the desire to have a fair administration of justice in Ireland. Well, I will assume that they are, though I am afraid that the assumption is a rather violent one, and one which, when I go back in history, or even in my own recollection, I should find very little except the sort of protestations we have heard from them to support. However, we will assume that they mean to administer justice fairly, and if they do that, no doubt the provision, modified in the way I propose to modify this 4th clause, would be one that would conduce to a fair administration of justice in Ireland. We know that it does not conduce to a fair administration of justice in Ireland, nor to the public belief that it is fair, or intended to be fair, when there is a change of venue such as took place in the case of the Maamtrasna murders. I have no sympathy for the Maamtrasna murderers; I do not believe anyone outside their own wretched circle had any sympathy with them, yet I think that everyone, no matter who he may be, is entitled to a fair trial. Everyone who is to be put upon his defence wants a fair trial; and I do not think it conduced to the fair administration of justice in Ireland, or to the confidence of the public in the fair administration of justice, that these poor wretched people, speaking not a word of English, were moved for trial out of their own neighbourhood, and taken 60 miles away, where there was difficulty in getting witnesses, where the people were not familiar with the locality of the murder, and brought before a jury, in a certain sense, of foreigners, who did not even speak the language of these poor people, and with whom the prisoners could have no communication whatever except through the medium of an interpreter —

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

DR. COMMINS: I am calling attention to what has been the practice in Ireland in regard to these trials. In former Acts, there was a power given to remove trials from one part of Ireland to another; but I doubt if a single instance can be adduced in which that power was exercised in such a way as to command the confidence of the people of the country, or as to have secured acquiescence on the part of the public in the fairness of the trial and the justice of the verdict. I have watched these trials for the last 25 or 30 years—so long, in fact, as I have been competent to examine these matters at all; and I challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), or the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), to name a single instance where, in the last dozen Coercion Acts, powers such as those which will be given under this clause were conferred, and where a change of venue has taken place, where that change was not afterwards challenged by public opinion, and where the Law Officers of the Crown had not the direst imputations made against them, and made against them with justice, and where the verdict was not challenged as that of a partial or packed jury. I challenge these learned Gentlemen to produce a single instance in the history of previous Coercion Acts where a single removal like this did what it ought to have done—namely, to have secured acquiescence in the fairness of the verdict and of the trial. If we look at previous experience in Ireland, this provision that we are now discussing stands condemned unless modified in the manner in which I am now proposing to modify it. If the same spirit actuated the administrators of the law in Ireland as actuates the administrators of the law in England, I should not object to a provision of this kind; indeed, I should welcome it; I should take it in the form in which it stands in the Bill. We know that there are few changes of venue made in England; but we know that from the beginning, when this system of alteration of venue commenced, that the power has never been exercised in a single instance where the friends of the accused have been able to say that it was exercised for political or partizan purposes, or where they could say that it was not exercised in such a way as to provide a fairer trial than could otherwise have been had. We all remember the first occasion upon which this alteration in the law took place in England. We all know the method that was adopted in order to enable a case to be transferred from the country to the Central Criminal Court, when there was fair ground for supposing that a fair trial could not be had in the country. That was under "Palmer's Act." From the time of the passing of that Act down to the present time this alteration of venue has taken place very seldom indeed. I do not think 20 cases have occurred altogether; but in all the cases that have occurred the result was in every case to command the confidence of the country in both the fairness of the trial and the justness of the verdict. Does anyone suppose that such a result attends the alteration of venue in Ireland? Does anyone suppose that the Law Officers in Ireland, who are invested with autocratic power by this Act to move trials from one place to another as they think fit, will exercise that power as it is exercised in England? Nothing of the sort. You will have one set of people in the North who will always expect to have their trials kept at home, as were the trials at Omagh in the last Winter Assizes, so that the prisoners can have a jury selected out of their own sworn brotherhood. You have another class of people, in another part of Ireland, who will expect that their cases will be moved, as was the Maamtrasna trial, from Galway to Dublin, and so on, in order that a jury might be packed with confidence and certainty. So that Ireland is in such a state that you can have no removal of venue in criminal cases from one province to another which would not be suspected, and, I venture to say, suspected with justice, of having been arranged with a corrupt motive, and with the object of procuring a conviction. I ask is it advisable or right in the state in which we find public opinion at the present time in Ireland to add fresh fuel to fire? Is it wise to give fresh impetus to this suspicion that exists in Ireland, on the part of five-sixths of the people, that the very fountain of justice is poisoned, and that a fair trial cannot be had in any case in which there is an agrarian or political element? Is it fair or just in those who wish to induce confidence in the administration of justice to introduce a provision of this sort, which will destroy the last vestige of confidence remaining—which I venture to say is very small indeed—in the administration of justice in Ireland? Can it be said that if the Amendment I propose is adopted, anything is done which will interfere with a fair trial being had? If a crime of a political or agrarian character occurs in Cork, you will have power to change the venue to the Province of Leinster, for a trial can be removed to Dublin, where, amongst the special jury class, you have a number of persons dependent upon the Executive in every sort of way. You have practically persons upon the special jury panel to choose from, five-sixths of whom I should say are either directly or indirectly dependent upon Dublin Castle. I venture to say that not even the Law Officers of the Crown for Ireland will contradict me when I say that out of those special jurors dependent on the Castle—those tradesmen or people in the Excise or Customs, those Resident Magistrates, and those people of a variety of callings who come to Dublin to be near the Castle—the Executive would always be able to get a jury prejudiced against the prisoner, no matter where he comes from. No one, I think, will contradict that. If I had to select a jury myself for a trial of my own, I certainly would not go to Dublin. If I were charged with an agrarian or political offence, I should say that the Dublin panel would be hostile to me, and that I should not have a fair trial; and yet, under this Amendment, I would allow the Law Officers of the Crown to bring persons, if they think fit, to be tried there by a special jury, chosen from a panel prejudiced in favour of the Crown, and, if prejudice can exist in such a case, prejudiced against the prisoner. That being so, provision is in this Amendment made for a trial such as the Law Officers of the Crown, the promoters of this Bill, ought to be completely satisfied with. Conviction is what they want, and conviction is what they will get in Dublin, if they can pack a jury as completely as they did in the Maamtrasna case, as completely as they did in the case of the Phoenix Park murders, and as completely as they did in the Poole case, and as completely as they did in other cases, 50 of which I could mention if I was not afraid of delaying the Committee. Yet if the Law Officers of the Crown do this in Dublin, they have to do it in the full light of public opinion. There are 20 newspapers that will have their reporters watching everything that is done, and they will have to take action with that check which a fear of public opinion or public reprobation imposes, the only check, I am sorry to say, we have upon the Government in Ireland—the only semblance of a check which we have as a guarantee that fair trials will take place. I say the only semblance of a check. If we cannot get the reality, let us have the semblance. Pack the jury as you did in the Phoenix Park case, as you did in the Maamtrasna case, and as you did in the other case I have referred to, but, under the check I have suggested, you will have to observe a certain amount of moderation in the packing. You will not be able to do it in such a way as to outrage public opinion and the simplest principles of justice, as you did in Galway, and as you did in Sligo. You cannot outrage public opinion in Dublin as you did in Sligo, a few months ago, where your jury-packing was not only a disgrace to the administration of justice, but to all the traditions of jurisprudence and of fair play in England, as well as in Ireland. I object, Sir, to jury packing in the Irish Provinces, where it is done in holes and corners without publicity, and with no check even of the weakest kind from the Bench. We never expect anything from the Bench in Ireland in matters of this kind, because it is the obedient henchman of the Crown, as it abundantly showed itself in Sligo.

[Fifteenth Night.]

THE CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the arguments of the hon. Gentleman are directed to an Amendment which has been already rejected—namely, that the change of venue should be exclusively to the County of the City of Dublin. The hon. Member should confine his argument to his own Amendment, and not extend it to one which has already been rejected.

DR. COMMINS: I was not aware, Sir, that that portion of my Amendment—for it is only a portion of it—had been dealt with at all. At all events, it stands in my Amendment that when you have provided that each Province should try its own cases, you have still the power of change of venue to Dublin, and I was pointing out that under this Amendment the Crown will have power to obtain juries of the kind they desire, which power ought to be sufficient, without seeking further opportunities for the alteration of venue. I think, however, I have said enough to make myself understood upon that point, and I do not wish to say more than is necessary to put my case before the House. I will now take another branch of the subject. We, in Ireland, are supposed to possess all the privileges of the British Constitution. Well, a greater fallacy historically, morally, and legally, never received the acceptance of any considerable number of sane people in this world. The British Constitution we practically never had in Ireland; the British Constitution we have not now, and even if we had it, this Bill would materially destroy it, and every shred of it would be taken away by the clause I am proposing to amend. The last particle of it would be taken away unless the Amendment I propose were accepted. In England, the very essence of trial by jury, and the good quality that is supposed to recommend it to the people, to the Legislature, to the Judges, to the jurymen themselves, and to the accused, is this—that a jury should be drawn from the vicinity and the neighbourhood of the place in which the offence has been committed. Now, we drift into what is practically useful, not as a consequence of any political theory, because the theory comes after, but from human necessity and the desire to do right that is always working in the world. By instinct we have drifted into this condition of things, which is one of the safeguards of the British Constitution. Very few charges of a criminal kind can be made in which a strict administration of justice, particularly the doing of full and impartial justice to the accused, does not require on the part of the Judges a local knowledge and a knowledge of the locus in quo. We all remember—it was discussed in this House so fully that I doubt whether there is an hon. Member listening to me who has not the facts impressed upon his mind—we all remember that in the famous Maamtrasna case, that which was believed to have led to a failure on the part of the Dublin jury who tried the case was through their utter ignorance of the locus in quo. A man stated that, in a district where there was no hedge to cover him, nor ditch to conceal him, on a moonlight, or, at any rate, on a fair night, he walked three miles behind a party of murderers without being discovered. That statement was received by the Dublin jury, who did not know the neighbourhood, but it would not have been received for an instant by 12 jurors drawn from the neighbourhood who would have been familiar with the character of the locality. But no matter how the local jury in that case had arrived at their verdict, and no matter what their verdict might have been, if they had been drawn from the locality it would not have been said that they had, in giving their verdict, fallen into error through utter ignorance of the locus in quo. Before a local jury, if a statement is made by a witness which violates their knowledge of the locality, and violates their knowledge of the circumstances which have occurred at the time the crime was committed, they will be able to correct it. This is the best guarantee we can have for the administration of justice fairly and purely—that the jury which tries a case shall be brought out of the neighbourhood, and shall have all the necessary local knowledge, provided they are free from prejudice. If there is any suspicion of their being prejudiced, then my Amendment provides that the prisoner shall be taken out of the district to Dublin. That is a thing which, since the trial of Palmer, has been found an excellent provision in the administration of the law in England; but that is to be abolished in Ireland. Why is it to be abolished in Ireland? We wait to hear the arguments that are to be used in support of the abolition of one of the oldest traditions of English trial by jury—a characteristic that for 1,200 or 1,300 years has been found to work so well in England, and which has only been done away with by Act of Parliament for a special purpose, which Act of Parliament has only been availed of some 20 times. Why do you seek to abolish in Ireland the principle for which I am pleading? Is it because you expect to find jurors in Antrim who will have a better knowledge of Kerry than a jury taken from the Province of Munster, and vice versa? Suppose the person to be tried is a Kerry Moonlighter. He is a person whom we all dislike. I do not think the dislike of the Kerry Moonlighter is more intense on the Treasury Bench than it is on these Benches; but the Kerry Moonlighters, as well as everybody else, should have justice. From everything we hear from the other side, the Executive is anxious to give him justice. That is well; everyone is entitled to have justice; but do you think that if a young man charged with Moonlighting was sent from Kerry to be tried in Antrim by a jury of Orangemen he would receive justice? I do not think he would any more than I believe that an Antrim Orangeman would get justice if tried in Kerry. "Oh," say the Law Officers of the Crown, "you must trust to us." But when was this new principle introduced into the British Constitution I should like to know? Why, the whole theory at the bottom of the Constitution is that you are not to trust anybody—you are not to trust Judges, or even the Crown itself—but are to provide checks to prevent them from going wrong. It is only when you have these checks to prevent them from going wrong that you can trust them. And that is all that we want now. We want a check upon the Law Officers of the Crown. We want to carry out the ordinary, trite principles of the British Constitution. We do not say that the Irish Law Officers will go wrong; but we want to have the power of checking them if they show a disposition to go wrong. These Crown Officials say to us—"Trust to us, and we will see that everything is done fairly and properly." I dare say they are sincere in what they say; but I do not want people's liberty to depend upon the sincerity of those Gentlemen, because we know that not infrequently men who are sincere enough in their convictions go very wrong in their practice. We know that we cannot always prevent wrong being done. I ask the Committee to allow this one ancient principle of the British Constitution to be still preserved. Nearly all the rest are gone from us. Preserve this one. Let the trial take place within the locality, or, at any rate, in the near neighbourhood of the place where the crime has been committed, where the local knowledge exists—where a knowledge of the prisoners and the places exists on the jury panel. Act on the principle that prisoners in Ireland are entitled to the privileges that people in England possess, unless there are peculiar circumstances in the case, as there were in the case of Palmer; and if peculiar circumstances do arise, then, as I have said, you can change the venue to Dublin. But that is not all; there is another of these safeguards of the British Constitution which have been provided by experience, and that we have drifted into by that instinct to do right, to which I have already referred, which is violated by this Bill. There is another safeguard rendered nugatory, null, and void, and that is the right of challenging jurymen, which is preserved by law to a prisoner. The prisoner has a right to challenge. The Crown has also a right to challenge, no doubt. After 27 years of practice at the English Bar; after having practised as a defending counsel at the English Bar more, perhaps, than any man living, I can say that I have never known the Crown to exercise that right of challenge in this country to the prejudice of a prisoner. In the whole of my 27 years' experience I have never known a case in this country where there was even a suspicion of jury-packing. I have never known a case where the Crown has challenged anyone, and probably only about a dozen cases where jurymen have been challenged by prisoners. In this country justice is administered fairly, and neither the Crown nor the prisoner has anything to complain of. The Crown does not order jurymen to stand aside. But what do you find in Ireland—what did you find in Sligo the other day, what did you find in Cork, and what did you find elsewhere?

THE CHAIRMAN: I fail to see the relevancy of the arguments the hon. Member is using to the Amendment he is proposing.

DR. COMMINS: If you fail to see the relevancy attaching to my arguments, Sir, that is entirely my fault, and very much my fault, because I am sure there is no one cleverer at seeing the drift of an argument than yourself. One sentence will show you the relevancy of my remarks, and it is this, that a fair trial depends as much upon the right of challenge which the prisoner has as anything else. That right of challenging the jury which a prisoner possesses secures to him a fair trial in Ireland, more perhaps than anything else, and if a trial is removed, as I was putting the case just now, from Antrim to Kerry, or from Kerry to Antrim, where the prisoner does not know a single living soul in the county, how is he to exercise his right of challenge? I will take the case of a Kerry Moonlighter—no, I will not say a Moonlighter, but I will say the lad who was sent to prison for six months' recently for printing a supposed seditious document in the office of a Kerry newspaper. Suppose this lad had the same privilege in Ireland as he would have had if tried in England—namely, the privilege of being tried by his peers, and supposing the trial was removed from Kerry to Antrim, how would he be able to pick out the rabid Orangeman who would come up to take his place on the jury, and who needed only an accusation, and no proof at all, in order to convict? How would this lad manage his challenges? He would not know the men who were so prejudiced as to require no proof, and who were so angry with him and with his political party as to be prepared to give a conviction upon nothing more than an accusation. By this change of venue the right of challenge is abolished. That is how I intended to put it, Sir, and it is entirely my fault that I failed to make the matter appear relevant. I maintain that a man in Munster would have some chance of a fair trial so long as the case was kept in Munster. I maintain, further, that if anything peculiar occurs in the case you may take it from Munster to Dublin. I protest against the idea that retaining a case in the Province in which the crime has occurred is likely to give a man a partial jury. Take a Kerry Moonlighter to Waterford, and he will get very little consideration there, although he will get justice. The connection between neighbouring counties will be sufficient to enable the accused to exercise his Constitutional right of challenge; but if the venue is changed from one end of Ireland to the other, the prisoner may be placed in the midst of a population hostile to him, and he may be utterly incapable of exercising his right of challenge. Prima facie, then I say, by the power which this clause gives, a prisoner will be utterly deprived of his right of challenge. My Amendment will enable him to exercise that right; and I provide against anything unfair happening by saying that if you move a man up to Dublin the Executive will be able to get a jury of their own sort—at all events, they will be able to get one which is not prejudiced in favour of the prisoner. That is my argument. I say confine your removal of venue to the Provinces. In the Provinces there is enough local knowledge to render the right of challenge that the prisoner has something actual and something real; but if you do not confine the removal to the Provinces you abolish surreptitiously the right of challenge which the prisoner possesses, and which I hold to be one of the best provisions of the British Constitution. I say do not abolish that, but restrict the right of removal to fair and proper limits. Restrict it to the Provinces and from the Provinces to Dublin, and when you have done that you will have secured a fair trial in every case and a jury that certainly will not be prejudiced in favour of the prisoner. I think I have gone over the whole argument. I never expected for one moment either to interest Gentlemen opposite or to secure their approval. I have been too long in this House to flatter myself that I am able either to convince or to persuade hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. It is very hard indeed for a Member on these Benches to imagine that he is able to do that. Though I offer these observations to the House, they are practically not intended for the purpose of convincing the Treasury Bench, but they are intended for hon. Members of this House, some of whom have still, I hope, an open mind upon these questions. My observations are intended for those hon. Gentlemen and for the country. We have been told over and over again that we have to impugn this Act before the country, if it is possible to do so, because the case is being tried even more palpably and openly in the country than it is being tried here. We have the public Press teeming with arguments that I find repeated almost verbatim, and with an accuracy that is creditable to their memories, by right hon. Gentlemen of the Tory Party. We find not later than this day a letter paraded in the papers from a right hon. Gentleman, writing from Rochdale, in which attention is called to this very fact to which I have referred—namely, that there are a body of people in Ulster hostile to the rest of the country. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be so ignorant of the facts he is writing about, that he describes what he calls the loyal population of Ireland at about one-third of the population of the country. The right hon. Gentleman, talking in that strain, scarcely deserves notice, and he certainly would not receive it if his utterances were confined to his letter of to-day, and if it were not for his previous services to the State. But when we find such statements put forward as are put forward by this right hon. Gentleman, that Ulster is a different nation, that the feelings of Ulster are alienated from the rest of Ireland, that it constitutes practically a hostile population; and when powers are asked for by the framers of this Bill to transfer cases from Cork or Kerry or Waterford or Carlow to Ulster, where the people are described as aliens, I say that the Committee must see the necessity for my Amendment. We are told that the Ulster people have hostile feelings, that they will not submit to common government with the rest of Ireland; and when powers such as are contained in this clause are claimed, it is time I say to call the attention of the public to the arguments used in support of the authors of this measure, and to turn these arguments round against those who use them. I say, if it is a fact—as this right hon. Gentleman writing from Rochdale declares it is—that Ulster is hostile to the rest of Ireland, and is, in fact, a foreign order in Ireland, I ask with what show of justice is power claimed by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland and the Treasury Bench to transfer the trial of people from Kerry and Waterford, from Cork, or Clare, or Galway, to Belfast, or other parts of Ulster? With what show of justice or fair play do the Government seek powers to send these young women from Bodyke for trial before juries selected in Ulster? In this matter I appeal to the instinct of fair play of the people of England—I appeal to the sense of what is right in criminal jurisprudence which has been nurtured by centuries of fair trial. I trust that their instinct of fair play will revolt against this attempt to deprive the people of Ireland of the simplest, commonest, and plainest guarantee which the people have for fair play and justice in trials in this country.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, after the word "certificate," to insert the words, "Provided always that nothing in this Act shall empower the removal of any trial from any of the four provinces to anywhere outside of such provinces, except the County of the City of Dublin."—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I hope the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Roscommon (Dr. Commins) who moved this Amendment will not think I am guilty of any discourtesy if in reply to his observations I do not occupy anything like the length of time which he took in introducing his proposal. He has had a great advantage in moving his Amendment, because he seems to have come fresh to the House at a rather advanced hour of the evening, and does not seem to be aware of the fact that this clause is now under discussion for the second day, and that every argument he has adduced has already been brought forward again and again. Of course coming in, as he does, not having taken any previous part in the rather protracted debates which have occurred on this clause, he possesses a great deal of energy, and is able to speak at great length. He is to be congratulated, because now, on the 11th or 12th night of the Committee on this Bill, he has succeeded, at this late hour of the evening, in making the longest speech that has been delivered up to this point. As regards the particular Amendment the hon. Member has moved there has been one advantage to me in his speech, because he has always contrived to answer his own arguments two or three sentences later on. In the beginning of his speech he showed that Dublin was the worst venue in all Ireland as far as criminals were concerned. He submitted that we should rest satisfied with the opportunity of changing the venue to Dublin for the reason that trial of prisoners there would lead to the certainty of a conviction. He would have us think that, in this way, he is making a most extraordinary concession to us. But then he went on to say that in Dublin everything occurs in the light of day, and that everything was published. But he forgot that his own Amendment enables a change of venue to take place from one county to another in the same Province, and I suppose the light of publicity is to be found no more in one part of a Province than in another, and no more in one Province than in another Province. He then fell back on another argument, and said that what he wanted was that those changes should be more or less local, as it is very desirable indeed that a prisoner should know something of the jurors before whom his case is to be brought, so that he might be able to challenge. If a Moonlighter from Kerry were to be tried the hon. Gentleman said let him be taken to Waterford; but the hon. Member must not overlook the fact that the divisions of Province are purely artificial, and that you may take a prisoner from the extreme end of one county to the extreme end of another—it might be with other counties intervening—and that this would, to all intents and purposes, be taking him into a strange neighbourhood. It would be possible to change a case from Donegal to Belfast, or from Donegal to Downpatrick, between which places there is very little connection; and then it would be impossible to take a case from Donegal to either Leitrim or Sligo, although the counties adjoin, and there is great community of interest between them. Whatever other Amendments may be moved with regard to restricting the change of venue, I must say there is nothing logical in the hon. Member's proposal, or in the arguments by which he has supported it. I trust the Committee will not accept this Amendment, and will not consider it necessary to go to a Division.

[Fifteenth Night.]

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I am rather surprised that the Government do not assent to this Amendment considering what is the preamble of the clause we are now discussing—namely—

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the place of trial of offences committed in Ireland, for securing more fair and impartial trials, and for relieving jurors from danger to their lives, property, and business.”

Now, the object, we are told of this clause is to secure more fair and impartial trials. Has the Government, at any stage on the debates upon this Bill, either in the second reading, or in the debates upon this clause, alleged or endeavoured to maintain the position that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had for all sorts of crimes in Ireland in the City of Dublin? This is really a matter of the first importance. It is because we know well that in the City of Dublin for upwards of 100 years you have had a series of trials of a political and agrarian character, and no one has ever heard it alleged in this House that there has ever been a failure of justice there. But, Sir, our case is a great deal stronger than that, because under the clause that we have just passed, the Government can bring these cases before special juries in the City of Dublin, and do they mean to say that a fair and impartial trial as they have intimated cannot be had by packing a special jury out of the City of Dublin? There is no use mincing matters with respect to this clause. We know perfectly well what we want to avoid, and I greatly fear that the Government know perfectly well what they want to obtain. We want to avoid the special jury panel of the County of Dublin; and I can conceive no motive for the Government in persisting in the refusal of this most reasonable and moderate Amendment, except this, that they desire to retain power to send their political opponents in Ireland before the special jury panel of the County of Dublin or of Belfast. Of course, it would be a good thing to pass a provision taking away from the Government the power of changing the venue from any of the three Southern Provinces to the Province of Ulster. But even if the Government had consented to that, it would, in my opinion, have left the matter very much as it now stands; because so long as they have power to go before a special jury panel in Dublin, with the powers of jury packing which they possess, it is ridiculous to suppose that they would want any further power. We have heard a great deal of mock heroics talked outside, and I dare say we shall hear a great deal talked here about the hardship that will be inflicted by Sub-section 2 of this clause. Why, Sub-section 2 is a piece of supererogation. You do not want that if you have power to go before a special jury. There is no tribunal before which a man who is suspected of being an Irish peasant, or who is suspected of sympathizing with an Irish farmer, or who is suspected of holding Home Rule or National views in Ireland—there is no tribunal in the world worse for such a man to go before than a packed jury out of the panel of the County of Dublin; and it is a perfect fallacy and simple nonsense to talk about leaving out the 2nd sub-section of this clause. The real point is, are you to bring Irish peasants, and those who sympathize with them, before a packed jury out of the panel of the County of Dublin; because if you are, you need not go on any further—you need do nothing more. Talk about trial before a Commission of Irish Judges! I would 20,000 times rather stand my trial before a Commission of Irish Judges than go before a packed jury in the County of Dublin. Talk about a change of venue from Ireland to England! I would 100,000 times rather be tried by a jury of Englishmen than go before a jury of the County of Dublin, who hate the ground I walk on, and who do not want evidence, but would be content to convict me out of the newspapers. I say that if this clause stands as it is now framed, and if prisoners of the class I have referred to are to be sent before these juries for trial, you might just as well insert a short clause in the Bill declaring that every Nationalist is guilty of any crime the Lord Lieutenant may choose to impute to him.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I am not sanguine that the Government will accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. At an early period of the evening the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), in replying to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), said that reasonable Amendments had been proposed by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Benches, and by others; but in making that admission he seemed to forget that not a single one of those reasonable Amendments had been accepted, consequently I am not very sanguine that this Amendment will be accepted. The Government have to thank themselves for our being compelled to bring forward this proposal, because the measure is drafted in such a way as to make it necessary to put forward such attempts as these in order to make it a reasonable measure. It is a singular thing that, since the Whitsuntide Holidays, not a single Amendment has been accepted by Her Majesty's Government, though Amendments much more reasonable than some submitted earlier on, and accepted, have been proposed. The Amendment before the Committee now merely asks that the peasants of Ireland may not be placed before juries who are picked out and selected because of their political opinions. We ask that the peasants from Kerry may not be sent before a jury selected from a panel of Antrim or Belfast. We hear a great deal from hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House with regard to want of respect for law and order in Ireland; but we contend that the very action they are now taking will render it impossible for the people of Ireland to respect law and order when administered in this spirit. What is more contrary to the spirit of law and order than to place a political or agrarian prisoner before a jury of political partizans? I would say it would be much better not to go before a jury at all, but to declare a man guilty at once, because conviction, under such circumstances, is simply a foregone conclusion. We hear a great deal about the people of Ulster not being in sympathy with the great majority of the people of Ireland; but we, Sir, know that we have the majority of the people of Ulster with us. But it must be remembered that if the venue of these trials is moved to Ulster the Executive will not seek a jury out of the ordinary jury panel, but will seek one from the special jury list; and those special juries are all of them either Orangemen or Freemasons. Freemasonry in this country has little political significance, but in Ireland it is quite the reverse; and we know from experience, and from the Report of the Commission appointed by the present Government, what an Orangeman means in the North of Ireland. Now, there is little or no intimidation of jurors in Leinster, Munster, or Connaught—of any class of jurors who conscientiously endeavour to discharge their duties. There is no such thing as intimidation of jurors where the law is conscientiously administered; and it is a rare case, indeed, to find such intimidation when the law is not being conscientiously administered. As I said, I am not sanguine that the Government will accept this Proviso, which we think absolutely necessary for safeguarding the interests of the people. Nevertheless, it is our bounden duty to test the views of the Committee upon the matter.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think the effect of this Amendment is the same as one I have lower down.

An hon. MEMBER: No; that is not so.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I hope when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) is placed upon the Irish Bench he will not treat a prisoner that may be brought before him with the same levity, and the same contempt, which he showed to-night to the arguments of the Representatives of the Irish people. He himself is elected to this House by an extremely restricted constituency, and he hardly thought it worth his while to advance a single argument against this most important proposition of my hon. Friend. The matter is one of most vital importance to those who do not represent restricted constituencies. It is of vital consequence to three Provinces, at least, in Ireland—I do not say it is of so much consequence to Ulster. I do not suppose that the present Government, who have nearly half the Ulstermen to support them, would risk offending the people of Ulster by sending down cases from that Province to be tried in Cork or Galway. I do not suppose there is a precedent for such a thing as that. The only shadow of an argument advanced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was this—that the County of Donegal is nearer to Sligo than Belfast; but it is true that if you wish to change the venue from Donegal the proper place to send a man to would be Belfast. At the same time, it would be a most unreasonable thing to send a man from Cork or from Kerry to Belfast for trial. We do not object so much to the venue being changed to the City of Dublin, for there is an enormous constituency there, although an exceedingly large proportion holds opinions diametrically opposed to those of the great mass of the people of Ireland, or those of the population of three and a-half of the Provinces. We wish to prevent the people of Galway and Mayo, and so on, from being sent for trial into totally foreign regions, so to speak, such as the City of Belfast. That, I think, is a fair proposal to make. This is not peculiarly a question affecting the Irish nation, but the point as to where a case shall be tried has been held of great importance both in England and in France. There is a notable case which occurred in England of which I would remind the Committee—the case of Governor Eyre. He was advised—and advised by a very able solicitor—to go and domicile himself in one of the Midland counties when he came to England, because there he would be sure of an aristocratic and Conservative jury. He followed that advice, and, as a result, he was acquitted. A very different result might have happened if Governor Eyre had allowed himself to be tried in one of our large Radical centres. Then, again, in France it was considered a great point for Prince Napoleon when his trial was fixed to take place at Tours, where there was an aristocratic population favourable to the Empire. Prince Napoleon was tried for his life, I believe, and it was considered a very great point that he was able to have the trial amongst a favourable population. What we want to arrive at is this—that we should not be able to pass certain limits in changing your venue limitations which have been very well known in Ireland for a long time—the limits of Leinster, Connaught, and Munster. The Conservative and the so-called Liberal Unionist journals every day point out the enormous difference between Ulster and the other Provinces. Well, we want to establish that, and in the same way we object to having our people tried in England or Scotland, because we conceive that serious damage will be done to prisoners if they are taken out of their own Province. But we are willing to allow that there are certain important cases which, perhaps, ought to be tried in the heart of the country; and we therefore propose in this Amendment to allow the Executive to take cases to the County of the City of Dublin. We say to the Government, rest satisfied with the Provinces of Ireland, the least of which has five counties in it. We say, try prisoners in the heart of the country—in what has always been the chief town of the country. We say, go before the City of Dublin where there are some people connected with the land, but where the types of landlord and tenant are much less bitter than they are in Belfast, and other parts of Ulster if you like. We say, do not take cases from the South and West of Ireland to Belfast, where there is strong antipathy between people of the two religions. We also say, do not let this matter be treated in the contemptuous manner in which it has been treated up to the present. I ask how would an Ulster Orangeman like to be sent to New York for trial; yet I believe many people in Galway would think they would get a fairer trial there than they would at the hands of some Ulster jurors.

Mr. P. J. Power

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have an Amendment on the same principle as that which is before the Committee, only in a mitigated form, and I would ask that something of the kind should be accepted. What I would propose is a practice somewhat similar to that in existence in England and Scotland. I do not know the details as to England, but in Scotland if you wish to move a case from a part of the country where you do not think there is likely to be a fair trial you bring it to the Central Criminal Court in Edinburgh. That was the course followed in the case of the Scotch crofters, and I hope that that is a course which will commend itself to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who is a Scotchman, inasmuch as it is the well-established practice in Scotland. It seems to me a monstrous proposal to take a Nationalist for trial from, say, the South of Ireland to Belfast, or to take an Ulsterman for trial to Kerry. I will not throw aspersions upon the honour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, whoever he may be; but we must bear in mind that the Irish Attorney General is not a permanent official, and that he is a Member of the Executive Government, and that as such it is necessary for him to act in an administrative capacity. I maintain, therefore, that it is unfair to put in his hands as a prosecutor and a Member of the Executive the power of declaring that a trial shall be removed to a county selected by him, and not to the Central Criminal Court, as is the practice in England and Scotland. I do hope that the Government will consider this a reasonable Amendment, and that some concession will be made. It seems that this is the more necessary, because a little further on there is an ambiguity in the matter. As the Government propose that the law should stand the Attorney General for Ireland may propose one place for the trial and the defendant may propose another, and apparently the Court is not to exercise a discretion in the matter, but it is to choose between the two, so that if the Crown proposes Belfast, and the defendant proposes Kerry, owing to the ambiguity of the wording of the clause, it seems as if the Court were to be bound to decide between the two, and could not select some intermediate place. But the real point is whether you will allow a man from one place to be taken to another where extreme views against his party may prevail, instead of taking these cases to the Central Criminal Court.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): If the Government were disposed to look upon any proposition in a reasonable spirit they surely would think this a reasonable one, and would accept it. I do not think the most ferocious partizan—the most disreputable and sanguinary partizan—in Ireland would allege that the state of any Province is such that within the four corners of that Province you could not find some jury to have something like a regard to the sacredness of their oath. Let me point out that our apprehensions on this subject are not at all imaginary. We have had some experience on this question in the past, for let me point out to the House that this protection which is interposed in this clause—this protection of the High Court to which the defendant may appeal if an improper or unreasonable venue is selected—has in the past been found perfectly futile. There was a case which excited great interest in this country and in Ireland, and as to which Party feeling was very strong indeed. It was a case in which the famous Mr. George Bolton brought an action against a Member of this House—Mr. William O'Brien. In that case Mr. George Bolton laid his venue in the County of Antrim—practically in the Borough of Belfast—though, of course, as everybody knew, the offence had been committed in Dublin. Well, Sir, what happened? In that case Mr. O'Brien went very naturally to the High Court in Ireland and said—"It is a monstrously unfair thing that my opponent here should be permitted to lay the venue among my enemies in Belfast. That is not fair play, and I ask the High Court to exercise the power which is always exercised in such cases, the power of changing the venue." But, Sir, as we might expect from our experience of its action in Ireland, the High Court had the highest opinion of Belfast jurors, and refused to change the venue, and their decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal, with the result that of course Mr. O'Brien, so far as a Belfast jury could do it, was mulcted in heavy damages, notwithstanding that he had proved his case over and over against this Mr. George Bolton. I say that experience of that kind shows conclusively that the protection given by this clause of an appeal to the High Court is entirely illusory—it is a hollow shield, and gives the defendant no protection whatsoever, and it would be open to the Crown in Ireland—if they should take it into their heads to do so—to bring up their political opponents and try them in hostile venues, such as we say exists at Belfast. Now, Sir, I confess that I am surprised that our arguments on this point are not listened to with more respect in that quarter of the House, because we are constantly told by a certain class of Members that Ireland consists of two rac~~es~~, and that one lives up in Ulster, while the other race lives in the South, and that the most deplorable consequences would follow if those two races are brought into conflict together. Is it not a monstrous thing that gentlemen who profess or pretend to hold these views should declare that as between members of these two races, who may be supposed to be in conflict, they should consider it fair that members of the one race should be taken, say, from Munster, and practically tried by their enemies in the Province of Ulster. Now, Sir, let me point out another thing. Of course, it may be said that we argue the contrary of this, and that an argument founded on this allegation does not come with a good grace from us. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) told us a while ago on another Amendment that it is our boast that a majority of the Ulster men are decided Nationalists. That is so; but let me point out what is the real state of things. Ulster is Nationalist so far as regards the majority of its inhabitants. That is our allegation. But, in the first place, the panels of jurors—both the panel of special jurors and the panel of common jurors—do not in any sense represent the population of Ulster. Under the old franchise every man who had a valuation of £12 had a vote; but in 30 out of the 32 counties you could not put a man even upon the common jury unless he had a valuation of £40, and that shows that in Ulster the jury would be drawn from persons not of our way of thinking. The holdings in Ulster are very small, for the land has been subdivided very largely, and very few of the tenants have rents of much more than £12, so that even the common jury is drawn from persons who are hostile to us, and who are our political enemies. That being so, I do think the Government might have yielded in reference to this Amendment. It is idle to say that as regards any of the four Provinces of Ireland it is not possible for them to find, in some corner of each Province, some place where they could not find a jury panel out of which, with their facilities, they would not be able to get a jury to ensure a conviction. They have boasted of it—that even under the present system the law was perfectly capable of enforcement at the Winter Assizes, owing to the facilities of inter-provincial change of venue which this Bill would give; and all we ask of them is to acknowledge that within the four corners of each of the four Provinces there is, at least, one spot where they can get a jury to try a prisoner to their liking. They should give effect to that, and to their experience of it.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I know, Mr. Courtney, how vain it is to expect that any suggestion from this side of the House will be accepted by the Government; but I gather that the only reason for opposition to the Amendment on the part of the Government of the day is that they do desire to take the Nationalists of the South and try them by juries in the North. Whatever may be the future of Ireland—under whatever system Ireland may be governed in future, whether by a separate Parliament or by National Councils, I should have thought that any man who had a desire for the prosperity and happiness of that country would wish to bury as much as he could the animosities that at present run there; and I should have thought that no man would desire to emphasize and enlarge and perpetuate the distinctions that lay between one portion of that country and another. But how can you more perpetuate distinctions of that kind and cultivate the animosities which unfortunately and unhappily exist there at present—how can you do that more successfully than by opposing an Amendment of this kind, and by saying that you are going to take persons from one class and one creed in one portion of the country and try them by persons of another class and another creed in another portion, and try them so because they are of another class and another creed, and are in another portion of the country? I should hope even these remarks of mine may have some effect on the Benches opposite; but, at any rate, we shall give colour to these views, and show the country that the desire of the Government is not for the real happiness and prosperity of Ireland, but to emphasize and perpetuate the distinctions which exist.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I have put forward five points in support of the Amendment. One is that, under the Amendment I propose, there will be ample and sufficient security for the fair trial of any offence that occurs. There will be, first, the choice of the county in each Province, and after that the choice of a jury in Dublin, which jury, as I pointed out, would be not prejudiced in favour of the prisoner. I venture to say that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), who has spoken after me, has not answered a single solitary one of my arguments, and has not contravened or dealt with them. I venture to say that the proposed system would place in the hands of the Attorney General the power of securing an absolutely certain conviction, irrespective of right or truth or justice, whenever he thought fit. No answer has been given, or attempted to be given, to that. He has said instead—"Oh, trust to me. I am infallible and fair, and my successor will be the same." I used another argument—that it would form an intolerable grievance on the prisoners tried, who might be brought from persons of their own race and religion and habits of life and thought, and tried by persons who could not even understand the language they spoke, and they might be brought 50 or 60 or even 300 miles away, where they could not call their witnesses. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has not answered a single one of my arguments. I gave another argument in support of the Amendment—that it would destroy one of the oldest grounds of fair trial known to the English Constitution—the selection of the jury in the vicinity from men who know something of the prisoner and of his habits and class and life and locality. Has he answered that? Not in any shape or way. He has not noticed it. Then I adduced another argument, and not an attempt has been made to meet any of them. The next argument was that it would utterly destroy and render nugatory the right of challenge. It would take a man from Kerry, where he knows the people and his lawyers know him, and try him in Antrim, where he knows nothing of the people, and where the people hate his very name and race. If you do that his right of challenge is a farce, and is utterly ludicrous. That has not been answered; it has not been attempted to be denied. Now, Mr. Courtney, I submit that when arguments of that kind, based not only on ordinary common sense, but on truth and justice, are used, they require at least an answer, and no answer whatever has been given to them.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 153; Noes 225: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 206.) [10.45 P.M.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move the next Amendment—namely, in line 29, after “certificate,” to add—

“Provided, that this section shall not apply in the case of any trial to be at a court of assize or commission for any county of a city or county of a town.”

My Amendment is only directed to a portion of the clause. It is the universal experience at Irish Assizes that, no matter what may be the state of things in Irish counties, such localities as these I name have always been peaceful and free from crime, even in the most disturbed times. I think that the Government should recognize that state of things by accepting the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, after the word “certificate,” to insert the words—“Provided, that this section shall not apply in the case of any trial to be at a court of assize or commission for any county of a city or county of a town.”—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): We are unable to accept this Amendment for the same reasons which have been already given in answer to a former proposal to exclude boroughs from the operation of the section. The Committee will remember the arguments which were used.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman should not assume that the Committee is familiar with the arguments addressed to it on this question. The vast proportion of the Committee was in the Smoking Room when the point was discussed; therefore to say that sufficient argument had been used to convince the Committee was rather self-flattery. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may have convinced the Whips into saying “Aye” and “No” as they stood at the door when Members came in. Under the circumstances, I trust the right hon.

and learned Gentleman will not entertain the idea that his arguments convinced the Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): There is an Amendment I wish to propose, to remove an ambiguity in page 3, line 36. The section gives power, first, to the Attorney General to claim a change of venue, and then to the prisoner; and if the prisoner proposes to remove the venue to one county, and the Attorney General proposes to remove it to another, it goes on to say—“Thereupon the High Court may order that the trial shall be had in that county in which it shall appear,” &c.

It seems to me that these words limit the discretion of the Court. I would move to leave out the word “that” before “county,” in order to insert the word “any.” This will enable the High Court to order that a trial shall be held in any county in which it shall appear that the trial can be most fairly and impartially had.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 36, leave out the word “that,” in order to insert the word “any.”—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘that’ stand part of the Clause.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I have no objection to this Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Surely the Government do not mean to accept an Amendment!

Question put, and negatived.

Question, “That the word ‘any’ be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move in line 37, after the word “had,” to insert—

“Provided, that where an order has been made under this section, and the place of trial is changed accordingly, the trial shall not be held for at least ten days after such order shall have been served on each defendant interested.”

This Amendment is to make provision for what the Government say they are perfectly disposed to do. It is simply to provide that after a change of venue has been effected some provision shall be made to prevent the defendant being taken by surprise. Everybody knows that in an ordinary case, where a defendant makes all his preparations for a trial in a particular town, he is taken at a great disadvantage if the venue is suddenly changed. Such a change of venue may render it necessary for him to cancel all his preparations, and make new ones. The solicitor he has employed may not be able to go with him to the new venue, and he may have to employ a fresh one. The Government must see that there will be a number of preparations involved which will require time. It would be most unfair that the Court should proceed immediately with the trial without taking the trouble to find out whether the prisoner is prepared to go on or not. I think the interval I mention in my Amendment should be allowed. Ten days would be most reasonable. A prisoner may have to make fresh arrangements with regard to his witnesses, and he may want new funds, I may say, seeing the Amendment is intended to provide for several defendants, only one of whom makes the application.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The rules on this subject will be made by the Lord Lieutenant; and no Government would think of forcing on a trial until a defendant has had full opportunity of taking the steps necessary to defend himself. I may point out that the defendant can apply to the Court to postpone the trial.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): It is only right, I think, that those who make the rules should have a mandatory direction from this House that a certain time should be allowed between the order and the trial. We must remember that we are passing a Coercion Bill which will impose upon a person the necessity of having his witnesses and providing his solicitor and counsel, and probably taking them a long distance away from the place where he had first thought to employ them. Surely, under the circumstances, 10 days is not too much of an interval to allow a person under those circumstances. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may say that the defendant may appeal to the Court to postpone the trial; but that would be at the trial, and after all his preparations have been made, and his witnesses have been brought up. No one would go to the trouble of asking for delay after he had provided his witnesses and was ready to go on with the case. I think this Amendment would be a great improvement in the Bill, and I do not see what harm it could do. It would prevent great injustice in many cases. I do not suppose, even if the prescribed authority were applied to, and were to make an order for an adjournment, that adjournment would be less than 10 days; but I think we ought to put in the Bill itself some limit within which the trial, under the circumstances provided for in the Bill, cannot be taken.

MR. HOLMES: Suppose a man to be tried at the Spring Assizes, and the venue is changed within 10 days before the Assize, if this Amendment is adopted there will be no possibility of trying him before the Summer Assize, even although the accused would be anxious for a trial, and might be detained in prison for four months longer awaiting one.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, whom we would always rather deal with than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who is merely a lamentable excrescence on this Bill, so to speak, has put a very good point. He says that a prisoner might be prevented from being tried at a certain Assize; but I think any hardship in that direction to the prisoner would be obviated by introducing the words "without the defendant's consent." Unless this Amendment is accepted, the result may be that a venue may be changed in such a way as to prevent the prisoner from employing sympathetic counsel, who may be engaged elsewhere, and to throw him into the arms of Orange barristers. If I were to be tried, I must say I would much rather hand my case over into the hands of a gentleman whose sympathy I thought I might claim. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that all these rules will be made by the Lord Lieutenant; but the Lord Lieutenant is the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself. He himself will have to make these rules. Surely he will not say that he is a better authority than 670 Members of Parliament. We suggest that the Committee should make these rules. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not happen to be in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant may be Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimer, for his Excellency the English Viceroy may be at the races in England, whilst his Chief Secretary is at the sea side. The poor Lord Lieutenant will hardly write his own name. It is absurd to endeavour to palm off arguments of this kind upon us. [Cries of "Question!"] This is the question. It is a monstrous thing to suppose that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in matters of this kind, is likely to have more sense than 670 Members of Parliament.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): This is an instance of the way in which the Government waste the time on this Bill. Here is an Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend (Mr. Maurice Healy). It is proposed that a defendant should have a fair notice—that is to say, 10 days' notice—before the trial is brought on; and what is the reply of the Irish Attorney General? He says that the Lord Lieutenant, or he himself, would make a rule to that effect. But why are we to trust him in this matter? Why should not the rule be in the Bill? For myself, I always listen to the discussions which go on on this Bill with an open and impartial mind. I listen, and am always ready to go upon the one side or the other, whichever I think is right; but I never was more convinced that this side was right than in regard to this proposal. When hon. Gentlemen opposite complain of waste of time, they should not set such a bad example as they are doing now, but they should grant these small Amendments, instead of sitting nagging and quarrelling and splitting hairs, as if we were a parcel of lawyers.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I am not surprised that the Government refuse to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, because, if they accepted it, it would be contrary to the principle on which they are going with regard to the whole clause. The whole clause is for the purpose of changing the place of trials of Nationalist prisoners, who may be guilty of no particular offence except that of defending their homes, to some Orange district, and the landlords and the authorities of Dublin Castle will find no difficulty in getting an Orange jury to convict. That is the object of the clause, and, that being so, it is not to be wondered at that the Government refuse the Amendment of my hon. Friend to provide that if the place of trial be changed the defendant should not be called upon to defend himself in the new place of trial without notice. I do not think anything more reasonable could be asked of the Government than that if they insist on changing without sufficient reason a place of trial in Ireland, and do it suddenly and without notice, they should give the defendant full time, when he arrives at the new place of trial, to get his witnesses together, and his lawyers to defend him, and generally to make his arrangements of defence. If the Government were honestly inclined to treat the matter fairly they would not refuse to give 10 days, which is a very short space of time, to a defendant, in order to enable him to make his preparations in the new place of trial. But the refusal of the Government to give a man, suddenly taken from his own neighbourhood to a new one, time to get his witnesses together to get up his case, shows the end the Government have in view. It shows that the object of the Government is not to get a fair trial, but to secure, rightly or wrongly, the conviction of such Nationalists in Ireland who may be distasteful to the landlord class. I, for one, am not at all sorry that the Government are consistently acting on this policy. The refusal of the Government to give a man whose place of trial has been changed an opportunity to get his witnesses together, and prepare himself for trial, proves conclusively that the object of the Government, and of the whole of this Bill, and more particularly of this clause of the Bill, is to obtain convictions on behalf of the landlord classes against men who have not committed crimes at all, but have simply made themselves obnoxious to the authorities of Dublin Castle and their protégés the landlords, by making a stand to prevent themselves and their children from being evicted from their homes. I am sure that when it is known that the Government refuse this moderate Amendment, and will not grant a man time to get up his case when a change is made in the place of trial, all doubt will disappear from the minds of the public that the object of the Government in passing this Bill is not to put down crime at all, but to strike at their political opponents, and carry on the government of the country in the interests of the landlord classes. I am very glad indeed that the Government are going to refuse this Amendment, because it shows us that we have to expect nothing reasonable from them, and that we are to prepare ourselves to fight them on every part of this Bill to see if we cannot succeed in frustrating their nefarious and infernal designs.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I rise to Order. I want to know if the hon. Member is at liberty to speak of the nefarious and infernal designs of hon. Members?

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the words.

MR. F. S. POWELL: The hon. Member's words were "nefarious and infernal designs."

MR. T. M. HEALY: What?

THE CHAIRMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member himself (Mr. W. Redmond) will repeat the words he used.

MR. W. REDMOND: What I said was nefarious and infernal designs.

THE CHAIRMAN: On the part of whom?

MR. W. REDMOND: On the part of the Government.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask, Sir, if, when words are challenged, it is not necessary that those words should be taken down?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not necessary in this case. The hon. Member (Mr. W. Redmond) cannot accuse any Member of this House or the Government of nefarious and infernal designs. Such language 'it is improper to use in the House of Commons.

MR. W. REDMOND: I applied those words not individually to any Member of the House, but to the Government collectively. However, I will withdraw the expression "infernal," and will confine myself to the expression "nefarious," and by so doing I shall make my meaning sufficiently clear.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Attention has been called to an improper expression used in debate, but the Chief Secretary for Ireland meets everything with leers or sneers or jeers. I observe him now laughing in a most improper manner. He gets a large salary for sitting on that Bench, and therefore he ought to keep his countenance, if he cannot keep his temper. Now, I want to put the matter seriously to the right hon. Gentleman. The Government refuse the prisoner 10 days before trial, but under Section 14 it is provided that—

"There shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament such allowances to officers and other persons acting in pursuance of this Act; and such expenses incurred in reference to any Court exercising jurisdiction under this Act, and such expenses of persons charged, counsel, and witnesses, payable in pursuance of this Act, as the Lord Lieutenant, with the approval of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, may from time to time direct."

That is always referred to as the English section, but I understand that the Government intend to drop it. Now, surely it is reasonable there should be some opportunity of engaging counsel. If a man is taken from Cork to the Giant's Causeway, is it intended he should bring with him his counsel and witnesses at his own expense? In spite of the sneers and unworthy laughter of the Chief Secretary, I think this is a point worthy of consideration. A matter of this kind ought not to be met in the heartless and callous manner of the right hon. Gentleman. I respectfully submit that this is a matter of some importance to the Bar. I am raising it as a member of the Bar, though, God knows, I do not get much chance of practising at the Bar, because I am generally here. I maintain that when a prisoner has paid his solicitor and barrister in Cork, he should not, if he is taken up to Antrim, be obliged to pay another solicitor and another barrister.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): There is no intention of dropping the 14th section.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not the point. We are constantly met in this way by the Irish Chief Secretary. He thinks his an aristocratic manner—[Cries of "Order!"] Well, I will not say aristocratic, but I will say we are constantly met by his abrupt manner, because there is nothing aristocratic about him.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to restrain himself, and speak in a manner more becoming the Committee.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 256; Noes 131: Majority 125. [11.35 P.M.]

AYES.

Addison, J. E. W.
 Agg-Gardner, J. T.
 Ainslie, W. G.
 Allsopp, hon. G.
 Allsopp, hon. P.
 Amherst, W. A. T.
 Anstruther, Colonel R. H. L.
 Anstruther, H. T.
 Ashmead-Bartlett, E.
 Baden-Powell, G. S.
 Baggallay, E.
 Bailey, Sir J. R.
 Baird, J. G. A.
 Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.
 Balfour, G. W.
 Baring, Viscount
 Barry, A. H. Smith-
 Bartley, G. C. T.
 Barttelot, Sir W. B.
 Bass, H.
 Bates, Sir E.
 Baumann, A. A.
 Beach, W. W. B.
 Beadel, W. J.
 Beaumont, H. F.
 Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.
 Bentinck, Lord H. C.
 Beresford, Lord C. W.
 De la Poer
 Bethell, Commander G. R.
 Bigwood, J.
 Birkbeck, Sir E.
 Blundell, Colonel H. B. H.
 Bond, G. H.
 Bonsor, H. C. O.
 Boord, T. W.
 Borthwick, Sir A.
 Bristowe, T. L.
 Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.
 Brookfield, A. M.
 Brown, A. H.
 Burghley, Lord
 Caine, W. S.
 Caldwell, J.
 Chamberlain, R.
 Clarke, Sir E. G.
 Coddington, W.
 Coghill, D. H.
 Commerall, Adml. Sir J. E.
 Compton, F.
 Cooke, C. W. R.
 Corbett, A. C.
 Corry, Sir J. P.
 Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
 Cross, H. S.
 Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
 Currie, Sir D.
 Dalrymple, C.
 Davenport, H. T.
 De Cobain, E. S. W.
 De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
 De Worms, Baron H.
 Dickson, Major A. G.
 Dimsdale, Baron R.
 Dixon-Hartland, F. D.
 Donkin, R. S.
 Dorington, Sir J. E.
 Dugdale, J. S.
 Duncan, Colonel F.
 Duncombe, A.
 Dyke, right hon. Sir W. H.
 Edwards-Moss, T. C.
 Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
 Egerton, hon. A. de T.
 Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
 Elliot, G. W.
 Elton, C. I.
 Evelyn, W. J.
 Ewart, W.
 Ewing, Sir A. O.
 Farquharson, H. R.
 Fellowes, W. H.
 Fergusson, right hon. Sir J.
 Field, Admiral E.
 Fielden, T.
 Finch, G. H.
 Fisher, W. H.
 Fitzgerald, R. U. P.
 Fitz-Wygram, Gen. Sir F. W.
 Folkestone, right hon. Viscount
 Forwood, A. B.
 Fowler, Sir R. N.
 Fraser, General C. C.
 Fulton, J. F.
 Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
 Gathorne-Hardy, hon. A. E.
 Gedge, S.
 Gent-Davis, R.
 Gibson, J. G.
 Giles, A.
 Gilliat, J. S.
 Godson, A. F.
 Goldsmid, Sir J.
 Goldsworthy, Major-General W. T.
 Gorst, Sir J. E.
 Goschen, rt. hn. G. J.
 Grimston, Viscount
 Gunter, Colonel R.
 Gurdon, R. T.
 Hall, A. W.
 Hall, C.
 Halsey, T. F.
 Hambro, Col. C. J. T.
 Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
 Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Hamilton, Col. C. E.
 Hamley, Gen. Sir E. B.

Hanbury, R. W.
 Hardcastle, E.
 Hardcastle, F.
 Hartington, Marq. of Havelock - Allan, Sir H. M.
 Heathcote, Capt. J. H. Edwards-
 Heaton, J. H.
 Heneage, right hon. E.
 Herbert, hon. S.
 Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
 Hill, Colonel E. S.
 Hill, A. S.
 Hoare, S.
 Hobhouse, H.
 Holland, right hon. Sir H. T.
 Holmes, rt. hon. H.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Houldsworth, W. H.
 Howorth, H. H.
 Hozier, J. H. C.
 Hubbard, E.
 Hughes, Colonel E.
 Hunt, F. S.
 Hunter, Sir W. G.
 Isaacson, F. W.
 Jackson, W. L.
 Jarvis, A. W.
 Jennings, L. J.
 Kelly, J. R.
 Kenrick, W.
 Kenyon, hon. G. T.
 Kenyon - Slaney, Col. W.
 Kerans, F. H.
 Kimber, H.
 King, H. S.
 King - Harman, right hon. Colonel E. R.
 Knightley, Sir R.
 Knowles, L.
 Kynoch, G.
 Lafone, A.
 Lambert, C.
 Lawrence, J. C.
 Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
 Lawrence, W. F.
 Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
 Lees, E.
 Legh, T. W.
 Lewis, Sir C. E.
 Lewisham, right hon. Viscount
 Long, W. H.
 Low, M.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Lowther, J. W.
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, right hon. J. H. A.
 Mackintosh, C. F.
 Maclean, J. M.
 MacIure, J. W.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Mallock, R.
 March, Earl of
 Marriott, rt. hn. W. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N. Story-
 Matthews, rt. hn. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mayne, Admiral R. C.
 Mills, hon. C. W.
 Milvain, T.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morrison, W.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, right hon. Sir J. R.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Newark, Viscount
 Noble, W.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 Norton, R.
 Paget, Sir R. H.
 Parker, hon. F.
 Pearce, W.
 Pease, H. F.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Plunket, right hon. D. R.
 Pomfret, W. P.
 Powell, F. S.
 Price, Captain G. E.
 Quilter, W. C.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Rasch, Major F. C.
 Reed, H. B.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Ritchie, rt. hn. C. T.
 Robertson, W. T.
 Robinson, B.
 Ross, A. H.
 Round, J.
 Royden, T. B.
 Russell, Sir G.
 Russell, T. W.
 Sandys, Lieut-Col. T. M.
 Schlater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
 Sellar, A. C.
 Selwin - Ibbetson, rt. hon. Sir H. J.
 Seton-Karr, H.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sinclair, W. P.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Stewart, M. J.
 Sutherland, T.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Tapping, T. K.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Verdin, R.
 Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Webster, R. G.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.

Whitmore, C. A.
Williams, J. Powell-
Wilson, Sir S.
Wodehouse, E. R.
Wood, N.
Wortley, C. B. Stuart-

Wroughton, P.
Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.
Douglas, A. Akers-
Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Glam.)
Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)
Acland, A. H. D.
Allison, R. A.
Asquith, H. H.
Atherley-Jones, L.
Barran, J.
Blake, T.
Blane, A.
Bolton, J. C.
Bradlaugh, C.
Broadhurst, H.
Brown, A. L.
Burt, T.
Cameron, J. M.
Campbell, Sir G.
Campbell, H.
Carew, J. L.
Chance, P. A.
Channing, F. A.
Clancy, J. J.
Clark, Dr. G. B.
Coleridge, hon. B.
Commins, A.
Connolly, L.
Conway, M.
Conybeare, C. A. V.
Cosham, H.
Cremor, W. R.
Crossley, E.
Deasy, J.
Dillon, J.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Dodds, J.
Ellis, J. E.
Ellis, T. E.
Easlemont, P.
Farquharson, Dr. R.
Fenwick, C.
Finucane, J.
Foley, P. J.
Foster, Sir W. B.
Fox, Dr. J. F.
Gill, T. P.
Gladstone, H. J.
Grey, Sir E.
Gully, W. C.
Haldane, R. B.
Harrington, E.
Hayden, L. P.
Hayne, C. Seale-
Healy, M.
Healy, T. M.
Hooper, J.
Hunter, W. A.
Jacoby, J. A.
Joicey, J.
Kennedy, E. J.
Kenny, C. S.
Lalor, R.
Lawson, Sir W.
Lawson, H. L. W.
Leake, R.
Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S.

Lewis, T. P.
Macdonald, W. A.
M'Arthur, A.
M'Arthur, W. A.
M'Cartan, M.
M'Donald, P.
M'Donald, Dr. R.
M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
M'Laren, W. S. B.
Maitland, W. F.
Mappin, Sir F. T.
Marum, E. M.
Mason, S.
Molloy, B. C.
Morgan, O. V.
Morley, A.
Mundella, right hon.
A. J.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.
Nolan, J.
O'Brien, J. F. X.
O'Brien, P.
O'Brien, P. J.
O'Connor, A.
O'Connor, J. (Kerry)
O'Connor, J. (Tipperary.)
O'Connor, T. P.
O'Doherty, J. E.
O'Hanlon, T.
O'Kelly, J.
Peacock, R.
Pease, A. E.
Pickard, B.
Pickersgill, E. H.
Pictou, J. A.
Pinkerton, J.
Powell, W. R. H.
Power, P. J.
Power, R.
Price, T. P.
Priestley, B.
Provand, A. D.
Pyne, J. D.
Quinn, T.
Redmond, W. H. K.
Roberts, J.
Roberts, J. B.
Roe, T.
Rowlands, J.
Rowlands, W. B.
Rowntree, J.
Sexton, T.
Shaw, T.
Sheehan, J. D.
Smith, S.
Stack, J.
Stanhope, hon. P. J.
Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
Stevenson, F. S.
Sullivan, D.
Summers, W.
Swinburne, Sir J.
Tuite, J.
Wallace, R.

Warmington, C. M.
Wayman, T.
Williams, A. J.

TELLERS.
Biggar, J. G.
Shell, E.

Question put.

"That the words, 'Provided, that where an order has been made under this section, and the place of trial is changed accordingly, the trial shall not be held for at least ten days after such order shall have been served on each defendant,' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 152;
Noes 258: Majority 106.—(Div. List,
No. 208.) [11.45 P.M.]

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.):
I beg to say, Sir, that I did not hear the Question put, and voted, accidentally, in the wrong Lobby.

THE CHAIRMAN: The mistake cannot be rectified now, as the numbers have been announced at the Table by the Tellers.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move that you do report Progress, Sir, and ask leave to sit again. I do this in order that we may hear from the First Lord of the Treasury whether he intends to take to-night the proposed Mail Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREA-SURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I wish to say that, unless any hon. Member objects to the proposal, I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House generally that the discussion of the proposed India-China Mail Contracts be postponed until Monday week.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.)
Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he intends to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill to-night?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no Question before the Committee. The Question has not been put.

DR. CLARK: I will withdraw the Motion.

Several hon. MEMBERS: No, no!

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr.
Clark.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I ask the right
hon. Gentleman whether he intends to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill to-night, as it is the intention of some of my hon. Friends to discuss the tobacco question as affecting Ireland, and also the question of the allocation of £50,000 for arterial drainage, which we have reason to look upon as a gross job?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask whether the Government have come to any decision as to the point raised at the commencement of the Sitting—namely, as to whether they intend to make progress to-night with the Coal Mines Regulation Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I would propose that we make progress with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill to-night if we reach it at anything like a reasonable hour. The question the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. M. Healy) refers to—namely, the allocation of £50,000 to arterial drainage in Ireland—has nothing to do with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask what the right hon. Gentleman considers a "reasonable time"? According to their proposed new Rules, the Government seem to think half-past 12 a reasonable hour for relinquishing Business for the night. I do not know whether reasonableness is to change according to the time of the year.

MR. W. H. SMITH: There does not seem to me any reason why the Committee should not arrive at a decision on the sub-section immediately. If it does, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland will then make a statement with reference to Sub-section 2. After that we shall immediately report Progress, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill may then be taken.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): That seems a very reasonable course. If we decide on the sub-section before the Committee, the Government will state what course they intend to take with Sub-section 2.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is not a reasonable thing to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill to-night. It would be an unfortunate thing to take it at this late hour of the night (12.10) in view of the important considerations to be raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the question of the allocation of this £50,000 will not arise under that Bill. I do not know what decision the Chair will give on the point, but the question certainly seems to me relevant seeing that it is proposed to allocate this money out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's surplus.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The question I put to the right hon. Gentleman had no reference to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, but was with regard to a subject which interests a large number of people inside and outside this House—namely, the Coal Mines Regulation Bill. The intentions of the Government respecting this measure are not known, and a large number of hon. Members have remained here in a state of uncertainty as to the course that is to be taken upon it to-night. I want some kind of definite announcement as to when the Bill is likely to be brought forward.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Earlier in the evening I stated that the Coal Mines Regulation Bill was to be taken, if it was agreeable to hon. Gentlemen representing constituencies interested in coal mines, between half-past 11 and 12 o'clock. Early in the evening—shortly after that announcement was made—I received a communication from those Gentlemen to the effect that it would not be agreeable to them that the Bill should be taken at that hour. I yielded to the representation then made, and announced, through the customary channels, that the Bill would not be taken this evening. It is impossible for me to say when the Bill will be taken. I am anxious to make an arrangement for it to come on, however, and it will be taken on the first convenient opportunity.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I would appeal to the Government to fix a time that will afford an opportunity for the discussion of this Bill, seeing that it involves the interests of 500,000 of the population of this country—and not only their interests, but their lives. It will be exceedingly inconvenient to have it put down at times when there is no opportunity of reaching it and having it discussed.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not responsible for the inconvenience that is spoken of. The hon. Member will bear me out that I have made repeated statements in this House and to him, on the subject, and I have his letter stating that it would not be agreeable to himself and his Colleagues that this Bill should be taken after half-past 11 o'clock. I am not now able to state the day on which it will be possible to take it at an earlier hour.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: If hon. Members only knew the thinness of the thread by which the lives of hundreds of thousands of these men—

THE CHAIRMAN: This discussion, however interesting, is not relevant to the Motion to report Progress.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I would ask the Government whether they think it more important to destroy the liberties of the subjects of the Queen—[Interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Does the hon. Member for Caithness wish to withdraw the Motion?

DR. CLARK: Yes, Sir.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move in page 3, line 37, after "had" to insert—

"Provided that the Court may, in any proper case, award any defendant his costs of any proceedings under this section."

I trust the Government will see their way to accept this Amendment. They have already accepted its principle, and have provided that when a change of venue takes place the Crown shall pay the cost of that change. They have limited the proposal, as I understand it, to the payment of the expenses of the defendant's witnesses and the expenses incurred if there is a subsequent trial.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 37, after "had," to insert the words, "Provided that the Court may in any proper case award any defendant his costs of any proceedings under this section."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I will endeavour to make the matter clear on Report, so as to provide that if a defendant succeeds in his application he will be entitled to costs.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to consider whether it would not be possible to accept the Amendment in its present form, and to give the Court power to allow the defendant his costs, even if the decision is against him, if the Court thought he had a reasonable case.

MR. HOLMES: I have said that I propose to deal with the matter on Report. I will endeavour to amend the Bill in this respect to some extent, but I cannot undertake to go so far as the hon. Member suggests.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I now move the Amendment which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) to insert after "had" in line 37—

"Provided, that an order made under this section may be appealed from to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, which shall have jurisdiction to hear such appeal, and to confirm, vary, or reverse such order as may seem just."

When we remember the case of Father Keller we see how desirable it is to have an appeal in these matters. The public generally have confidence in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, and I trust the Government will not allow men to be deprived of their liberty—to have their lives and liberties imperilled—under this section without giving them an appeal in the matter.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 37, after "had," to insert the words—"Provided, that an order made under this section may be appealed from to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, which shall have jurisdiction to hear such appeal, and to confirm, vary, or reverse such order as may seem just."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Government cannot accept this Amendment. It would be absurd to allow an appeal on a mere exercise of discretion on the part of the High Court. No appeal was given in criminal cases in the Judicature Act of 1873, though a similar provision was inserted in the Irish Judicature Act; but if this Amendment were accepted there is little doubt that advantage would be taken of it in every case, if only to procure delay.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that the discretion of partizan Judges should not be overruled by giving an appeal to independent men? We all know that the Judges of the Court—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman has been frequently told that he must not attack the Judges as he is now doing. There is a Constitutional method of calling the action of these officials inquisition.

[Fifteenth Night.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: Some of the Judges to whom I was referring are dead and gone, and my attack would not do them much harm. One of them is in the House of Lords, and no attack could reach him. The practice of the Government has been for the Government to put political partizans into the Court of Queen's Bench, so as to form a Court on which they can rely. We propose that there should be an appeal from this Court to one that has been reasonably constituted—namely, the Court of Appeal in Ireland. The Government seem to think that the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal are equally deserving of being incensed by this House; but our preference for the Court of Appeal ought not to be offensive to the Queen's Bench Division, seeing that the gentlemen in the Court of Appeal have much higher salaries, and from their position are entitled to much more respect. I think it most unreasonable for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to refer to what was done in the Judicature Act. That Act was passed before the franchise had been extended, and when you had representing Ireland in this House a corrupt Party who looked after their own interests more than anybody else's and were always on the watch for jobs. That Party did not object to the constitution of this Court, but the Party now representing Ireland do object to it. If we had a Judicature Act like that referred to to pass again we should fight it tooth and nail. I say in 1873 the Irish people were not represented as they are now. That period was the dark ages as compared with the present time, so far as the representation of Ireland in this House is concerned.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): In a certain well known case—that of Canon Keller, of Youghal—the defendant would have been kept in prison to this moment if it had not been for an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Dublin. Canon Keller's imprisonment was illegal; but the Court of Queen's Bench held it to be perfectly legal. The Court of Appeal decided against the Court of Queen's Bench by a majority of 3 to 1. That being an example—a recent example—of the untrustworthiness of the partizan Court, I think it hardly decent for the Government to resist us in this matter.

We are entitled, under the circumstances, to say that they resist our attempt to secure this appeal because they know they are secure under present arrangements, and that the Court of Queen's Bench will not oppose the wish of the Executive.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I would ask English legal Gentlemen to bear in mind what it is the Government have done in this matter. If I bring an action for £20 in one of the Superior Courts, and lay the venue in any part of Ireland, any party to that action can apply to have the venue changed; but the Government have now decided that in a case where a man is tried for his life, and the Government lay the venue in a particular place, if the prisoner objects to that venue, and appeals to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the Court of Queen's Bench refuses to hear him, he is not to have an appeal from their decision in a matter that may affect his life, and must affect his liberty. I cannot conceive anything more monstrous than that. In the smallest and most trumpery action you can have an appeal, and it is most monstrous for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to tell us that you cannot have an appeal against the "discretion" of the Court. I say it is not a matter of discretion. It is a question of fact in itself. The Court has to decide whether it is or is not a fact that the venue to which the trial is to be changed is of such a character that you can get a more fair and impartial trial there than in the place where the venue would be ordinarily laid. That is an allegation of fact to be decided, and it is perfectly idle and monstrous to say that this is merely a matter of discretion. There are appeals every day on this question of venue in civil cases, and no one has ever pretended that in civil actions it is a question for the discretion of the Court. The Court is trying an ordinary motion, on which it is to come to a conclusion on the evidence placed before it—not oral evidence, but evidence contained in affidavits. I did think that this was a point on which we might expect a favourable hearing. I do not desire to make any attack on the Court of Queen's Bench; but Members on all sides must be aware of this fact—that the Court of Queen's Bench is so constituted that the Irish people have not—rightly or wrongly—confidence in it. That has been declared in this House over and over again. Their partiality and their decisions have been frequently attacked; and as to cases in which an appeal has been taken from their decisions on political matters, those decisions have been over and over again reversed. The Court consists of four political Judges, and it is simply atrocious to say that on a matter in which the life of a prisoner may be concerned there should be no power of appeal. After such a decision as that we may expect anything of the Government.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): The Attorney General for Ireland opposes this Amendment, because he says it is a matter for the discretion of the Court, and it is not usual on such questions that there should be a power of appeal. Well, I should like to ask the House to look at the process by which this change of venue is brought about. It is brought, in the first instance, before the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland himself, and it is a matter for his discretion, as an Officer of the Crown, and the Member of a political Executive, to say, without any evidence, and on his simple certificate, that the venue ought to be changed. But then, if the defendant wishes to question this decision, he may bring evidence before the Court, so that the question for the Court to decide is a question of fact. Now, by an insidious provision of this Bill—all through it—the Court is called the High Court of Justice in Ireland. Now, we look to the Judicature (Ireland) Act, and we find that the High Court for criminal matters does not consist of one or all of the Judges of the Supreme Court in Ireland; it consists, and can consist, only of the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division. Therefore, the Queen's Bench Division is the tribunal before which alone these cases can be decided. If it is true that the Queen's Bench is a political Court—I say nothing whatever about that—what is more reasonable—having regard to the case of the Rev. Father Keller, who, if there had been no appeal from the Judge in Bankruptcy, would have been in prison at this moment for contempt of Court—than that there should be the right of appeal on this question of venue to the Court of Appeal? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for England well knows that the Criminal Code Bill—the preamble of which said that it was expedient that there should be equal justice for England and Ireland—laid it down as an essential principle of criminal jurisprudence that there should be a right of appeal. That shows the tendency of criminal legislation in this matter, and will you deny to carry out that principle now that you are passing an amendment of the Irish Criminal Law which is intended to be perpetual? Without this Amendment the safeguards in this clause are quite illusory. The Court has no discretion whatever. They are presented to the gaze of the English people as acting judicially, while really they are mere puppets of the political agents of Dublin Castle.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 236: Majority 103.—(Div. List, No. 209.) [12.40 A.M.]

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of moving the omission of the 2nd subsection of this clause. There is an Amendment on the Paper standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Central Hull (Mr. H. S. King); but it is, probably, for the convenience of the Committee that I should move it myself, and take this opportunity of stating to the House the views of the Government on the subject. Sir, the reasons which induced the Government originally to introduce this sub-section are not light ones. I do not propose to enumerate them at length now. They are stated briefly in the preamble of this clause. They may be summarized by saying that if we left the measure which we proposed to Parliament, without some conditions of this sort, too great a strain would be put on the jury system of Ireland. I shall not stop now to defend that proposition, because, as I will explain to the Committee in a few moments, there will be another opportunity on which I shall be able to lay the views of the Government at greater length before the Committee, and in a manner which, I am sure, will convince all impartial persons that a strong case exists for introducing some machinery of this or an analogous kind. But, whilst we adhere to these reasons, which we still think those reasons are sound and whilst we are still of opinion that any measure for improving the legal machinery of Ireland would be incomplete without something of the kind, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that a large body of opinion—entertained by Gentlemen who agree entirely with the policy of Her Majesty's Government—entertained not only by Gentlemen on this side of the House, but also by some on the other side of the House—exists to a degree which it is impossible for us to ignore. I observe, for instance, that there are Amendments on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir Albert Rollit), the hon. Member for South Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley), the hon. Member for the Blackpool Division of North Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley), and the hon. Member for South Salford (Mr. Howorth), similar to that which I am now moving; whilst other Amendments from the other side of the House, and to a similar import, are on the Paper. Of course, we always were aware that objections—very strong objections—might reasonably be urged against the propositions we put before the House. We were aware, for instance, that some very high authorities thought that a very grave objection to the change of venue to England might be found in the fact that the Criminal Law of Ireland is embodied in a different series of Statutes to that of England. But besides that objection—which some might call technical—there is a large body of objections—which I will not call sentimental, because that implies blame, but which, at all events, are founded chiefly upon sentiment—with respect to which I quite admit that objections so founded may, under certain circumstances, deserve and command very great respect. We thought that, great as was the weight to be attached to these objections, an expedient that did preserve the reality of the jury system, and which, even in the opinion of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, preserved that system better than the other parts of our Bill—for they have, over and over again, declared that they should rather be tried by an Old Bailey jury than by a special jury empanelled of 11 County Dublin—was worthy the consideration of the House. But, Sir, so long as the end we desire to attain is reached we do not desire—[An hon. MEMBER from the Opposition Benches below the Gangway: The end justifies the means.]—we do not desire to show ourselves obstinate as to the means by which it is to be reached. Therefore, Sir, the Government are of opinion that, on the whole, it would be a wise and a prudent course for them to abandon the change of venue to England, and to substitute for it a Commission of Judges, which has, at all events, the advantage of having to some extent and in a certain manner in its favour the precedent set by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) in 1882. I do not propose to argue that question now. What I have to propose to the House is the method by which the Government intend to carry out that which is their intention on this point. There are three possible courses open to us. We might, of course, introduce Amendments embodying our proposals to this part of the Bill as an Amendment to this clause; but the objection to that would be, if on no other ground, that a proposal of this sort ought not to be sprung upon the Committee at such a short notice. There are other objections, so, without a word of argument, I may dismiss that part of the question. The second course would be to put at the end of the Bill the clauses which would be found necessary to carry our proposal into effect. In 1882 the clauses by which the Special Commission of Judges were created took up, I think, about five or six pages of that Bill; and if we were to embody them in this measure we should increase its bulk by about one-half. Coming, therefore, at the end of this Bill, their introduction would, undoubtedly, greatly prolong our debates; and as this proposal was not mentioned to the House on the second reading—though the grounds for it were—and as this is the first time the Government have announced their intention of carrying this plan into effect, and as, moreover, we hope the remaining clauses of the Bill will not take any very long time to dispose of, we are of opinion, for all these reasons, that great and weighty objections may be urged against our introducing at the end of the Bill the necessary machinery to carry out our scheme. We therefore propose, Sir, simply to drop the 2nd sub-section and all the consequential portions of the Bill which may follow; to carry the Bill without this portion, and, without any further delay, to introduce a second Bill embodying this proposal for a Commission to which I have referred.

[Fifteenth Night.]

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, to leave out sub-section (2).—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed,

"That the words—'(2.) When the crime committed as aforesaid within a proclaimed district with which the defendant is charged is—

- (a.) Murder or manslaughter;
- (b.) Attempt to murder;
- (c.) Aggravated crime of violence against the person;
- (d.) Arson by statute or common law;
- (e.) Breaking into, firing at or, stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I cannot congratulate the Government upon the method they have devised for saving the time of Parliament. Here is a proposal introduced by the Government—introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) with great pomp as a scheme which was absolutely necessary for the pacification of Ireland, a scheme such, as he told us just now, necessitated the unusual course of a special preamble to this particular clause—it was in order to cover this particular proposition he said this preamble was introduced, this preamble that occupied the attention of the Committee for the greater part of yesterday—and now, for the first time after the Bill has been before the House for many weeks, they have discovered that this proposal is so preposterous, so ridiculous, that they cannot face the condemnation of it which stands recorded on this Paper from every quarter of the House, including their own supporters who sit there and their own supporters who sit here. Why, everybody knew how preposterous it was from the very moment the Bill was first seen. I remember very well that on the second reading of the Bill I declined altogether to discuss it as a serious proposal. I said it was so ridiculous, so monstrous, on the face of it, that the Government would not dare to carry it, and even if they carried it they would not dare to act upon it, and that was apparent to every man of common sense in the country who does not happen to sit on that Bench. And here, on the 9th of June, the announcement is made that it would be wise and prudent, in face of this universal condemnation of their proposal, to drop it. They arrive at this after mature deliberation on a scheme they have claimed as entirely their own. But it is a proposal for which they cannot claim the originality. There is a precedent for it in one of the most disgraceful periods of our history; it is stolen from the policy of the Government of Lord North—which lost us the American Colonies. It was a disgraceful, discreditable proposal, which you will find condemned by the great oratory of Burke in that immortal speech on the conciliation of America—a proposal to bring Colonials from America to try them in London. Having the whole scope of English history to choose from, this is the example Her Majesty's Government deliberately introduced into their Bill. But I need not dwell on this capital article of their Bill. In consequence of the universal disapprobation it has met with, what are they going to do? To substitute another proposal, and a proposal in the Act of 1882, which they now find was a more sensible proposal than their own.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say so.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Then I have failed to understand the right hon. Gentleman. He referred specially to the Act of 1882. It would seem that the right hon. Gentleman has so little acquainted himself with his own policy that he has hardly explained his new plan to the Committee to his own satisfaction. If it is not to be a Commission of Judges, as in the Act of 1882, what is it to be? He certainly has failed to explain it to the Committee. Well, however it be, what is the proposal that is to save the time of Parliament? You have had your first reading debate, your second reading debate, and your debate on the stage of going into Committee on this Bill, and what you propose to do now is not to introduce an alternative proposal into this measure, but to have a new first reading, and a second reading, and a going into Committee debate, upon a supplementary Coercion Bill. Such a proposal is wantonly, deliberately made to waste the time of Parliament. You "live and move and have your being" so entirely on coercion that it seems you think that if you part with this measure you would be unfortunately compelled to introduce some other measures of another kind, and this would be so alien to your character, so inconsistent with your political position, that you must always keep a Coercion Bill before the House for this is the fundamental basis—the universal cement—which keeps together all sections of the Unionist Party. Therefore, when, on the 17th June or some other day, you have got rid of Coercion Bill No. 1, you will have ready a fresh Coercion Bill No. 2, which will last a month or two longer. Then you will find out that some proposal in Coercion Bill No. 2 is so ridiculous that you cannot maintain it, and then you will have Coercion Bill No. 3. And so this Government of Coercion will have its properly arranged set of courses—a first course, a second course, and a third course. This is the pabulum on which alone you live and act, on which alone you can go on. Is there a man in the country who does not see through this scheme? You know that the moment the Coercion discussion ceases you will get into inextricable difficulties. You have told us of your remedial measures. Well, in “another place,” where you have it all your own way, where you have no obstruction but what comes from your own Party, you cannot get along with your remedial measures there. If that be so, if your remedial measures involve you in such enormous difficulties, it is a case of keeping coercion going as long as you can. Under these circumstances, it seems the proposal you have announced to-night to terminate Coercion Bill No. 1 is quite immaterial, for when you terminate that, then at once you begin Coercion Bill No. 2. I treat the proposal as a distinct sham to provide a cry that you have done this to get on with Business, when you are obliged, after all, to have recourse to such a clumsy device as this to prevent any Business at all being done.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated—

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) rose in his place, and said: I rise to Order, Mr. Courtney, and I claim to move, “That the Question be now put.”

Question put accordingly, “That the Question be now put,” and agreed to.

Sir William Harcourt

Question,
“That the words (2.)
omitted as aforesaid with which the defendants
(a.) Murder or manslaughter;
(b.) Attempt to murder;
(c.) Aggravated criminal person;
(d.) Arson by statute
(e.) Breaking into, &c.
of the Clause,”
—put, and negatives

Words omitted.

THE CHAIRMAN maintains one more clause (81 A) capable
Mr. J. E. EL Rushcliffe): The Amendment being only the second part the same Provision
the Government essions on the Bill I detain the Committee
it will be accepted.

Amendment proposed
To add, at the end of
“There shall be published
Dublin Gazette a return
The number of or preceding quarter
place of trial, &c.
order, the places
change has been with the names of defendants, and the
him or them.”—

Question proposed be there added.”

THE ATTORNEY
RICHARD WEBSTER)
The Government
Amendment. The publishing a Return persons who might
the preliminary into the proceedings
These proceedings official character; the dictment and the General; and if the
the Court it will
But, first of all, a publicly; and it will known in the usual
when the offence
the evidence will be papers, and there will for this Return to ins
possibly is necessary

1st clause of the Bill, and to which, in that case, the Government assented.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: With great respect for the authority of the Attorney General I think there is a necessity, and the object in either case is the same. It is desirable that, from time to time, attention should be drawn to the operation of the Act; and I cannot for a moment see any good reason why the Government should wish to withhold from the House of Commons this information in this convenient form. I must press my Amendment.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I cannot agree that the reasons given by the hon. and learned Attorney General are sufficient for the rejection of this proposal. He says he will not give this Return, because it would be a record of things done publicly; but there are hundreds of things done publicly in the full light of day that yet are recorded in Returns granted every day by this House. We have Returns of evictions, for instance. These are not exactly judicial acts, but they follow on judicial acts. I need not attempt to go over a list of such things; but it will occur to any hon. Member that many things, after having been matters of public knowledge, are given in the form of tabulated Returns. Let me point out this—that when we come here and ask for a Return of things and transactions that are not matters of public knowledge the Government say they have no means of giving the Return; but when we ask for a Return of things done publicly we meet with a refusal, because all these things may be found reported in the newspapers.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I do not see on what ground the Government can reasonably refuse this Return; they have their officers ready to compile the information we ask for. We have no such ready means, and I do not see why they should refuse this, unless they fear the Return will disclose an arbitrary exercise of the power vested in the Government. The only way of judging whether this power has been exercised in an arbitrary and unjust manner is by having the number of these alterations of venue brought together and made public. It has been very well said that a large number of individuals being assembled and drilled make an army, while undrilled they would be only a mob. When we have these separate instances of change of venue noted, when we have these facts marshalled side by side, then we shall judge whether these changes of trial have been simply for the purpose of obtaining convictions—whether the change has been made in the interests of justice, or to further the interests and gain the objects of the authorities in Dublin Castle. No doubt, we can find out what we desire to know from other sources; but when the information in a connected form is refused by the Government, we can only suppose that it is the intention to make these changes in their own interest, in the interest of arbitrary power, not of justice, and that they wish to conceal their movements and the springs of their action, as such would be displayed if we had a connected view of their administration of this Bill. They refuse us this information, and add one more to the numberless proofs that they ask for arbitrary power with an intention of using it in a tyrannical, unconstitutional manner.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The Government are following the course we might have expected from experience they would follow. They have been lashed with refusing all concessions on the ground that to do so would be to justify opposition. Surely it has always been held only reasonable to give such information as we ask for. I do not believe that even in the most despotic times it would have been refused in France. Why should not the Government let the people know how many persons have been affected by this change of venue? It is most unfair for Her Majesty's Government to refuse a proposal merely for information that does not affect the principle of the Bill, which only will show in how many instances this power has been put in force. This Amendment, remember, has not been moved by an Irishman; we have not asked for it, for we know enough about you and your doings—we read the Irish papers. But we know there are many hon. Members who, like the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), never read Irish papers; possibly many read nothing at all. Well, this is a demand for information; and surely, if you are going to act honestly and, in accordance with the statements of the hon. and learned Attorney General, will not make these changes of venue in an unfair and unjust manner, you should not be ashamed to let us know how many changes of venue you order. What is the secret of this refusal? Is it that the Return will enable us to detect how many two guinea fees uselessly expended you have had from the taxpayers' pockets? If we knew that there had been 100 changes of venue, we should know that 200 guineas have uselessly gone in motions for cause. Two guineas! Why, I suppose no Crown lawyer would deign to move for that sum; it is only poor wretches outside the ring who receive such. I never held a Crown brief, and I never shall; it is only "duffers" get Crown briefs, men who cannot earn two guineas by doing anything else. Is it because the Return would enable us to test exactly the high-water mark of Liberal Unionist and Tory Bar practice that you refuse it? This is the real secret; it is on this ground that the Amendment is resisted. It is the two guineas that stick in the throat of hon. Gentlemen. We are told we can read the information in the newspapers. Yes; we can read it in units, but not as a whole. We could not see at once of how much the taxpayer is robbed by gentlemen who inveigh against inflated Estimates, and get up a Committee to cut down the expenditure upon the Army and Navy, those Services of which England in the past has been proud, but to which, in a penny-wise and pound-foolish principle, you now grudge money and supply with tin bayonets.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 227: Majority 100.—(Div. List, No. 210.) [1.15 A.M.]

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Mr. Courtney, it would be absurd to expect that this clause should be allowed to be added to the Bill without some debate. We have passed Clause 3, and when Clause 4 is added to the Bill we shall have machinery authorized of such a character that it will be utterly impossible for any man in Ireland to get a fair trial. Now, Sir, we have spent two days, or the greater part of two sittings, debating this clause, and, as far as I can remember, not one single verbal alteration has been granted to us. [Cheers.] Well, these cheers are a very good specimen of the spirit of the Party opposite. That is evidently what they consider to be the proper way to debate measures in this House. If that be the case, why do you have any debate at all, and what is the necessity for having any House at all? You might just as well get the Government draftsman to draft the Bill and provide that whatever the Government inserts in that Bill shall be law, without any discussion at all—for that is what it comes to. This measure is stated by the Government, in the precious preamble over which they wasted three or four hours of the time of the House yesterday, to be necessary in order to get a fair and impartial trial, and these two clauses are of such a character—and I will do the draftsman the justice to say that he has fully succeeded in carrying out the intentions of his paymasters—that when they are carried into law it will be utterly impossible for any man in Ireland who differs from the Government in politics to get a fair trial. There is not a single Member sitting on the Benches opposite who does not know this to be the absolute truth. In the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) the right hon. Gentleman used the following remarkable words. He said that as long as the Government attained their object they were not disposed to be bigoted as regarded means. The right hon. Gentleman accurately described the condition of mind of the Government. As long as they obtain convictions of their political opponents in Ireland, whether the persons convicted be guilty or innocent of the charge brought against them, they do not care whether the convictions are obtained by means of a jury of packed men in Dublin, or a Commission of three Irish Judges, or an Old Bailey jury. It is all the same to the Government. They are not disposed to be bigoted as to the means by which they attain their object. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary alluded to the large amount of sentiment brought into play in this matter, and to the objections which, he said, existed among a large body of politicians to the machinery of this Bill.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Allow me to say that, monstrous and abominable as that machinery unquestionably is, and revolting as it has proved to the sense of Englishmen, the reason why it is revolting is a very simple one. That reason is, that it brings home to Englishmen—that it brings under their own ken—what you are doing in Ireland. And the Government have failed in the attempt, and do not dare to do in view of independent English opinion what has been done for 80 years in Ireland. And why? Because what they do in England is recorded in all your newspapers, and what they do in Ireland is done in the dark. Why, Sir, if the things proposed to be done under this Bill were to be done in England, even if only against Irishmen, or if they were to be done in any part of Great Britain, under the eye of the English Press and of English public opinion, this Bill could not live for a fortnight. The fate of the 2nd sub-section of this clause ought to be a lesson to any intelligent man who wishes to be fair-minded and to treat the Irish people in such a way that he may venture to hope for any union between Ireland and this country or for any cessation of hatred. There never was a better sample of the hypocrisy common among some classes than the outcry which has been raised about this machinery of the Bill. You talk of the injustice of bringing a prisoner to England. I have already stated that a prisoner would get a fairer trial before an English jury than under the machinery which you have provided. I repeat that statement; and I say emphatically that rather than be tried before such tribunals as you are, unhappily, going to set up in Ireland I would prefer to take my chance before any jury selected in the ordinary way in Great Britain. But do I approve of the machinery of the 2nd sub-section, which is about to be struck out? Nothing of the sort. It is an infamous machinery—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the 2nd sub-section has been struck out of the Bill. It is, therefore, irregular to continue the debate upon it.

MR. DILLON: I will submit to your ruling at once, Sir, if I am out of Order. I did not intend to discuss the 2nd sub-section. I was simply pointing out that it was worse than too bad to be submitted to the public of England.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, inadvertently no doubt, spoke of the 2nd sub-section as about to be struck out.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I submit for your consideration, Sir, that the Question before the Committee is that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill, and that one part of the amendment of the clause consists of the striking out of the sub-section.

MR. DILLON: I shall not, Sir, say anything inconsistent with your ruling. I will simply refer to the 2nd sub-section as an illustration, and will drop all reference to it in detail. My point was this—that the proposal to try Irish cases in England was dropped out of this clause on the ground that it was too monstrous to be tolerated by public opinion in England, even amongst the Conservative and the Liberal Unionist Parties. I consider that Clauses 3 and 4 constitute a tribunal in Ireland which will leave the prisoner a great deal less chance than he would have had under the sub-section which, in deference to public opinion, has just been struck out. Whilst I in no way approve of the principle of that sub-section, I state distinctly that, in my opinion, it is another glaring instance of the hypocrisy which is frequently manifested in English public opinion, when dealing with affairs outside this country, that they will not tolerate a thing which is publicly brought forward, although they will tolerate things ten times more infamous when the cloak of silence is drawn over them. We know that the most infamous things are allowed to be done in the dark, and that not a voice is raised to condemn them, until, perhaps, some Press-man stirs up the cesspool. The Committee strikes out of a measure like this the proposal that Irish cases shall be tried in England, on the ground that it is too strong for the English stomach, and yet it leaves in the Bill provisions which are infinitely more unjust and cruel to the prisoner in Ireland—provisions which leave the prisoner no chance, and which forms the most monstrous and infamous parody of justice ever attempted to be set up in any country. Talk of justice as administered by despots in Eastern countries! I believe that there would be more chance of justice before an Eastern potentate than there is under these clauses. The system in the past has been to bring prisoners before jurors, every single individual of whom has been carefully selected, because his position has been carefully ascertained beforehand by detectives, and because he is a sworn enemy of ours. No Member of the Irish Government could attempt to deny that they have done such things in the past, and they think that they will deceive the public of England into believing that they are doing something humane—that they are acting upon principles of justice and humanity—when they leave out the 2nd sub-section, and content themselves with other machinery, the effect of which will be to place Irish Nationalists on their trial before men every one of whom has condemned them before entering the jury-box. That is the system which they propose to set up in Ireland for ever. Now, I want, in all seriousness, to put this question to every hon. Member of this House. Does any Englishman of this House expect that this law will command the sympathy of the Irish people? All I can say is, that if any Englishman expects it he must be either intensely stupid or completely ignorant of the history of our people. Every English statesman who has addressed his mind and intellect to the consideration of the Irish Question in years gone by has declared his conviction that the essence of the difficulty in Ireland is the fact that the law is distrusted, disliked, and looked upon as hostile by the masses of the population. Statesman after statesman, from the days of Fox and Burke, and the days of the Old Whigs, to the days of Peel and Russell, and down to the day of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, has declared his conviction that, until you conciliate the masses of the people and give them confidence in the administration of the law, you cannot hope for peace in Ireland. And now, in 1867, the best way English Ministers can devise for conciliating the people and imparting to them confidence in the administration of the law—the best way they can devise, after 87 years' experience, is to adopt a machinery which they tell us is to be perpetual, and which provides that the man who belongs to the poor, and the man who holds the same political convictions as, at the lowest estimate, four-fifths of the people of Ireland, can never be a political offence, but the jury-box 12 men political convictions as [Cries of "No!"] We cry of "No!" I will not. Gentlemen opposite of I care not whether they like or not, because our friends of Ireland are will merely say alien to political conviction, at the most potent of all hands—namely, the conviction its pockets will be all the Irish people that they to live under such a system damn them to an end of the turmoil, discord with the law which has history of your administration country. I would ask this House, whether the Conservative, if they had system as that is going Union, and, if they did are not beginning to object on which they hearts is not worth the

Dr. COMMINS (R When I put down the which stands on the Paper to omit this clause, I there was one saving provision it was the provision been struck out. I have experience of English law in England, and I know the English law as administered in Ireland. I know that the prejudice seldom influences the packing of juries do Judges and Recorders and those who administer the think more of doing justice sooner than they think of political parties. I have confidence in English jury jury selected and paid adopted in Ireland by the after Attorney General did not object to the which I believed was the of the clause—the one I the ship from going down has been thrown overboard whale. Although no Irish to the sub-section—although had that confidence in it they believed their countrymen would get better justice before an English jury than under the other machinery provided by the Bill, the provision was so essentially unfair, so atrocious, so contrary to the old and well-established principles of English jurisprudence, so contrary to the spirit of the jury system, that from all sides of the House and from all shades of opinion in the country the strongest condemnation was showered upon it. And yet that provision was less atrocious than anything else in the Bill. There was no Amendment put upon the Paper showing that there was any intention amongst us to oppose it, but at the last moment it is thrown overboard, and the rest of the clause is left in its unmitigated hideousness. What does the section, in its present form, propose? It begins with several lines which, Sir, are so unusual that I defy any of those learned or unlearned Members who sit opposite to point to any English Act of Parliament in which it was ever found expedient that a preamble should be put into a clause, especially a preamble which, like this, involves insult and contumely to a whole people. If the clause is justifiable, it does not need such a preamble—

Mr. Dillon

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question of the preamble was debated yesterday for two and a-half hours. The hon. Member must now confine himself to the clause as a whole.

DR. COMMINS: Well, Mr. Courtney, the preamble has been passed, and, as I oppose the whole clause as it stands, I thought it was open to me to express my objection to the preamble. However, Sir, I am content to accept your ruling in the matter. Then comes the most material part of what is left of this clause, and that is the arbitrary power which it confers, without supervision or check, on the Irish Attorney General, whoever he may be, not only to select the place of trial, but virtually and practically to select the jury, and to abolish every pretence of fair trial in Ireland. We know how strongly opinion runs in Ireland. We know that the Attorney General is always able to bring that opinion into the jury-box to destroy all chance of any person charged with a political offence having a fair trial. That being so, it appears to me that the clause, as at present framed, places the liberty of every man who happens to be resident in Ireland at the mercy of the Attorney General for the time being, with no legal check on the exercise of his discretion. I oppose this clause because I feel that the very best portion of it has been thrown over, and because, as it now stands, it is an absolute abnegation of fair trial in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I may be permitted to say one word. We are charged with obstruction, but we have only given the Government time to consider this clause, for they do not seem to have been able to make up their minds upon it sooner. Do you condemn murder and assassination by a Ribbon Society? You do. That is intelligible; but this is a proposal to assassinate by legal methods. The Ribbon Society gives a man a trial in secret, but without the forms of law; of course its murderous executions are of a very hideous and horrible character, and must produce a painful and shocking sensation. But the people have a motive in carrying them out; they think they are justifiable, but they do not believe you have a right to carry out your law in their country, because that law has no moral ground; it has no foundation except that of your bayonets. You propose now to pick out from amongst the population of Ireland a body of men in every county, numbering, perhaps, not more than 1,000 in the aggregate, men who belong to a secret organization, and you want to place on their trial, before these men, the Irish Nationalists. You condemn the Ribbon men for arraigning the landlords before their organization, and upon their verdict after what they call a fair trial, carrying out the sentences of execution; you condemn them for carrying out their miserable sentences in their miserable Ribbon Lodges; but, Sir, you would drag the Irish Nationalists for trial before a jury of members of the Orange Order—of men who will not, perhaps, sit in the jury box wearing the regalia of their order, but who may have come down shouting—“To hell with the Pope!” or who may be boasting—“I shot so and so in the Shanklin Road.” It is true the Government have dropped the sub-clause. I was careful to say nothing about that clause at any time; but I must now say it is strange that at a period when the country has enlarged the basis of its franchise, and when 500,000 individuals have just been admitted within the Constitution in Ireland, you say that only 5,000 men are to be allowed to sit in the jury-box in Ireland. This is a step back into the dark ages. If you decide on this you will poison public life in Ireland; you will continue to poison the relations and feelings between the two countries, and it can only lead to having the Irish Members expelled from this House. If this policy is maintained in its entirety, you, who are in favour of Union, as you say, will have to see the failure of another of your Crimes Bills, in the same way as you have seen 20 or 30 previous Crimes Bills fail; and if the Germans conquered England to-morrow—which God forbid!—and if they selected 20 or 30 men who supported their administration to be the sole administrators of the law, would you consider justice could be administered in that way? No; you would not. Then why try the same policy in Ireland? And when you have failed in this policy—as fail you must—you will come down with another proposition, and you will say—"It is the agitators." Yes; it will be the same old story. You will complain that it is the agitators who are attacking the privileges of the landlord class, and you will wind up by expelling from this House those who raised their voices—as our future Representatives will—against the continuance of this bad system. Then you will be left alone. I recommend the Government, when their first Coercion Bill has failed, and when their second one has been brought in, to make the latter much shorter, and merely provide that the Attorney General for Ireland may, of his own will, order any Irish Member or Irish peasant to execution.

Question put.

The Committee divided: Ayes 219; Noes 115: Majority 104.—(Div List, No. 211.) [2.10 A.M.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) state what will be the character of the Motion of which he has given Notice for debate to-morrow?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I propose to move, Sir—

"That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as hereinafter provided. After the Clauses are disposed of he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House.

"From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion, That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith.

"If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As far as I caught it, this seems to me to be copied in some respects from a former Notice in reference to Urgency. But the right hon. Gentleman will remember that in those Rules with reference to Urgency there was a certain majority required.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is very irregular to discuss a Motion of which Notice is merely given by permission of the House. It is permissible to ask a Question in regard to it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is what I am going to do. [Interruption.] I, of course, fully submit to the ruling of the Chair; but I will not submit, nor will I pay any attention, to these interruptions from hon. Members opposite. In order to explain the Question I propose to put to the right hon. Gentleman, I referred to a former Resolution as Urgency and to the majority required by it. I only rose to ask, in reference to this Notice, whether it is proposed that there shall be any particular majority, or whether it is to be a bare one!

MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall not propose any particular majority.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman promised us we should have copies of this Resolution, but we have not had an opportunity of seeing it. I tried to take it down, but that was wholly impossible, for it is as long as "God Save the Queen." I would respectfully ask him is it carrying out the pledge that we should have it at an early hour to give it to us now? I acquit him entirely of bad faith, because at the time the right hon. Gentleman thought it possible the Coal Mines Regulation Bill might be reached by 10 o'clock

Mr. T. M. Healy

But we were promised an adequate opportunity of seeing and handling this Resolution, so as to enable us to put on the Paper any Amendments we might think necessary. I submit that the promise has not been kept. Does the right hon. Gentleman expect us now to sit down and prepare the Amendments, to laboriously copy them out, and to keep the Clerks at the Table after the rising of the House? Does he think it reasonable to treat us in this manner? The discussion should be postponed or the period extended.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am very sorry that the proceedings of the Committee have been protracted far beyond the hour at which I thought we might close. But I do not see how I can possibly postpone the consideration of this Amendment, or extend the Committee stage beyond June 17.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Put it on to Jubilee Day.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Member will have an opportunity of moving any Amendment he chooses.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, To-morrow, again resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask for what day do the Government put down this Bill? If for to-morrow, I must resist it; because the Government have given Notice of a Motion that must give rise to a long discussion, and it would be unreasonable to expect us to resume the discussion of this Bill after that at a late hour—perhaps 2 or 3 in the morning. At least, let us set it down for a day when there is some probability of its being taken. I move that it be set down for Monday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "To-morrow," and insert "on Monday next."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That 'To-morrow' stand part of the Question."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I hope the hon. and learned Member will not press this Amendment. How long the debate on other Business may take this day I cannot say, but we will undertake that Committee shall not be resumed at a late hour.

MR. DILLON: Then why not put the Bill down for Monday at once, or else let the Motion for Urgency be put down for Monday, a far more sensible plan? I presume the Government do not expect that the Motion for Urgency will be disposed of without, at least, a night's debate.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: What will the right hon. Gentleman consider a late hour? Will he say that it will not be taken after 10 o'clock, then we shall understand? Let him give us an undertaking that it shall not be taken after a certain hour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not after half-past 11.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I withdraw my Motion for Monday.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Committee To-morrow.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACTS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(Sir James Corry, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Johnston.)

[BILL 176.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

New Clause—

(Execution of Main Drainage Scheme.)

"Until the New Council shall have been elected in manner described in the preceding section, no action shall be taken nor liability incurred in respect of any scheme which may be passed into Law during the present Session of Parliament for the Main Drainage of the Borough of Belfast,"—(Mr. Sexton,) —brought up, and read the first time.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In moving the insertion of this clause in the Bill very little argument is required from me to commend it to the House. It is, in fact, for the purpose of completing an arrangement made by the House in Committee. The House has determined to increase the municipal franchise of Belfast from 5,000 to 20,000, in order to secure that such schemes as that for the main drainage of Belfast should not be proceeded with against the opinion and without control of the great body of householders. The House has further declared that next November all the seats on the Town Council shall become vacant, and shall be refilled at an election to be held then; therefore, it is apparent that the present Town Council will have no control over the works for the main drainage scheme after November. But what security have we as to the action of the present Town Council between the passing of the Main Drainage Bill and the elections in November? There is great danger that the present Council, conscious that the term of their power is approaching an end, may make contracts and otherwise proceed with the scheme, plunging the borough into a liability that may continue for 30 or 40 years. My Amendment will prevent that. Resolutions passed at public meetings in Belfast have been forwarded to me, and they express what is the general opinion in the town, that there is no confidence in the Town Council elected on the restricted franchise. I ask the House to complete the action it has taken, and to make the control it has vested in the ratepayers a real and effective control in regard to the main drainage scheme. If the House does not adopt this clause, that control will be illusory, and I cannot regard the Bill without this clause as satisfying the claim I have made, and giving the ratepayers that security they have a right to expect after the action of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. EWART (Belfast, N.): I rise to oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast. The main drainage scheme is one upon which no time should be lost, for the drainage of Belfast is in a deplorable condition. The effect of the Amendment of the hon. Member would be to delay all operations for a year. The Corporation of Belfast are prevented from discharging any sewage matter into the Lough until an outlet sewer and settling tank are completed. These operations are to be carried on in the waters of the Lough, on ground which is bare at low water and covered at high water, and they can only be carried on during the summer and autumn months. The contracts for these works are not heavy, not more than £60,000 or £70,000, and they are the only contracts that it would be necessary to enter into for a long period.

Mr. Sexton

If the Amendment of the hon. Member is carried it will delay operations until next year, a delay of at least 12 months. Already the town has suffered a year's delay in these works through the action of the hon. Member, and I hope the House will mark its disapproval of the action of the hon. Member. Instead of the clause of the hon. Member, I have given Notice of an Amendment which I will move on the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to the Main Drainage Bill, to the effect that no action shall be taken, or liability incurred, in respect to these works authorized by the Act, unless and until approval has been expressed by a meeting of the ratepayers.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): That will not be in Order.

MR. EWART: The portion of the works I have referred to as being necessary to proceed with before the winter will bear but a very small proportion to the whole. Seeing that the health of the town has suffered so much from the want of a scheme of main drainage, I hope the House will not support the further delay this clause would occasion. We have had a good deal of discussion about Belfast for months past, and reference has often been made to the lamentable loss of life in what may be called a small civil war. Strangely enough, this commenced about the time the hon. Member made his appearance there as an advocate of Home Rule. But the loss of life in those disputes is as nothing as compared to the loss of life the hon. Member wishes to make provision for—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I rise to Order, Sir. Is it in Order to say the loss of life the hon. Member wishes to make provision for?

MR. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to imply that the hon. Member for West Belfast desires to provide for the loss of life?

MR. SEXTON: Oh, I do not mind.

MR. EWART: I withdraw the observation. But in a sanitary sense the loss of life through a want of a proper system of main drainage works is not less than 200 persons, and I do hope the House will not incur the blood-guiltiness of bringing about such a state of affairs.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I confidently appeal to the House—to all sections of the House—to vote for the proposal of my hon. Friend.

I make the appeal in confidence, not merely because of the merits of the question being on the side of my hon. Friend, but because in all previous stages of the Bill my hon. Friend has been able successfully to oppose the narrow policy of the hon. Gentleman opposite by the assistance of votes from both sides of the House. I trust the impartial manner in which this Bill has been discussed and dealt with in previous stages will continue to the end, and that when it leaves this House the credit of passing it may be shared among all sections of the House. I may recall it to the attention of the House that not a single proposal has been made by my hon. Friend that has not been opposed by the hon. Member for North Belfast and the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry), and I cite this as a precedent to show that the burden of proof lies with hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have been defeated when opposing Motions of my hon. Friend. The House will remember that the whole action of the House in reference to this Bill has been abnormal. In the Main Drainage Bill my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) was enabled to induce the House to deal with the municipal franchise of Belfast. It was objected by the Chairman of Ways and Means, who is responsible for Private Bill legislation, that this was an entirely anomalous, unprecedented, irregular, and inconvenient course; and I must say, speaking generally, that his argument was well worth consideration. But all sections of the House were so convinced of the absolute necessity of enlarging the municipal franchise of Belfast in view of the main drainage scheme, that the conviction overcame these objections and caused the acceptance of my hon. Friend's proposal and the introduction into the Main Drainage Bill of a comparatively extraneous matter, the extension of the municipal franchise. The House took this unusual, if not entirely unprecedented course, on the ground that while the main drainage scheme was large and important as affecting the whole body of ratepayers, on the other hand the franchise was so narrow, that it was right the latter should be extended, that the people of Belfast should have a voice in the control of the large expenditure.

Now, is not the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Belfast (Mr. Ewart) asking the House to stultify itself on the whole ground upon which it took an exceptional course, by removing from the ratepayers, to whom you have now extended the franchise, all control over the drainage scheme until November? The hon. Gentleman says the delay in the Bill will cause great loss of life. I should be inclined to pay more attention to that argument were it not for the fact that this scheme and this extraordinary anxiety for the preservation of life in Belfast occurs with suspicious sequence to the choice of my hon. Friend to be Representative of West Belfast, and his efforts to bring the municipal expenditure of Belfast within the purview and control of all the ratepayers. There will be no avoidable delay. Surely the hon. Gentleman opposite knows that even if the clause is rejected, no serious action, so far as the actual works are concerned, can be taken yet? Large contracts have to be made, on which I will say a word presently, and great preparations have to be made, and it is quite impossible to get through these preliminaries before November; therefore there will be no loss of time in actual works. It is said the expenditure before November will be small; but contracts may be entered into involving very heavy expenditure indeed. I have no desire to cast doubt on the bona fides of hon. Gentlemen, who, no doubt, mean what they say; but surely their words have no binding effect upon the Corporation while the latter has power to make these contracts. I say that unless this clause is passed the present Corporation of Belfast will have the power to enter into contracts for the expenditure of £300,000, and that in face of the fact that this House has decided that the Corporation is not competent to enter into such an expenditure until the large body of the ratepayers have made their voice heard. When this Bill passes the Council will dissolve next November, and it is notorious that not a single member of the Council will be re-elected, so that the House—if this clause is not accepted—will come to the astounding decision that a Corporation that will not be re-elected shall have the prospective power of saddling the ratepayers with an expenditure of £300,000. I recognize with my hon. Friend the impartial spirit with which hon. Members have acted in regard to this Bill, and I trust that spirit will prevail to the end of the proceedings. The House has decided over and over again that the ratepayers should have control over the large expenditure upon the drainage scheme, and the way to give effect to that decision is to prevent the present Corporation taking action until the ratepayers have expressed their opinion by the election of a new Council.

MR. CHANCE: The hon. Member who said that there was an annual loss of 200 lives from want of a main drainage scheme for Belfast did not even see this was a heavy accusation against the Corporation that for half-a-century made no attempt to remedy the evils. In reference to what the hon. Member has said as to the Amendment he proposes to move to the Main Drainage Bill, I am quite sure it would be out of Order on the consideration of the Lords' Amendments; and without such a clause as this there is no guarantee that the Corporation, in which the people have no confidence, would not burden the town with an expenditure of £300,000.

MR. SEXTON: Before we go to a Division, Sir, may I ask you a question? The hon. Member for North Belfast has stated that it is his intention, on the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to the Main Drainage Bill, to move the insertion of a clause to provide for a town meeting to consider the scheme. I have to ask you, Sir, will it be competent for the hon. Member to enter upon any other matters than the acceptance or rejection of the Lords' Amendments?

MR. SPEAKER: Any Amendment proposed by any hon. Member in this House must be relevant to the Lords' Amendment then under consideration.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 71: Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 212.)

Clause added.

MR. SEXTON: I ask the House to allow the third reading to be taken now, because the Main Drainage Bill comes on on the 20th, and if this Bill is delayed a further postponement of that Bill will be necessary.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. EWART: I do not object to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MOTION.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) [EXPENSES].—RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any allowances that may be made, and Expenses that may be incurred, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland, and for other purposes relating thereto" (Queen's Recommendation signified).—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I, upon this Motion, ask the Government to give me a distinct answer to a question I raised earlier without getting an answer? This is a Resolution upon which to found a Committee, and to that extent it is a matter of form, but it is one upon which I may put the question again; and that is, do you expect a prisoner to pay all his expenses for the transfer of his counsel and witnesses? The travelling expenses from Dublin to England are less than the expenses of travelling from Cork to the Giant's Causeway, and it is only a fair thing that if a prisoner is removed for trial to such a distance these expenses should be defrayed for him. Before we allow a Committee to be formed to make provision for the payment of useless fees for motions for cause we should know whether the expenses of counsel and witnesses in the case of a prisoner torn from his friends by a change of venue will be paid.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): Under this clause the same course as regards expenses will be followed as in a similar clause in the Act of 1862. The hon. and learned Member is probably aware that in that case the expenses of counsel were paid when the change of venue necessitated any extra or additional expense by reason of the change. The hon. and learned Member will see that it would not be fair to the taxpayers to impose on them the payment of counsel in all cases where there is a change of place of trial. For instance, take the case of a change of venue from Cork to Dublin, the services of the very same counsel would probably be available more readily than if the proceedings went on in Cork. That will be done which was done in the Act of 1882—namely, that when by a change of venue charges are incurred by the prisoner or accused for extra expenses to obtain the services of counsel, those expenses will be paid; and of course the expenses of witnesses, where there is a change of venue, will also be paid.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has not answered the question; he has mentioned a change from Cork to Belfast. Of course, in Dublin the same counsel would act, for there is the Central Law Courts. But suppose the change of venue is to some other circuit; then the prisoner could not employ the same counsel without the payment of special fees. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman answer that?

MR. T. M. HEALY: If we do not get an answer we shall divide.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 48: Majority 63.—(Div. List, No. 213.)

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 10th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SAT FIRST IN PARLIAMENT—The Lord Hindlip, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2)* (116); Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* (117).

Second Reading—Dog Owners (91), negatived.

Report—Tithe Rent-Charge (110-115).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Second Reading—Elementary Education (Christchurch)* (92); Elementary Education (Middleton St. George)* (93); Elementary Education (London)* (94); Pier and Harbour* (103).

DOG OWNERS BILL.—(No. 91.)

(The Lord Mount-Temple.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to provide that the owner of a dog should be liable in damages for any personal injury done by such dog to any person, and it should not be necessary for any person suing for the recovery of damages for any such injury to show a previous mischievous propensity in such dog, or that the owner knew or had notice of such mischievous propensity, or that the injury complained of was attributable to any negligence on the part of the owner in the keeping or management of such dog. The sight of dogs with jaws tied up by iron muzzles had given to multitudes a new impression of the dangerous character of dogs. Many, who used to think of them as tame and pleasant domestic creatures, were suspicious and alarmed at the sight of them, and some people had begun to wish that no dogs were to be seen in the street. It was for the interest of dogs and of dog-owners that the rising prejudice against the freedom of dogs should be allayed, for, though the cases in which dogs were savage and injured strangers were very rare, they did arise, and there ought to be an easy process for getting compensation in the form of damages. In this respect the law was absurdly inefficient. The right of a person injured by the bite of a dog to maintain an action for damages against the owner of a dog depended on his ability to prove by evidence, not only that the dog was of a mischievous and ferocious disposition, but that this fact was known to the owner or person in charge of the dog. There had been many cases in which the ferocity of the dog and the knowledge in the owner of that ferocity were fully believed by the neighbourhood, and yet the injured party lost his damages from the want of the particular evidence required by law. This was one of the instances in which the law gave more protection to property than to individual human persons; for, by an Act of 1865, damages for injury inflicted by dogs on cattle and sheep could be obtained without proof of the previous ferocity of the dog, or previous knowledge in the person who was responsible for the dog, so that if a dog bit a calf in his pasture the law gave him easy redress, but if that dog preferred to bite the calf of his leg, the law gave him little more than a nominal redress. None of their Lordships would doubt that an alteration of the whole condition of the law was required, but there might be a question as to the form of that alteration. The ancient law seemed to have been founded on the assumption that dogs, like other domestic animals, must be considered too respectful towards men and women to presume to injure them until some evidence could be produced to prove an exception in the case of a particular dog. He believed that most lawyers agreed that it was not necessary at the present time to cling to the antiquated doctrine of scienter, and he had the result of an inquiry made for the opinions of the County Court Judges, who, with very few exceptions, considered it better to extend the principle of the Act of 1865 to injuries done to human beings than to adopt a new form of application of the old rule of scienter. The owner was free to have or not to have a dog. He got the pleasure and companionship of the animal, and upon him, and not upon anyone else, ought the risk to fall if the dog turned out to be worse than he expected. On these grounds, he hoped their Lordships would assent to the second reading of the Bill.

Moved "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Mount-Temple.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, he was very sorry he could not recommend their Lordships to adopt the proposed alteration of the law. No doubt, a person who chose to keep a mischievous dog ought to be responsible for any injury done by it. That was the law at present, and it applied not to dogs only, but to all other mischievous animals. If a man chose to keep a tiger, he was bound to keep it under such conditions that it could not kill or injure human beings. If a dog had become ferocious, and was likely to worry mankind, the law said that the owner who knowingly permitted such a dog to be at large was responsible in damages for any injury it might commit. So far the law seemed to him to be based upon an intelligible principle. But now it was suggested that the law should go further. The Bill would make persons liable for damages from accidental causes, as in the case of a dog being affected with rabies. He did not think the noble Lord could have contemplated the effect and the far-reaching consequences of the alteration he proposed. The keeping of a dog was not in itself a wrong, unless it were accompanied by negligence or some culpable omission to provide against the risk of injury to the public. He admitted that the noble Lord had some precedent for his Bill in the Act of 1865. He did not think their Lordships would approve this very serious alteration in the law, which, in his opinion, would open the door for numberless actions of a frivolous and mischievous character.

On Question? Resolved in the negative.

EGYPT—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION — FRANCE AND THE HEBRIDES—THE PAPERS.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to raise any discussion in this House in reference to the Question of which I have given Notice. It is clear, from the reports which have appeared in the public Press, that the position, diplomatically, is one of a certain amount of tension at the present moment. I have no wish whatever to increase that tension. I am quite conscious that the position of Her Majesty's Government is a difficult one, and—giving them credit, as I fully and sincerely do, for an anxious regard for British interests in Egypt, and also giving them credit for taking into full consideration that duty which unquestionably we owe to Egypt, having undertaken a certain mission, so to say, not to leave it unfilled—I do not propose to raise any question of debate to-night. I shall not comment upon those reports which have appeared. I shall make no criticisms, however friendly, which might place my noble Friend in a difficult position for reply. I shall leave it entirely to him to say much or little, as he thinks best under the circumstances. One thing only I would say. It is stated, and apparently stated on solid grounds, that great pressure is being placed diplomatically upon Her Majesty's Government with regard to that Article which gives us, under certain circumstances, the right to the re-occupation of Egypt. I pronounce no opinion on the Convention so far as it has appeared; but I will venture to say this much—that I think the Government have gone to the extreme verge of that which was prudent and safe, and I sincerely trust that no amount of diplomatic or political pressure will induce them to go one single step further in the direction of that re-occupation—I mean, of course, one single step further towards giving up the claim for re-occupation. I adhere, therefore, to my resolution with which I started, and I will merely ask my noble Friend, When he will be in a position to lay the Papers on this most important transaction on the Table of the House, without the reading of which it will be difficult for your Lordships to form any fair and impartial conclusion?

Lord Mount-Temple

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I feel that both in this and in the other House very great consideration and forbearance have been shown to Her Majesty's Government in reference to this question, and that no step has been taken in any way to embarrass us or create difficulties. That circumstance makes me feel the more regretful that I cannot at once lay the Convention, and the Papers relating to the Convention, on the Table of the House; but the circumstances to which my noble Friend has referred must, I think, without dwelling upon them further, show that it would not be desirable to lay that Convention on the Table until it has been ratified. As soon as it has been ratified it shall be laid on the Table. I may just say shortly what the provisions are. Our position is not one of perfect freedom. We were not dealing with the matter as res integra. We had pledges of a very binding character which we inherited, and binding in two directions. It was not open to us to assume the protectorate of Egypt in the way that the French Government assumed the protectorate of Tunis, even supposing—a question upon which I desire to give no kind of opinion—that such a course, on other grounds, would be consistent with International Law and the interests of this country. It was not open to us to do so, because Her Majesty's Government had again and again pledged themselves that they would not do so. On the other hand, it was not open to us to abandon the task we had undertaken and leave the Egyptians without any protection from those evils to which undoubtedly, by the force of events, our intervention had tended more to expose them. We had no right to leave them at the mercy either of any kind of foreign invasion, such as they have had to deal with and repel, or exposed to the dangers of internal troubles which had brought their State within a very short distance of destruction. My noble Friend has dwelt upon that pledge, and he does us no more than justice when he expresses his conviction that it is a pledge which has been constantly present to our minds, and which we have done our utmost to fulfil. Hedged in on one side and the other by these two pledges, we had to find a solution of the question which should be agreeable to both of them, and we did not feel that it was a solution which could be indefinitely postponed. Not only was there considerable expense incurred by this country, for which Parliament would naturally desire to see some practical motive; but it was undoubtedly the fact that our presence in Egypt, unrecognized by any Convention, did inspire the Ottoman Court with considerable disquietude and gave the subjects of the Sultan cause for a suspicion which we did not deserve, but which it was very natural that they should entertain. We were very anxious to sustain the authority of the Sultan, and not to give any handle for the belief that we entertained designs in the slightest degree against his just rights. Guided by these motives, we have agreed to a Convention being signed. We have authorized the signing of a Convention which has been negotiated by my friend Sir Drummond Wolff, to whose skill, tact, and patience I am bound to pay a very high tribute; and the terms, without going into many details, may be briefly described as follows:—There is something in it about the Suez Canal and Protocols in reference to it; and there are other details. But what my noble Friend was most concerned to know was as to the presence and stay of our troops in Egypt. We have engaged, subject to certain conditions, which I shall state, to withdraw our troops from Egypt at the expiration of three years from the ratification of the Convention, and we shall cease at the end of five years to have the right secured to us up to that time to appoint the officers of the Egyptian Army. But, in the first place, that engagement is limited by the condition that if there is any danger, external or internal, to be apprehended at the time when this evacuation is due, it will be adjourned, and will not take place until that external or internal danger has passed by. After the evacuation has taken place we shall then have to deal with what may happen during the absence of our troops from Egypt. In three contingencies we retain the right of sending our troops back—namely, if there is danger of external invasion, if there is danger of internal disturbance of order, or if there is danger of the Government of Egypt not fulfilling its international obligations. But we are under the obligation, as soon as the danger is dispelled, to withdraw our troops again. The Sultan, it is recognized in the Convention—but it is a right not derived from the Convention—the Sultan has the same right of sending in his troops for the same causes. No other nation is to have any right to send troops into Egypt except for the purpose of transport, which is strictly regulated. These are the conditions which have been agreed upon between the Porte and ourselves. It is simply an agreement between the Porte and ourselves; and your Lordships will, therefore, observe that supplementary proceedings will be required to give it full force and effect. The assent of other Powers will be necessary to some of these stipulations; and unless that assent is given our engagements lose their validity, and we remain in the same position as we were in before. Our engagements are made to the Porte, and to the Porte alone. My Lords, I think that, on the whole, perhaps I had better follow the cue given to me by my noble Friend, and not dwell any further on considerations which I could not enter into at any great length without the risk of saying something which I had better not say. I will merely say that, the earliest possible time after the ratification, I propose to lay on the Table all the Papers connected with this Convention, except, of course, those connected with the negotiations with other Powers, which will be presented on a future occasion.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I rise to ask the noble Marquess one or two questions on this matter, although I do not wish to discuss now the terms of the Convention which has been signed. The noble Marquess said that in the Convention there was something about the Suez Canal. That is a matter of such high importance that it would be satisfactory if we could know in some general terms what that something is. Another question which I would ask is, whether we are to be the sole judges as to sending the troops back to Egypt in case of necessity, or whether the Porte will join in that determination? I would further ask whether there is any agreement with regard to the time for the evacuation of our troops after the restoration of order?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As to the first question in regard to the Suez Canal, I did not dwell upon it, because, as I thought, the noble Earl opposite would be fully informed, from his official experience, that all we have done is to carry out Lord Granville's engagements. Lord Granville engaged that the Canal should be open to all persons at all times, and to that engagement we have strictly adhered. The noble Earl next asks whether we are to be the judges, or the Porte is to be the judge, as to the necessity for the re-entry of the troops? We are to act in full communication with the Porte; but we have declined to make the consent of the Porte a condition precedent to our going in, and that for the very obvious reason that the dangers which we wish to guard against might arise at any moment; and if it was necessary to have negotiations with Constantinople before action was taken, the danger might become much more formidable than if action were taken at once. There is a distinct engagement between the Porte and ourselves that the troops shall be withdrawn the moment the danger ceases.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE BILL.—(No. 110.)
(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 2 (Liability of owner of lands for rent-charge).

LORD BRABOURNE said, he rose to move, in page 1, line 17, after ("cease,") to insert—

("Provided that if the owner of less than one hundred acres of land, without any proceedings under this Act, and within three months after any rent charge becomes payable, pays the same in the parish or parishes in which his land is situate, he shall be entitled to deduct therefrom five per cent in consideration of the personal liability imposed upon him by this Act.")

He proposed to restore, with some little alteration, the Proviso at the end of Clause 2, which the noble Lord at the head of the Government introduced, but which was subsequently withdrawn. Their Lordships would bear in mind that there was this singular feature in the Bill, that whereas it was avowedly introduced on account of the difficulties which had arisen in connection with the incidence and mode of collection of tithes, there was not one clause, nor one line of a clause, which afforded the slightest relief to the tithepayers, whose complaints had brought those difficulties prominently before the public. He desired that the Bill should not go down to the other House without showing that their Lordships had at least some little consideration for the tithepayer, who was complaining so much. At present this was emphatically a titheowners' Bill. He observed that at a Diocesan Conference, held at Lambeth the previous day, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, a number of earnest but, as he (Lord Brabourne) thought, short-sighted Churchmen had come to an unanimous resolution that, "in the interest of the titheowners, it was desirable that this Bill should at once become law without amendment." No doubt, this was the titheowners' view. The Bill was aimed at owners of land, and especially at the class of small owners, the number of whom they were all agreed it was desirable to increase; and he feared that the inevitable result of the Bill, if it passed in its present shape, would be to intensify and extend the agitation against tithes, and also to enrol among the supporters of that agitation men who, by a little wise and well-considered legislation, would have been kept in a different camp. The first blow would fall upon these small owners; but, to his mind, the eventual result of that Bill must be a great blow to the tenant farmers of England. He earnestly urged their Lordships to consider how this would be brought about. They were going to repeal the Law of Distraint in regard to tithe, whilst, in the same breath, the supporters of this proposal declared that tithe was more sacred than rent, and was a prior charge upon the land. If this was the case, how could they logically refuse the demand, which would infallibly follow, that they should repeal the Law of Distraint in regard to rents? The moment they did that they would create an entire revolution in the management of the whole of the landed property of England. Landowners would no longer be able to grant to their tenants the indulgence now constantly granted of holding their rents in hand during that portion of the year in which no returns came from farming, and of clearing up their rents several months after they had become actually due. The repeal of the Law of Distraint would compel landowners to require rents to be paid at less intervals of time, and would oblige them to enforce more exactness and punctuality, and to see that rent was paid, or adequate security given, within a limited time. All this would in its working inflict great inconvenience upon the body of tenant farmers. But at the present moment he was dealing only with the small owners of land. Had they or had they not reason to complain? The other day his noble Friend at the head of the Government taunted him with not having shown the shadow of a case for the re-valuation of tithe. He (Lord Brabourne) always bore the taunts and jeers of his noble Friend with great equanimity, because they showed that he was in good health and spirits, which no one more devoutly than he wished for his noble Friend. But the taunt was misplaced in this instance, because he had not been attempting to make out a case for the re-valuation of tithes, but had only incidentally remarked that if his noble Friend had found himself able to propose any such measure, he would have done more to meet the public feeling than by the present Bill. The tithepayers had a good deal to complain of on account of the amount of the tithe rent-charge, its inequality, the manner in which it had been commuted, and the principle in respect to tithe lately avowed by the Head of the Government. His noble Friend of other day said that he had not brought forward any figures; but he could have quite overwhelmed their Lordships with figures, if he had desired to do so, as regarded the amount. Any one who had inquired into the subject must be well aware that in many instances that amount was excessive, exceeding, as it did, the rent, and pressing hardly upon the land. As to the inequality, that also was beyond doubt. In his own case he had, at that moment, on his hands a large field situate in two parishes. In the one parish the tithe was commuted at 10s., in the other at 7s. per acre, and, as a matter of fact, the latter was the best part of the field. In another case the rent was 19s. per acre, of which 10s. went to the landowner and 9s. to the titheowner. These instances could be indefinitely multiplied. The fact was that the manner in which tithe was commuted in 1836 caused great inequality. The average of the receipts of the seven previous years was taken at the time of commutation. Consequently, if the titheowner had been exacting, a heavy tithe was put upon the land; if he had been careless or liberal, the tithe was lighter; or, take it another way, the man who had farmed well up to the mark and had his land in good condition paid a heavy tithe, while the man who farmed badly and neglected his land paid a light tithe. All these things tended to show that, after 50 years, there was justice in the demand for re-valuation. But, above all, the principle lately avowed by the noble Marquess made it very desirable that we should know the ground on which we were standing. The noble Marquess at the head of the Government said tithe was the tenth of the produce of the land, totally irrespective of the cost of production. That was the ancient Law of Tithe, at a time when the cultivation of the land cost little; but now, when the cost of cultivation was so great that, according to fair calculation, the value of £7 per acre for wheat, as stated by the noble Marquess, was only obtained by an expenditure of £6 per acre, to abstract a tenth from the value of £7 so obtained, was a doctrine which he believed would not be accepted by the people of England. If such a principle was to be acted upon, their Lordships would witness a revolution against tithe which would shake the fabric of the Establishment. He thought it would be a wise thing, at this moment, to consider whether they could not sweeten to the tithepayers, in some small measure, the Bill, before sending it down to the other House. It appeared to him that there was a great case for reduction with regard to those poor owners, because they were the men who had suffered largely by the legislation of the last 50 years. Seeing that their Lordships were landowners themselves, he wished to avoid the possibility of their being charged with selfishness in this matter, and, therefore, he asked them to extend this relief only to those small owners who were most in need of it. It might be asked, however, why he chose the figure 100? It was obvious that they must take some figure, just as £2 was taken in Clause 10 as the amount to which compulsory redemption under that clause should be applicable, and he believed that 100 acres would cover the bulk of the small owners throughout the country. In any case, their Lordships were going to impose a personal liability where none now existed. They ought to give some compensation, and the compensation which he asked for was a small one. In his own opinion it was too small. He believed that if their Lordships consented to the restoration of this Proviso they would be showing their sympathy with a class who emphatically deserved it, affording an inducement to the speedy payment of tithes, and making, at the same time, a concession in the direction at once of justice and of wisdom.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 17, after ("cease,") insert—
 ("Provided that if the owner of less than one hundred acres of land, without any proceedings under this Act, and within three months after any rent charge becomes payable, pays the same in the parish or parishes in which his land is situate, he shall be entitled to deduct therefrom five per cent, in consideration of the personal liability imposed upon him by this Act.")—(The Lord Brabourne.)

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, he considered the proposition of the noble Lord a very moderate one.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he must express his surprise at the speech of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment. In his judgment, the great reason for this Bill was the difficulty of making the occupier of the land understand that the question was not one between him and the titheowner, but one between the owner of the land and the titheowner. The noble Lord's case was founded on the idea that the landowner incurred some additional responsibility. He did nothing of the sort. The landowner was the person liable for the tithe. The Tithe Commutation Act expressly said so. It was true that he could not be directly got at for non-payment of tithe by the occupier, but he could be indirectly got at in this way—that if the landowner appointed his tenant to pay he received less rent from his tenant than he otherwise would, and if the landowner did not agree with his tenant that the latter should pay, the landowner was liable, if he did not pay, to the tenant if distrained on. The landowner was at present as much liable to the tithe as he would be by this Bill. By it it was proposed that he should be got at directly by a suit to be brought against him for the recovery of tithe; but it was a mistake to suppose that he incurred a pennyworth of liability more than he was subject to at the present time. In these circumstances, the foundation of the noble Lord's case seemed to fail. It was urged by the noble Lord that they should sweeten the Bill for the acceptance of the other House. Let their Lords sweeten it if they chose; but he asked them not to sweeten it by a sort of plunder of the titheowner.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) complained that there was no distinction in substance between this Bill and the law as it present stood. But the noble and learned Lord had stated the distinction himself with admirable clearness. No doubt, it was a question between the titheowner and the landowner. At present the relationship was an indirect one, but this Bill proposed to make it a question of direct relationship; and surely the noble and learned Lord would not say that this was not a difference.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, that the only thing which the occupiers would suffer from by the passing of this Bill would be that they would no longer be liable to have their goods distrained upon—a process to which they were subject now. He doubted whether the occupier would conceive that to be a hostile act on the part of Parliament. It was said that a great change had taken place in regard to this matter, but he confessed that he was unable to see it. It seemed to him that that which was liable for tithe now, as in the past, would be the land. Those people who were owners of 100 acres of land were, if not invariably, certainly in the large majority of instances, the occupiers of their own land, and they had been paid tithes all along without any change whatever in their position. They were the last persons in the world who had any relief to claim, because their position was in no way changed. There were some parishes where there were a great many owners as compared with occupiers, and in those parishes, where, no doubt, there would be many owners of less than 100 acres, the clergyman would not be in the least relieved by the passage of this Bill from the trouble he incurred, and he would have nearly as many persons to deal with as before. Therefore, the reason for deducting the 5 per cent commission to him would disappear. On the whole, it seemed to him that the proposal was not one that the House ought to accept; and he must object to the idea of making the Bill sweet for the consumption of the other House. The other House was perfectly capable of taking care of itself, and whatever it thought necessary it would probably insert and send back to this House in the Bill. But he thought their Lordships had better send the Bill down in the shape they thought it ought to be, and leave the other House to suit its own palate.

LORD BRABOURNE explained, that he had not expressed a wish to sweeten the Bill to the other House, but to the tithepayers.

On Question? Resolved in the negative.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Attachment of rent).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he rose to move the insertion of words to the effect that the County Court Judge, before making an order for the attachment of rent due to the landowner for the payment of tithe rent-charge, must be satisfied that recovery could not be had with reasonable despatch in any other way. He had had some hesitation in determining how to meet the objections which had originally been brought against this clause. But, on the whole, he thought the best way would be to limit it, and not to permit the titheowner to seek the remedy given by it unless he could satisfy the Court that he could not get his money with reasonable despatch in any other way. There was the danger that the section providing summary execution might produce the very evils which it was desired to guard against, and he thought that they had done enough for the titheowner in putting it into the Act that he had the right to attach the rent.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 9, after ("unsatisfied,") insert ("and that recovery cannot be had with reasonable despatch in any other way.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD HERSCHELL said, he agreed entirely with what had fallen from the noble Marquess. There had been ground for apprehending that the effect of the clause as it stood would have been to do away with much of the benefit to be derived from the operation of this measure.

On Question? Resolved in the affirmative.

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Sub-sections (2) (3) and (4) were struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Effect on existing contracts of tenancy).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Amendment made, in page 6, line 12, at end of Clause 3, inserting as a fresh paragraph:—

("Where, by reason of the redemption of the tithe rent-charge on any lands, the tenant or other person holding such lands under the owner by virtue of any contract existing prior to such redemption is liable to pay any increased sum on account of rates, he shall, during the continuance of such contracts, be entitled to deduct such increase from his rent.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Provision for redemption of rent-charge).

On the Motion of The Bishop of LONDON, Amendment made, in page 8, line 13, by adding at the end of Sub-section 1—("Provided that in the case of disagreement, where the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are themselves the payors of the tithe rent charge,

The Marquess of Salisbury

the amount and term of the annuity shall be referred to the Lord Commissioners, who shall hear both parties and shall also take the opinion of the bishop as required by the preceding clause of this Act, and whose decision shall be final.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following new Clause was inserted, after Clause 10:—

(Redemption of tithe rent charge on lands divided into plots for building.)

("Where lands charged with tithe rent charge are, after the passing of this Act, about to be divided for building or other purposes into numerous plots, it shall be the duty of the owner of such land to redeem the tithe rent charge on such land before such division, and, if he fails so to do, he, his heirs and assigns, shall be liable to pay the costs incurred in any subsequent redemption of such tithe rent charge.

Where lands charged with any tithe rent charge have been or are about to be divided for building or other purposes into numerous plots, whether houses have or have not been built upon such plots, the provisions of this Act with respect to the redemption of tithe rent charge to an amount not exceeding two pounds shall apply to the said tithe rent charge, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the application of any person interested either in the tithe rent charge or in any part of such lands, may require the owner of the lands to redeem the same in accordance with those provisions, and where the lands have been divided the tithe rent charge may be apportioned among the divisions in such manner as may be just, either by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners or by the Land Commissioners on the request of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and for that purpose the Land Commissioners shall have the same powers of apportionment as they have under the Tithe Rent-charge Acts specified in the First Schedule to this Act.")

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved to insert the following new Clause, after Clause 10:—

(Money applicable for redemption of tithe rent charge.)

("Any money which may by law be applied in the redemption of tithe rent charge charged on any lands may be applied in payment of a capital sum for the determination of any annuity charged under this Act on such lands by way of redemption of such tithe rent charge.")

LORD BRABOURNE said, that it did not appear to him that it had been sufficiently taken into account that a titheowner who received a capital sum by way of redemption would escape rates which he (Lord Brabourne) found in his own experience to amount to about 12 per cent on his assessment. This burden would be transferred to the owner who redeemed the tithe. He had not, however, taken part in the discussion, because he was convinced that the terms offered for redemption were so one-sided that no sane landowner would be likely to redeem.

Clause agreed to.

Schedule 1.

LORD BRABOURNE called attention to the proceedings of the first inquiries instituted under the Extraordinary Act as reported in local papers. It appeared that a claim had been advanced on behalf of the titheowners to inquire into the value, not only of the hop or fruit gardens in cultivation as such at the time of the passing of the Act, but into the whole farm of which such gardens formed a part, as to its capability for being converted into such gardens. If this were so, and the request of the tithepayers for a general re-valuation of tithes was at the same time refused, there would be a manifest injustice. He had understood that the inquiry and charge to be placed on the land was limited to existing gardens, and he begged to call the attention of the noble Marquess to the facts reported.

Schedule agreed to.

Remaining Schedules agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday the 30th instant; and to be printed as amended. (No. 115.)

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE CENTRAL HALL — POSITION OF THE STATUE OF THE LATE EARL OF IDDESLEIGH.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether it was intended to give permission to the subscribers to the statue of the late Earl of Idedesleigh, to place the statue in the Central Hall of the Palace of Westminster, or on one of the pedestals prepared for statues in the Lobby of the House of Commons? said, their Lordships and the Government had a responsibility for preventing interference with the architectural character and harmony of the building. A statue of the late Earl of Idedesleigh they would all be glad to see in a proper place; but if it were placed in the Central Hall it would detract from the architectural features of that Hall for which it was so much admired. There were in the Hall 48 pedestals, and on them 48 statues in proper form, dignified by crowns and surrounded by mediæval decorations. The statue of Earl Russell seemed to have dropped down accidentally into a place not intended to receive it. The son of Sir Charles Barry had written a letter in which he said that his father would have objected to the statue of Earl Russell in its present position as out of character with the Hall and a blot upon that part of the building. In the Commons Lobby there were eight pedestals which Sir Charles Barry left to be occupied by statues. Why should not the statue of the Earl of Idedesleigh be placed upon one of those pedestals where it would be in harmony with the surroundings? The only reason he had heard for placing the statue in the Central Hall was that that Hall was more open to the public than the Commons Lobby. Many of the great works of art in that building were not open ordinarily to the public. A matter of this kind ought not to be left to an official like the Lord Chamberlain, but it was a matter upon which the Government and Parliament ought to express an opinion.

LORD HENNIKER said he could not give the noble Lord an answer to his Question, because if he did so he should be exceeding his duty as representing the Office of Works in that House. The question was one that rested entirely in the hands of the Lord Great Chamberlain; and, therefore, it would not be right on his part to discuss whether it should remain in his hands or in the hands of the Board of Works, or any other authority, although it was undoubtedly one of great interest, and they were indebted to the noble Lord for bringing it before them.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 10th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS —
Considered as amended—Water* [250].
Third Reading—Local Government (Poor Law)
(No. 3)* [260]; Local Government (Gas)*
[259]; Local Government (No. 2)* [251].

QUESTIONS.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS (SCOTLAND)— DISCHARGE OF SEWAGE, &c., INTO THE RIVER CLYDE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, during the past fortnight, several thousand tons of silt, sewage, and chemicals have been discharged at the mouth of Loch Long in the River Clyde; whether one of these discharges of about 500 tons took place about two to three hours before high water on Tuesday, 31st May, and was carried by the incoming tide along the Bay of Ardentinnny round the rocks into Lochgoil, and was there distinctly traceable by sight and smell for a considerable distance, and for at least two boats' length from the rocks; and, what steps, if any, are being taken by the Government, and against whom, to prevent further injury to the fishing population of the lochs, and to the health of the inhabitants near Dunoon, Kirn, and Blairmore?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It has been ascertained to be the fact that large quantities of offensive matter have been recently discharged at the mouth of Loch Long, consisting of river-dredgings and chemical refuse. No such discharge is known to have taken place on the 31st of May; but on the 1st of June the contents of a lighter, believed to come from a chemical work, were discharged, and the result of this being done was that the effects could be traced along the shore. The Scotch Department has been in active communication with the Board of Trade on this matter; but as no injury is caused to navigation, that Board cannot interfere. An experienced officer of health will be at once dispatched to the locality, with instructions to make as speedy a Report as possible. I must point out, however, to the hon. Member that the Local Sanitary Authorities have the primary duty to interfere to stop nuisances, which, in the case of any illegal nuisance, they can do by application to the Courts of Law for interdict; and that Her Majesty's Government cannot take the initiative, but can only use their powers to compel dilatory Sanitary Authorities to do their duty.

BURMAH (UPPER)—THE RUBY MINES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can now give the House any information as to the negotiations, during the past 18 months, with reference to the Burmah Ruby Mines; whether he can state the tenour and several dates of the various communications received during that time, or made to Messrs. Streeter or to any person on their behalf, or received from or made to any other person or persons, with reference to the leasing, letting, or working the said mines, or relating to the sale or other disposal of the produce of such mines; whether he will state the names of the several persons who have applied for permission to visit the mines, the dates of their several applications, and the respective grounds stated for each such application, and the date and tenour of the reply in each case; why permission was granted in one case and withheld in others; and who is the person responsible for the permission granted to the representatives of Messrs. Streeter; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the whole of the Documents, Reports, and Correspondence, since the occupation of Burmah, relating to the said Ruby Mines?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has called for the Correspondence on the subject of leasing the Ruby Mines which has been carried on in India and Burmah, and which has not yet been sent home. As soon as it is received he will consider what part can be laid upon the Table. In the meanwhile the information, official and private, in his possession is so incomplete that I cannot attempt to reply categorically to the earlier part of the Question. When the present Government came into Office, the Secretary of State found that the plan of giving a provisional lease to some firm or Company had been suggested; that with the sanction of his Predecessor certain persons had been invited to tender; and that Messrs. Streeter had made the highest bid. The Secretary of State, however, came to the conclusion that no binding agreement subsisted between the Government of India and Messrs. Streeter. He informed the Government of India that he desired that the value of the mines and the rights of Government should be carefully ascertained before pledging Government, and that any arrangements proposed should have his previous approval before being carried into effect. He also intimated that the desirability of retaining the mines in the hands of Government was well worthy of consideration. The Secretary of State has not yet received the Report on the value of the mines which he asked for, nor have any proposed arrangements been submitted for his approval, and until these are before him no decision can be arrived at. Meanwhile, he has repeated his former directions—that no action is to be taken without his previous sanction being obtained. The only desire of the Secretary of State is to deal with the property as may be best for the interests of the people of India, due regard being had to Native rights. If any persons have been prevented from visiting the mines on any ground other than a regard for their personal safety, it has been owing to no directions on his part, but to some misapprehension on the part of the Local Authorities. I have now given the hon. Member and the House all the information I can at the present moment. As soon as a decision is arrived at, or the fuller information asked for is in the possession of the Secretary of State, I shall be most happy to give such further particulars as may be then available.

ADMIRALTY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD
H.M.S. "RUPERT" AT HULL.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether they have received any explanation of the explosion on board H.M.S. Rupert, at Hull, during hand-charge practice, resulting in the death of one man and injury to several others?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormskirk): An explanation has been received from the captain of Her Majesty's ship Rupert reporting that the usual precautions were observed at practice; but pending the further inquiry to be held, when the injured men are able to give evidence, the absolute cause of the accident cannot yet be stated.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—NEW STATION ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

MR. W. L. BRIGHT (Stoke-upon-Trent) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether a contract has been entered into for a new police station on the Thames Embankment; if so, what is the contract price; what will be the rate per cubic foot of building; and, out of what funds the cost will be provided for?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): No contract has yet been entered into for the erection of the new central police offices on the Embankment; but certain firms have been invited to send in tenders for the foundations. The rate per cubic foot cannot, therefore, be stated. The cost will be met out of a loan which it is proposed shortly to ask Parliament to sanction.

INDIA—SPECIAL ALLOWANCES TO TWO ENGINEER OFFICERS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that special allowances were granted to two military officers—namely, Lieutenant Colonel J. Brown, R.E., Engineer in Chief of the Sind Pishin State Railway, and Major T. Gracey, R.E., Superintendent Engineer, Burmah, while civil engineers assigned to similar duties in the same districts were refused the same privilege; if so, under what circumstances, and on what grounds, the distinction was made?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has no information of any such allowances having been made to the officers mentioned in the Question.

INDIA—THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—THE UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India, having, since the Commission as constituted under Sir Charles Aitchison broke up, appointed a limited Sub-Committee to inquire into the subject of the admission not only of Natives but Europeans to all the more important branches of the Public Service connected with the Civil administration of the country, thus largely extending the scope of the inquiry, any arrangements have been made to give the Uncovenanted Service a fair opportunity of laying its grievances before the Committee; whether his attention has been called to the expressions of alarm in the Indian Press and among the Anglo-Indian community at the course being pursued by the Government of India, owing to the suspicion that very important changes are contemplated in the organization and conditions of the Services, especially in the direction of a large admission of Natives to important positions in the Services; whether the Secretary of State has information that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce has had submitted to it a letter strongly deprecating the course now being pursued by the Government in relation to this question; whether, having regard to the grave interests involved, he can make any statement with regard to the ultimate object of the inquiry, and the time within which it will be brought to a conclusion, which may have the effect of re-assuring investors and others having interests in India that no serious changes are about to be made in the direction indicated in the above letter; and what object the Government of India has in view in its present proceedings?

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Public Service Commission has not broken up. It was originally appointed, in consequence of a despatch of the Earl of Kimberley, dated July 15, 1886, to inquire into the admission of natives of India to offices formerly reserved exclusively for members of the Covenanted Civil Service. The Resolution of October 4, 1886, appointing the Commission, and the Resolution of March 8 last, appointing the Sub-Committee referred to by the hon. Member, have been laid upon the Table. It is for the Commission and the Sub-Committee to make arrangements for obtaining full information on the subjects of the inquiry; and I have no reason to suppose that the Uncovenanted Service will not be given a fair opportunity for stating its grievances. There is no ground for the alarms and suspicions referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the Question which have found expression in the newspaper articles and the letter mentioned. It is intended that the Sub-Committee shall conclude its inquiry by the autumn; and that then the Commission, as a whole, shall be re-constituted for the purpose of preparing its Report to the Government of India. Any changes which the Government of India may then have to propose will be submitted to the Secretary of State in Council, and will be considered with the care due to the importance of the subject.

CROFTERS HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT—LOANS FOR FISHING HARBOURS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, What are the terms on which the Fishery Board for Scotland will lend money under the Crofters Act for building and repairing fishing harbours in the counties under the Crofters Act?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The Crofters Act does not authorize loans for the construction of harbours, and, therefore, no terms for such loans have been adjusted.

THE CHIEF LAND COMMISSIONERS AT LONGFORD—RE-HEARING FROM AP-PEAL.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that an application for the re-hearing of the appeal (Record No. 2,423) of Edward Murray, tenant, Francis O'Beirne, landlord, came before the Chief Land Commissioners at Longford on the 23rd of February, 1887; whether a period of three years had elapsed after the notice before the appeal came on; whether the case was struck out of the list, and the tenant ordered to pay the landlord's costs, solely on the ground that a fee of 1s., as provided by one of the Rules, had not been paid by the tenant; and, whether the attention of the Commissioners will be drawn to the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied), said, the Land Commissioners reported that the facts were as stated in the Question. The law required that in every case in which notice of re-hearing was served such notice should bear a 1s. stamp. This was not done in the present case, and no appeal was, therefore, properly before the Court; and, if the opposite Party desired, he could ask that the case be struck out, which was the invariable practice.

Mr. King

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE
(WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—LETTING OF SEATS ON PUBLIC GROUND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, for whose benefit and profit seats on stands on public ground adjoining Westminster Abbey and St. Margaret's Church to witness the Jubilee Procession are advertised at five guineas each; if the ground has been let for the purpose, by whom and on what terms it has been let, and to whom the rent is to go; whether, in any shape, it will be devoted in diminution of the expenses incurred by Parliament for fitting up the Abbey, &c.; whether any other public ground is to be let; and, if so, for whose profit?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The stand erected on the green adjacent to the Abbey has been built upon land which is the property of St. Margaret's Church, and the profit derived from it will go to the Vestry of St. Margaret's. Neither the authorities of the Abbey nor the Government have any authority or right of interference in the matter. In order to meet the convenience of the Government the Vestry of St. Margaret's have agreed to surrender their rights over a considerable space of the remainder of the frontage belonging to them, and they have been permitted in exchange to place a stand in the Canning enclosure on the other side of the roadway. It is not proposed to let any public ground for profit.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, whether the First Commissioner was aware that through the courtesy of a distinguished person connected with St. Margaret's, vestrymen and distinguished parishioners were to have seats; and whether, on the Government ground, some arrangement of the same kind could not be made for the convenience of the families of hon. Members?

MR. PLUNKET: As to the rest of the Government ground I think I may be able to give a more satisfactory answer later on. I am, however, not responsible for the distribution of tickets by the Vestry of St. Margaret's.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, whether the expenditure and income in connection with these platforms of the Vestry of St. Margaret's would come within the scope of the inquiries of the Local Government Board auditors?

MR. PLUNKET: I am unable to answer the question as it does not come within the scope of my Department.

DISPENSARIES (IRELAND)—OUGHTER-ARD BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether any, or what, steps have been taken by the Local Government Board to meet the application of the Oughterard Board of Guardians, for the erection, in the Lettermore district of that union, of a dispensary and dispensary residence, for the use of the medical officer of the district; and, whether it is a fact that the only available residence at present, and for the past three years, for the use of the medical officer has been a poor cabin in a remote part of the district?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the Local Government Board found it necessary, in connection with this application, which was received on the 13th April last, to ask the Guardians for some particulars. These particulars had not yet been furnished, and any delay which might have occurred was therefore attributable to the Guardians. The Local Government Board were not aware that the present dispensary residence was situated in a remote part of the district; but the medical officer had reported that a residence was very much needed.

CENTRAL AFRICA—TRANSIT TARIFF THROUGH PORTUGUESE TERRITORY.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to remove the impediments that have been placed by the Portuguese authorities in the way of communication by the Lower Zambesi and Shiré, between the African coast and the trading and mission stations in the neighbourhood of Lake Nyassa?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I presume that my hon. Friend alludes to the suspension of the trading facilities formerly afforded by the scale of transit duties through the Portuguese territories. I stated on May 12, in answer to a Question from the hon. and learned Member for Partick Division (Mr. Craig Sellar), that Her Majesty's Government, having no Treaty rights in that region, cannot object to the imposition of the Mozambique Tariff. Her Majesty's Consul there has lately reported that the revision of the tariff of that Province is under consideration.

WAR OFFICE (AUXILIARY FORCES)— THE VOUNTEERS—ASSISTANT IN-STRUCTORS IN SIGNALLING.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is possible to arrange for an officer from the brigade dépôt to be sent when necessary to the head quarters of Volunteer Corps, to examine the officers and non-commissioned officers as assistant instructors in signalling, so as to avoid the necessity of the latter being compelled to proceed for the purpose to a distant town?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): A duly qualified officer is detailed by the General Officer commanding each district to examine the signallers of Volunteer Corps. As brigade dépôts are not provided with instructors of signalling, it very frequently happens that no qualified officer is stationed at a brigade dépôt. I am afraid, therefore, that it would be difficult to make the proposed alteration.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—IN-CREASE OF PENSION TO OLD SOL-DIERS.

MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the propriety of signalling Her Majesty's

Mr. Buchanan

Jubilee Year, in regard to the Army, by recommending a slight increase, during the remainder of their lives, in the pensions of those old soldiers who took part in either or both of the two great wars of Her Majesty's reign—namely, the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): No, Sir; I am unable to recommend that an increased charge for pensions should be created in honour of Her Majesty's Jubilee.

THE PUBLIC OFFICES—LOWER DIVI-SION CLERKS IN THE TREASURY OFFICE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact, that of the six Lower Division clerks in the Treasury Office no less than five were formerly writers, and that four of them are so efficient as to be receiving the highest rate of duty pay; and, whether instructions have been issued to the Civil Service Commissioners to fill up 121 vacancies in the Lower Division of clerks by the usual method of competitive examination?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: There are 10 Lower Division clerks in the Treasury, not six as stated by the hon. Member. Of these, seven were men who had been long in the employment of the Treasury, and on account of the special circumstances of their case they were placed in the Lower Division at the time when it was instituted. Five of them are receiving duty pay; but none of them the highest rate of duty pay permitted. Of the 121 vacancies referred to in the second part of the Question, 72 will be filled by Lower Division clerks who have obtained places on the list, but have not yet been employed. Directions have been given for an examination to be held about August next.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—SUB-COM-MISSION OF INQUIRY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact that a Sub-Commission, consisting of Mr. Berge of the Treasury, Mr. Humphreys of the Civil Service Commission, and Mr. Bright of the Inland Revenue, has been appointed to confer with the Heads of Departments in reference to Civil Service Writers; whether he will state the scope of the Sub-Commission's business; and, whether it is intended to forestall, in respect of the "Writer" Class, the Report of the Royal Commission now sitting on the Civil Services?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: Three gentlemen have been appointed to collect certain information which the Treasury thinks it necessary to obtain. The appointment has no reference to the Royal Commission; but is intended to assist the Treasury in giving effect, as soon as possible, to the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and to carry out the pledge given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CURRENCY—THE NEW COINAGE.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassellaw) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that urgent requests are being made of bankers in all parts of the country for supplies of the new coinage, especially the smaller denominations, for distribution on the 21st instant; and, whether, in view of such demand, it will be possible for supplies to be in the hands of bankers at latest by the 20th instant, so that the provincial public may be able to obtain the new coinage on the following day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the Mint is working up to its full power already. The Bank of England will make arrangements, in proportion to the supply it may receive from the Mint, to distribute the new coin to country bankers through their London agents before the close of next week, on the understanding that bankers are not to issue such coin to the public before the 20th instant. Similar arrangements have already been made for Ireland.

METROPOLITAN POLICE — SUPERINTENDENTS' DIVISIONAL REPORTS FOR 1886.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Divisional Reports for 1886 of the Superintendents of Metropolitan Police were all sent in during January last; and, if so, what is the cause of the delay in the issue of the Report of the Chief Commissioner; and, whether he can now state when the Report will be issued; and, if not, whether he will, at any rate, give an undertaking that it shall be in the hands of Members before the Vote for the current financial year is taken?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Commissioner that the Divisional Reports for 1886 of the Superintendents of Metropolitan Police were all sent in about the end of January. It is usual to present the Chief Commissioner's Report about the end of July. This year the Commissioner hopes to be able to have it ready a few weeks earlier. It cannot be prepared earlier than this, as time is necessary to complete the statistics of criminal cases, some of which are even still pending.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ADDITIONAL ACCOMMODATION IN THE WEST OF IRELAND.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the sum of £4,000 to be devoted to the promotion of fishery pier accommodation in the West of Ireland will provide actual additional accommodation of this kind, or be spent in the completion of works already commenced under former schemes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The £4,000 is to be spent on piers, harbours, and roads, not on piers only, as the Question seems to imply. A sum of rather under £3,000 will be devoted to additions recommended by the Piers and Roads Commissioners as calculated to secure the full utility of the works already executed by them; and £1,200 will be spent on a new road to complete the coast communication between Galway and Clifden. I may take this opportunity of saying that with regard to the whole question of the appropriation of the £50,000 to be devoted to works of public utility in Ireland, and principally to arterial drainage as the most urgent, the Government will gladly learn the views of hon. Members from Ireland. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) will appoint some Members representing the views of his Party to confer with the Chief Secretary and myself on the subject, the Government will give the most attentive consideration to any suggestions they may offer.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked if an opportunity would be given for discussing the question of the allocation of this £50,000. On what day would the vote be taken?

MR. GOSCHEN said, the allocation of the money would be taken in the form of Estimates, so that hon. Members would have ample opportunity for discussing the different items.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And would the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary confer with the associates of assassins?

[No reply.]

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND) — ALLEGED OUTRAGE BY A MEMBER OF THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has inquired into the facts described in the following paragraph from The Pall Mall Gazette of the 9th instant:—

"It is true Pat Walsh's mother of 80 was bludgeoned in his house, as she sat in her chair, by a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who formed one of the volunteer storming party, and she has at this moment the marks of his baton in the shape of a bad black eye; "

and, whether the above statements are accurate; and, if so, whether he will take immediate steps to punish the conduct of the constable in question, and to prevent similar occurrences in future?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, as the Question was only put on the Paper the previous night, he had not yet been able to make the inquiries which were necessary before an answer could be given.

MR. CONYBEARE asked, if the Question were postponed, would the right hon. and gallant Gentleman or his superior officer be able to answer it?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said they would.

Mr. Goschen

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PRO-MOTION OF SERGEANT MAGEE (BELFAST).

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Sergeant John Thomas Magee, R.I.C., of Ballynaveigh, Belfast, has been promoted to the rank of Head Constable; was he on several occasions convicted of drunkenness; did he, while under cross-examination, admit that he had been four times convicted of drunkenness; and, how many convictions are recorded against him since he joined the Constabulary?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, Sergeant Magee had not yet been promoted, but he had passed the necessary examination. It was quite true that during his constabulary career Sergeant Magee had been fined four times for drunkenness. The last occasion was as far back as 17 years ago. This, with the exception of two minor offences, which, by the Constabulary Regulations, did not count as records, were the only convictions against the man.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—THE BRITISH-INDIAN VOLUNTEERS.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether provision will be made for some representatives of the several Corps of British-Indian Volunteers at the Jubilee Celebration in Westminster Abbey?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Yes. The Secretary of State is endeavouring to make the selection for the limited space at his disposal as representative as possible; but as the list is not yet complete I am afraid I can give no positive pledge to the hon. Member.

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—THE SEATS OUTSIDE ON PUBLIC GROUND.

MR. PULESTON (Devonport) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can have seats in the enclosure of St. Stephen's Square put up for the families and friends of Members of this House to see the procession on the 21st?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I hope to be able to put up two platforms, one in each of the garden spaces outside of Palace Yard, which spaces are the property of the Government. The smaller will contain about 600 places, and will provide for the Colonial and Indian visitors for whom seats cannot be found in the Abbey. The other platform, having two fronts to the procession, will be larger, and on it I hope I shall be able to find about 1,000 seats for Members and their friends at 10s. for each seat. ["Oh, oh!" laughter, and "Hear, hear!"] Well, no Member will be under any obligation to take a seat. The platforms will be covered in. I cannot bind myself yet to these exact figures, and I hope to be able to give a fuller explanation on next Monday as to the method of obtaining tickets and other particulars. I have made these proposals to meet what I believe to be wishes very generally entertained, and I hope that I may consider that I shall have the approval of the House in carrying them out.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): Will this charge of 10s. per head include refreshments?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give an abatement if a quantity are taken?

[No reply.]

ROYAL GRANTS—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the Select Committee on Royal Grants will be appointed?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, the pressure of Public Business had been such that he had not seen his way to the appointment of the Select Committee on Royal Grants, regarding which he had in some degree pledged himself at the beginning of the Session. He was afraid he must ask the hon. Member to allow a further postponement.

PUBLIC BUSINESS — ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS — COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION BILL.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked, Whether the First Lord of the Treasury could now state when the Coal Mines, &c., Regulation Bill would be proceeded with, and at what hour?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he was not able to say positively; but he hoped the Bill would be taken on Monday, the 20th, about 10 o'clock in the evening, or as near that hour as possible, consistent with the Business that might precede it.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) inquired, whether the right hon. Gentleman intended only to take the first stage of the Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he hoped it would be possible to take the Committee on that day. He presumed it would be the desire of the House to go through with the Committee if possible.

MR. BURT (Morpeth) said, that he understood that a discussion was to take place on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, and that the House should not go into Committee till the next occasion.

MR. W. H. SMITH understood that there was a strong wish on the part of hon. Members to proceed with the measure itself, and not only to have a discussion upon it. Of course, it was for the House to say, when in Committee, whether they were to make progress with the measure or not.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE ON THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL).

RESOLUTION.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in rising to move the following Resolution:—

"That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday, the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as hereinafter provided. After the Clauses are disposed of he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House. From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion, That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith. If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."

said: Sir, in submitting the Motion which stands in my name, I wish to be most distinctly understood that I desire to avoid any reference to any topic which can by any means create irritation or annoyance to hon. Gentlemen who have a perfect right to differ from me and from the Government in the view which they take of their duty under the circumstances in which the House is placed. But I desire to place before the House the course which the Government feel to be absolutely essential in the interests of the honour and dignity of Parliament and the duties which are imposed upon the Members of the House of Commons. Sir, I have undertaken this task with the greatest possible reluctance. There is no one in this House who is more unwilling than I am to place any restraint whatever upon the exercise of the liberty of speech, of the right of debate, and the full Privilege of the Members of the House of Commons. Since I have had the honour of being a Member of this House, I have always deprecated any attempt whatever to restrain those liberties and rights of debate. It has only been when the necessity has been absolutely imperative and irresistible that I have concurred in, or that I have proposed measures which have placed any restraint whatever upon Members of the House of Commons. We had hoped that it would be possible to avoid the course which Her Majesty's Government now feel it necessary—which Her Majesty's Government now feel it their duty—to ask the House of Commons to adopt. We had hoped that the counsel that has been offered by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench would have been accepted by hon. Gentlemen who, conscientiously no doubt, have opposed the measure which the Government thought it their duty to propose to the House of Commons. We had hoped that reflection and consideration would have induced hon. Gentlemen to accept the suggestion that points of principle and points of importance might receive the consideration of the Committee of this House, and that mere matters of detail—mere matters which, in the judgment of those who have opposed them at least, have appeared to be of absolutely trivial importance—might be passed over, and might be allowed to receive only that very limited consideration which their importance deserves; but I am sure that anyone who has sat in this House during the last week must have felt that there was no longer any hope that those wise counsels offered from the Front Opposition Bench would be accepted and acted upon by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. Then, Sir, it becomes our duty, from our point of view, to offer to the House the counsel which we now offer, and to make the proposal which we now make. The period of the Session alone is sufficient to justify, in my humble judgment, the course which the Government are now about to take. We have arrived at the fourth month of the Session and we have practically done nothing except to consider the measure now before the House. Some Votes in supply have been passed, some comparatively unimportant measures have received the consideration of the House in that period, but the whole course of legislation has been stopped other than that which has been proposed in the measure now before the House. The consideration of Votes in Supply has not been given as is usually the case, and the privileges of Members, the rights of Private Members, have been entirely suspended during that period of the Session. These are matters which it is impossible for the Government to ignore, and it is impossible for the Government to be otherwise than deeply concerned at the paralysis of Parliamentary Business, which certainly does not reflect credit upon the House of Commons. I hope it may be understood that I am endeavouring as far as I can to avoid anything like an irritating remark. I am merely stating what appears to be, from my point of view, the facts of the case, and putting them plainly and in an honest and straightforward way before the House, without any desire whatever to enlarge upon them in a manner which hon. Members may suppose is intended to give a colour to them. We arrived, yesterday, Sir, at the 35th day of the consideration of this measure which is now before the House. Thirty-five Parliamentary days—some of them protracted beyond all former experience—have been passed in the consideration of this measure. I have no doubt that hon.

Gentlemen opposite will say that only too little time has been given to the consideration of a measure which they dislike, to which they are opposed on principle, and which they regard as tyrannical and unnecessary. That may be the case from their point of view; but the majority of the House and the Government of the day have also their duty to discharge. They have thought it their duty to propose to Parliament a measure which they believe to be necessary for the restoration of law and order—for the preservation of law and order in Ireland. That is their belief, and as a Government and as a majority they are bound to press it forward to the utmost of their ability, with due consideration for the rights of the minority, with due consideration for the authority of Parliament, with due consideration for the traditions of Parliament, and, above all, with the greatest possible consideration for those glorious traditions of liberty and freedom which belong to an institution of which, hitherto, Englishmen have been proud. But, Sir, if it is the duty from the point of view of Her Majesty's Government to press forward this measure; if it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to care also for the transaction of the Business of the country in this House, it is undoubtedly their duty, when they find that they are faced by a condition of circumstances absolutely unparalleled in the history of Parliament, to place the case before Parliament itself and to demand from Parliament that relief—not for themselves, but for the House of Commons itself and for the Business of the country, and those trusts which are confided to the House of Commons—I say, Sir, it is their duty to demand from Parliament that relief which they believe to be essential and absolutely necessary. I have no doubt that I shall be told that there is no exact precedent for the course I am about to take. I am aware that there is no exact precedent. The precedents of 1881 and 1882 are analogous, but they are not exact. In 1881, late at night—in fact, it was the last Business of the House—a Notice was given that at 3 o'clock the next day a Motion would be made that the Bill itself should be reported to the House. On this occasion we have adopted a different course. The circumstances are not precisely the same. A much longer period has elapsed since the measure which is now before the House was introduced—a very much longer period. We are four months later in the Session than was the case in the instance to which I have referred. We have laboured on through 35 days of Parliamentary endurance with this measure. We have laboured on, and now it becomes our duty to consider what course shall be taken. We think it right to ask, Sir, that the House shall now—having six Parliamentary days between this and Friday, the 17th of June—order that on the 17th of June, allowing the whole of the interval for the consideration in Committee of the measure before the House, that the Bill shall be then reported to the House. I daresay I shall be told that the course I recommend is one which may seriously interfere with the privileges and the duties of hon. Members who object to this measure. We have to consider how the Business of Parliament is to be carried on. We have to consider the relative importance of the Business of Parliament, and we leave it to hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in the Bill to adopt the advice given to them by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and to object to any question of principle to which they may reasonably object in the course of the next five days, which, I humbly venture to think, will afford ample time for the consideration and decision of principle, if not more than ample time, and then to acquiesce in the course the Government think it their duty to propose. What, Sir, is the alternative open to Her Majesty's Government? The alternative, we are told, is that of capitulation—that the majority in this House, and, as we believe, the majority in the country, should yield their sense of obligation, their sense of responsibility, their sense of and duty to the obstruction of the minority in this House. [Home Rule cries of "Order!"] I appeal to you, Sir, if I am out of Order in any way. It is for the Speaker, I apprehend, to call me to Order.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is entitled to impute a Parliamentary offence, which obstruction has been repeatedly declared to be, to a minority of this House, and that without making any attempt whatever to substantiate the charge?

MR. SPEAKER: The term "obstruction" has been repeatedly used in this House without the Chair calling the Members using it to Order.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I regret if I have occasioned the hon. Member for Cork any sense of pain by the charge which I have thought it my right to prefer against a minority in this House. I find that 35 days have been occupied by the consideration of this measure, and that 15 days in Committee have been employed in discussing Amendments, many of which must be admitted to be merely trivial; but I am sure, if I refer again to the fact that 15 days in Committee have been consumed in discussions, many of which must be pronounced to be purely trivial, then I think that the language which I used was fully justified. As I said, it is impossible for a majority of this House and for the Government, sustained by the great majority, I believe, of the people of this country, to yield to the obstruction of a minority in this House, especially when a portion of that minority refuses absolutely to follow the advice which has been tendered to it even by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) himself. The power is placed in the hands of the majority, and power involves responsibility and duty. It is our duty to see that the administration of this country, the conduct of Business in the House of Commons, the interests which are confided to the charge of the Government and the House of Commons, are not paralyzed by the action of those to whom we desire to give full liberty consistently with the traditions of the House of Commons itself, but who have no right to tyrannize over the great majority of the House. We have been patient and enduring. The resolve which we are obliged to take must prevail. There is an alternative which is open to the Members of the House of Commons, and that alternative is to displace the Government of the country, if they can, by an adverse vote of the House of Commons itself. They can, if they think right, appeal to the public out of doors, but while we are sustained by a majority in the House of Commons and by public opinion, we must carry on the Business of the country to the best of our ability, and according to our sense of public duty and right. Sir, it is impossible to deny that our recent proceedings have been really a farce and a travesty of Parliamentary discussion. The right of speech which exists is always subject to loyalty to Parliament and to the institution itself. It is subject to the duties to be discharged by Parliament; and we ask hon. Gentlemen, as was asked by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) five years ago, what would become of Parliament if only a few hon. Members chose to exercise their privileges according to their own excessive views of their right to do so? How would it be possible for any Business of any kind to be transacted, and how long would Parliament continue to possess the confidence of the country, and be worthy to merit the belief which has prevailed in past generations of its capacity to deal with the vast interests committed to its care? The period through which we have passed has been a period of pain, of embarrassment, and discredit, and of strain to Members themselves. What has been the result? The result has been to bring about ridicule, and disgrace, and contempt of the institution of Parliament itself. It may not be an objection on the part of some hon. Gentlemen that that result has been obtained by their exertions, but we should be wanting in our duty if we failed to take notice of it, and if we did not endeavour to remedy the evil. The public interest demands a present effort. It is not an individual question, it is not a question either for Her Majesty's Government itself, it is not one for hon. Gentlemen who sit in the House night after night till 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning—but it is a question for the House of Commons and for Parliament and for the institution whose honour and whose dignity we are bound to endeavour to preserve. The hon. Member for Cork objects to my use of the word "obstruction." Perhaps I may be allowed to quote a remark which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1881. The right hon. Gentleman then remarked that obstruction might be so pitted against Business that no Business could be done. We know that it may be so. Is that the aim and object of hon. Gentlemen? Is that their purpose and resolve? The interval which we propose for the further consideration of this measure is, in our judgment, adequate and sufficient for any discussion which can, under the circumstances, be deemed necessary. We aim at restoring the efficiency and capacity of the House of Commons itself in the discharge of its duties, and at preventing the degradation and destruction of the authority of Parliament; and of vindicating the honour and ability of Parliament itself to discharge the duties which are entrusted to it. I now venture, without further preface, to move the Resolution which is placed in your hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the Whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as hereinafter provided. After the Clauses are disposed of he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House.

"From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion, That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith.

"If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I was glad, Sir, to hear the right hon. Gentleman began his speech by the assurance that he intended studiously to abstain from what may be called polemical remarks. That was not his phrase, but I think it conveys the meaning which he conveyed to the House. I was glad of it, if for no other reason, for this reason—that that, I think, is the course most conducive to the purpose he has in view—namely, expediting the progress of this Bill, and shortening the debate by the particular Motion now before the House. Now, the right hon. Gentleman honestly, I think, persevered in a good portion of his speech in a tone which fully corresponded with that initiatory remark. I cannot say I think he was equally fortunate or equally consistent in some of the closing remarks of his speech. It was quite right that the right hon. Gentleman, believing it, as no doubt he does, should say that he was acting in conformity with the sense not only of a majority of the House, but of a large majority of the country. But surely it was not quite necessary for him, if he was thinking of keeping this debate within very limited bounds, to repeat that three or four times in a quarter of an hour. I was still more, I own, affected by regret at another observation twice repeated by the right hon. Gentleman. I will not say a word, after what has fallen from the Chair on the subject of the right of any Member of the House to charge a Party in the House with a Parliamentary offence—a distinct offence against the Rules of Parliament—namely, obstruction. But I think the right hon. Gentleman himself will agree with me that to charge such an offence against the minority in the House is not the way to induce that minority to abstain from a liberal use of its privilege of speech on that particular question which is submitted to its notice. However, Sir, in what I have to say I will certainly not endeavour to widen the field of this debate, but I will confine myself strictly to what I think is the most practical view of the matter before us. In the first place, I am bound to express my concurrence—though I was not in the House at the time when my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) made it—in the application made by him for a longer notice of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman has sustained himself on this point by referring to a Notice given by myself, I believe in the year 1881, of an intention to make what may be called an expediting Motion on the following day. Yes, Sir, but that was after a very important preliminary Motion which had been made, which introduced an entirely new and exceptional state of things—namely, a preliminary Motion that the state of Public Business was urgent; and after the House had declared that the state of Public Business was urgent, then with the Notice of a single Sitting I did announce the intention of the Government to make a demand in some degree analogous to this. But the right hon. Gentleman will observe that it is a totally different matter to make an allowance of a few hours of discussion by the House of of Urgency for Public Business, and to make it when no such declaration has been made. I think my right hon. Friend was entirely justified in making his application, and I am sorry it did not meet with a happier reception on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Now, Sir, this Motion involves a great number of details, but I do not mean to enter into any controversial consideration of them. Still, I will venture on one observation, simply because I have no intention to follow it up by any appeal to the judgment of the House in defiance of the Government, but I wish rather to tender it as a friendly suggestion. I cannot help observing the introduction—I am sorry to ask the particular attention of the First Lord of the Treasury—who was conferring with some of his Colleagues—though I know that these communications are very necessary in all circumstances, and not less in these particular circumstances. I refer now, Sir, to the second of the three paragraphs in the Motion. That, as far as I am aware, is an absolute and unmitigated novelty. It is an innovation which I view with extreme jealousy, and I am very much afraid of its being used hereafter as a precedent for some further invasion of the Rules of the House. If I were not under the conscientious belief that the Motion for introducing the present paragraph is totally unnecessary—the motive is to prevent that waste of time which is not infrequent in the recollection of most of us—I should not occupy the time of the House. But surely the security against this in the present instance is perfect, because if those of whom it is apprehended they will move to report Progress waste time in that way, they will limit still further the already limited space which the House will concede to them for substantial and solid Amendments. I hope the Government are ready to consider whether there is any necessity for that second paragraph, assuming for the moment the general purpose of the Resolution is to be accepted by the House. This Resolution is one, no doubt, that might be held to justify a long review of the state of affairs, and of the arrangement of Business during the Session. I have no intention of using the present occasion for such a purpose. I think it right to reserve that title which every Member possesses to make such a review, possibly on a future day, but, in my opinion, it is a subject which the House and the country ought well to understand, and which is fruitful of many reflections. But, undoubtedly, to enter upon it now would be the very last thing which I would wish to do—namely, to retard the progress of the Bill in Committee. There are two things in point of fact in which I agree with the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that it is most important to get forward with the present Bill, and for this reason, if for no other, we should have a proper opportunity within the limits of an ordinary Session to consider some matters of great weight which will have to be submitted to us in connection with the Irish Land Bill. The consideration of these matters postponed to a very late period of the Session, would, I think, be in the nature of a public calamity. Nor can I hesitate to subscribe to what the right hon. Gentleman has said with regard to the present state of the business considered as a whole. The state of the proceedings of the House in respect of Supply, even if it turned on that point alone, is in itself a scandal. The whole condition of Public Business, the entire paralysis of Parliament—the rate of progress of the present Bill, I think the right hon. Gentleman said, had given rise to very strong feelings in the country. I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman did not speak of displeasure and even of contempt. But, undoubtedly, it has created widespread and extreme dissatisfaction. Here I am afraid that whatever concord I have with the right hon. Gentleman is exhausted. As to the position with which we stand I agree, I think that the country is dissatisfied, and think it has a right to be dissatisfied. When the right hon. Gentleman and I speak of the country I am not sure that we quite mean the same thing. When I speak of the country I mean either those who are neutral in politics or those who are opposed to the Irish policy of the Government. When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the country he speaks in the names of those who are friendly to the Irish policy of the Government, who he thinks are entitled to a great deal of consideration in the present state of things, which I cannot admit they do possess. I am bound to say, in my opinion, it is the conduct of the Government that has brought about this state of things. That would be a matter of consideration in detail hereafter, but I will say in four lines why I think it is the conduct of the Government. In the first place, it is that they have been pursuing a false and evil policy of coercion without the justification which, as I shall show on another occasion in detail, has been pleaded at the time of former demands. Then they have, in my opinion, disregarded all the usages and traditions of Parliament in the conduct of Business. They have, worst of all, under the name of a Crimes Bill, introduced a Bill which is against combination, apart from crime; and finally they have made arrangements for carrying forward and working the Bill totally without precedent in my experience, and which, in my opinion, have been most unfortunate with regard to its progress. ["Hear, hear!"] I thank right hon. Gentlemen opposite for having sufficient patience to hear me in delivering these obnoxious sentences, but I will give them the best reward I can in not saying one word on the present occasion in justification of any one of them. Looking at the wide scope and reach of the principles involved in this Bill, especially considered as a permanent alteration of the Criminal Code in Ireland, I am at a loss to know, looking at a great number of days occupied in the discussion, how the right hon. Gentleman can attribute, in the main, that number of days to what he calls obstruction. The right hon. Gentleman said there have been 35 days so occupied. Well, I think we had 58 days on the Irish Land Bill without the continuous possession of the time of the House. I think we had 24 days in Committee on the Crimes Bill in 1882, when the House was divided not as it is now, as between a considerable majority and a not inconsiderable minority; but when it was divided between the whole mass of the House on one side, and some 30 or 40 Gentlemen on the other. We felt that of these 24 days the bulk was consumed in obstructive proceedings. In my opinion, so far as I may venture to pronounce either from what I have heard in the House, or what I have learnt from others, it is most unjust and not less absurd than unjust to ascribe to obstruction any large portion of the time consumed. I will not now enter upon the question whether the Government is to be blamed or praised for introducing a new and permanent criminal code for Ireland. I am only saying that when such a thing is done you must reckon with it as a certainty, and accept it as a thing just in itself that long and minute discussion upon such a measure will take place. I do not deny that there may be frivolous discussions, and I will not be tempted to refer to my experience of frivolous discussion. I think I could quote instances without difficulty as to matters of controversy which would render it extremely hard for Gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury Bench to press this Motion. Sir, I do not deny that there is a state of Public Business which is extremely grave, and, in my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman when he leaves that groundwork of the present state of Public Business for the purpose of going into charges of obstruction abandons a strong ground for the sake of a weak one. With the exception of the limited obstruction which always will occur in debate on a great Bill hotly contested, I doubt whether one, two, or three days have been consumed in this way. The main thing lies in the nature of the measure and the arrangements made by the Government for carrying it forward. That being so, the right hon. Gentleman confronts us in this way. He says—"Look at the period of the Session, look at the labours we have undergone." Neither of these statements will I contest for one moment. The period of the Session is advanced; the labours we have undergone have been most severe. I have ventured to point out what it appears to me would be the reasonable mode of expediting the Bill. But I have not been fortunate enough to obtain any countenance at all from Her Majesty's Government; on the contrary, many suggestions I have made have been described by the right hon. Gentleman as giving way to tyranny of the minority. [Mr. W. H. SMITH: No, no.] I should not have found fault with him if it had been. In my opinion there is a rational mode of expediting this Bill—which I admit to be an object of great public importance—that is, to take such measures as these:—To make the Bill temporary instead of permanent; to strike out of the Bill what touches combination apart from crime; and to give the Irish tenant and cottier population the same protection in respect of their land strikes which you give to the English artizan in respect of his labour strikes. But we knew that the right hon. Gentleman opposite gives no countenance or encouragement whatever to that method of procedure. He says that the large majority of the House is against it. I cannot deny it. He thinks the vast majority of the country is against it, and that is an opinion which, of course, he is perfectly entitled to entertain. Therefore, our mode of expedition is thrown out altogether. The right hon. Gentleman proposes his mode. I am bound to say that in those circumstances I know there is a point at which the action of the minority, and especially anything like the collective action of the minority, against the will of the majority becomes itself open to the charge of obstruction. I cannot be surprised at the judgment or opinion of any Gentleman on this Bench, or this side of the House, who may say—"This is another violence added to a long series of violences, and we will not let it pass without debate." I am not prepared to advise the minority as a body, and I am not prepared myself personally to relieve Her Majesty's Government of any of the responsibility attaching to this Bill. Let them make what they can of the undoubted state of the facts—the confusion, perplexity, stoppage of business, and dissatisfaction, if not indignation, of the country. The only course which I can properly take is to assert that we have from this Bench steadily, and without regard to the reproach of obstruction—but, as I think, with absolute innocence of any intention or action in that sense—we have steadily resisted, and in the time allowed by the right hon. Gentleman shall continue to resist, the most objectionable portions of this Bill. With respect to the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot deny that he has a great deal to urge in its support from his point of view; but his point of view is one which he has made for himself, and for that point of view, and the resulting proposal, he will not think it unfair in me to say that he and his Colleagues must bear the absolute and entire responsibility. The proceedings of this Session, more than those of any other Session I can remember, sum themselves up under one great head, which is capable of being considered and discussed both by Parliament and the country. I think it would be idle—it might even with some plausibility be called factious—to dwell upon details when principles of such breadth are in view; but I cannot find fault with Gentleman who think it right to record their protest against this further abridgment of Parliamentary liberty. For my own part, however, having only one remedy to propose, and that remedy having been rejected by the majority of the House, I do not wish to create fresh difficulty on the present occasion by offering to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman an opposition which cannot be effectual, for the many occasions on which the majority of this House has recorded its opinion has left me no doubt as to the course they will now take under the circumstances.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Sir, I desire to make a preliminary remark before moving the Amendment, which I intend to propose later on, to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. It is a word of warning to minorities in this House that this Resolution, coming, as it does, so soon after the exhaustive discussion upon the Closure Rule just recently passed by this House, and aiming, as it does, against one of the safeguards which was introduced into that Rule—namely, the action and the veto of the Chair, as the result of the judgment of all sides of the House that some such safeguard was necessary, will undoubtedly lead to the adoption by the House hereafter of some permanent Closure Rule framed on the lines of the present Resolution, to deprive the House of the safeguards to minorities which the present Closure Rule supplies. Just as the original Closure Rule adopted in 1882 was made easy by the Urgency Resolution of 1881, so the adoption of a more stringent Closure Rule than the present one will be made easy by this Resolution now before the House, if it be adopted. I cannot imagine the fatuity which possesses hon. Gentlemen opposite in rushing blindfold into the pit to which the right hon. Gentleman their Leader is conducting them. I fear it is a case of the blind leading the blind—of incapacity leading the incapable. But however that may be, this is not the proper time to discuss a Resolution aimed at the safeguard—the protection of the Chair, which was deliberately thrown over minorities when we were considering the first Closure Rule lately before the House. The Chair during the discussions in Committee on this Bill has repeatedly felt called upon to check the headlong speed and impetuosity of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House. The right hon. Gentleman over and over again asked the House to clôture Resolutions and Amendments, and he has been vetoed in the request by the Chairman, in virtue of the power and trust which were vested in him by the first Closure Resolution for the protection of minorities and the freedom of debate. Now, Sir, it is to prevent that action of the Chair, it is to destroy that action, it is to cut away the safeguard, the power, the right of the Chair to protect minorities, that the right hon. Gentleman now asks the House to adopt this Resolution. There is no safeguard of any kind in this Resolution. Parliamentary discussion, under the circumstances of this Resolution, will become a mockery, and if it be adopted it will, in my judgment, constitute a grave reflection upon the past action of the Chair, which it repeatedly exercised in protecting minorities and the freedom of debate, and in rebuking the intemperate zeal of the Leader of the House. Sir, we have heard nothing at all from the Government about the rights of minorities, or the freedom of debate. They have permitted all that to go by the board, and there will be but a pretence of debate in the future. The right hon. Gentleman talked about obstruction. The right hon. Gentleman I believe to be his own obstructor. I have no notion or belief that the right hon. Gentleman really desires to advance the Business of the nation. How can the Business of the nation be advanced under household suffrage, by a Tory Party leaning upon a broken-reed crutch? Progress in the Business of the nation we ardently desire. Obstruction was defined by a late Chairman of Committees, the present Postmaster General, as “obstruction of all Business.” What Business have we opposed? We have opposed a measure of the most iniquitous character—one single measure; a measure designed to deprive the Irish people permanently of all power of right to agitate for changes in the laws and for redress of grievances; a measure which is admitted to be designed for that purpose, and not for the detection of crime; a measure which will make agitation for the redress of grievances impossible—utterly impossible; and a measure which is intended to do these things for ever and for ever. Yet we are told that we are obstructing the general Business of the nation, when the fact is, we have lifted neither hand, voice, nor pen against any single measure except this one measure. We invite, we urgently entreat the Government—we have done so over and over again—to go to the Business of the nation, to proceed to the Business of the nation. If they will not undertake to prevent the horrors of Glenbeigh and the infamies of Bodyke—let them protect their own English and Welsh working men. Let them do something, even suppose it does make coal a shilling in the ton dearer, let them do something to prevent those terrible explosions in the depths of the coal mines in this country. That would be a part of the Business of the nation, in which we would cordially help and assist. Let them do some of the many other things which the nation understands and expects the Tory Government to do, and which the nation certainly were assured at the last General Election that this House would have done. But this cry of obstruction is not a real and genuine cry. It is not raised by men who have in their hearts a desire to advance the public interests of the nation, and to expedite the progress of reform. It is raised by a Party who, at all times in the history of Parliamentary Government, have been studying how they could best impede and prevent the progress of legislation—a Party who, when in a position and when in power, have recourse to every subterfuge and every dodge for the purpose of whittling away the time and diverting the attention of the country from the subject of the redress of grievances. No, Sir, let us go to the Business of the nation, and it will be found we are not the real obstructors, and that the obstructors sit upon the opposite Bench. No, Sir; we ask but for our right to debate the measure—to discuss the details of this measure of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. But the right hon. Gentleman is not yet the autocrat or dictator of the House of Commons; and so long as we can prevent him from occupying that position, we shall endeavour to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has not shown that judgment in the conduct of the Business of the House, that desire to give fair play, that desire to carry out his pledged word in the discussions on the first Resolution of clôtüre, to induce us to surrender ourselves, and the rights of our country, bound hand and foot, to his tender mercies. I have no desire to obstruct public Business—I have no desire even to obstruct this miserable, this wretched Bill; and I assert that the real obstructors are the Party who have always been the obstructors of progress, who have brought forward this Coercion Bill at a time when Ireland is more free from crime than she has ever been, at a time when the measure was least wanting, for the purpose—for the absolute purpose—of occupying the time of the House of Commons, and of diverting the attention of the country from its more legitimate aims and objects; and it is for this also that this cry of obstruction has been got up against the Irish Members, and this cry of destruction against the Irish people. I propose to move, as an Amendment to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, to leave out all the words after the word “that,” in order to add the following words:—

“Inasmuch as the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill is designed to deprive the Irish people permanently of their constitutional rights, this House declines to sanction the proposal of Her Majesty’s Government to deprive the Chair during the discussions in Committee on the said Bill of the power which, since the opening of these discussions the Chair has felt called upon repeatedly to exercise, in opposition to Her Majesty’s Government, for the protection of freedom of debate in this House, and the maintenance of the rights of minorities.”

I expressed the opinion formerly, during the discussion of the first Procedure Rules, that the time that would be gained by the adoption of that Rule would not make up for the loss of time in discussing it. I ask the Government, if the views which are embodied in this present Resolution are their views as to the rights of Irish Members in opposing and discussing the Coercion Bill directed against Ireland, why did they not come forward with this proposition at the beginning of the Session? They would have saved all the time which they have occupied in the discussion of the first Procedure Rule—a Rule which they now admit to be useless, because the Chairman of Committees will not allow them to use it in the way they would wish; they would have saved all that time, and they would have passed this Resolution probably sooner than the Closure Rule which is now being found to be useless. Why did they delay not only over the first Closure Resolution, but also over all the subsequent proceedings which the right hon. Gentleman erroneously told the House lasted 35 days? It would have saved all those days if so much time had not been taken up with those proceedings. Why did he not go to work then—35 working days ago—where he is going to work now? Surely neither he nor the Government could have supposed that a measure of this kind, designed permanently to set up Criminal Law of an exceptional character in Ireland, could be passed in a few days. Surely he could not have supposed that it would have taken less time than the Land Law (Ireland) Bill of 1881, which took 58 days altogether and 33 nights in Committee before it got through its different stages. Surely, if a measure for the amelioration of Ireland took so long a time as that to pass, a measure for the coercion of Ireland was entitled to an equal length of time for discussion. And why are we to be accused of obstruction when less than 30 days have been spent over this Coercion Bill as compared with 58 days which were spent by the Tory Opposition of 1881 over the Land Law Bill of that year? Why, Sir, does not the House remember that the Bill for the Amendment of the Criminal Law in England and Ireland—which was brought forward by the late Liberal Government, in 1885 I think it was—was sent before a Grand Committee, and took the whole Session to discuss before that Grand Committee; and not only so, but before the discussion was more than one-third concluded—I myself was a Member of that Grand Committee, and admired and aided the exertions of the then Tory Opposition—I will not say to prevent the Bill from passing, but to amend it properly before the Bill passed—but before the Bill was one-third over the Government of the day had to abandon it, because even before a Grand Committee, with the whole of the Session at their disposal, there was not time to finish more than one-third of the measure—the amendment of the Criminal Law. Now, Sir, if that was the case with regard to a Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Law, and not directed against any political agitation, or against any political agitators, as this Bill is directed, but for the ordinary Amendments, many of which were most excellent, of the Criminal Law of the three Kingdoms, how can it be said that we have exceeded the limits of our rights—that we have exceeded the limits of moderation in the debate which has taken some 28 or 29 days altogether on the different stages of the present measure? Why, Sir, even the worm will turn, and it would be impossible to suppose or expect that the Irish Members would have submitted to such a measure as this without at least taking up time as they have so far as the measure has got. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman compared his course with the course taken by the late Government, and asks us to believe that his is the more moderate course. What was the case of the course taken by the late Government when they adopted the Rules of Urgency? The Resolution under which the Rules of Urgency were subsequently drafted by the Speaker was first proposed in the House on the 2nd of February, 1881—a whole month after the commencement of the Session, when, if my memory serves me right, a whole fortnight had been taken up in the discussion on the first reading of a Bill only a single clause long—a Bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the provisions of which were mere child's play compared with the present Bill, and which was only to last for 18 months. Now, Sir, a whole fortnight had been taken up on the discussion of the first reading of this Bill, a lengthened Sitting of 48 hours had taken place, and Mr. Speaker Brand had intervened by saying that a small minority had abused the forms of the House, and that it was necessary that it should be checked, and he put an end to the debate on the first reading. Well, then the Government proposed their Resolution of Urgency. Their Resolution of Urgency did not, as the present Resolution proposes to do—it did not frame a rule under which the Chairman is obliged to act, whether he likes or not—whether he thinks it just or not—but it gave power to the Speaker to frame rules under which, after a certain period, it might be possible for a Minister of the Crown to move a Resolution providing that all Amendments then on the Paper should be put to a Division without further discussion; but the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman goes a great deal further than that. His Resolution provides that there shall be no Division whatever upon any Amendment after a certain day that he mentions—a week from the present time. It was on the 2nd of February that the Resolution of Urgency was first adopted. It was not until the 21st of February, or three weeks afterwards, that this Resolution of Urgency was first put in force—in other words, the very small Opposition of that day was allowed to contest the second reading, and the Committee stage of the Coercion Bill, for three weeks before the power which the Resolution placed in the hands of the Chair was exercised; and it was not until the 24th of February, three days later, that it was put in force for a second time; and, finally, it was not until the 9th of March that it was exercised for a third time. But the right hon. Gentleman proposes, after an interval of only a week, to make a fell swoop on all the Amendments on the Paper, no matter how substantial they may be, no matter how strongly opposed the Chairman of Committees and the Speaker may be to the exercise of his authority. The matter is taken from out the range of the power of the Speaker and the Chairman of Committees, and we are entirely left to the tender mercies of the autocrat of the Treasury Bench, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord. Now, Sir, I think I have shown that the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to compare his course of action as regards moderation with the action which was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on a previous occasion. On the contrary, he proposes nakedly to deprive a minority—now a very considerable minority—in the House, of all their rights and power of moving Amendments against this Bill, whether or not the Speaker and Chairman of Committees agree—and, practically, set up the most brazen and barefaced tyranny which has ever been attempted in this House since the King entered it for the purpose of seeking out and expelling the Members. But even the Resolution of Urgency was fenced about by a variety of safeguards. The then Leader of the Tory Party (Lord Iddesleigh) as the price of his assent to the Resolution, insisted that there should be a majority of three to one, and that the House should consist of at least 300 Members before it could be enforced. But all these safeguards have been swept away. We now see a Tory Government which, above all, is supposed to be the guardian angel of minorities, the protector of their rights, headed by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Government in this House, rushing forward in hot haste—in such haste that he could not even give us the usual decent 24 hours' Notice required by the usages of the House for the terms of his Resolution, to sweep aside all the safeguards which his own Party had insisted upon at a time of very much greater trial, at a time of far greater provocation than the present time. Now, Sir, I have shown that the circumstances of this Bill are such as to claim from this House greater patience than it would exercise on that or any other Bill. It is an attack—admittedly an attack—upon the rights of Constitutional agitation in Ireland. The Government were offered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that if they would confine the Bill to the repression of crime, and strike out from it those clauses which attack the right of combination and of Constitutional agitation, he, for one, would take no further part as Leader of the Liberal Party in opposing the further progress of the measure. Well, they refused to accept that, and they have gone forward now, relying upon their own strength to trample on the rights of minorities, and carry the Bill by the enactment of a Resolution of the most arbitrary and extraordinary character which has ever been proposed. I have shown already that it is an attack upon the Chairman of Committees. Any power which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Government can claim and can put in force under this Resolution can be put in force under the present closure, unless the Chairman of Committees forbids it; and the Chairman of Committees is only entitled to forbid it if he considers he is compelled to use the veto out of regard for the rights of the minority. Consequently, the Government, by endeavouring to set aside the Rule, admit that they are proceeding in this matter regardless of the rights of the minority. In conclusion, all I say is this—If this Resolution be passed—if Ireland is to be trampled upon and the rights of minorities destroyed and despised, because it is a mere question of coercing Ireland—you will find some of these days that the rights of minorities in questions concerning England and in which hon. Members opposite may feel deeply concerned, will be trampled upon and despised when there are more vital questions concerning the interests of the Kingdom involved than those who force this upon the House have any thought of at the present time. I beg, Sir, in conclusion, to move the Amendment which I read out a while ago, a copy of which I have handed in at the Table.

Mr. Parnell

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed.

To leave out from the first word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inasmuch as the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill is designed to deprive the Irish people permanently of their constitutional rights, this House declines to sanction the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, to deprive the Chair, during the discussions in Committee on the said Bill, of the power which, since the opening of these discussions, the Chair has felt called upon repeatedly to exercise, in opposition to Her Majesty's Government, for the protection of freedom of debate in this House, and the maintenance of the rights of minorities."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. W. H. SMITH rose—when—

MR. PARNELL: Mr. Speaker, cannot the Question be put in such a way as to permit of other Amendments being moved subsequently to the one I have moved?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has moved the Amendment in that form—to leave out all the words after the word "that."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to point out that if that course be taken no subsequent Amendment can be moved. I would ask you, Sir, whether the Question could not be put in such a form as would not preclude the consideration of other Amendments?

MR. SPEAKER: That course could only be followed when there were other Amendments on the Paper; but I will put it in that way, for the convenience of the House, if the House so desires, so that other Amendments may not be excluded.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Especially, Sir, as there could be no Amendment on the Paper, as Notice of the Resolution was only given this morning.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: There is one very important feature in this Motion which differs from any other I have seen—namely, that, assuming that when the date for concluding the Committee stage arrive, there were Amendments and even new Clauses on the Paper, which the Government themselves approve of, and are willing to accept, they cannot be put, because the wording of the Resolution is—

“That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill stand part of the Bill.”

MR. SPEAKER: I will put the words down to the word “Chair,” in line 5. The Question is, that the words “That, at Ten o'clock p.m., on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the Whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair,” stand part of the Question.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Scotland, Liverpool): Will you allow me to state, Sir, that I intend to propose an Amendment which will begin in the second line, after the words “Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill,” by inserting the words “and other Bills before the House.” I should be glad, Sir, if you could see your way to so put the Question as to allow that Amendment to be moved.

MR. SPEAKER: That would not be in Order. The Amendment handed in by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) traverses the principle of the Motion, and if I put the words, as I have stated them, down to the word “Chair,” I shall exercise, if possible, the right of hon. Members to introduce other Amendments.

MR. PARNELL: I would respectfully observe, Sir, that the question of the date at which this Resolution is to come into force is one of the most important questions raised in the whole Resolution.

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the hon. Member's Amendment itself excludes that question. It is quite contrary to the usual practice to allow the hon. Gentleman first to move an Amendment, and then to move another traversing the same ground.

MR. PARNELL: I did not suggest, Sir, that I was going to move another Amendment, and, as a matter of fact, I do not intend to move another. I merely pointed out that the question of the date is one of the most important questions involved in the whole Resolution. I would beg to remind you, Sir, that before moving my Amendment, I asked my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) to ascertain at the Table whether the rights of the Movers of other Amendments which might be handed in subsequently would be saved in the usual way—that is to say, if I were to propose to leave out merely the word “at,” the second word in the Motion, and I was informed that the rights of other Members would be saved. I blame myself, Sir, for not having approached you personally in the matter; but I did not desire to trouble you personally, and I therefore asked my hon. and learned Friend to go to the Table and make the inquiry. I have followed the precedents, and I find that the Amendment could not have been put on the Paper—if it had been possible to put it on the Paper at all—in any other way than the way in which I have moved it. It is always by the action of the Chair, and by the action of the Chair alone, that the rights of other Members who have Amendments on the Paper are subsequently saved. The Chair puts an Amendment such as I have moved by moving to leave out any one of the words at the commencement of the Resolution. It was a physical impossibility for Amendments to be on the Paper to-day, as we only heard at 2 o'clock this morning what the words of the Resolution were to be. I would pray you, Sir, to protect the right of the minority in the usual way to move Amendments by putting my Amendment in the way you have put similar Amendments and Resolutions in past times.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman was informed by the Clerk at the Table that if other Amendments were put in as the hon. Gentleman's Amendment was put in, then I, in the discharge of my duty, should preserve the rights of the hon. Members who intended to move them. But the hon. Gentleman has moved his Amendment in such a way as to exclude the whole of the words of the Resolution. The hon. Member might withdraw his Amendment.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I venture to hope that an arrangement may be made under which any legitimate Amendment shall be considered by the House. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will be prepared temporarily to withdraw his Amendment, if that be necessary, in order that other hon. Members may have the opportunity of moving the Amendments they desire to bring forward.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that as soon as practically possible, after I had seen the terms of the Resolution of the First Lord of the Treasury, I considered what Amendments I thought it open to, and I drafted certain Amendments with the intention of putting them in as soon as opportunity was afforded. I have not had the opportunity of placing them on the Paper, and I have not had time to hand them in at the Table. Under these circumstances, I ask you, Sir, to protect my rights as an individual Member. The Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) goes to the root of the principle of the Resolution. I propose to move to change the date from the 17th of June to the 24th. Now, Sir, I must ask you to enable me to do so by putting the Question in such a manner as will not shut out that Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to be for the convenience of the House, under the special circumstances of the case, that I should only put the words down to "10 o'clock p.m." I do not think, however, that it ought to be regarded as a precedent. The Question is, that the words down to "10 o'clock p.m." stand part of the Question.

Question proposed, "That the words 'at Ten o'clock p.m.' stand part of the Question."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not think that it would be respectful on my part towards the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Amendment if I did not say a few words in answer to his arguments. In doing that I shall refrain from commenting upon the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who has merely exercised his legitimate right in reviewing the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken in reference to this matter. I must, however, refer to the assertion of the hon. Member for Cork, that in bringing forward this Motion Her Majesty's Government intended to make an attack upon the power of the Chairman of Committees. The hon. Member is entirely mistaken upon that point. The closure has been put in force 16 times. Once the Chairman of Committees has declined to put the Question on a point of Order; and there were two occasions on which he thought it was his duty not to accept the Motion for immediately putting the Question, that the remainder of the clause under discussion should be added to the Bill, when the remaining Amendments to such clause appeared to Her Majesty's Government to be of a trifling character. The Chairman of Committees on both occasions remarked that there were two or three Amendments standing on the Paper before we reached the particular point of the clause to which I have referred which deserved a certain amount of consideration. After the disposal of those Amendments, in which about an hour or an hour and a-half was consumed, the closure up to the particular point to which I have referred was accepted by the Committee without a Division, and the clauses themselves were passed without Divisions. The object which we had in view was entirely met by the course that the Chairman thought it his duty to pursue, and I have no complaint to make of any difference of opinion between the Chairman and myself. On the second occasion, in an almost precisely similar way, we were involved in the discussion of a number of minor points in which we could not make any substantial progress. I moved that the words down to a certain point should stand part of the Bill, and the Chairman very properly remarked that there were two or three provisions worthy of consideration, and so far as he could see the rest of the Amendments were of a trivial character, and when the important Amendments were disposed of the closure was accepted. On another occasion the Chairman put the Question that the words—that certain words—should stand part of the clause, and the hon. Member for Cork rose and pointed out that, according to the distinct words of the Rule, the condition had not been entirely fulfilled which entitled the closure to be moved. The Chairman then held that I was not in Order in making the Motion; but it was only when the Chairman had had his attention called to the very difficult construction of the Rules, that he thought I was not perfectly in Order in making the Motion I did. Even in the cases where the Chairman had refused my Motion, the object I had in view has been attained. I have no complaint to make of the Chairman, and there is no difference of opinion between the Chairman and myself. I have only referred to the subject in order that any misapprehension which the hon. Member cannot desire to labour under should be removed, so far as I am concerned. The hon. Member charges the Government with being themselves the cause of obstruction. I do think, Sir, that that opinion can only be held by the hon. Member if he takes a very perverted view of the responsibilities and duties which belong to a Government. The duty and responsibility of the Government, from my point of view, are to proceed with any measures they believe to be necessary in the interest of the community at large. It is reasonable that the hon. Member should take an opposite view of what those measures should be. We say that we believe those measures to be of primary importance; he is of a different opinion, and those who agree with him think that they are discharging their duty by preventing the progress of this Bill, and thereby preventing the consideration of other measures by the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian admitted that the condition of Public Business at the present moment is a grave scandal. He admitted that there were questions which deserved and required consideration in this House; and although he probably coincided in the opinion of the hon. Member for Cork as to the incapacity of Her Majesty's Government to do justice to the measures required in the interests of the country, yet he admitted that the condition of Supply and the Business of the country generally warranted the course the Government propose to take with reference to the discussion of this Bill. With reference to the observation that we ought to have taken this course on the first day we entered into the discussion of this Bill, instead of waiting till the 35th day, I may say that the Government thought it their duty to permit the minority to have an ample opportunity of discussing a measure which affects them and their people. But, now, after more than ample opportunity has been afforded for discussion, we think that it is now time to vindicate the authority of Parliament and its reputation in the country, and we accordingly ask the House to make provision for some portion of its time and strength being given to questions which affect the general interest and well-being of the nation.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, that he rose for the purpose of saying a few words in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). He looked upon the Amendment as a Vote of Confidence in the Chairman of Ways and Means, and the proposition brought forward by the First Lord of the Treasury as a Vote of No Confidence. After entrusting the Chairman of Ways and Means with a veto, it was a most extraordinary thing to come and try to take away from him the option of permitting the closure, because he supposed it had not been exercised in the way the majority of the House liked. One of two things must be the case—either the Chairman of Ways and Means was fair or he was unfair. Those who supported the Motion declared that he was unfair. On that side of the House they were satisfied with him. What they said was—“You have got this power of closure; why do you not exercise it and bring it forward to put down the frivolous discussion the right hon. Gentleman talks about?” After a great expenditure of time, the right hon. Gentleman found it necessary to bring forward a Motion to stop all discussion after 10 p.m. next Friday, and he supposed he would carry it, as he carried everything. He did not, however, think the Liberals would suffer much if the Motion were carried. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of the country being with him; how did the right hon. Gentleman know that? He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had as good a right to express his opinion about the country as the First Lord of the Treasury had; and his opinion was that the democracy of this country, who were now fortunately enfranchised, would never permanently consent to tyrannize over and oppress the democracy of another country; they would never make Ireland another Poland; they would never see the destruction of the liberty of the Press, or of the right of public meeting. If they were in favour of making Ireland a perpetual Poland, then he said they were a miserable democracy. If they were, then they deserved to have the same measures they were now applying to Ireland applied to themselves, and he hoped that a Tory Government would pluck up courage to apply the same measures to this country. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman was right in his views as to the opinion of the country. The right hon. Gentleman had had several messages from the country. Had he not during the last few months heard from Burnley, from Ilkeston, and from St. Austell? [Loud Ministerial cheers.] He admired the Tory Party, though he had never seen hon. Gentlemen so pleased at being beaten before. They had, also, heard from Liverpool, and he wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had been present that he might have reminded him of it. He considered, therefore, he was justified in saying that the Government occupied their present position by no valid title whatever, and that he and his Friends were entitled to do all that they could to get an appeal to the country to see whether it supported Her Majesty's Government or not. The Government had only three supporters; one was an argumentative support, and the other two were physical. The first was that all the Irish Members were assassins and murderers, and consequently it was of the utmost importance that they should be retained in the House. That was the great argument in the Tory papers. Then the right hon. Gentleman's argument was that they were all obstructives on that side of the House, and spent all their time in blocking Business and preventing a vast number of most valuable Bills, such as no one had ever heard of before from a Tory Government, being brought forward. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that the country believed that? How many hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House declared at the last General Election in their addresses that they were entering Parliament to promote coercion? The third support of the Government was their crutches, the Liberal Unionists, whom he looked upon as worse than any Tories they had had during the present generation. He had, however, the comfort of knowing that their day was short. They dared not appeal to the country, any more than the First Lord of the Treasury dared, notwithstanding his brave words about the country being with him. Whatever might come of this Motion there was one bright spot, and that was that if the House were compelled to forge a weapon to be used by right hon. Gentlemen opposite in promoting tyranny and oppression, that weapon would remain as precedent; and in the days that were to come, and that were certain to come sooner or later—sooner, he hoped, rather than later—they on the Opposition Bench would apply that weapon to a far nobler purpose. [Ministerial laughter.] Yes, for a purpose which Tories always had laughed at and always had despised—namely, the purpose of promoting measures of freedom and progress.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that this Motion would be a precedent by which, without any declaration of urgency, by mere notice from one day to another and by a bare majority, without any intervention from the Chair, a debate might be closed. The right hon. Gentleman said there had been obstruction to this measure; but hon. Gentlemen opposite never hesitated to offer the most strenuous opposition to measures which they thought too advanced or described as revolutionary, and thought it no obstruction to do so. Even in the present he had personal experience of opposition, to a measure supported by a majority of the House, offered by a minority sitting opposite, and which had been characterized as obstructive from the Conservative Benches. He submitted that much of the responsibility for the delay in connection with the Bill before the House rested with the Government, for in many cases they had made concessions at the end of a debate when they might very well have made them at the beginning. He did not suppose that there would be any chance whatever of defeating this Resolution, but he wished to put upon record the protest of the Radicals, with whom he worked, and to record the precedent a justification for moving similar Resolutions when their time came.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said he thought the Government ought to recognize the way in which they themselves had brought about the position in which they now stood. In the Land Act of 1881 the Tory Party occupied four nights debating one single line, and that the first line. The Tory Party, and principally the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), spent four nights in discussing the first line of the first clause of the Land Act, although that first clause of the Bill dealt simply with the question of free sale, which existed in Ulster always and which existed in other parts of Ireland. Then, after that, they occupied nine nights in debating the clause. What was their position now? It was said that wearisome and very dry debates had taken place on the Bill. He did not deny it for one moment; but surely if they took the Bill and stuffed it and choked it with all kinds of obnoxious provisions, they made it necessary to take up time in discussing it. Nothing was easier than for the Government to get up a cry of obstruction against the Irish Members. The Government had in London in the newspapers the materials for getting up an artificial cry of obstruction, and though that House was supposed to be the highest Court of the Realm, and an international issue was at stake, Ireland v. England, there was contempt of Court with regard to the proceedings of that House on the part of those who were appointed to write on the subject. The Representatives of the people could be abused, attacked, and defamed, their speeches were misrepresented, and their conduct twisted and distorted, whereas if he had an action for twopence halfpenny in Westminster or the Royal Courts of Justice in the Strand against the right hon. Gentleman opposite for goods sold and delivered, and any newspaper in the kingdom ventured to comment on that case while under discussion, he could have that newspaper up for contempt of Court. Yet those newspapers in dealing with that highest Court of the Realm and in dealing with litigants—international litigants who came before that House pleading their cause before the people of England—every newspaper in the Kingdom thought itself at liberty, upon matters which very few of them understood, to discuss in the most partizan point of view this cry of obstruction, which was a purely artificial cry, and which could be got up at any moment by the Ministerialists in their newspapers in London. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury talked about making sacrifices. It was easy to make sacrifices at £5,000 a-year, but they had to make them at that side of the House, and not sit silent as the right hon. Gentleman. They had got to point out the mischiefs and evils of the country, and spend their time not in the enjoyment of profits and emoluments, but in the interests of their country; and then because they did it the representatives of the capitalist and of the landlord party said they were actuated by some malignant motive. For himself, he had never believed in obstruction as a policy, and he did not believe in it now. He never could see any object in interrupting the Business of the House, because what good did it do? There was no good whatever, in his judgment, in engaging in a policy of obstruction, and the only good purpose to be served in carrying on a debate was that of informing the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, if that was not a wholly impossible task, and teaching the public outside. As for delaying the Bill, for his part he did not attach any value to such delay. Whether the Bill was to come into operation on the 1st of July or the 1st of August, he did not think it mattered in the least. The opponents of the measure had moved Amendments to it, and he had been specially attacked by the papers for doing so; and the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Colonel King-Harman), who had been appointed to his Office because of his antagonism to the Irish Members, described them as “the scum of the swill tub of Ireland.” That was the gentle way the Under Secretary had of describing his own countrymen; and in a speech which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman made he stated that he (Mr. T. M. Healy) made more speeches than anybody else, and that, therefore, he and some others were guilty of obstruction. He would remind the House that while two or three, or four, or five of the Irish Members had spoken, all the others remained silent, allowing their Colleagues to speak for them. Would it be a reasonable thing if anybody said of the First Lord of the Treasury that he made more speeches than anybody else? The right hon. Gentleman would reply that he had to do it; and in the same way, if certain Members had been put forward by other Members, that was the action of a party of 86, and not of an individual Member. He was speaking and taking up a position for 86 others, and he was justified in making a series of speeches which, if he were only making from his own individual point of view, he would be entirely unjustified in making; so that no argument could be drawn from the position taken up by the First Lord of the Treasury, who said if every Member of the House made 100 speeches they could never get on. That was perfectly true, but if individuals on certain clauses had moved Amendments which had the support of an entire Party, that was a sufficient justification of those Members who had moved the Amendments and made speeches. But then there was another additional obstruction in the House which the right hon. Gentleman must see was in the nature of things inevitable. How could they avoid obstruction in a House composed of 670 Members? They must have obstruction in a Legislature which comprised so many Members, and which should not be composed of more than 200 or 300 Members. What had been the course of the Government in regard to the management of affairs in that House? When the 1st clause of the Bill was under discussion they were met with considerable fairness by the Government, and what followed? Why the 36 lines of the clause were expanded to 113, and then the Government, seeing they were justifying their opponents by accepting their Amendments and were giving reasons and grounds for saying the draftsmanship of the Bill was as bad as their policy, refused to make any concessions to fair arguments addressed from that side of the House. That was a most unfair and disingenuous way of meeting the Members from Ireland, because undoubtedly the matters put forward by them were entitled to consideration. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, like the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, seemed to be able to make only one speech. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord had made one great speech, which was to move that the Question be now put, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had made another. Amendments were moved, and then the right hon. Gentleman got up and said—"I see nothing in the Amendment which in any way makes our Bill clearer or better," and without one single reason in justification of his proposal the right hon. Gentleman sat down. Intellectual barrenness of that kind in rejecting or opposing Amendments only led to friction and unpleasantness, and he thought it would have been much better for the Government to have let the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary remain away somewhere while the Bill was under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman could have been studying Irish questions at the Irish Office, and have left the defence of the Bill in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown, who were able to reply to the arguments put forward. It was one of the forms of insult the Government offered to the House that that they should leave the entire conduct of the Bill in the hands of a Gentleman like the Chief Secretary, who absolutely failed to meet any argument, when they had a Gentleman like the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), who was perfectly able and willing to meet them in discussion. He (Mr. T. M. Healy) never saw more lamentable ignorance on any subject than that displayed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, whose conduct had been one of the causes of the delay that had taken place. That Rule, as he understood it, was a practical repeal of their great provision which enabled the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington to swallow the principle of the clôture, and it was a practical justification of the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). Those right hon. Gentlemen said the simple system of clôture was the only real one for the working of the Business of the House; but the Government insisted on the putting into the Rule that the veto of the Chair should not be withheld, and after one month almost from the passing of that Resolution they were actually moving a Vote of Censure on the Chairman of Ways and Means, because he had shown fair play in the conduct of the debate. The Chairman had given them fair play, and this would be remembered by Irish Members after the present strife had passed away. No doubt the very fact that the Government had not been enabled to induce the right hon. Gentleman to grant them the clause without adequate discussion was a proof that the Amendments which had been moved were not of a trivial character. With regard to the entire of the 2nd clause he (Mr. T. M. Healy) did not move a single Amendment, leaving it entirely to the English and Scotch Members. He would not have complained of the Government attempting to put down the system of Boycotting if the Government had introduced some safeguards, such as that of appeal to a proper tribunal. The Government, by their present action, had given a signal proof that they considered the Amendments on the Paper of a substantial character; and that being so, they might well be content to allow that Bill to pass, subject to their protest.

Mr. T. M. Healy

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he wished it to be put on record that the bringing forward of this Motion was a further advance in the doctrine of closure, and a great advance it was. The Government, when the question of Procedure was under discussion, laid great stress on the authority of the Chair as a regulating and restraining influence upon the closure. The present proposal was, however, an admission that they were entirely wrong, and it was a complete justification of the course which his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and himself had taken. What was the difficulty of the Government in this case He thought that they had said that every Amendment to their Bill was frivolous and unnecessary, and they had resisted every Amendment. If they had had the power in their own hands they would have used the closure, and the Committee on the Bill would have been over long ago. But they had set up an independent Judge, who on several occasions said that, in his opinion, some of these Amendments were most reasonable, and ought to be discussed. It was because the Chairman of Committees said that that the Government had come forward with the present Resolution. If the Chairman of Committees was of opinion that these six days would be sufficient to discuss all reasonable Amendments, all they need have done would be to apply for the closure. But they were afraid that the Chairman would say that the Amendments which they called frivolous were substantial Amendments which ought to be discussed. Consequently this new Resolution was proposed, in order to get rid of the impartial judgment of the Chairman of Committees. He had always predicted that the moment the majority found in the Chair any objections to their proposals for closure they would never tolerate that impartial judgment of which they formerly spoke so much, and that when such an obstacle was put in their way they would sweep it out of their path. They had drawn their clause in such a form that if there were Amendments which they thought ought to be in the Bill, they had taken good care to prevent their being put. Surely that was a closure as complete as anything that could be desired. He had never himself been an enemy of the closure. He had been consistent on that subject, having always been in favour of the closure pure and simple. The supporters of the present Government protested against a tyrannical majority until they themselves became one. They talked now of obstruction. Why, they took 20 days to discuss the single proposal of the closure some years ago. Perhaps the Government thought there would always be a Tory Party in Office, always supported by Liberal Unionists. That was like some foolish people who when they had got a fine day thought it would never rain. But changes came over the political atmosphere. The day might come—he ventured to say it would come—in which there would be a Liberal Government supported by a democratic majority. Then they should not be sorry to remember the lengths to which, for purposes of coercion, the Tory Party would carry the principle of closure. It was the tendency of these things to develop themselves. Conversion was rapid and complete. Look at Gentlemen opposite. They would never consent to the closure except with a three-fourths majority. Where were they now? They would never consent to the closure without every kind of safeguard. All their safeguards were now swept away. They must have the impartial judgment of the Chair, and the moment they were checked by the impartial judgment of the Chair, they closed the Chair, and they put the extinguisher on the Chairman of Committees. That was the process of conversion. In the days of Urgency in 1882 this very Rule could not be carried except by a majority of 3 to 1, but now the Tory Government had set an example that they could do this thing by a majority of 1. He would paint a picture which he was sure would edify the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He suggested to him a possible future when there might be a Liberal Administration numbering, say, 340, and there might be a Conservative Party of 330. There might be some great Constitutional measure—perhaps Home Rule—and there might be a Minister standing at the Table and saying—"I shall introduce to-morrow a Home Rule Bill, and I shall accompany it by a declaration that the third reading shall be taken this day fortnight; the subject has been discussed for many years; the Amendments you have put down to the measure are frivolous; your resistance to it is obstructive; you are standing in the way of a great reform; you are opposing the Business of the nation; it is our duty as a majority to assert the rights of the nation, and to see that the Home Rule Bill is carried in a fortnight." That might happen. And then they should have a glorious example! If anybody lived to see that day he might learn by heart the noble speeches they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that night. A Liberal Government might introduce a Bill for the Disestablishment of the Church, and they might reasonably say—"All that can be said for and against this Bill has been said already, and we shall take the third reading of it this day week." That was to be the sort of progress they were likely to make in the democratic transaction of the Business of that House. This was really what the Conservative Party and the Conservative Government in their insane passion for coercion were doing for themselves. A Greek sage said that no man could be called happy until he was dead, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite ought not to think himself happy in seeing how the closure had worked until the time of his political decease. He thought it right when this proposal, which was in absolute contradiction of everything the Tory Party had ever said or done, was made, to notice their complete conversion to the principle of closure for which the Liberals had contended, and the inevitable consequences to which in the future this proposal may lead.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said: "When the cat's away the mice will play." The tone in which his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had addressed the House was very different from that of his Leader. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), at all events, remembered the duty of the House to proceed with its Business—to clear the road for other legislation. But the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken did nothing but taunt those who sat on the Government Benches with their conversion to the closure. The right hon. Gentleman was a great authority on the question of conversion. But by what process had it been brought about that this Resolution had been proposed. The right hon. Gentleman threatened those who sat on the Government Benches with what would happen when he was able to bring the democratic forces of the country with him. They had been engaged 35 days upon this measure, and in those proceedings to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded. No doubt, it was a most grave and serious thing when the Government was brought to the necessity of proposing so unusual and unprecedented a Resolution, and it was regretted by every Member of the House. But it seemed to be looked upon with triumph by the advocates of the closure on the opposite Bench, because they said that it proved that they were right with regard to the closure. That was not the principle of those who sat on that side of the House, nor of the majority of those who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman. If he were to poll his followers he would see that there were two-thirds who regretted that it was necessary to propose this Resolution. The country, however, sympathized with the Government, and looked upon their proceedings as absolutely necessary; and the country would know with whom lay the responsibility for the necessity of that action. Just as the Government would not propose a Resolution of that kind unless they knew that the moment had arrived when public opinion would justify their action, so they felt convinced that in the future, when the time came for his right hon. Friend to command his democratic forces, they would not be able to abuse the closure in the manner which he had described in the comic sketches with which he had just favoured the House. His right hon. Friend had amused the House, as he always did. But he would not delude the country, which he was seldom able to do. His right hon. Friend was naturally in good spirits, because he was aware that he would soon be relieved of watching this Bill, and supporting Amendments which he knew not to be worthy of attention. He made due allowance for the comic sketches indulged in by his right hon. Friend, and no one would be terrified by the picture he had drawn of the closure being used to put down legitimate discussion, and to promote legislation of the kind he referred to. The Government disliked the necessity of proposing so drastic a measure as this. His right hon. Friend had said that the Cherman had not applied the closure enough to satisfy the Government, and that the Government had treated every Amendment as frivolous. It was absurd of the right hon. Gentleman to make such a charge against the Government, for there were many occasions on which they had admitted the justice of prolonged discussion upon important clauses, and there had been no attempt to cut it short. His right hon. Friend said that the course now adopted was a proof that closure with the check of the Chair was a failure. But it was not necessary for an Amendment to be frivolous in order to take up time; and if the House were to follow the precedent of the proceedings in Committee upon this Bill, and the multiplication of Amendments were to go on, they would never get any legislation at all. The Leader of the Irish Party, and the Lieutenants of the Party opposite, had been unable to induce their followers to moderate the length of their Amendments and speeches, which were not necessarily frivolous, but which threatened to go on ad infinitum. If Her Majesty's Opposition were determined to put Amendments ad infinitum, they would block all legislation in that House. Such a course had been applied in the case of this Bill, and it had rendered necessary the proposal before the House. He (Mr. Goschen) had risen to protest against the contention that in taking their present course the Government had set a precedent which would justify proceedings such as the right hon. Gentleman had suggested. The Government felt that the moment had come when it was absolutely necessary to pass such Bills as the Coal Mines Regulation Bill—to which the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had referred—and the other legislation which the Government felt bound to undertake; and it was of far more importance to get one of those measures passed than to have discussion on Amendments which, if not absolutely frivolous, were trivial, and could not be put in competition with legislation of that important character.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he was not at all surprised at the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) that the Members of the Party to which he belonged had brought forward this proposal with regret and humiliation. It was very easy to see the feelings with which the Tory Party regarded this proposal. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had been an observer in the House for a great many years, and he should say that he never saw the Tory Party in such profound depths of despondency as when the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) was making his proposal, and he should confess that the right hon. Gentleman gave cause to his followers to be despondent owing to the nature of his speech in matter or manner, for a more weak or shuffling speech he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had never heard in favour of such a momentous and important proposal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that the Business of the House was paralyzed, and yet he was prepared to maintain against all odds the competency of the House to deal with all matters affecting every country in the Empire. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the directions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) and his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had been ignored by their followers was entirely inaccurate. The hon. Member for Cork came down to the House on Tuesday and backed up the very sensible advice given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that they should concentrate their attention on a certain number of Amendments and drop other Amendments which they did not regard as of equal substance and importance. And what happened? There were about 60 Amendments that night on the Paper, and his hon. Friends who were sponsors for these Amendments drew their pens through three-fourths of them. Even the discussion on Wednesday over the preamble in the 4th clause was carried on in a reasonable spirit, and was concluded without the application of the closure. In face of that fact he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making too large a presumption on the gullability of his supporters in the country when he said that the advice of the right hon. Member for Derby and the hon. Member for Cork had been rejected by their followers. He was not surprised at the sensitiveness with which the right hon. Gentlemen the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer received the allusion made to their action towards the Chairman of Committees. It would not be good taste to praise any more than blame the decision of any Presiding Officer of the House; but he should say that, by his conduct in connection with the Closure Motions that had been proposed from time to time by the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chairman of Committees had greatly increased the respect and confidence of every section of the House, and also his reputation for impartiality, strength, and dignity in the Chair. The Chairman of Committees more than once found it necessary to accept the proposals of the First Lord of the Treasury for curtailing debates and rejecting Amendments placed by Members of the Irish Party on the Paper; yet there was not a single one of the Irish Party who blamed the Chairman for so doing, or who did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman was acting honestly in what he believed to be his duty in the matter. The hon. Gentleman had on several occasions thought it right to refuse to accede to the demand of the First Lord of the Treasury. This had displeased the Treasury Bench. A Chairman that was good enough for the Irish Party was not good enough for the Tory Party, and it was impossible not to help feeling that the present Motion was the direct consequence of the discovery which the Government had made that they had in the Chair an independent and not a servile President. That was his charge, and he made it plain and unmistakable. The difference between the Clôture Rule now proposed, by the Government and the Clôture Rule already in existence was that by the former the Chairman of Committees was deprived of all the power which he possessed under the latter Rule of protecting substantial Amendments from the clôture. The Government lived, as the clôture. The to mouth. They did not know in the morning what they were going to propose in the evening. They opened the Session with the declaration that the intervention of the Chair in connection with the application of the clôture was absolutely necessary, and that such intervention afforded a complete safeguard for the protection of minorities. That declaration was made a few weeks ago; yet the Government wished to get rid of the very safeguard which formed an integral part of their original proposal. Those right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench who talked about obstruction ought to bear in mind the history of some of the most prominent Members of the Party. Why, the right hon. the Tory man the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had gained such political eminence as he enjoyed by acting as an arch-obstructor, and the predecessor of the right hon. the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had brought the art of obstruction up to a pitch of development never reached previously. When, therefore, the Government charged opponents with obstruction, he was reminded of the pot calling the kettle black. The Government had no precedent for their action; but they had established a precedent which would have the most important consequences—a Home Rule Bill would be proposed a great deal sooner than the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) ventured to say that if an appeal were now made to the country, a Home Rule Bill would be introduced in six weeks' time. It might be, when that Bill was introduced, and when the Lords of the Treasury were opposing it—as they had opposed the Land Bill of 1881—that it would be necessary to have a precedent from a Conservative Government for gagging inconvenient opposition.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Mr. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr) said, he could not look at the Treasury Bench without thinking of the words of a song of the good old days gone away. It appeared a farce to him to hear the Government denouncing obstruction, having regard to the fact that there were sitting on the Treasury Bench more than one hon. Gentleman who had mainly gained distinction by obstruction. He was one of those who had learned the art of obstruction from the Treasury Bench. When the Clôture Rules were introduced by the Liberal Government, he assisted the present Members of the Treasury Bench in obstructing these Rules night after night, and one of his most able instructors and allies was the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). It was from that right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues that he learned obstruction—it was in their company he proceeded in his bad habits. The present cry of obstruction was got up by the Government as a veil in which to hide their real policy. The closure enabled the Government to wipe out frivolous Amendments, and that ought to be sufficient for all legitimate purposes. But it appeared that the Government were dissatisfied with the action of the Chairman in protecting the rights of minorities and securing discussion for really important Amendments. For his own part, he did not care whether the Motion was passed or not—the further the Government went the better for the Opposition—the more the Tory Party endeavoured to put down freedom of discussion in the House, the worse it would be for them in time to come, and looking forward to the period when the Tory Party would be in Opposition, he, for one, hailed with delight the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, the Tory Party were never satisfied except when they were endeavouring to rob the people, and especially the people of Ireland, of their liberty. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) should have thought it necessary to tell the House he moved this Resolution with peculiar feelings of distaste. If he had not said so the House would never have found it out. He hoped the House and the country would take note that the Tories revelled in taking away the liberties, not only of the country, but of that House. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was never tired of telling of the traditions of that House; but what was the value of those traditions unless they secured freedom of debate? He should have despised the Members for Ireland if they had not withstood the infringement on their liberties made by this Bill. They would have been unworthy of their position had they not done so. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) affecting that right to speak on behalf of the democracy. The right hon. Gentleman had no right to speak on behalf of the democracy, considering that his whole life had been spent in opposing those in whose name he now professed to speak. The right hon. Gentleman could not, in fact, obtain the support of any popular constituency, but had to obtain a seat for St. George's, Hanover Square. Speaking after 40 years' intercourse with the people of this country, he (Mr. Handel Cossham) ventured to say that they had made up their minds against this Coercion Bill, and that they would not be slow to express that opinion as soon as they could get an opportunity. The first day the people of England were appealed to would be the last of the present Government. He did not believe that the Liberal Unionists had any idea, when they joined the present Government, what lengths they would have to go, or how fast they would go down hill. Indeed, he never heard of anything like the pace at which the Government were now going down hill since the day when the herd of swine rushed down the hill into the sea. The Conservative Members had, in this matter of coercion for Ireland, belied their hustings' pledges. He could point out 100 men on the Conservative side who had obtained the support of the electors at the last Election by promising to vote against coercion for Ireland. What had changed their policy? It could not be the prevalence of crime in that country, for the amount of crime there was less than at the time of the last Dissolution. There would be an end of this thing ere long. The Coercion Bill was kept up simply to obstruct other measures, and when remedial measures came on for discussion, the Government combination would go to pieces. Not all the Liberal Unionists would be satisfied without some remedial legislation, or would be satisfied with the political sham that the Coercion Bill is. The Government might get this Motion passed by the votes of those who would not listen to discussion; but they could never carry out the Bill in the face of Irish representation and the reports of a Free Press. They must expel the Irish Members and suppress the reports of the Press before they could hope to carry out the Bill. Meantime, they wasted the time of the House, and insulted the country by keeping on the coercion controversy from day to day. What the country required was, to use the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian's (Mr. Gladstone's) words, measures that would make it easier for the people to live, strengthening the desire to do right, repressing the tendency to do wrong. The Bill would not prevent, it would create crime, and was so intended. It would aid the class of oppressors—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the Bill on this Motion.

Mr. HANDEL COSSHAM said, he begged to apologize. He was only referring to the Bill by way of illustration. The result of passing this Motion would disappoint the expectations of the Government, and teach the country that no more incompetent Government than the present ever attempted to conduct the affairs of a great nation.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) said, he could not help noticing the scanty attendance of Members, particularly on the Ministerial side, and he thought that if a Motion were made for the adjournment of the debate it would not be unreasonable. The object of the Government was to push this matter through as hurriedly as possible; but, considering that the bulk of hon. Members were to a large extent in the dark on this matter, he thought it would be more respectful to the House and the country that the Government should postpone this discussion, instead of pressing it forward, until the Amendments were seen in print. A more serious and drastic proposal than that of the Government had never been made in the whole of their Parliamentary history. It opened up a very promising prospect for Irish Members of Parliament especially. They were told impliedly that they would not get Home Rule, and that the Government would shut them up when they liked. The Resolution was a proposal to the effect that for the first time in the history of the British Parliament a bare majority should have the right of stifling the voice of the minority. He utterly denied that any obstruction whatever had been offered by the Irish Members to this Coercion Bill; but they were bound in the faithful discharge of their duties to place Amendments to every clause on the Notice Paper, and to fight them out to the bitter end, no matter how displeasing it might be either to the Speaker or the occupants of the Front Ministerial Bench. The effect of the Resolution, if passed, would be to make Irish Members, if possible, more disgusted and discontented with this House than ever. Its object seemed to be to goad the Irish Members to resort to some desperate action, and so to enable the Tories to hold them up to odium before the constituencies as an unconstitutional Party. He contended that the Government in the course which they were now taking were doing away with the protection afforded by the Closure Rule, by which no Motion for the closure of debate could be put without the sanction of the Chair. To hand over the Irish Members to a majority which were composed of Members who did nothing but enjoy themselves when the Irish Members were working hard in the House was to add insult to injury. The real fact of the matter was this—that not satisfied with the majority they got, the Tory Party would be content with nothing but to see the minority sitting mute in the House. They were too much for the Tories, as the people of England saw, and they accordingly determined to gag them. If this sort of policy was to be carried out they might as well shut up the House of Commons at once, and adjourn the whole thing. Let the Members of the Tory Party enjoy themselves in their country seats all over the country, and let the First Lord of the Treasury communicate with them by telegraph from Downing Street when he wanted anything done. There was no obstruction whatever, unless the Tory Party considered discussion obstruction, or wished to hoodwink the people in the country into the belief that there was obstruction. He wished the Tories joy of their rest when they got it. They would get their coercion; but the result of the coercion would be to make the people of Ireland more dissatisfied with the clique which governed Ireland in Dublin Castle. The proposal that by a bare majority of 1 the Tory Party should have the power of closing debate was so outrageous that he thought it would produce general dissatisfaction in the country. He believed that the result of the passing of the Resolution would make them the laughing stock of the world.

Mr. Handel Cossam

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he believed that the United States could not change its Constitution unless by a two-thirds majority. The Government proposed to alter the Constitution of Ireland by a bare majority, and not satisfied with doing that under the ordinary Rules of the House they wished to make a great innovation. He should support the Amendment, for he contended that the Government should be satisfied with the progress their Coercion Bill had made. No Ministry could expect to pass more than one first-class measure in a Session, and as the Coercion Bill was a measure of first-class importance, seeing that it affected the Constitution of Ireland, they ought to be content with passing that one important Bill and some other smaller measures. What the Government wished to do was to make a show of progress, and in that they were wise, because if they dealt with other questions they would not be able to secure the support of the Liberal Unionists, who, according to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, differed from them in 99 cases out of 100, while they agreed with them only on the Irish Question. Had Her Majesty's Government allowed the Bill to go on at the rate at which it was proceeding, he believed that it would have been got through its Committee stage in some seven or eight days, as the Committee had now disposed of nearly all the important points in the measure. The Government, however, had been forced by their supporters out-of-doors to do something, and in the effort to do something vigorous the Government had brought forward this Motion to deprive the Chairman of Committees of his power of vetoing their proposals for putting the closure in force. The Chairman of Committees had three or four times thought that the First Lord of the Treasury wanted to go too fast and had refused to put the closure. Nothing could be worse than for the Government to say that as the Chairman of Committees had not decided in their favour upon every occasion they would take away the power from him. That was really what the Motion meant. The Government had intimated their intention of introducing a second Coercion Bill this Session; and, in a Party point of view, they were quite right, because by so doing they would retain the allegiance of their Liberal Unionist Friends, whom, beyond all doubt, they would attempt to crush out at the next General Election. If the Government would drop this Motion, and would leave out a great part of the remainder of the Bill, with the intention of re-introducing the omitted portions of the measure in the form of a new Coercion Bill next autumn, they would easily pass the Bill through its remaining stages.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) said, he proposed to consider this question, not from a Party point of view, but speaking in the interests of the House itself, as one who had had for several years the privilege of conducting the debates in Committee, and who had knowledge of how the Rules of the House acted. He made no objection to the course which Her Majesty's Government had taken in drawing attention to the fact that the debate in Committee on this Bill had ceased to be instructive and had become obstructive; but he objected to their having made this proposal by a rude and clumsy machinery to effect a wholesale slaughter of Amendments. He thought that Her Majesty's Government were wrong in attempting to make a precedent which might become exceedingly dangerous to the rights of minorities at some future time. How did the case present itself to the House in 1881, which was the first occasion on which obstruction made its force felt? The House then determined that it would crush obstruction; but how did it proceed? It then proceeded in the most formal and careful way. It first declared that the Business of the House was urgent, and at that time nearly all the Irish Members were suspended. Nevertheless, a full debate took place, and, at the suggestion of Sir Stafford Northcote, the then Leader of the Conservative Party in that House, it was resolved that debate should not be put an end to unless there was a two-thirds majority in a House of not fewer than 300 Members. That right hon. Gentleman then contended that such a proposal should never be made unless the House was practically unanimous. Urgency had been several times voted by the House in respect to the Business before it. It was voted three times in 1881, and then it was not again voted until July 4, 1882. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on the latter occasion moved that the Business should be declared urgent, and upon that Business was declared to be urgent by 3 to 1 in a House of 300 Members. The Rules with regard to urgency never became Standing Orders as a whole; some were adopted into the Rules of Debate; but this one never did become a Standing Order. On the first occasion, on the 3rd of February, 1881, Urgency was declared; but the effective Resolution putting an end to debate was not moved till the 21st, so that ample time and deliberation were given to the House. But on this occasion we are informed at midnight one night, and the Motion is made at 4 o'clock next day. The precedent that was now being set was deprived of all the safeguards and conditions for deliberation that were previously observed. The precedent now being established would permit a House of 41 Members to pass a Resolution of this kind at 24 hours' Notice. That the Resolution gave a week for the discussion formed no essential part of the precedent, for other precedents could be quoted when only a few hours' discussion were permitted. It would be a precedent for the passing of a Resolution by a majority of 1, by which the discussion on any measure, however important, could be brought to a close at once without debate or Division. They were going further even than the Resolution of the 24th of February, the 10th of March, and the 4th of July, which all made it necessary that the Amendments set down should be voted upon, so that the Government might accept some and improve their Bill; but by this Resolution all the Amendments were to be swept away, and they were to vote on the clauses without amendment. The Government were thus putting it out of its power to consider any Amendments which might be proposed. The precedent now being established would be most dangerous for any minority, and particularly for the Conservative Party. Assuming the Liberal Party were in a majority, and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) proposed a Bill for the abolition of the House of Lords, under this Resolution Notice could be given and the Bill be at once put to the vote after, perhaps, only 12 hours' discussion. Some day the Conservative Party must be in a minority, and this machinery would be used by the Party of action in a manner even more arbitrary than it was now being used. It would be far better to add to the Resolution that it must be voted by a House of 200 or 300. It was not even necessary, according to this precedent, for the Resolution to be proposed by the Leader of the House. In his opinion, and speaking in no Party sense, the Government were establishing a precedent of a most inconvenient and dangerous character. He did not say that seven days were not sufficient to allow for the discussion of the remaining clauses of the Bill; but he should vote against the Resolution, on the ground that, from the manner of its introduction and the absence of safeguards in it, it formed a most dangerous precedent for the future conduct of the Business of the House. No Motion for Urgency ought ever to be proposed to the House without the clearest necessity. The Government consider that 15 days' debate in Committee on a Bill affecting the liberties of the whole Irish people are excessive and justify repression. But the Conservatives occupied 22 days in Committee in opposing the abolition of flogging in the Army in 1879. They occupied 39 days of 1880 in Committee on the Irish Land Bill, and yet they deem 15 days utterly intolerable when a nation struggles against coercive legislation which curtails the liberties of the people.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, it was a matter worthy of distinct notice that notwithstanding so weighty a speech as that which they had just heard from so weighty an authority as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), who had filled for years the distinguished Office of Chairman of Committees, no Member of the Government had risen to reply. The conduct of the Government in this matter was of a piece with their attitude for some weeks past. They sat in silence before them, using their mechanical majority from time to time to meet the arguments against the Bill. This Resolution was a consequence of the evil course which the House had adopted on previous occasions. From the day that the first Urgency Resolution was adopted the House was placed on an inclined plane, and its course had been uniformly downward. Whether they had yet reached the lowest point was a matter of opinion, though he did not think they had. Another point which would have struck anyone who considered the matter was that, startling as was the proposition, the Government had been absolutely unable to adduce a single precedent from the long history of Parliamentary procedure for the course they were now pursuing. The previous Resolutions of this kind had been passed under circumstances entirely different and with safeguards which this altogether lacked. There was no instance before of any such proposal as this for definitely bringing the discussion in Committee to a close at a certain fixed date. This proposal was entirely unprecedented in its character, and was entirely foreign and strange to the whole spirit and history of the House. It was a departure from the best traditions of the House, and it did appear that this "Mother of Parliaments," as it was fondly called, was likely to see a degradation far more serious than had yet been experienced by any legislative Assembly in the world. It was said that this proposal had become necessary because the advice and suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) and of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had not been followed. But he traversed the statement that such advice had not been followed. In a single night Clause 3 was passed in its entirety, and the fourth clause was passed after two sittings of the House, one of which was a short Wednesday sitting. The House already possessed abundant means of bringing irrelevant discussion to an end—the closure afforded an ample safeguard against undue prolixity of debate. What was the nature of the Bill to carry which this Motion had been brought in? It was not an ordinary Bill dealing with property rights or local interests—it was a Bill which affected the liberties of the subjects of one entire division of the United Kingdom, and if there was any Bill to discuss which the fullest possible liberty should be allowed to the Representatives of the people to be affected by it, it was this Bill, and yet it was in respect to a Bill of this important kind that the mouths of the people's Representatives were to be closed without any answer being given to their arguments. The Government seemed to drive the only vestige of protection left to minorities from its last resting place in the hands of the Chairman of Committees. Why not dispense with all the subsequent stages of a Bill after its introduction, and when read send it up immediately to the House of Lords? It would be a more honest policy than the present policy of the Government. The Government took the action to remove the difficulty in the way of getting the Bill through in the only one stage in which they had any difficulty to contend with—that was to the Committee stage—because the suggestion they made for putting the Question was not always successful, and because the First Lord of the Treasury found that his own position was becoming shaken and discredited, owing to the repeated rebuffs which the Chairman of Committees in the discharge of his duty and in his capacity of guardian of the rights of minorities, had found it necessary to administer when the right hon. Gentleman attempted to closure substantial Amendments. In the case of the alterations effected in Clause 1, it was idle to say that the discussions in Committee had been obstructive. The proposal of the Government would have the effect of making the remaining proceedings in Committee a hollow mockery, and he should have been glad if it had been resolved by the opponents of the Bill to take no further part in them. The Bill would, no doubt, be passed, but it would retain the stain of irregularity. Nemesis would come sooner or later, and those who now heedlessly, thoughtlessly, and truculently threw aside the principles and traditions of an illustrious Assembly like this, would inevitably rue the consequences of their own folly.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, he had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) with great pleasure, and he was surprised that no one had risen on the Treasury Bench to reply to it. The House had become accustomed to startling novel propositions made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) in his blandest manner; but no proposition during the Session was so startling as that made this evening. The justification for this extraordinary proposal was wrapped up in the word "obstruction," which had an effect on the Government similar to the red flag on the bull. The right hon. Gentleman could hardly have remembered the definition of that term accepted during the discussion of the Procedure Rules proposed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in 1882 or he would not have used the word as he had. That right hon. Gentleman defined "obstruction" as the attempt on the part of a small minority to resist the view of a Parliamentary majority otherwise than by argument. He expressly declared that reiterated pressure of argument was not obstruction. Tried by that standard the proceedings on the Crimes Bill could not fairly be described as obstruction. There was some little lack of historical knowledge in regard to proceedings in times gone by, and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was able to correct some errors into which the Leader of the House fell in referring to discussion on the Land Bill. Let each Member of the House consider the Bill as applicable to his own constituency, and he would take a different view from that held by the Government. Let him fancy, in his own constituency, this terrible engine for the suppression of free speech, the infringement of the freedom of the Press, the suppression of the right of meeting, and the suspension of liberty. Let him suppose this Bill at work suspending all rights of Constitutional agitation, and he would come to the view that Irish Members representing five-sixths of the country would have failed in their duty to their constituents if they had not offered the most strenuous opposition in their power to the passing of the measure. Considering, too, the mode in which the Bill was drafted, the manner in which it was conducted, the hours wasted through the Government failing to make concessions until the last moment after long discussion, the charge of obstruction could not fairly be applied. Hon. Members who absented themselves throughout the evening and returned at 11 o'clock or at midnight, and who failed thereby to grasp the point at issue, might consider the discussions wearisome; indeed, it was admitted that unless they followed the arguments closely the details of the Bill were wearisome; but a suspicion had gained strength in his mind that the dislike shown to a prolonged discussion had another cause, that the arguments against the Bill were more cogent than the Government were disposed to admit. He remembered that on one evening six Queen's Counsel rose one after the other and forcibly criticized a portion of the Bill, and he particularly noticed the growing sense of impatience after this fire of criticism. The Prime Minister spoke of remembering the time when a Coercion Bill introduced into the House in the morning passed at night. Possibly the Leader of the House looked back with envy on that time; but the time had happily gone by for ever when they could pass such measures with such rapidity through the House of Commons. He had said the proposition was of a startling nature, and, personally, he felt some sympathy for the right hon. Gentleman as he painfully struggled to find some precedent for his action. He fell into inaccuracies, and almost apologized for not having the details of his story more correctly. It was hardly necessary to cast about for a precedent. The Tory democracy was largely influenced by novelty. It was the very essence of its creed, which seemed saturated with a passion for novel proposals. What they had been debating that evening was but a new form of the 1st New Rule of Procedure. The Closure Rule had already become rusty and blunt in its operation, and more than once it had pierced the hand of him who tried to use it, and so it was thought necessary to forge a new weapon. He had a rooted aversion to the Closure Rule, and its operation had already abundantly justified the prognostications of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and was simply an inclined plane down which the House was rapidly slipping. The Leader of the House held the Motion necessary to uphold the honour and dignity of the House; but, with the honour and dignity of the House as much at heart as any on the other side, he maintained that the preservation of the dignity of the House rested upon respect for the traditions of the past and the right of freedom of speech in debate. In the year 1864 some striking words had been used in that House by a very eminent man, which he would venture to quote. Mr. Disraeli then said—

“What makes the House of Commons influential in contradistinction to the popular Assemblies of other countries is this—that when there is any great question of difficulty the country feels that we are solving it, not merely by the present thought and existing intelligence of the Members of the House, but that we come to its consideration fortified by precedent, and bringing to bear upon it the accumulated wisdom of the eminent men who have preceded us.”

The Leader of the House had upon this occasion been absolutely unable to find any precedent for the course he had adopted, and he agreed with the right hon. Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) that the most important aspect of this Motion was its relation to the procedure of the House of Commons. Nothing could be more dangerous in its effect on that Assembly than to deprive hon. Members of the opportunity of criticizing proposals made to them on the character and conduct of each other. If they smothered discussion, then they would drive all serious discussions to public platforms, and that would be very deplorable for this reason, that when Members were there face to face with each other, their language had a character of moderation which was not always found on public platforms. If discussion was driven to public platforms, they would have utterances of a very different kind. It was for this reason mainly, on account of its effect on the proceedings of that House, and its absolute defiance of all the traditions of that Assembly, that he should unhesitatingly record his vote against the proposition of the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said, as one who had taken a small part in opposing the Coercion Bill, he did not regret that the opportunity to continue that opposition had been removed in the way proposed by the First Lord of the Treasury, because it was not inappropriate that on a Bill intended to stifle the liberties of the Irish people, the Government should commence by stifling discussion in that House. The Government appeared to have come to the conclusion that they had made at least a tactical mistake in yielding to the Irish Members as they had done on the 1st clause, and were determined to ignore all Amendments on the subsequent clauses, and if that were so it was a great deal more creditable to them that they should carry the Bill in the manner provided by the Motion before the House rather than by continuing to meet the Amendments to it in an uncompromising spirit of unreasonable opposition. He had endeavoured to find a precedent for the action of the Government, and he believed he had found an historical precedent for it. One of the Kings of France, whose name he forgot, was exceedingly fond of entering into metaphysical discussions with his courtiers. The latter, however, soon found out that when the Monarch was worsted in an argument he took to kicking their shins, and he (Mr. Maurice Healy) could not compare the action of the Government on that Bill to anything more than the action of that Royal personage. The Government were unable to give any reply to the Amendments proposed, and accordingly they had discovered that device for stifling all legitimate discussion. With respect to the charge of obstruction, he would point out how absurd were the arguments of the Tories, who themselves in the case of the Land Act and also the Crimes Act, and the Rules of the Government, occupied more time in their opposition of those measures than the Irish Members had done in the case of a Bill which was to deprive the Irish people of their liberties, and which was, moreover, a Bill which was to continue for ever. He would challenge any fair and impartial man to take the 1st clause, as amended, in his hand and, comparing it with the clause as originally introduced, to say whether the attitude of the Irish Members had not been simply justified by the results which had been attained. The proposal of the Government amounted to a virtual impeachment of the Chairman of Committees, who had acted with impartiality. It was an appeal from knowledge to ignorance—it was an appeal from the Chairman of Committees to the unreasonable ferocity of hon. Members opposite. It was a most unfair and unworthy thing, when dealing with a small minority in that House who were fighting for what they considered the cause of their country in the face of great odds, that the Government should invent this exceptional proceeding to get rid of the sanction of the Chairman of Committees which they insisted on when they were devising a Rule which might be used against themselves.

MR. W. H. SMITH rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 284; Noes 167: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 214.)

Question put, "That the words 'at Ten o'clock p.m.' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 301; Noes 181: Majority 120.—(Div. List, No. 215.)

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am afraid I shall be compelled to ask the attention of the House for some time. Although I understand certain festivities are to take place to-morrow, I am sure that even Tory Members of the House and their Friends who sit upon this side of the House will admit that I am entitled to believe that the liberties of the Irish people, which we are sent here to defend, are in our eyes at least of more value than any proceedings which may take place at Portsmouth to-morrow. I intend to end by moving an Amendment to the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); but before I do so, I desire to make the frank admission that not only have the English people a right to be satisfied with the progress of Business in this House during the last four or five months, but that we also have a right to be satisfied with it. We have a right to be satisfied with it when we recollect the pledges and professions by which not only Gentlemen who sit opposite came into power, but by which some Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, and sailing under certain colours, obtained the confidence of the electors. It is patent to everyone that the electors would never have thought of reposing confidence in the so-called Liberal Unionists had they at the time of the Election advocated the policy they are now advocating. When the House met in January, a vast programme of reform was laid before it, and we know what has become of that programme. The promised reforms have melted away; and now the House is asked to express its regret that the crop of coercion has not ripened sufficiently fast to suit the allies of the First Lord of the Treasury, who, as long as he clings to power, are his masters, but who, when once he and his Party are driven from power, will become his abject slaves. I desire to refer for a very few moments to the delay which has occurred, and to the reasons which have led to that delay. There are several reasons for the delay. I do not intend to allude to the previous debates upon a Rule, which, after obtaining it by a waste of very nearly a month of the time of this House, is now declared by the First Lord of the Treasury to be practically unworkable; but, Sir, I desire to allude specifically to the length of the debates on the Crimes Bill for which the Government are now seeking to get Urgency. I may remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) that the precedents of other Coercion Bills cannot be fairly appealed to

Mr. Maurice Healy

on this occasion. This Coercion Bill has been marked by several distinguishing features—not only by its permanency, which is undoubted, but by the new crimes which it is proposed to create, and by the political character of the repression which it proposes to apply to the National League, a body which has kept the tenantry of Ireland from despair. This Coercion Bill is particularly distinguished from its predecessors by the fact that it is the product of a combination of Tories on the one hand and discredited and ruined men on the other. There is another cause which has led to the prolongation of the debates in Committee on this Bill, and it is this—that our arguments and appeals, no matter how reasonably and moderately made, have been usually addressed to empty Benches, and met by the Government with a persistent non possumus. I also wish to allude very shortly to a remarkable speech made a few days ago by the Earl of Derby, a gentleman who is no particular friend of ours. The House will recollect that in that speech the noble Lord said we are fighting for the liberties of our nation, and, therefore, he counselled that moderation on the part of the Government towards us which, I regret, they do not now seem disposed to exercise. What is our position? We are resisting the permanent degradation of Ireland. This is not a Bill which is to remain law for 18 months or two years, but it is a Bill which will permanently destroy our rights and liberties. We conceive we have, therefore, great right to discussion—that freedom of debate should be more carefully preserved to us than if this were a mere temporary measure. Under certain clauses of the Bill almost despotic power is to be vested in the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or his deputy the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Under this Bill power is to be granted to these Gentlemen to declare any person who stands on a platform and defends the cause of his constituents, to be a criminal, and to send him not only before two Resident Magistrates, but also to make him subject to the infamous Whiteboy Code of Acts, which has been nominally dropped, but which, under the 7th clause of this Bill, will undoubtedly be brought into operation. This Bill destroys the right of public meeting, and it is aimed at the destruction of combinations on the part of the tenants to defend their property and their miserable huts and cabins. Under such circumstances it seems to be our duty to protest against the high-handed course the House is now asked to adopt. Now I ask what remedy does the Government propose for this loss of time they seem so seriously to regret. They propose by this Motion to give us four and a-half days to debate the remaining clauses of the Bill. They propose to do this under a Rule which entitles the Member in charge of the Bill to move to report Progress at any hour he likes, and which does not bind that Member to bring on the Bill for discussion until Friday next, if it so pleases him. We have not got absolutely the right to four and a-half days' discussion, but to such portion of that time as the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill may choose to give us. May I also point out that in addition this Motion, if carried, would deprive us of the protection of the Chair, a protection which was forced upon us by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury himself not very long ago. Let me draw the attention of the House to the fact that when the right hon. Gentleman insisted that the Chair should exercise its right of veto, he made that very fact an argument for obtaining closure by a bare majority, an enactment which he would never have succeeded in getting except for the veto of the Chair. I desire to glance very briefly at the conduct of the Gentlemen who now propose extreme measures, when they were defending what they considered to be an invasion of class privileges. This Bill has been under discussion in Committee for 15 days, 66 Divisions have been taken on Amendments, and Amendment after Amendment has been dropped without Division in order that the Party which is now in power should not be able to go to the country saying we have obstructed the passing of the measure. Fourteen times has the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury moved the closure, and on many occasions the closure was moved by him when we were quite ready to take a Division on the Main Question. Sir, I have calculated that, removing from the time occupied in Committee the time occupied in Divisions, we have had about 85 hours' discussion in Committee on this Bill. We have passed four very long and momentous clauses. What was the position of the Tory Party when they were in Opposition in 1882? On 72 lines of Rules and Procedure they occupied 30 days, and took 56 Divisions. On the matter of the Procedure of this House, a matter which it is always in the power of this House by a single Motion to alter, they thought it their duty to waste 30 days of the time of the House, and to take 56 Divisions. Now I ask Gentlemen on the other side of the House, before they vote for the passing of this Rule in its present form, to recollect what questions we have to discuss. Let me mention some of the more important ones. In the first place, it is proposed that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should have power to proclaim counties by the advice of the Irish Privy Council, the Irish Privy Council being a body, the extent of whose powers we ought to object to in the strongest possible manner. In the four and a-half days to be given up to us, we shall have to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this power of proclaiming counties may be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for whatever purpose he likes. We shall have to draw the attention of the Committee to the suppression of public meetings which, under the 6th and 7th clauses of the Bill, it will be in the power of the Chief Secretary to insure; we shall have to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the whole code of White-boy Acts as to public meetings and the suppression of combinations will be imported by the 7th clause into this Bill, and that the suggestion that these powers shall be subjected to the control of Parliament is the merest farce. Now, there are other clauses in the Bill equally important. I find further on in this Bill that it will deprive the Irish people of the right of bearing arms, and that it will provide for search warrants directed against whole localities. The method of constructing special juries will require the greatest and keenest discussion, having regard to the fact that you have already taken power to try Nationalists by special juries after change of venue. Furthermore, I may draw attention to the period and method of punishment prescribed by the Bill.

Mr. Chance

In the small space of time allotted to us we shall have to discuss the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Carnarvon District (Mr. Swetenham), whose idea of political liberty is to be discovered by his Amendment, which prescribes that the Judge shall be entitled to award 150 strokes with a cat-o'-nine-tails to anyone convicted under the Act. Then I see that Members of the Party opposite have Amendments dealing with the constitution of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, which Amendments, I presume, will receive somewhat greater consideration than any Amendments we could propose. There are powers given to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to make rules as to the witnesses and prisoners' expenses, to make rules as to the whole course of procedure, rules which may bear most oppressively upon prisoners, and upon those who have to differ politically with the administration of the Act. Now, Sir, I do not desire to weary the House by any further observations; I think it is perfectly clear to any person in this House of independent mind that these questions could not possibly receive even a shade of discussion in the few hours—32 hours at most—which are to be awarded to us under this Motion. If Parliament is to degrade itself for the purpose of degrading the Irish people, let us at least have some time to consider the matter. I warn the First Lord of the Treasury and his Colleagues that a Bill passed by the discreditable methods now proposed cannot possibly obtain the slightest respect from any free or independent people, and I therefore propose to leave out "the 17th day of June" for the purpose of inserting "the 24th day of June," in order that we should have at least seven or eight Parliamentary days to deal with these matters of high importance, not only to us, but to the credit of Parliament, whose credit for fair play is at stake.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "17th" and insert "24th." — (Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That '17th' stand part of the Question."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the observations which have fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chance), and which have been founded principally upon the contention that the five days which will elapse between this and the 17th June are insufficient for the discussion of the remaining clauses of this Bill. That, Sir, was not the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), who, with the great experience he brings to bear upon discussions in this House, thinks that five days are sufficient for the discussion of this Bill. And I am within the recollection of the House when I say that the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) expressed a view which was very similar in character although not precisely the same as that of the right hon. Gentleman. There are undoubtedly two or three questions of considerable importance to be considered by the Committee when it returns on Monday to the consideration of the Bill; but there must be a limit to the period which can be given to the consideration of these questions, however important, and having regard to the fact that these questions have been debated on the first reading of the Bill, on the second reading, and on the Motion, that you, Sir, do leave the Chair—having regard to the fact that the whole matter within the Bill has been debated over and over again, it does not seem to me that the Government are seeking too much from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway when they seek to put a limit to the discussion on these questions of five days more, especially when there must be another stage on which discussion can be taken; the stage of Report when you, Sir, will be in the Chair. I am lothe to appear to insist too strongly upon the Resolution I have submitted to the House, but after having given the fullest possible consideration to the question, after having weighed the importance of all questions which can be submitted to the House, I have come to the conclusion, with the assistance of those who are able to give an opinion on the subject, that five full days are at least ample for the consideration of any questions which can be raised upon the remaining clauses. Under these circumstances, I must oppose the Amendment which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chance) has proposed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I must say the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury does himself great injustice in not making longer speeches in the House. He always imports very great sincerity into everything he says; indeed, I feel persuaded that the right hon. Gentleman brings full conviction to bear upon any remarks he has to make. But, Sir, allow me to say that I do think the right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in the position he assumes when he says that five full days are sufficient for the consideration of the remaining clauses of this Bill. Why are not five minutes sufficient? If her Majesty's Government take up the position that an end can be put to debate, why give us five days? They mean to accept no Amendment, and therefore, why not put the closure on at once? Why five days? That is the absurdity of their position. Why do not they take the advice of the gentlemen who write for The Times? These gentlemen have no conscience—why not take their advice? You appear to imagine that there is a sacramental period at which you can say everything is fully discussed. If you are infallible surely your infallibility might just as well prompt you to allow only two days or two minutes for the remaining clauses, as four days. Why not, like Desdemona, when she was pressing for a particular office for a gentleman with whom we are all acquainted, say on Wednesday? Once you assume that a particular time can be fixed for the conclusion of the discussion of any Bill, you forsake all the principles of debate. Now, let me point out how altogether hollow are the arguments in support of the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman. What is to prevent the gentlemen who write letters to The Times taking up the entire time to be allotted to us? Will the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) give us a written assurance that no one will speak on his side of the House? Is it not possible that Liberal Unionists will talk for the whole five days and not allow us to get a single word in? You seem to suppose a kind of truce of God; that we should assume hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House will be absolutely bound over to keep the peace during the next five days, and that we shall be allowed to romp round ourselves and absolutely exclude all Parliamentary discussion, so far as the Government supporters are concerned. If the Motion of the Government is adopted, effective debate will disappear, because the great Tory Party and the greater Liberal Unionist Party will be compelled to absolute silence. I do hope the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Courtney) will take note of the position taken up by Her Majesty's Government, and that during the next five days he will not allow one word to be uttered by any Gentleman who sits upon the Government side of the House or upon the Liberal Unionist Benches. It is to be understood, as I understand it, that the next five days are to be thought a sacred period of time, which we are to have for our own consumption. It is a healthy position to be taken up in the first Assembly of Gentlemen in Europe, the great Temple of Liberty that we hear so much about, that the whole Government Party is to be excused from debate, and the discussion left to Irish rapperees. A healthy position for the English Government to assume in the latter part of the 19th century! I do hope we shall live to see the time when, as my hon Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) pungently pointed out, a Government in Office will measure out, like so many yards of tape, the opposition of some future Party to Church Disestablishment, or some other portion of the unauthorized programme, when, perhaps, those who have started that agenda—that is the mildest term I can use—will be denounced by those who are now preventing liberty of discussion. It seems to me Her Majesty's Government are taking up a very ill-advised course. I am very glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) in his place. He was the man of all others who denounced the closure, and who only assented to it because he said he felt full confidence the veto of the Chair would be exercised to protect minorities. Now you have the first step in taking away the veto. This Motion really amounts to a Want of Confidence in the Chair. You will not allow our Amendments to be proposed with anything like adequate discussion. You take away the veto of the present Chairman of Committees, a Gentleman whom we regard with the utmost admiration. Although at times I have had occasion to differ from him, on the whole, I consider his conduct has been extremely fair towards us, considering we are a struggling Party. If you now admit that you can measure out like so many yards of tape the time of this House, when you come to some question of disestablishment, you may find a partizan Chairman in the Chair, and that the whole British liberties are at an end. You may have the English Land Question, the English Church Question, the Graduated Income Tax Question decided by this application of the closure. You think yourselves safe in the protection of the House of Lords; but it is just possible that at some future time you may not have a House of Lords to protect you. I ask the House to say that it is, on the whole, better that the criminal Irish—the assassins, cattle houghers, and scoundrels of Ireland—should have an additional 10 days' debate upon this Bill, rather than the fair fame of England should be tarnished by the restriction of debate. If you had not proposed this closure, if the feelings of hon. Members had not been irritated, if you had not held the sword of Damocles over our heads, as it were, it is possible that discussions in Committee might have been finished on Friday next. If we are to have the closure on Friday next, what will happen? Members will know they have until Friday, and some will insist upon considering at length one Amendment and others insist upon considering at length another Amendment. For the sake of shooting grouse on the 12th of August you will abridge the liberties of Irish Members. Is that a desirable thing? You can shoot grouse on the 19th of August, and they might be stronger on the wing by the 19th. For the sake of separating on a given day it is proposed to do a thing which will be remembered for all time. I must say that for a great and powerful nation like the English it is not worth while splitting straws with the Representatives of Ireland upon a question of this kind. I have often thought that even if with the Parliamentary Under Secretary (Colonel King-Harman) you consider the Irish Members the scum of the swill tub of Ireland, it would be much wiser of you to adopt a more generous attitude towards the Irish Representatives. You cannot expect, when you mete out time to us in so rigid a manner, but that those who think they have been unjustly treated will kick against the goad. There are in this Bill matters of the greatest importance. I would ask the attention of the First Lord of the Treasury to this. For my part, I have no longer any care to talk about Amendments to this Bill, and if others are of the same way of thinking we might say to the Government—"If you have thoroughly made up your minds not to accept any Amendments from this side of the House, however reasonable they may be, let us know it at once—save us the pains and trouble of moving Amendments next week. Publish a programme as to what you are going to allow us." Here we have in this Bill a large number of the most important questions yet to consider, and yet they ask us to say, or to agree to the proposition, that a week is sufficient to dispose of these matters. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—if I may be allowed to say so—has been misled in this matter to a large extent by the Irish Office. I blame Lord Ashbourne, to a large extent, for the mischiefs that have arisen in this Bill. The Government in this House are misled by Lord Ashbourne and the Irish landlords. I see the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) laughing. When I refer to Lord Ashbourne I, of course, refer to the whole Irish landlord gang. Many Members of the Tory Party, I believe, were anxious to conciliate Ireland—I do not refer to the First Lord of the Admiralty, who, no doubt, enjoys his little position, such as it is, and will continue to do so as long as he has it; but I do not believe that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Ritchie), and men of their description, were anxious for this Bill. I believe that a number of the English Tory Party were anxious to have a fresh deal, but the Irish Office were too many for them. I say that the Irish landlords, knowing that they had the Unionists at their back, crammed into this Bill every vile form of coercion they could think of or that they could find in the pigeon-holes of Dublin Castle which may have been lying there for years. I say it is they who are responsible for obstruction and for the wasting of the time of this House. I say that it is the Irish landlord party who are responsible—and one of the principal amongst them is the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), for he is an Irish landlord, or, at any rate, he very soon will be. These are the persons who try and delude the English people about the "glory of the Empire," the "maintenance of the Union," "law and order," and stuff and nonsense of that kind. They talk about these things with their tongues in their cheeks—

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Member, but I must point out to him that he is wandering from the subject before the House, which is, whether the date at which the Committee stage shall cease shall be the 17th or 24th instant.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I fully recognize, Mr. Speaker, that you have given me great latitude, and that I was, perhaps, wandering. I would only say, in finishing my remarks, recognizing the justice of your correction, that everybody who lives in Ireland well knows that there is no justification whatever for this Bill and for asking us to spend even another week in discussing the provisions of this Bill. The Government already have obtained all the powers they can possibly want. They have secured the secret inquisition; they have secured the summary jurisdiction; they have secured the special jury and the change of venue. Surely that is enough for them. Is it reasonable to ask us to continue these discussions? Let it come to an end. Speaking as one who spends his time in Ireland, whose fortunes are bound up with those of the poorest of his countrymen—for that is the class to which I belong—I declare it to be a monstrous libel on the Irish peasantry, on the part of the landlord class, to say that they are a bloodthirsty race. They are nothing of the kind. They are as kindly and well-intentioned a race as there is on earth. To say that they are cruel and bloodthirsty is an atrocious libel, and it is for that reason, to a great extent, that we have resisted this Bill in the spirit in which we have resisted it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 268; Noes 113: Majority 115.—(Div. List, No. 216.)

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Here rose—

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am very sorry, Sir, to intervene; but as I understand that the Amendment about to be proposed is not material, I hope the hon. Member will not persist in it, but will allow the Question to be now put. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I call upon the hon. Member to move his Amendment.

MR. W. REDMOND: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of proposing an Amendment to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. I am bound to say I think it would have been a great deal more courteous on the part of the right hon. Gentleman if he had waited to hear what I was going to propose before rising to make his suggestion. It appears that the practice of closure has now arrived at such a point of perfection that it is not even necessary to hear what is to be said for a proposal before closing the debate upon it. I think the right hon. Gentleman might, at least, have listened to what I was going to propose. The Amendment I propose is in line 3 of the Resolution—that the word “shall” be omitted, in order to insert in its place the words “may, if he thinks fit, having regard to the Rule of Clôture of the 18th of March, 1887.” The Resolution, as it stands at the present time, makes it obligatory on the Chairman to put the Question when a Motion to that effect is made. At present under the Rule of Clôture which I propose in my Amendment shall be observed when a Motion is made “That the Question be now put” it is left to the discretion of the Chairman to say whether, in his opinion, it is proper and advisable that the Question be put. According to the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury the Chair has no option at all, but is bound to put the Question when it is proposed from the Treasury Bench. I think, Sir, that it would tend a great deal more to the proper and swift conduct of debate in this House if the closing of debate were left, as at present, to the Chair. There is nothing, to my mind, more clear than that the occupants of the Treasury Bench are, at certain times, goaded on by the cheers and the cries of their followers into moving, without due reason, that the Question be put. In that way many debates have been, and a great many debates may be, closed in an unsatisfactory manner, before the subjects have been at all exhausted. I cannot understand the new-born suspicion and distrust which this Resolution appears to show has suddenly sprung up in the mind of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the discretionary exercise of the vetoing powers of the Chair. I think that the public outside will come to the conclusion that this summary dismissal of the right of the Chairman to say when a debate shall be closed will be traced to the fact that, in the course of the discussion upon the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, the Chairman of Committees considered it his duty on several occasions to refuse the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to close the debate. It certainly is a remarkable fact that when, in March last, the Rules of Clôture were introduced, hon. Gentlemen opposite strongly supported giving to the Chair the right of giving or withholding sanction to the closing of debate, and that we find that the very Gentlemen who supported the proposal to give to the Chairman the right of vetoing closure of debate are now, in a most sudden and summary manner, without any apparent reason, going to deprive the Chair of that right. I do not think the First Lord of the Treasury has any right at all to come down and suddenly, without any Notice, ask us to withdraw that power which in March last he gave to the Chairman of Committees and to yourself. I do not see, Sir, how it can possibly tend towards a more satisfactory conduct of the Business of this House that, instead of allowing the Chairman to exercise his discretion in the closing of debate, that the power should be now vested, for the first time in the history of this House, in a bare majority of the Members of the House. I do not think that it will be denied that there are occasions when, upon both sides of the House, Party feeling and excitement runs high, and I have no doubt that if this Resolution is adopted in its entirety, and my Amendment is not accepted, that the result will be that occasions will arise when, in moments of great excitement, Her Majesty's Government will be prompted and goaded on by their followers unduly to propose the closing of an important debate, and that after that has happened, in cooler moments, when it becomes apparent that the closing of debate is unjustifiable and unwarrantable, and that the matter under discussion was not fully gone into, both the Government and Members of the House, as well as the general public outside, will be very sorry indeed that they sanctioned this Resolution taking away from the Chair the right of deciding whether the discussion has gone far enough, and vesting that right in a majority of the Members of this House. I do not think, Sir, that it is necessary to say anything more on the subject; but I may say this, in conclusion, that to my mind hon. Members who vote against my Amendment to leave still in the hands of the Chair the right of deciding when a discussion shall be closed will be, to all intents and purposes, giving expression to an amount of distrust in the discretion of the Chair which is altogether unwarrantable. All that we ask is that in moments of excitement the decision as to the closing of a debate shall rest in the discretion of the Chair instead of a crude majority of the House. That is a most reasonable proposal, and is not one which should have been met on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury by a proposal to clôture it before it was supported by argument. I think it is a reasonable and fair subject for discussion whether the closure of debate should be left to a bare majority, or whether it should be left, as it is now, to the discretion of the Chair? I sincerely hope that hon. Members will not vote against this very fair proposal.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, to leave out the word "shall," and insert the words "may, if he thinks fit, having regard to the Rule of Closure of the 18th March, 1887."—(Mr. William Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'shall' stand part of the Question"

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, and, in saying so, I am sure the House will understand that I do not in the slightest degree express any want of confidence in, or any disrespect towards, the Chairman of Committees. I have no doubt whatever, in my own mind, that the great majority of the House are fully aware that that is a statement which has been fully borne out, and that the Chairman himself will be prepared to endorse it. This Resolution is not based upon any precedent, and it would be altogether inconsistent with the object we have in view to accept the proposed Amendment. We are obliged to adhere to the precise form of the Resolution.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I think it will to some extent tend to shorten the proceedings if I state to the House that the Amendment I handed in, which bears some resemblance to that now before the House. I shall forego, offering whatever remarks I may have to make upon this Amendment. The Amendment I had to propose dealt with the Rules of the House and with the rights of minorities. The present Amendment, however, will afford me an opportunity of expressing my views as to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. The Amendment of the hon. Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. William Redmond) is designed with a view of preserving to the Chair that power which the former Rules of this House placed in the hands of the Chair. We have heard it stated in the course of the discussion on previous Amendments how when, in former times, previous Governments thought it necessary to take out of the hands of the House the right of unlimited discussion which it had enjoyed up to that time—we have heard it stated how those Governments acted. I will not weary the House by repeating the statements of right hon. Gentlemen who now occupy the front Government Bench, when a few short weeks ago in proposing the new Rules of Procedure, they expressed their desire to preserve the Rules of the House and the rights of minorities. Now, Sir, according to the Rules existing up to the present moment, it is necessary to declare Urgency for any particular proposal before actually closing the debate. That Rule was embodied in the Resolution that was passed in February, 1881, and which stated in placing the power in the hands of the Chair that—

"The powers of the House for the regulation of its Business upon the several stages of Bills, and upon Motions and other matters shall be and remain with the Speaker, until the Speaker shall declare that the state of Public Business is no longer urgent, or until the House shall so determine upon a Motion which, after Notice given, may be made by any Member put without Amendment, Adjournment or Debate, and decided by a majority."

Such was the respect in which the Rules of this House were held, and such the respect for the liberty of speech enjoyed by Members of this House on the part of former Ministers, that they found it necessary to protect it by a special provision in the Resolution, which up to the present time has governed the debates of this House. But not only did former Ministers take good care to place the protection of liberty of speech in your hands, Sir, but they also provided that before the House should surrender its right and liberty a majority of three-fourths of the Members should be in favour of it. Now, however, we have a proposal before us which abolishes all that. Now, liberty of speech is to be abandoned by a bare majority of this House, without the protection of the Chair and without that protection that would be afforded by making it necessary that the abandonment should have the support of a majority of three-fourths of the House. Thus I find that the last vestige of protection for hon. Members in this House and for their right of liberty of speech, and the last vestige of the protection of minorities in the exercise of their liberty, will be swept away by this drastic Resolution or Rule of Procedure, moved by the First Lord of the Treasury. Now, the first time this Rule was proposed in 1881, the House had before it a state of things that does not exist at the present time. At that time there was real, downright obstruction. There was obstruction not only to one single measure such as may exist at the present time to a very limited extent, if at all, but at that time there was obstruction to every measure proposed by the Government—active obstruction by a small and efficient Party in this House. Nevertheless, so much did this former Government respect liberty of speech, that they protected it by this special Rule, and the necessity for this large majority. I will read what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) when he asked the House of Commons to pass the Resolution, a portion of which I have just read. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"What is the meaning of the language that we hear about the liberties of speech? The liberties of speech! Liberty as to the quality of speech—Yes! Let none endeavour—unless under necessity, which we have never had, and are not likely to have, the faintest glimmer—let none endeavour to narrow the liberal bounds that surround us in that respect. And as to quantity of speech, it must be regulated, not by the fancies of men, but by the necessities of the case, and in accordance with the discharge of the duties which we are sent here to discharge."—(3 Hansard, [258] 91.)

Such was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian when he found it necessary to propose that Resolution, or Rule of Procedure, which has governed the discussions of this House from that day to this. How about the minorities in this House? They have always, up to the present time, looked to the Chair for protection; but, for the first time in the history of this Institution, they will now find themselves unprotected by any Rule of this House—unprotected by the wisdom of the Chair, and unprotected by that confidence which minorities in this House have always reposed in the Chair. I contend that Her Majesty's Government, in their present proposition, not only do not remain still, but that they are actually performing an act of retrogression by abandoning those rights and liberties and privileges which, up to the present, minorities have enjoyed in this House. I will ask Her Majesty's Government just to hear what was said at the time of which I speak—when this former Resolution was passed—by an hon. Member of this House, one who has since passed away—namely, the late Earl of Iddeleigh, then Sir Stafford Northcote. He, at that time, took great interest in the Rules that were then proposed, and his opinion was very crucially expressed as to the right of liberty of speech and as to the privileges of the minority. He said—

"We must be prepared, if we are to give expression to the opinions of all classes in this country—if we are to be a Representative Body of all classes of the country and the great bulk of the nation, and of those classes who are not directly represented here, but are indirectly represented, and who look to us to plead for their interests—I say we must be prepared to insist, and should not be doing our duty if we did not insist, on retaining those things more than mere forms, which are the substance of the dignity and honour of Parliament, and which really give life and vigour to our proceedings."

Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary)

Further on, he said—

"I do feel it most important not to adopt any measure or any Rules which would place the Party for the time being in a minority at the mercy, not of the Whole House, but of the Party of the majority."—(3 Hansard, [258] 105.)

Now, Sir, that is exactly what is sought by the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. It will not only place minorities at the mercy of the Whole House, but it will place them at the mercy of the majority of any Party. Sir, I say that this is a most unprecedented and tyrannical proposition. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury stated truly in what light we would consider this proposition. He stated that, no doubt, it would be called tyrannical and oppressive. Tyrannical and oppressive it is to the last degree. In proposing this extreme Motion, the First Lord of the Treasury said he did so in accordance with public opinion. Yes, Sir; it is in accordance with manufactured public opinion—public opinion manufactured by speeches outside from Members of Her Majesty's Government, public opinion manufactured by newspapers in the interests of Her Majesty's Government. These newspapers do not scruple at misrepresentation; but they hold up the action of certain Members of this House as calculated to obstruct the Business of the nation when, in reality, those Members are only pleading in the cause of the liberties of their own country. We have been accused by the First Lord of the Treasury of paralyzing Parliament. I deny that emphatically. Take the history of the discussion upon the 1st clause of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. What was the effect of the discussion upon that clause? Why the clause swelled from a clause of comparatively few lines into a very large and comprehensive clause. I maintain, Sir, that the discussions upon the Coercion Bill cannot by any stretch of imagination be stigmatized as obstructive discussions. The idea only exists in the fancy of the Government. But even if the discussions have been to a certain extent obstructive, there is every reason why they should be so. Why should we be anxious to pass into law rapidly a Bill which strikes at the liberties of our people? Why, at the risk of being considered obstructive, I would—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not dealing with the specific Amendment before the House, but with the whole subject of the closure.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I was under the impression that the Amendment which my hon. Friend the Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond) moved dealt with the removal from the Chair of the power of regulating the discussions.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman's Amendment is to restore to the Chairman the discretion which is taken away by the Resolution.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I was referring to the Rule which has governed the House up to the present time and was endeavouring to draw a contrast between the effect of the proposed Rule as compared with the Rule which has governed the discussions of the House and the Committee of the House up to the present time. However, Sir, I shall not proceed further in that line. I can only express my regret that the First Lord of the Treasury found it necessary to introduce this Rule at all, and I also desire to express my regret that he should so far—I hope it will not be too strong a term to use—misrepresented the action of those Members on this side of the House who have endeavoured to amend the Crimes Bill, as to call their proceedings obstructive. I must also express my regret that the First Lord of the Treasury should have appealed to this, a free Parliament—should have appealed to a free people in the name of liberty to press the Rule he has now proposed. The right hon. Gentleman was not above using the sacred name of Liberty when he failed by fact or argument to establish a case for the passing of the Rule; he appealed to this House to pass the Rule in the name of Liberty. It is not the first time the name of Liberty has been appealed to in the cause of oppression, and this Rule is for the purpose—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is scarcely discussing the Amendment.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I think I am justified in claiming to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 258; Noes 91: Majority 167.—(Div. List, No. 217.)
[1.10 A.M.]

Question put, "That the word 'shall' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 255; Noes 94: Majority 161.—(Div. List, No. 218.)
[1.25 A.M.]

MR. W. H. SMITH: I now claim to move, "That the Main Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Main Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 250; Noes 91: Majority 159.—(Div. List, No. 219.)
[1.40 A.M.]

Main Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 245; Noes 93: Majority 152.—(Div. List, No. 220.)
[1.55 A.M.]

AYES.

Addison, J. E. W.
Ainalie, W. G.
Allsopp, hon. G.
Allsopp, hon. P.
Ambrose, W.
Amherst, W. A. T.
Anstruther, Colonel R. H. L.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.
Bailey, Sir J. R.
Baird, J. G. A.
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.
Balfour, G. W.
Baring, Viscount
Barry, A. H. Smith-
Bartley, G. C. T.
Bates, Sir E.
Baumann, A. A.
Beach, W. W. B.
Beadel, W. J.
Beaumont, H. F.
Beckett, E. W.
Bentinck, Lord H. C.
Bentinck, W. G. C.
Beresford, Lord C. W.
De la Poer
Bethell, Commander G. R.
Bigwood, J.
Birkbeck, Sir E.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H.
Bond, G. H.
Bonser, H. C. O.
Borthwick, Sir A.
Bridgeman, Col. hon. F. C.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.
Brookfield, A. M.
Brooks, Sir W. C.
Bruce, Lord H.
Burghlev, Lord
Caine, W. S.
Caldwell, J.
Campbell, R. F. F.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.
Chaplin, right hon. H.
Charrington, S.
Clarke, Sir E. G.
Coghill, D. H.
Commerell, Adml. Sir J. E.
Compton, F.
Cooke, C. W. R.
Corbett, A. C.
Corry, Sir J. P.
Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Cranborne, Viscount
Cross, H. S.
Crossley, Sir S. B.
Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Curzon, Viscount
Curzon, hon. G. N.
Dalrymple, C.
Davenport, H. T.
De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
De Worms, Baron H.
Dimsdale, Baron R.
Dixon-Hartland, F. D.
Dugdale, J. S.
Duncan, Colonel F.
Duncombe, A.
Dyke, right hon. Sir W. H.
Eaton, H. W.
Ebrington, Viscount
Edwards-Moss, T. C.
Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Elcho, Lord
Elliot, Sir G.
Elliot, hon. H. F. H.

Elliot, G. W.
Ellis, Sir J. W.
Elton, C. I.
Evelyn, W. J.
Ewing, Sir A. O.
Farquharson, H. R.
Feilden, Lieut.-Gen. R. J.
Fergusson, right hon. Sir J.
Finch, G. H.
Fisher, W. H.
Fitzwilliam, hon. W. J. W.
Fitz-Wygram, General Sir F. W.
Fletcher, Sir H.
Folkestone, right hon. Viscount
Forwood, A. B.
Fowler, Sir R. N.
Fraser, General C. C.
Fry, L.
Gathorne-Hardy, hon. A. E.
Gedge, S.
Gent-Davis, R.
Gibson, J. G.
Gilliat, J. S.
Godson, A. F.
Goldsmid, Sir J.
Goldsworthy, Major-General W. T.
Gorst, Sir J. E.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gray, C. W.
Green, Sir E.
Grimston, Viscount
Grove, Sir T. F.
Gunter, Colonel R.
Hall, A. W.
Halsey, T. F.
Hambro, Col. C. J. T.
Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Hamilton, Col. C. E.
Hamley, Gen. Sir E. B.
Hardcastle, F.
Hartington, Marq. of Hastings, G. W.
Heath, A. R.
Heathcote, Capt. J. H. Edwards-
Heaton, J. H.
Herbert, hon. S.
Hermon-Hodge, R. T.
Hervey, Lord F.
Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
Hill, Colonel E. S.
Hoare, S.
Hobhouse, H.
Holland, rt. hon. Sir H. T.
Holloway, G.
Holmes, rt. hon. H.
Hornby, W. H.
Houldsworth, W. H.
Howard, J.
Hozier, J. H. C.
Hubbard, E.
Hulse, E. H.
Hunt, F. S.
Isaacson, F. W.
Jackson, W. L.
Jarvis, A. W.
Kelly, J. R.
Kennaway, Sir J. H.
Kenyon, hon. G. T.
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. W.
Kerans, F. H.
Kimber, H.
King, H. S.
King-Harman, right hon. Colonel E. R.
Knowles, L.
Kynoch, G.
Lafone, A.
Lambert, C.
Lawrance, J. C.
Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
Lawrence, W. F.
Lees, E.
Leighton, S.
Lethbridge, Sir R.
Lewisham, right hon. Viscount
Long, W. H.
Low, M.
Lowther, hon. W.
Macartney, W. G. E.
Maclean, J. M.
MacLure, J. W.
Malcolm, Col. J. W.
Mallock, R.
March, Earl of
Marriott, right hon. W. T.
Matthews, rt. hon. H.
Maxwell, Sir H. E.
Mayne, Admiral R. C.
Mildmay, F. B.
Mills, hon. C. W.
Milvain, T.
Morgan, hon. F.
Morrison, W.
Mount, W. G.
Mowbray, R. G. C.
Mulholland, H. L.
Muntz, P. A.
Murdoch, C. T.
Newark, Viscount
Noble, W.
Norris, E. S.
Northcote, hon. H. S.
Norton, R.
O'Neill, hon. R. T.
Parker, hon. F.
Pearce, W.
Pelly, Sir L.
Plunkett, right hon. D. R.
Plunkett, hon. J. W.
Powell, F. S.
Price, Captain G. E.
Puleston, J. H.
Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
Rankin, J.
Rasch, Major F. C.
Reed, H. B.
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
Robinson, B.
Rollit, Sir A. K.

Round, J.
 Royden, T. B.
 Russell, Sir G.
 Russell, T. W.
 St. Aubyn, Sir J.
 Sellar, A. C.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sinclair, W. P.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Stewart, M.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Tapling, T. K.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Thorburn, W.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Townsend, F.
 Tyler, Sir H. W.

Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Webster, R. G.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Wilson, Sir S.
 Winn, hon. R.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Wroughton, P.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)
 Acland, C. T. D.
 Allison, R. A.
 Blane, A.
 Bright, Jacob
 Broadhurst, H.
 Burt, T.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Campbell, H.
 Carew, J. L.
 Chance, P. A.
 Channing, F. A.
 Clancy, J. J.
 Clark, Dr. G. B.
 Cobb, H. P.
 Commins, A.
 Connolly, L.
 Conway, M.
 Conybeare, C. A. V.
 Cossham, H.
 Crilly, D.
 Deasy, J.
 Dillon, J.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Ellis, T. E.
 Esmonde, Sir T. H. G.
 Fenwick, C.
 Finucane, J.
 Foley, P. J.
 Fox, Dr. J. F.
 Gill, T. P.
 Gray, E. D.
 Grey, Sir E.
 Harrington, E.
 Harrington, T. C.
 Hayden, L. P.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Healy, M.
 Healy, T. M.
 Hooper, J.
 Kennedy, E. J.
 Kenny, J. E.
 Kenny, M. J.
 Lawson, Sir W.
 Lawson, H. L. W.
 Lewis, T. P.
 Macdonald, W. A.
 MacNeill, J. G. S.

M'Cartan, M.
 M'Carthy, J.
 M'Carthy, J. H.
 M'Donald, P.
 M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
 M'Lagan, P.
 Mayne, T.
 Nolan, Colonel J. P.
 Nolan, J.
 O'Brien, J. F. X.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Brien, P. J.
 O'Connor, A.
 O'Connor, J. (Kerry)
 O'Connor, J. (Tipperary)
 O'Connor, T. P.
 O'Doherty, J. E.
 O'Hanlon, T.
 O'Kelly, J.
 Pease, A. E.
 Pickersgill, E. H.
 Pinkerton, J.
 Powell, W. R. H.
 Power, P. J.
 Power, R.
 Pyne, J. D.
 Quinn, T.
 Redmond, W. H. K.
 Reynolds, W. J.
 Roberts, J. B.
 Rowlands, J.
 Rowntree, J.
 Schwann, C. E.
 Sexton, T.
 Sheehan, J. D.
 Stack, J.
 Stuart, J.
 Sullivan, D.
 Sullivan, T. D.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Tuite, J.
 Will, J. S.
 Williams, A. J.
 Williamson, J.
 Wilson, H. J.

TELLERS.

Biggar, J. G.
 Sheil, E.

Ordered, That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the Whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as herein-after provided. After the Clauses are disposed of, he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House.

From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed, unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith.

If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move that the Bill be set down for to-morrow (Saturday). I think that as we are to have the Bill reported next Friday, the very least we can ask is that the Bill should be taken to-day. It would be too much to go on with the Bill now—the officers of the House deserve some consideration at our hands—but it would be reasonable to consider the measure again to-day. Seeing that Saturday is an off-day, I do not think anybody will grudge the Irish Members the opportunity of considering the Bill to-day. Even the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) will not grudge the Irish Members a Saturday Sitting for the discussion of this Bill. I, therefore, trust the Government will see their way to consent to a Sitting to-day. There is, perhaps, one obstacle in the way, but I do not think the House will regard it as insurmountable, and that is the Naval Review at Portsmouth. The Irish Members are quite willing to save the time of the nation and preserve the dignity of the House by going on with the Bill to-morrow, when really you cannot say you have any other Business to transact. What is the objection to take the Bill to-morrow? My Motion will test the sincerity, the bona fides, of Members of the House who talk about their sacrifices. Are you prepared to sacrifice the Naval Review? We shall see whether you prefer your Buffalo Bill programme to the Business of the House. I beg to move the omission of "Monday," and the insertion of "To-morrow."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "upon Monday next," in order to insert the word "To-morrow,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'upon Monday next,' stand part of the Question."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman; indeed, I cannot think it is made seriously. Throughout the discussion this evening we have spoken of five days next week, and no reference whatever has been made to a Sitting to-day. It would be most unfair and unjust to the officers of the House to fix a Sitting for to-day, and, therefore, I must refuse the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I very much regret the First Lord of the Treasury, now he has got his Motion, has shown with what little fair-play he desires the House should treat us. We are fighting for the liberties and the fortunes of our people. We are fighting to prevent in future atrocities such as have occurred at Glenbeigh and Bodyke; we are fighting that old women shall not be batoned by your policemen. We want every hour between this and Friday next at 10 o'clock. What is the answer we receive? Virtually, it is that there is a Naval Review to-morrow which hon. Members wish to witness. Hon. Members who were returned pledged to do justice to Ireland will not sit this day, will not give up the miserable spectacle at Portsmouth to-day, and thus enable us to defend the liberties of our people. ["Oh, oh!"] It is very easy to cry "Oh, oh!" but they will not give up this miserable Review in order that we may do something to mitigate the evils of this Bill, and discuss many important questions which still remain to be discussed. I must say I thought some Members of the House would have had fair-play enough in them to agree to sit to-day. The First Lord of the Treasury has told us we said nothing earlier in the evening about a Saturday Sitting. We said something about extending the time till the 24th instant, and we were met with the statement that, owing to the state of Public Business, such an extension of time was impossible. There is no Public Business to be transacted to-morrow except the Naval Review. The Motion of my hon. and learned Friend is one which recommends itself.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am surprised that the natural sense of humour which the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) possesses should have induced him to suppose that this Motion was not made in a serious spirit. I do not know whether it was made in a serious spirit or not; but I can only assure the right hon. Gentleman I rise in a serious spirit to support it. Whatever the spirit of self-sacrifice which hon. Gentlemen opposite are so fond of talking about may be, I am perfectly prepared to sacrifice the 17s. I have paid for a ticket for the special train to-day. I have a great regard for the courtesy of the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford) who has invited us to take part in this Review, and I take great interest in naval tactics and the benefit which will result from the Review; but I have a far greater regard for the dignity of this House. I think that, in view of the revolutionary tactics of the First Lord of the Treasury, it is our bounden duty to do what we can to mitigate the viciousness of the precedent he is setting up. I am perfectly willing to have a continuous Sitting until 10 o'clock on Friday next. The First Lord of the Treasury, with that admirable innocence which becomes him so well—[Cries of "Divide!"]—with that—[Renewed cries of "Divide!"]—with that—[Renewed cries of "Divide!"] I ask, what have we to think of the sincerity of the First Lord of the Treasury—[Cries of "Divide!"]—the First Lord of the Treasury—[Renewed cries of "Divide!"]—the First Lord of the Treasury—[Renewed cries of "Divide!"] —

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask you if the hon. Gentleman is speaking to the Question before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I regret the whole tone of this debate. I regard the tone in which the debate on this subject is conducted as a disgrace to the House.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 202; Noes 73: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 221.)
[2.10 A.M.]

Question put, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 72: Majority 131.—(Div. List, No. 222.)
[2.25 A.M.]

MOTION.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I see no reason whatever for this proposal on behalf of the Government. We are often told of the serious purpose for which this House exists, and yet we have this Motion made at this early hour of the morning in order to consult the private convenience and private pleasure of hon. Gentlemen. These are the Gentlemen who talk about their sacrifices to the country. I should like to know what reason the Government have to-night above any other night for moving the adjournment of the House without going through the Orders of the Day? They offer no explanation why they make this Motion. The whole series of Orders are to be gone through; and we shall be told on another occasion that some of these Orders are of the utmost importance. If these Orders are of the utmost importance on other occasions, they are of the utmost importance now. What is the reason the Government consider hon. Members should no longer be kept up? When the Government want to make progress with coercion, they are ready to sit until 4 o'clock in the morning; but when they want to go to a Naval Review, they can move the adjournment of the House at half-past 2 o'clock. This is the measure of the seriousness of the Tory Party. We hear a great deal about the degradation of the House of Commons —

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 71: Majority 132.—(Div. List, No. 223.)
[2.40 A.M.]

Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 71: Majority 132.—(Div. List, No. 224.)
[2.55 A.M.]

House adjourned at ten minutes after Three o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, 13th June, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Irish Land Law (106-122).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—First Reading—

Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 3)* (118); Local Government (Gas)* (119); Local Government (No. 2)* (120).

Second Reading—Commons Regulation (Ewer)* (108); Commons Regulation (Landon)* (107).

Committee—Report—Pier and Harbour* (103).

CENTRAL ASIA—AFFAIRS OF AFGHANISTAN.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I rise to ask the Secretary of State for India a Question of which I have given him private Notice, Whether he has any information to communicate to the House with respect to affairs in Afghanistan?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I am always very happy to communicate any information I may have on this as well as other matters, especially with regard to Afghanistan, where rumours are so rife in public prints that one hardly knows what is going on. I am afraid my answer at present will not be very satisfactory to the noble Earl; but the Viceroy telegraphed on the 2nd of June that no fighting had recently occurred between the Ameer's troops and the Ghilzaïs, and so recently as the 9th instant Lord Dufferin reported that there did not seem to be much change in the position of affairs.

IRISH LAND LAW BILL.—(No. 106.)

(The Lord Privy Seal, Earl Cadogan.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) according to Order.

Equitable Jurisdiction

Clause 20 (Power of court to stay eviction).

LORD FITZGERALD said, he rose to move an Amendment to the clause which would have the effect of preventing landlords from evading the equitable jurisdiction intended to be given by the clause by having recourse to an action for the recovery of rent instead of to an action of ejectment, and thus rendering the equitable jurisdiction of the Court inoperative. If a landlord had two tenants each owing £50, he might bring an action of ejectment for non-payment of rent against one, and the tenant in that case would be entitled to relief under the equitable jurisdiction of the Court. But the landlord, in the case of the other tenant, might bring an action for recovery of rent, obtain a speedy judgment, issue execution, and sell the tenant's interest or purchase it in at a nominal price. The tenant so proceeded against would not be entitled to equitable relief. There appeared to be no good reason why one of these tenants should be entitled to equitable relief more than another, and his Amendment sought to remove the objection in this respect.

Amendment moved, in page 12, line 15, after ("recovery") to insert ("of the rent").—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN) said, he could not accept the Amendment. It imposed an undue limitation that would defeat the object of the clause.

LORD HERSCHELL, in supporting the Amendment, said, that the object of the clause was to enable the County Court Judge to exercise an equitable jurisdiction of restraint when a landlord was harshly exercising his power. If the landlord wished to exercise his right unreasonably and harshly, the Government left open to him a means of so doing which would absolutely destroy the object of the clause. The landlord could bring his action for non-payment of rent and could sell the tenant's interest without interference. That was a course not unfrequently adopted, and would, at the present moment, be universally adopted by harsh landlords in order to effectually dispose of their tenants, unless the Amendment was adopted. The clause would be absolutely valueless, if landlords would never proceed by action for ejectment, but by action for recovery of rent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE) said, that the clause was intended to deal with the landlords in the exercise of their special power as landlords. The Amendment took up very different grounds, and proposed to tie the landlord's hands when they put in force the remedy of ordinary creditors. This, while tying the hands of the landlords, would leave ordinary creditors free.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that he wished to prevent this clause—admirably devised for the good of the tenant—from being rendered of no avail. As had been pointed out unless the Amendment was accepted, landlords, instead of bringing actions of ejectment, would bring actions for recovery of rent, and thus escape the equitable jurisdiction. He, himself, had had occasion to try 13 cases in one day, in which a noble Lord brought actions for recovery of rent, secured judgment, and obtained from the Sheriff conveyances of the tenants' interests, thereby gaining in one day absolute control over the interests of the tenants. If this Amendment was not accepted the clause would be a delusion.

EARL SPENCER said, he hoped their Lordships would not be guided entirely by the arguments used by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Cadogan) and the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. There was a great deal to be said in favour of the Amendment. The fact was, that if these proceedings became at all common in Ireland the benevolent intentions of Her Majesty's Government would really be defeated; because landlords, instead of proceeding as they did now by means of ejectment for non-payment of rent, would adopt the other course, and in that case the beneficial intention of this clause would be entirely lost. He hoped the Government would not absolutely refuse to accede to the Amendment, but would consider it really in the interest of their own Bill. If they did not, the operation of this clause might be made nugatory.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY) said, that the object of the Bill and the Government was to deal with an evil which existed and which was very conspicuous. That evil had done, and was at present doing a great deal of harm. It was the tendency of a very small number, but still of a certain number, of Irish landlords to have recourse to evictions which, though just in law, were unreasonable and harsh in practice. That was the evil with which the Bill dealt. No one denied that it existed. But now they were asked to extend the Bill to an evil which did not exist, or that did not exist to any noticeable extent. They were asked to deal with a possible action on the part of landlords to obtain the same results through a very circuitous and costly process. If they were to be asked to do this, he must ask the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Fitzgerald) whether his Amendment went far enough? If the tenant was to be prevented, in all circumstances, from having his holding sold in satisfaction of his debts, there would not be a vestige or shadow of reason why the landlord should be the sole victim of that process; it must be extended to every tradesman—to the keeper of the whisky shop and to the gombreen man! There was not a shadow of a defence for limiting it to the landlord. The noble and learned Lord did not propose to take that course of extending it. The truth was, they were dealing by this Bill with an exceptional privilege granted to landlords only—namely, the power of evicting for non-payment of rent. They were now invited to go a step further, and to deal with a remedy which was open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects alike as against the man who did not pay his debts. It was a tremendous demand to make upon them, and he could not imagine the circumstances in which it would be wise to concede it, even if it were made general. But it would be nothing but the grossest and most grotesque partiality to limit it to the landlord alone.

LORD FITZGERALD said, the noble Marquess opposite (The Marquess of Salisbury) did not trouble himself to read the Irish newspapers, or he would see that cases of the kind he had referred to were of frequent occurrence. The Sheriff gave notice of the sale of a holding; a turbulent crowd attended, and eventually, the tenant-right was knocked down at a nominal sum to the landlord. He might also point out that in case an ordinary creditor obtained an execution, he would sell the tenant's right only subject to the payment of the rent due to the landlord, so that the landlord was no loser. The landlord was secured as against the action of an ordinary creditor, and there would be no harm in restraining him from the harsh exercise of his rights. Unless their Lordships accepted the Amendment the clause would be but a sham, and he was certain that their Lordships did not so intend.

LORD INCHQUIN said, the Bill dealt hardly with landlords in many respects, and they were entitled to some consideration for not opposing it, as they might have done on the second reading. If this clause was altered, as proposed by the Amendment, the effect would be for a long time to prevent landlords getting any rent whatever. The only safeguard they had left was this power of sale.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 26; not-Contents 128: Majority 102.

CONTENTS.

Northampton, M.	FitzGerald, L. [Teller.]
Ripon, M.	Hamilton of Dalzell, L.
Granville, E.	Herschell, L.
Kimberley, E.	Houghton, L.
Morley, E.	Howth, L. (E. Howth.)
Spencer, E.	Monkswell, L. [Teller.]
Strafford, E.	Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.)
Sydney, E.	Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.)
Oxenbridge, V.	Sandhurst, L.
Powerscourt, V.	Sudeley, L.
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)	Thring, L.
Braye, L.	Vernon, L.
Burton, L.	Wolverton, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Halsbury, L. (L. Chancellor.)
 Cranbrook, V. (L. President.)
 Cadogan, E. (L. Privy Seal.)
 Buckingham and Chandos, D.
 Grafton, D.
 Leeds, D.
 Westminster, D.
 Abercorn, M. (D. Abercorn.)
 Bristol, M.
 Exeter, M.¹
 Salisbury, M.
 Annesley, E.
 Bandon, E.
 Beauchamp, E.
 Belmore, E.
 Bradford, E.
 Brownlow, E.
 Coventry, E.
 Dartmouth, E.
 Dartrey, E.
 Devon, E.
 Dundonald, E.
 FEVERSHAM, E.
 Kilmorey, E.
 Leven and Melville, E.
 Lindsay, E.
 Lovelace, E.
 Lucan, E.
 Mar, E.
 Mar and Kellie, E.
 Northbrook, E.
 Onslow, E.
 Orkney, E.
 Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
 Portsmouth, E.
 Ravensworth, E.
 Romney, E.
 Rosse, E.
 Stanhope, E.
 Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.
 Tankerville, E.
 Verulam, E.
 Waldegrave, E.
 Yarborough, E.
 Bangor, V.
 Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)
 Cross, V.
 Exmouth, V.
 Gough, V.
 Hawarden, V. (E. de Montalt.)
 Sidmouth, V.
 Torrington, V.
 Bangor, L. Bp.
 Abinger, L.
 Alington, L.
 Ashbourne, L.
 Balfour of Burley, L.
 Belper, L.
 Blantyre, L.
 Bolton, L.
 Bramwell, L.
 Braybrooke, L.
 Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
 Brougham and Vaux, L.
 Calthorpe, L.
 Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)
 Castletown, L.
 Chelmsford, L.
 Churchill, L.
 Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)
 Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)
 Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
 Clinton, L.
 Cloncurry, L.
 Colchester, L.
 de Ros, L.
 de Vesci, L. (V. de Vesci.)
 Deramore, L.
 Digby, L.
 Dinevor, L.
 Ellenborough, L.
 Elphinstone, L.
 Fermanagh, L. (E. Erne.)
 Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.) [Teller.]
 Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
 Grimthorpe, L.
 Harris, L.
 Hillingdon, L.
 Hopetoun, L. (E. Hopetoun.)
 Inchiquin, L.
 Keane, L.
 Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
 Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.) [Teller.]
 Lamington, L.
 Lawrence, L.
 Leconfield, L.
 Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
 Lyveden, L.
 Macnaghten, L.
 Massy, L.
 Middleton, L.
 Minster, L. (M. Conyngham.)
 Montague of Brandon, L.
 Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)
 Northington, L. (L. Henley.)
 Poltimore, L.
 Saltersford, L. (E. Courtown.)
 Shute, L. (V. Barrington.)

Sinclair, L.
 Stanley of Alderley, L.
 Stanley of Preston, L.
 Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
 Stratheden and Campbell, L.
 Sudley, L. (E. Arran.)
 Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
 Talbot de Malahide, L.
 Templemore, L.
 Tredegar, L.
 Truro, L.
 Tweedmouth, L.
 Ventry, L.
 Wantage, L.
 Watson, L.
 Wemyss, L. (E. Wemyss.)
 Wigan, L. (E. Crawford and Balcarres.)
 Windsor, L.
 Winmarleigh, L.
 Zouche of Haryngworth, L.

Amendment disagreed to.

On the Motion of The Viscount DE VESCI, the following Amendment made:—
 In page 12, line 22, after the words ("believing that,") by inserting ("having regard to the interests of both the landlord and the tenant").

LORD CASTLETOWN said, he rose to move an Amendment, the object of which was to provide that in the case of a tenant who was unable to pay arrears of rent, the Court might "upon application by the tenant," order that the arrears of rent and the costs, or such sum in satisfaction thereof as might be agreed on between the parties, should be paid by such instalments as the Court might appoint. The noble Lord argued in favour of the Amendment in connection with another which he had on the Paper calling for a full disclosure of the tenant's affairs and insolvency by means of a filed affidavit. He was of opinion that a tenant should file an affidavit giving a full disclosure to the Court of the particulars of the debts due by him, whether secured or unsecured, his assets, and any interest he might have in his holding.

Amendment moved, in page 12, subsection (1), line 25, before the word ("order"), insert ("upon application by the tenant").—(The Lord Castletown.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (EARL CADOGAN) said, the noble Lord had given good reasons for his second Amendment, and the Government were prepared to accept it. They could not, however, accept the Amendment just moved.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that a tenant might neither be bankrupt nor insolvent, but still unable to pay at that particular juncture. In that case an extension of time would be highly desirable; but as matters stood the tenant was called upon to make a complicated affidavit. The noble Lord was really anticipating the Bankruptcy Law.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he rose to move an Amendment with the object of providing that in the case of a tenant who could not pay his arrear claims the Court might order that the arrears of rent and costs, or such sum in satisfaction thereof as might be agreed on between the parties, "or in default of agreement as shall be fixed by the Court," should be paid by such instalments as the Court might appoint. Such a provision had worked well in the case of the crofters, and in his opinion the powers conferred on the Crofter Commission in this respect should be granted to the County Court Judges in Ireland.

Amendment moved, in page 12, line 26, after ("parties"), insert ("or in default of agreement as shall be fixed by the Court.")

EARL CADOGAN said, it might assist their Lordships in the discussion of these clauses, if he stated that it was quite impossible for the Government to give up any part of the equitable jurisdiction which the Bill proposed to invest in the Court of Bankruptcy. A tenant who by reason of his insolvency claimed the assistance of the law rendered himself liable to proceedings in Bankruptcy, and should therefore show the genuineness of his inability to pay rent. The Amendment would introduce a very objectionable distinction which would result in a general and annual revision of judicial rents. Under the circumstances, the Government must ask the House to reject the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment moved,

In page 12, subsection (1), line 27, to add, after the word ("appoint,")—("Upon any such application the tenant shall in the prescribed manner file an affidavit making full disclosure and giving particulars of the debts due by him, whether secured or unsecured, and, if secured, the nature of any such security, and of his assets, whether consisting of money or securities for money, the value of the interest in his holding, his farming stock and chattels of every description, whether in his own hands or in those of any other person on his behalf.")—(The Lord Castletown.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that in accordance with the promise already given by his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal (Earl Cadogan), he would accept the Amendment in principle. Its terms would, however, require re-casting, and he would suggest as perhaps the most convenient course that the Amendment so re-cast should be presented on Report. He thought it would be wiser, instead of the words of the noble Lord, to indicate that the affidavit should be in a prescribed form setting forth prescribed particulars which would give the fullest information in order to enable the Court to come to a fair decision.

LORD CASTLETOWN said, he was willing to comply with the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend, and would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert as a Proviso to the 1st subsection of Clause 20—

"Provided, however, that the execution of the judgment for any balance that may remain due on account thereof shall not be stayed for a longer period than eighteen months from the date thereof," said, that the object of the Amendment was to prevent a County Court Judge from having the power to fix an unduly long period for payment of instalments. He might conceivably fix a period as long as 5 years, which would be very inconvenient in the interest of the landlord.

Amendment moved,

In sub-section (1), line 27, after ("appoint"), insert ("Provided, however, that the execution of the judgment for any balance that may remain due on account thereof shall not be stayed for a longer period than eighteen months from the date thereof").—(The Duke of Abercorn.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he hoped the noble Duke would not press the Amendment. The case put was an extreme one, and where the power was purely discretionary it seemed useless to fix such a limitation. Moreover, the very mention of a period of 18 months might induce the Judge to think that in most cases he ought to give it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN moved to insert the following Proviso at the end of the section:—

"Provided also, that where the landlord has offered to accept in full satisfaction of the arrears of rent such lesser sum, payable either in one payment or by instalments as the Court shall think reasonable, and the tenant has refused such offer, no stay of execution shall be granted under this section."

The effect of the Amendment would be to induce the landlord to make a reasonable offer to his tenant, and also to deter tenants from refusing or combining together to refuse to accept any fair offer from the landlord. The effect, therefore, would be to prevent litigation.

Amendment moved,

In sub-section (1), line 27, after ("appoint"), insert ("Provided also, that where the landlord has offered to accept in full satisfaction of the arrears of rent such lesser sum, payable either in one payment or by instalments, as the Court shall think reasonable, and the tenant has refused such offer, no stay of execution shall be granted under this section").—(The Duke of Abercorn.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he should support the Amendment, which, in his opinion, would tend to prevent litigation, and enormous expenditure in the way of costs. The costs in bankruptcy in the now well-known case of "O'Grady v. Maroney," were said to be considerably in excess of the rent due. The Amendment of his noble Friend was in no way hostile to the Bill.

EARL CADOGAN said, that any friendly arrangement between a landlord and his tenant calculated to prevent them entering upon legal proceedings undoubtedly must have their best sympathy. On the whole, while he had some doubt as to the wording as to reference of payment by instalments was legal, he was prepared to accept the Amendment, subject to a recasting of the words, if necessary, upon Report.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he begged to move an Amendment to modify the second sentence of the 2nd sub-section of this clause, that it should read thus—

"If default is made in complying with the order of the Court for the payment of the first or any subsequent instalment, the stay upon the execution of the judgment shall be removed, and it may thereupon be executed in due form of law."

The Amendment was intended to meet the case where a tenant, unable to pay the full amount from no fault of his own, was, nevertheless, willing to pay by instalments; if such a tenant failed to pay a subsequent instalment thereupon, the landlord would be entitled to call upon the Court to put him in possession, to eject the tenant, and deprive him entirely of his right to reside there. By a peculiarity of the law in Ireland, this power might operate harshly upon the tenant. The right of execution as at present given to the landlord was unnecessarily hard upon the tenant, and time should be given, seeing that the tenant would be compelled to pay all—interest, principal, and redemption.

The Duke of Abercorn

Amendment moved, in page 12, leave out lines 33 and 34, and insert ("and it may thereupon be executed in due form of law").—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that this Amendment was one of great importance, and would, no doubt, commend itself to many. There was a difference, however, between the cases where the time given by the Courts was a long period, such as nine or ten months or a year, and cases where the stay of execution was granted for only a short time. In cases where the time for paying the instalment was only for a few weeks, it was not unreasonable that this stay of execution should be granted. But if they took the case which was far more likely to arise, of a stay of execution for nine or ten months or a year, then it would be a question which would require examination whether the tenant should, at the end of that time, be at liberty to start with the right of six months' further relief.

LORD HERSHELL said, he thought that if there were two classes of cases so extremely different they might be dealt with differently. What they had to consider was in what position the tenant would be put by this clause. It was desired to make it a real protection to the tenant, and he would point out that if a tenant were only allowed three months by the County Court Judge to pay an instalment which he was really unable to pay, he would be in a worse position than if he had been allowed by the landlord to remain for six months.

EARL CADOGAN said, that, in his opinion, the Amendment was a fair one, and he had no objection, on the part of the Government, to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved,

In page 12, at end of sub-section (2), line 38, add—"Provided that upon any such sale all arrears of rent and the costs then due to the landlord shall be paid in full out of the purchase-money, and shall be the first charge thereon.")—(The Earl of Kilmorey.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he could not accept the Amendment. It was unnecessary, for the Land Act of 1881 had already made the provision.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 (Jurisdiction in bankruptcy by consent).

THE EARL OF KILMOREY, in moving, in page 13, line 19, after "execution," to omit the following words:—

"And may, where the holding is subject to a statutory term, fix the rent to be paid for the residue of such statutory term then unexpired, at such moment as, in the opinion of the court, a thrifty and industrious tenant might reasonably be expected continuously to pay,"

said, that there was not a single point in the whole Bill to which there was greater unanimity of objection than to permitting the County Court Judge to tamper with the rents fixed by the Land Commissioners. One peculiarity of our legislation with regard to Ireland was a want of finality which prevented that confidence which ought to be felt in carrying out remedial measures. He would ask Her Majesty's Government not to cause that confusion which would be sure to arise from allowing the Bill before the House to override the Act of 1881. A County Court Judge was a lawyer pure and simple, and probably had no knowledge whatever of agriculture or of the value of land. On the other hand, two at least of the Land Commissioners were supposed to be well versed in the survey and valuation of land. Therefore, it would be very unfair to allow one man to upset the judgment come to by properly qualified persons. If any County Court Judge was allowed to have this unlimited power of revising rent continually, there would be no finality, and the idle and drunken tenant would be more favoured than the sober and industrious. He would appeal to his noble Friend (the Lord Privy Seal) to spare the Irish landlords at least the hardship inflicted by this part of the clause.

Amendment moved, in sub-section (2), line 19, omit words ("And may, where holding is subject to a statutory term") to the word ("pay").—(The Earl of Kilmorey.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he was sorry to state that the Government had not found opinion more unanimous upon any point in the Bill than on the proposition to which his noble Friend objected. He (Earl Cadogan) stated, when he brought in this Bill, that Her Majesty's Government were very unwilling to give a power to revise any judicial rents fixed by statutory provision. It was with very great reluctance that the words in this paragraph were inserted in the amended clause; but the Government hoped that the effect would be to obviate the liability to renewed insolvency, and the probability of renewed appeal to the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge. There was great force in the contention of his noble Friend, especially with regard to the point to which he (Earl Cadogan) had himself before alluded, that the insolvent tenant would obtain a relief not granted to the solvent tenant. He had also some hope that, if the power of revising the rent were not given after the discharge of the bankrupt, the tenant who had been white-washed might be better able to pay a given rent than he was at a time when he was overwhelmed by outside debts, far more than by the rent due to the landlord. Therefore, if the Judge, in fixing the rent to be paid, considered the general prospects of the tenant, he might think him unable to pay a rental which, after he was relieved from the burden of his debts, he would be well able to pay. Under all the circumstances, therefore, he had come to the conclusion, not unwillingly, that the Government were prepared to accept the Amendment, which he must say he considered a reasonable one.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that the announcement which the noble Earl (Earl Cadogan) had just made was rather a startling one. He had consented to strike out of this carefully thought provision, which they understood represented the views and intentions of the Government, that which was the very essence of the Bill. It was evident that the only conceivable inducement to a tenant to agree in an application that he should be made bankrupt was that he might obtain some relief in the way of reduced rent. The noble Marquess before now, in answer to some observations of his, contended that it was legitimate, when the tenant was in the position of a bankrupt not through his own fault, that his rent should be revised. But what, according to the noble Marquess, was justifiable in the case of a bankrupt was no longer to be permitted. He gathered from what had been said, that it was intended by the Government to take away the provision as to the fixing of rents from all the bankruptcy proposals.

EARL CADOGAN: Only as regards the residue of the statutory term.

LORD HERSCHELL said, the proposal about to be omitted was a penalty put upon the landlord if he unreasonably refused to concur with the tenant in his application. The Government had declared that there were cases in which a thrifty and industrious tenant could not reasonably be expected to pay the rent fixed, and yet they were taking away the only protection which the tenant had if the landlord refused to make the bankruptcy application to the Court. It was true that there was a provision against the unreasonable refusal of the landlord in respect of a particular rent, but the matter should be settled once for all.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he entirely demurred to the statement that the essence of the Bill was the revision of rents in all cases. The essence of the Bill was to prevent harsh and unreasonable evictions, and it had been stated over and over again that, while the Government adhered, and meant to adhere, to that object, they were, when it had been attained, very much in the hands of the House as to the machinery to be used, and they were willing to listen to objections from all sides. They had already yielded something to noble Lords opposite, and to some of his noble Friends behind him. They wished to be dogmatic on the one point that harsh and unreasonable evictions should be prevented, but they did not wish to be dogmatic on anything else. With regard to the question raised by his noble Friend the Earl of Kilmorey, of revising the rent of the insolvent tenant, he confessed that if he were an Irish landlord he should prefer the clause as it stood, because it would be better for the landlords. But he had very little doubt, from all that had reached him, that the landlords in Ireland almost universally did not think so, and that they were very jealous of the charter given by the Act of 1881, which brought them a great deal of disadvantage and loss. That charter, they urged, should not be interfered with, and no revision of judicial rents should be undertaken. He considered that there was ground for thinking that the provisions of the Bill were the most convenient; but, at the same time, there was a good deal to be said on the other side. It must be remembered, moreover, that the security against the landlord continuing to enforce an impossible rent, if such rent there was, was very great, because the tenant, under the Bill, if the Amendment should be agreed to, would still be able to institute proceedings, the end of which would be that his rent would be compulsorily compounded, and that the rent, if excessive, would be reduced on each occasion. On each occasion there would be costs, which, of course, if the tenant had been the reasonable, and the landlord the unreasonable party, would inevitably be placed upon the landlord. It was, therefore, the landlord who had the greatest possible motive in considering whether the rent was reasonable or not. Was there any hope, if they gave this power to the County Court Judge, that it would be within his reach so to foresee what would occur in future years, that he would be able to fix another rent which would not be liable to the same mutability of human affairs by which it was alleged that former rents had been affected? They were told by the head of the Commission (Earl Cowper), and by the Commissioners, that there were certain causes which had made the state of things now so difficult that in many cases rents pressed harder than the Commissioners intended them to do. These causes had operated against the power of the tenant to pay his rent; but would they not operate in the future? He felt that in the case of those tenants who were just on the verge of subsistence there was something disparaging in the process of fixing a rent which was to last across all vicissitudes for a considerable number of years; and he could well understand the feelings of the Irish landlords that as the principle had been adopted, as against free contract, of estates managed under the supervision of the Court, it was better, on the whole, instead of trying to fix rent for a future term of years, to which they would not be able to adhere, to leave the matter under the control of the County Court Judge, and open to constant appeal to him, and with abundant power in his hands, to make either landlord or tenant pay the penalty if their conduct had been unreasonable, and if they had not been willing to submit to inevitable changes, which the seasons or the condition of affairs had produced. So long as harsh and unreasonable evictions were prevented, he would not insist upon any particular machinery.

Lord Herschell

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he felt bound to express the feeling of surprise he experienced at the action of the Government. This constant power of appeal to the County Court Judge would produce a state of confusion all over Ireland. But it should be borne in mind that it was not the Opposition who took the first step in re-opening this matter. The Commission presided over by Earl Cowper, and which was appointed by the Government, had placed it on record that there were at the present moment a large number of judicial rents fixed too high, which the tenants were unable to pay. From that fact they could not escape. It was a position of extreme difficulty, he admitted; but to dangle before the Irish tenants the remedy which the clause contained, and then to withdraw that remedy in deference to the wishes of the landlords, and provide for a constant power of appeal to the County Court Judge, which the noble Marquess had himself stated was a worse provision than the one now abandoned—this action of the Government was vacillating and dangerous, and there could be nothing more likely to increase the confusion. The noble Marquess had endeavoured to show that the tenant would be in no worse position under the clause as it was now proposed that it should stand; but he thought, even on the noble Marquess's own showing, the position would be very much worse.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that his noble Friend should remember that they on that side of the House were responsible for the Act of 1881. He did not agree with the noble Earl who had just spoken, who was putting every possible difficulty in the way of the Government. He thought the Lord Privy Seal had done rightly to agree to the omission of the words. He agreed that if they were to deal with judicial rents, they must not deal with them in such a way as to demoralize the whole tenantry of Ireland; but such demoralization would result rather from the clause as it stood than from the Amendment. The position taken up by the Government was perfectly logical and right, that they should provide a temporary remedy, and should not attempt through bankruptcy to revise the rents fixed under the Act of 1881. They were right, therefore, in accepting the Amendment. He complained of the conduct of his noble Friends in trying to put difficulties in the way of the Government.

LORD HERSCHELL thought the noble Earl who had just spoken was rather hard upon the Leaders of the Opposition in suggesting that they were factious, because they preferred the original form of the Bill, which the Leader of the House thought the best, to the form which the Amendment would give to it. His own objection to the provision altogether was that it would tend to demoralize tenants, but in a sense different from that in which the noble Earl had used the word—namely, by making bankruptcy the only channel of relief; and this was not altered by the Amendment.

LORD CASTLETOWN said, he could not imagine anything more dangerous than to tamper with judicial rents, and two of the most important witnesses examined by the Commission were strongly of opinion that these rents should not be interfered with.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that many of their Lordships had supported the second reading of the Bill, on the ground that there had been harsh evictions, which were to be put an end to, but on the understanding that there was to be no further revision of judicial rents. If tenants were driven into bankruptcy it would not be solely on account of their rents, but largely through their other debts. In the majority of cases, relieved of other debts, they would be able to pay the moderate rents fixed by the Commissioners. There was strong ground for the feeling that if the words objected to remained in the clause, many tenants would go into bankruptcy simply in order to get their rents reduced. The temptation to do so would be one which they would not be able to resist. Before 1881, the normal number of estates in Ireland having Receivers over them did not exceed 500. There were now between 1,200 and 1,300 estates under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and the number was increasing every day. This fact showed what strong reason there was for not tampering any further with judicial rents. In cases in which they were unduly high, most landlords would willingly give temporary abatements. He rejoiced that the Lord Privy Seal had assented to the Amendment.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, as the Government have agreed to take these words out, in deference to what they understand to be the universal opinion of Irish landlords, I wish to say that I, for one, do not entirely object to these words. If the Bankruptcy Clauses are to be of any real avail, it appears to me that as the Bill stands words to this effect must be formulated in those clauses. As the Bill was originally brought in, either a landlord or a tenant could petition; as it is now, it requires that the landlord and the tenant must join together to petition. The result of this would be, that where a tenant is really bankrupt, he will be made a bankrupt; but that if he is not bankrupt—and it would be to the immense advantage of the landlord that he should be bankrupt—the tenant will object, and no penalty will be placed on the tenant. I do not know whether it is the object of the Government to make the Bankruptcy Clauses really work and act; but of one thing I am perfectly certain, that if no such power as this is contained in them the Bankruptcy Clauses will be absolutely a dead letter, and that will be a great misfortune. I was convinced that the Bankruptcy Clauses, as originally introduced, would be of great advantage to the landlords of Ireland. I confess also that I think it is unfortunate that these words, having been put in the Bill, should be taken out of it, because it will inevitably appear that the position of the tenant is this—that he is to go on in his holding subject to a rent such as a thrifty, industrious, and well-meaning tenant cannot possibly pay. That is an unfortunate construction to be put on the wording of an Act of Parliament. As the Bill stood, it was not necessary for the landlord and the tenant to join together. But I do not mean that I entirely agree with the words as they now stand. What I think ought to have been done was to give the County Court Judge power, wherever he thought it necessary, to refer a case to the Sub-Commissioners, and leave it to them to settle the statutory rent. I think that if words to that effect were put into the Bill it would be a very great advantage. The alternative proposal is a very painful one. What the tenants have to do, if they are required to pay a rent which they really and honestly cannot pay, is to be continually coming up as bankrupts, and getting themselves cleared, and being started again at rents they cannot pay. I think the County Court Judges ought to have been given power to refer a case to the Land Commissioners when, in their opinion, the insolvency of the tenant was owing to a rent which had become excessive.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of The Earl of ERNE, the following Amendment made:—In Sub-section (2.) line 26, for ("may"), substitute ("shall on the application of the landlord").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE EARL OF KILMOREY said, he proposed after Clause 21 to insert a new clause providing that a tenant should be compelled, on applying for a petition in bankruptcy, to file an affidavit stating the nature, amount, &c., of his debts and his assets. His object was to assimilate the procedure with the ordinary procedure in bankruptcy.

Amendment moved, to add after Clause 21—

"22a. A tenant presenting a petition for adjudication against himself shall, with his petition, file an affidavit in the prescribed form, and shall furnish a copy thereof to the landlord or his agent, setting forth the names, addresses, and occupations of his creditors, the amounts respectively due to them, and the particulars thereof, and specifying whether they are secured or unsecured creditors, and, if secured, the nature and value of the security. He shall also in his said affidavit set forth particulars of his assets of every kind, whether consisting of money, debts due to him, farming stock and utensils, or other chattels or other property of any description, with the value of the same. He shall also state where all such chattels are. He shall specify in his said affidavit the estimated value of his interest in his holding or holdings, and if any part of his assets consist of money, or of securities for money in the hands of any trustee or other person for any purpose, he shall in his said affidavit disclose full particulars of the same, including the name of such trustee or other person, and the date when such money or securities for money was or were so placed in the hands of such trustee or other person. And if at any time it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that there is any wilful or fraudulent mis-statement or concealment in or omission from such schedule, the Court may order the petitioner to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding six calendar months, with or without hard labour, as the Court shall think right."—(The Earl of Kilmorey.)

The Earl of Belmore

EARL CADOGAN said, he was informed that the Rules of Court would apply to these proceedings, and it would be much better to leave the matter there than to burden the Bill with details of that kind.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved a new clause providing that the adjudication of any person under the Act should operate ipso facto as a release and discharge of all property of the bankrupt from every mortgage, charge, security, and lien, whether legal or equitable, to which at the date of adjudication any person may be entitled on the real or personal property of the bankrupt, every such person to rank as an unsecured creditor only, said, that it might seem a strong measure to level mortgages, but the object was to prevent fraud. This might happen—a dishonest tenant might wish to favour some of his creditors, and he would borrow on mortgage what would pay them in full, and afterwards go into bankruptcy, leaving the landlord and other creditors whom he disliked out in the cold. He would leave the Amendment in the hands of the House and of the Government.

Amendment moved, to add, after Clause 21—

"21b. The adjudication of any person under this Act shall ipso facto operate as a release and discharge of all property of the bankrupt from every mortgage, charge, security, and lien, whether legal or equitable, to which at the date of adjudication any person may be entitled on the real or personal property of the bankrupt, or any part thereof, and every such person shall rank as an unsecured creditor only, for his debt or the amount due to him pari passu with the other creditors of the bankrupt, whether he shall prove for his debt or the amount due to him or not."—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, he should oppose the clause. He thought that the noble Earl could hardly have conceived the consequences of it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, the effect of this new clause might be that any two persons in the relation of landlord and tenant might come to an agreement between themselves to do away with the property. Its operation would be signally unjust, although he did not deny that there was an evil against which the noble Earl was attempting to provide a somewhat harsh remedy. The clause could not be accepted by the Government.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that he did not quite follow his noble and learned Friend (Lord Fitzgerald). He could not always agree with him as to what was equitable and inequitable, as, for instance, the other night, as regarded a point on the leaseholder question. He would not press the Amendment; but he hoped that the Lord Privy Seal would consider the matter before Report, and bring up something himself.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 22 (Power in certain cases to continue tenant in his holding, notwithstanding bankruptcy).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in moving an Amendment providing that the Court might permit a debtor to remain in occupation of his holding on payment of "his rent," and not "a reasonable rent to be fixed by the Court," as stated in the clause, said, that the judicial rent was supposed to be a fair rent; but by introducing the word "reasonable" in the clause the Government seemed to indicate to the tenantry of Ireland that the rents they were paying were unreasonable and too high. He should have thought that when the Lord Privy Seal accepted the Amendment of his noble Friend behind him he would accept the present Amendment.

Amendment moved, in page 14, line 3, leave out ("reasonable"), and insert ("his").—(The Earl of Milltown.)

EARL CADOGAN said, the Government could not accept the Amendment, as the Government did not think it would be possible to insist on the payment of the existing judicial rents in every case of the kind.

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause?"

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 92; Not-Contents 38: Majority 54.

On the Motion of The Earl of ERNE, the following Amendment made:—In page 14, lines 25 and 26, leave out ("and any land improvement charge or drainage charge").

On the Motion of The Duke of ABERCORN, the following Amendment made:—

In page 14, line 40, omit the following words:—"When the court grants a certificate of conformity to a bankrupt who has been permitted to remain in occupation of his holding, the court may, if the holding is subject to a statutory term, fix the rent to be paid for the residue of such statutory time then unexpired, at such amount as, in the opinion of the court, a thrifty and industrious tenant might reasonably be expected continuously to pay.")

Amendment moved,

At end of Clause 22, to add after ("holding")—"If any creditor or any bankrupt under this Act, or other person shall conceal, or attempt to conceal, or aid in concealing or attempting to conceal, any part of the bankrupt's property, or being in possession of any property or money or trust, or as agent for the bankrupt, shall refuse to deliver up the same, or to give full information concerning the same when required, every person so offending shall, in addition to all other penalties, forfeit and pay for every such offence the treble value of such property so concealed or attempted to be concealed, or not delivered up, or concerning which full information shall not be given, and the court, on the application of the assignees, in a summary manner may make an order for the payment of the same by the person so offending, which order may be enforced in the same way as a decree for the payment of money is now by law enforceable, or the assignees may sue for and recover such penalty in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and half the money so recovered shall be paid to or among the person or persons, if more than one, equally, whose evidence, the court shall be of opinion, materially assisted in the discovery or proof of the offence, and the other half shall be paid to the creditors of the bankrupt, other than any offender under this section, in proportion to their respective debts, and irrespective of any compensation they may have received."—(The Lord Castletown.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he could not accept the proposed addition to the clause. The question was already dealt with in the Act of 1872.

Earl Cadogan

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI, in moving, as an Amendment, to add at the end of the clause—

"If in any case where a composition of a tenant's debts has received the sanction of the court any of his creditors should at any time hereafter, either directly or indirectly, take or receive any money, effects, property, or value whatever in respect of the unpaid portion of his claim or debt, save under and with the sanction of the court, such creditor shall be liable to a fine of £200, and one-half of such fine shall be paid to the person or persons whose evidence, in the opinion of the court, may have led to the disclosure and proof of the offence," said, his object was to protect the poor and ignorant tenant from a class of men who were his worst enemies, the gombeen man and the village usurer. He was confirmed in the opinion that such protection was necessary by some of the most experienced men in Ireland, the managers of local banks.

Amendment moved,

In page 15, line 14, at end of Clause 22 add—"If in any case where a composition of a tenant's debts has received the sanction of the court any of his creditors should at any time hereafter, either directly or indirectly, take or receive any money, effects, property, or value whatever in respect of the unpaid portion of his claim or debt, save under and with the sanction of the court, such creditor shall be liable to a fine of two hundred pounds, and one-half of such fine shall be paid to the person or persons whose evidence, in the opinion of the court, may have led to the disclosure and proof of the offence."—(The Viscount De Vesci.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that a creditor who would do what the provision of the noble Viscount was intended to guard against would be guilty of a gross fraud under the existing Bankruptcy Law; and, in his opinion, no new legislation was wanted on the subject. But if the noble Viscount was advised that something was required to be done he should be glad to consult with him.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said, that the noble and learned Lord must know that in the small villages the poor man was entirely in the hands of that class of creditors to which he had referred.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he was glad that attention had been called to the subject. When a poor man wanted fresh credit, the gombeen man would say to him—"I will give it to you, provided you pay the balance of the former debt?"

EARL CADOGAN said, the matter would be considered.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Power to appoint additional staff of judges for bankruptcy) agreed to.

Clause 24 (Sittings) agreed to.

Clause 25 (Summary punishment for perjury and fraud).

LORD HERSCHELL said, he would move to omit the clause, on the ground that if a man swore falsely to his knowledge, that was wilful and corrupt perjury. That he understood; but he did not understand what was meant by "swearing or affirming what shall be false." If the swearing was not false to the man's knowledge, it was not wilful and corrupt perjury. By the clause no opportunity was afforded to the witness to call evidence or employ counsel; and it enabled the Judge, who might be irritated at the way in which the testimony was being given, to decide that it was false, and to summarily punish. To enable a Judge in Bankruptcy to commit to prison one who might be only a witness, without having any opportunity of meeting the charge, was a very strong and oppressive proceeding.

Amendment moved, To leave out Clause 25.—(The Lord Herschell.)

EARL CADOGAN said, that the Government would consider the wording of the clause on Report, to meet the view of the noble and learned Lord; but they could not consent to leave it out altogether.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that as his object had been gained he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 26 (Officers) agreed to.

Clause 27 (Appeals) agreed to.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved to insert after Clause 27 a new clause, providing that the Act should apply to all leases and grants of land in perpetuity made to any person previous to the passing thereof, and under which, or under the provisions of any Act of Parliament by virtue of which the same was made, the grantor or the grantee is entitled from time to time to require the variation and revision of the variable rent payable under such leases or grants.

Amendment moved, after Clause 27, page 16, insert the following Clause:—

(Perpetuity leases. Variable rents.)

"This Act shall apply to all leases and grants of land in perpetuity made to any person previous to the passing hereof, and under which, or under the provisions of any Act of Parliament by virtue of which the same was made, the grantor or the grantee is entitled from time to time, and at the expiration of certain periods of time, to require the variation and revision of the variable rent payable under such leases or grants; and in every such case the following provisions shall be in force and have effect with respect to the variation and revision of such variable rent, and shall supersede and be in substitution for all and every the provisions in that behalf contained in such leases or grants and in any Act of Parliament with reference thereto:

"(a.) The grantor or grantee shall be entitled six months before the expiration of any prescribed period to require a revision of such variable rent, and to apply to the court to fix the same, and in such case the party desiring the revision shall serve a revision notice upon the other party;

"(b.) In every case where, before the passing of this Act, any revision of such variable rent has taken place in pursuance of the leases or grants, or of any Act of Parliament with reference thereto, the grantor or grantee may at any time within the prescribed period serve a revision notice upon the grantee or grantor, as the case may be, and in such case the prescribed period then current shall be deemed to have expired at the day next after the end of six months from the service of such notice;

"(c.) Whenever the grantor or grantee has served a revision notice, and the parties agree within three months after service of such notice as to what shall be the amount of variable rent to be payable during the prescribed period next following, they may fix the amount of the variable rent to be payable during such prescribed period;

"(d.) Whenever the grantor or grantee has served a revision notice, and the parties do not within three months after the service of such notice agree as to what shall be the amount of the variable rent to be payable until the variation and revision of such variable rent next following, then and in every such case the amount of the variable rent to be payable until the variation and revision of such variable rent shall be fixed by the court in accordance with the provisions contained in this Act;

"(e.) Before fixing the variable rent of any such lands the court shall take evidence as to the then letting value of such lands, and such value is herein-after referred to as 'the present letting value,' and shall take evidence as to the letting value of such lands at or about the time when the grant was made, and such letting value is hereinafter referred to as 'the former letting value,' and shall preserve the same proportion between the present letting value and the variable rent to be paid by the grantee until the variation and revision of such variable rent next following, as existed between the former letting value and the variable rent payable by the grantee immediately after the making of the grant: Provided always, that the grantor shall not be awarded any increase of variable rent by reason of any increase in the value of such land, which is due to any buildings or improvements, except in so far as the grantor has contributed to the same. The variable rent fixed by the court under this Act shall be the variable rent payable under the leases or grants until the same shall be again varied and revised;

"(f.) In this section the words following shall have the meanings respectively attached to them, namely, 'person' includes corporation, whether aggregate or sole; 'variable rent' means a rent subject to variation and revision; 'prescribed period' means the period at the expiration of which a variation and revision of the variable rent, payable in respect of any lands leased or granted in perpetuity, may be required, in pursuance of any lease or grant of the same, or of any Act of Parliament, or this Act; 'revision notice' means a notice in writing signed by the person giving such notice, and requiring a variation and revision of any variable rent; 'grantor' means the person to whom such rent is payable; 'grantee' means the person by whom such rent is payable."—(The Earl of Leitrim.)

THE EARL OF ROSSE said, he must take exception to the proposal, which had for its object the relief of the noble Earl (the Earl of Leitrim) from his perpetual leases from Trinity College, Dublin.

LORD BRAMWELL said, the new clause differed from those in the Bill. It neither sought to have a fair rent fixed, nor a power to surrender the lease. To either of these the lessors would gladly agree, as the lessees were making a large profit rent. The noble Earl, one of the lessees, was receiving a profit rent of £2,000. What he sought was this—that when the rents received by the lessees of the College had been reduced, the rent payable by them to the College should be reduced in proportion. That was to say, if 20 per cent had been taken off the rents payable to the lessees, 20 per cent should be taken off the rents payable by them to the College. Why? Either they had been receiving more than a fair rent, or they had not. If they had been receiving more than they ought, how did that give them a claim to reduction of the rent payable to the College? If they had not been receiving more than they ought to have received, and injustice had been done them in the reduction of the rents payable to them, by what right did they want to shift part of the injustice on to the College? It might be hard upon the lessees in a sense; but what had Trinity College to do with that? Why should the lessors be losers? The rents paid by the lessees had been spoken of as statutory. The only sense in which they were so was that an Act was passed to legalize that which had been agreed upon. A bargain was struck, and it was made valid by Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that these statements were contrary to the fact.

LORD BRAMWELL said, that the Act of Parliament and the leases spoke for themselves; and now their Lordships were asked to disturb the bargain that was made. The proposal was unfair and unreasonable, and it had nothing to do with any part of the Bill.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he was sorry the question was brought forward at this hour, when those who usually supported the noble Earl (the Earl of Leitrim) were absent. No doubt, Trinity College would be delighted if their immediate tenants would surrender their leases, for surrender would enable them largely to increase their income. Perhaps it was their object to screw them down until they did surrender. It was said that the noble Earl who moved this clause paid the College £3,000 a-year, and received £5,000. It might be that the noble Earl had tenants who promised him, in the whole, £5,000; but it was very doubtful whether he received anything like that sum. There was no doubt the lessees were parties to the Act of 1881; but the question was whether it was a voluntary contract. The lessors said—"If you do not agree to our terms, we will not renew your leases." And the conditions imposed were very hard. He thought they could not do justice to the subject, which involved a great grievance, at that hour of the evening (20 minutes to 9), and he suggested that the Amendments should be withdrawn and brought up on Report.

EARL CADOGAN said, the Government could not accept these Amendments for the reasons already stated. The proposal was entirely outside the scope and object of the Bill.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he would accept the advice of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Fitzgerald), and postpone his Amendment until the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 28 (Court valuers in county courts) agreed to.

Clause 29 (Rules, orders, &c. for bankruptcy matters) agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord FITZGERALD, the following Amendment made:—

In page 14, after Clause 29, insert as a new Clause:—("In all actions of ejectment for non-payment of rent in the Civil Bill Court the fees, costs, charges, and emoluments henceforth recoverable shall be according to the scale of fees, costs, charges, and emoluments for the time being in force in ordinary civil bills, and in referring to such scale the annual rent of the holding for which such ejectment shall have been brought shall be deemed the amount sued for and decreed for respectively.")

Clauses 30 to 32, inclusive, agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday the 1st of July next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 122.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 13th June, 1887.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE—Forestry, Viscount Ebrington added.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order) — Second Reading — Manchester Ship Canal.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) * [287].

Second Reading—Places of Worship (Sites) [5], debate adjourned.

Committee—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [217] [Sixteenth Night]—R P.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—o—

MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL BILL

(by Order).

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th June], "That Standing Orders 62, 204, 223, and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a second time." — (Mr. Houldsworth.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. SOLATER - BOOTH (Hants, Basingstoke): I have to move, as an Amendment to the Motion made by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth), to leave out all after "Standing Orders," and insert—

"204 and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills."

I have to offer an apology to the House for interfering with a matter in regard to which I have certainly no personal interest, nor have any of my constituents, so far as I know. But I have, as the House knows, taken some interest in the conduct of Private Business for a good many years, and I was also Chairman of one of the Committees which considered this Manchester Ship Canal Bill, and I have watched with great interest the progress of this important undertaking since. This proposal to pass over the Standing Orders seems to me to go far beyond the necessities of the case, and we are running the risk of being placed in a false position with the country. Everybody must know that of late there has been a growing indisposition on the part of the House to interest itself in matters concerning Private Bill legislation, and there has been a certain degree of recklessness as to the consequences of this neglect, as was exemplified in the celebrated Hull and Barnsley case. It is well known how the House found itself situated in regard to the exceptional legislation which then took place. I do not propose to go into the case now, and I have only alluded to it by way of example; but I think that every hon. Member who is aware of the action of Parliament in that case will not feel inclined to allow on this occasion a second departure which may be established into a precedent, and which may have the effect of misleading public opinion and of inducing those who are ordinarily prudent in regard to the investments they make to relinquish this prudence on the faith of a Parliamentary arrangement. No doubt this case differs very much from that. This is a case where the undertaking has not been commenced, and in which the share list has not been fully subscribed; but, nevertheless, the House is asked to enable the promoters to raise £4,000,000 of capital by Preference Stock, and to pass by that which has always hitherto been regarded by Parliament as an important preliminary—namely, that the consent of the shareholders should have been secured. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) proposes to suspend Standing Order No. 62, which is the Standing Order which requires that a Wharnccliffe meeting shall have been held in accordance with the regulations laid down by Parliament, under which the shareholders of a Company should have received due notice so as to give them an opportunity of withdrawing their consent to an alteration in the financial conditions under which an undertaking was originally promoted, and the capital of that Company was authorized to be raised. One of the difficulties I have in pressing this Motion is that it may have the effect of delaying the progress of this measure, and that it may be dangerous to the future success of the scheme. That, of course, I have no wish to do; but I think that Parliament would act very wrongly if it were to allow the Bill to go forward without being satisfied that the spirit of Standing Order No. 62 had been complied with—that is to say, that the original subscribers to the undertaking had cast in their lot with the present Bill. The original shareholders are now told that £4,000,000 Debenture Stock are to come before them, so far as interest is concerned; and what I maintain is that the original shareholders should have a full opportunity of giving their assent, or, if they are so minded, of retiring from any subscription they have already agreed to make. There is another difficulty which I may mention, and that is that the Standing Order refers to the proprietors or the proprietary of the undertaking, and I am not sure that there is any proprietary at all in this undertaking. We have been told that something like £700,000 have been actually subscribed, and that £3,000,000 have been subscribed sub modo—that is, taken conditionally upon something else being completed. It is a matter of doubt whether, if this Bill goes before the Examiners, it could be held that there is any proprietary in the strict sense of the word, or whether those who have only subscribed sub modo are competent to exercise a discretion as to whether the Bill shall be completed or not; but whether it is competent for them to do that or not, what I contend is that Parliament should take care that whether they are competent to exercise an opinion “Aye” or “No,” that, at all events, they should be at liberty to withdraw their subscriptions if they are so minded. That is the object I have in proposing this Amendment to the proposal of the hon. Member for Manchester. I feel that there will be a little further difficulty in the event of this Bill finding its way before an ordinarily constituted Parliamentary Committee—namely, the doubt whether a Private Bill Committee will, unless it receives special instructions, be competent to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case. Parliament may incur a heavy responsibility if, without full consideration, it is prepared to sanction such an unusual and unsatisfactory course of action. I, therefore, venture to hope, whether my Amendment finds favour with the House or not, that the Bill will eventually be sent before such a Committee as may be charged with and competent to perform the duty of inquiring into the whole facts and circumstances of the case. Knowing the value which at this moment is attached to the time of the House, I do not intend to enter into the subject at any greater length; and I have only considered it necessary to bring it forward now in order that mischief may not be done either on one side or the other. As I have said, I have no personal interest in the case; but I think that Parliament ought to be scrupulous not to establish a precedent which may hereafter prove to be unsatisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. Gentleman move his Amendment?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Selater-Booth

Amendment proposed,

After the words "Standing Orders," to add the words "204 and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills."—(Mr. Selater-Booth.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I fully sympathize with the views which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed on the subject, and I can assure him that the promoters have not the slightest intention, in what they propose to do, of injuring or altering the position of the present proprietors of the Manchester Ship Canal, or the persons who may have applied for shares. We have been most scrupulous on that point, and I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that the steps we are taking will be sufficient to place every applicant for shares and every present shareholder in a position in which he will be not only enabled, but called upon, to give his consent before the arrangement we are asking Parliament to sanction can be carried out. Now, the House will remember that the power which we received under the Manchester Ship Canal Act was a power to raise £8,000,000 of capital. We now propose to divide that capital into two, one part to consist of Preference Stock, which is to receive the first payment of a dividend of 5 per cent; but as this preferential claim is not cumulative the shareholders who subscribe this Preference Stock will take a substantial risk, along with the ordinary shareholders. The ordinary shareholders may be taken to represent the present shareholders and the applicants for shares. Perhaps I ought to inform the House that the present shareholders represent a subscribed sum of £750,000 of capital; the balance between this sum and the £3,000,000 which we have at present guaranteed represent shareholders who have applied for shares to that extent, and these shares have been applied for on certain conditions, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated. Now, with regard to those applicants, a Circular, which I hold in my hand, has been sent out to them, and the condition there stated is that unless they absolutely and entirely give their consent to this arrangement, and practically apply again for the shares they have proposed to take, we shall have no hold upon them, but they will be perfectly free. With regard to the present shareholders, it is not intended, in asking for a suspension of Standing Order No. 62, to evade the holding of a Wharnccliffe meeting. The only portion of the Standing Order we desire to suspend is that part of it which provides that we should report to the Examiners that the meeting required by the Act of Parliament to be held has been actually held. We do not intend to evade any of our responsibility, but all we want to do is to save a few days, and we are prepared to give an undertaking, and, if necessary, I should be prepared to add it to this Motion, that we should report to the Committee on the Bill that such a meeting has been held, and that the necessary proportion of the shareholders have given their assent to the undertaking before we seek to have it performed. Under the circumstances, I think the House will see that we have done everything we possibly could to gain the consent of those more interested in the matter. I have no desire to occupy the time of the House or to trespass upon it, for I am anxious to give our opponents an opportunity of saying everything they have to say with regard to the proposition we are now making to the House. Time, however, is an element of the greatest importance in the case. I believe that unless the House is prepared to sanction the second reading of the Bill on the present occasion, it will be almost impossible, if not quite impossible, to make the necessary arrangements for carrying on the undertaking. If opportunity is afforded for a protracted inquiry, the time for the completion of the undertaking, which lapses on the 5th of August, must necessarily lapse. But if our opponents think that the lapse of the powers we at present possess will kill the Manchester Ship Canal, then they are very much mistaken. The only effect of defeating us now will be that we shall have to apply to Parliament again next Session, and another £50,000 would have to be added to the £150,000 already spent by the promoters of the undertaking in getting the necessary sanction of Parliament to it. I believe there is no doubt that, whatever our opponents may do, the feeling of Lancashire and Yorkshire has been so much aroused in this case that the effect of defeating us at this moment will only be to delay an undertaking which its opponents cannot absolutely kill. I am quite aware that we are asking from Parliament, on this occasion, certain unusual powers; but I ought to explain that that is not the fault of the promoters of the Bill; it arises very much from the conditions which were imposed in the original Act of Parliament, by which we were prevented from carrying out any part of the undertaking until practically the enormous capital of £8,000,000 was actually subscribed. That is an unusual condition; but it is not a condition of which we have ever complained, or in regard to which we complain to-day, although it has placed difficulties in the way of the promoters which cannot be fully appreciated except by those who have to carry out the working of such an undertaking. It was made a condition precedent that this very large amount of capital should be raised before the works were commenced, and we have experienced considerable difficulty in raising it in Lancashire at a time when trade has been so much depressed. If I may use such an expression we have had to do it in cold blood, and with a great deal of uncertainty hanging over the people of Lancashire in regard to whether this undertaking will ever really be carried out or not. We are now in a position to say that the arrangements we have made will render it perfectly certain that the capital will be raised without any doubt whatever, and the mere announcement of that fact has had an electrical effect in stimulating the interest which is felt in the undertaking. I am informed that 70 per cent of the shareholders, although they were only applied to on Thursday last, have sent in assents confirming their applications, and that only one-half per cent have expressed dissent with the new arrangement which has been proposed. I may add, further, that there have been new applications for shares from three times the number of persons whose dissent has been expressed; and, therefore, it is quite evident that the shareholders do not believe they can be placed in a worse position than that which they would have occupied before the new arrangement was made. I urgently appeal to the House to grant us the facilities we ask for. We do not require the suspension of the Standing Orders for the purpose of preventing our opponents from carrying out any legislative opposition they can legitimately bring to bear upon the scheme. The object of asking for the suspension of the Standing Orders is simply to save time, without depriving our opponents of any of the rights they would enjoy under ordinary circumstances. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that our opponents can have very little to do with the question that is before the House, and the proposal which is now introduced. It is not a question in which they are interested in the slightest degree. The opposition to the scheme, all along, has been occasioned by the fact that the opponents thought their own interests were likely to be sacrificed, and that the position of the Port of Liverpool might be jeopardized by the carrying out of this undertaking. I do not believe a word of it. I do not believe that the interests of Liverpool will be jeopardized in the slightest degree; on the contrary, I believe that neither the interests of the Port of Liverpool nor of the Railway Companies will suffer in the end. As I have said, although the matter is of the utmost importance to the promoters, if this Bill is not passed now, it will only delay a measure which must come on again next year. Therefore, if the Bill is to be passed, I would ask the House to pass it at once, because a single day may involve the risk of upsetting the whole of the arrangements which have been entered into.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): I think it will be the opinion of the House almost universally that as little time as possible should be occupied in this discussion consistently with the importance of the subject; and it is with the hope of abbreviating the discussion that may follow that I have risen thus early. With respect to the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth), it has been made clear by the speech we have just heard that the rights of the shareholders will be substantially protected. The spirit of the Standing Orders will be carried out, even if the words are for the moment set aside. The Wharnccliffe meeting will be held on Monday next, and, if there be dissentient shareholders, these shareholders will not be precluded from carrying on their opposition to the Bill in precisely the same way as if the Wharfedale meeting had been held before this stage. Therefore, allowing this stage will in no degree prejudice the right of these shareholders. There is, however, another question of which we shall probably hear a good deal, and which it is important for the House to consider. This scheme has been sanctioned by Parliament, after repeated examinations by Committees of both Houses. It has been sanctioned to this extent—that the opinion of the Legislature has undoubtedly been expressed that it is a scheme which might fairly be tried. At the same time, Parliament has laid down very extreme financial conditions under which it is to be carried out. Those conditions cannot be lightly disregarded. It is impossible to pay attention to the approval of the scheme and disregard the conditions annexed to it. Those conditions, I apprehend, were annexed on this principle—that the scheme does expose very considerable interests to some risk, and that risk ought not to be entered upon wantonly or without some substantial security—not only that the matter was prosecuted bonâ fide, but was prosecuted under conditions to give guarantee of the substantial character of the undertaking. It was for that reason, I apprehend, that the strict financial conditions were annexed to the sanction given by Parliament; and the Bill now proposed is, in effect, to dispense in some degree with those financial conditions. We ought, if possible, to secure the same authority in favour of dispensation that we had in favour of originally imposing the conditions. This House, speaking of it as a body, is no more competent to undertake the question whether or no those financial conditions are absolutely necessary than it was competent to undertake the question whether the scheme, as a whole, should be passed or not; but the Committee which annexed those financial conditions to the scheme is a competent body to advise us on the question whether the conditions can be dispensed with. Without, therefore, allowing a Committee to go into the mercantile or engineering character of the scheme, or to enter on that which has been decided, it is, I conceive, a very proper thing that the precise question which is now treated in this Bill—namely, the dispensation with the financial conditions—should be referred to a Committee, and before that Committee the interests which were protected by these conditions should be allowed to appear. I took the opportunity of bringing together the agents interested in this matter—the agent for the promoters, and those representing the London and North-Western Railway, the Mersey Docks, and the Liverpool Corporation—and suggested to them that the Bill might be allowed to be read a second time if it was understood that it should be referred to an ordinary Committee of four Members, and that the examination before that Committee should be strictly confined to this issue—whether the substitution of the proposed financial arrangement was one that could be sanctioned, having regard to the motive and purpose of the original arrangement, and the large amount of capital which is involved. Perhaps I may be allowed to add that since I have been in the House I have received a message from the agent to the promoters of the Bill, stating that they assent to the condition which I proposed. In these circumstances I apprehend the opponents would be perfectly satisfied with the conditions of reference; and if the agent of the promoters, as I understand, is ready to assent to these conditions, I think the House may consent to allow the Bill to be read a second time, upon the understanding that it shall be referred to an ordinary Committee of four Members constituted for that purpose. No time should be lost in getting to work, and the inquiry, as I have said, should be confined strictly to the question as to whether the financial conditions under which the Bill was formerly sanctioned could be transformed to the proposed conditions consistently with the respect paid to those interests in regard to which the financial conditions were presumably imposed.

Mr. Houldsworth

MR. HOULDSWORTH: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the agent for the promoters had no authority to give consent to the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means, and I am quite sure he has not done so without authority.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I am quite satisfied with the proposal which has been made by my hon. Friend, if my hon. Friend will undertake that the Committee shall receive an Instruction in the direction I have intimated. In that case the necessary preliminary of a reference to a Wharnccliffe meeting might be waived, on the understanding that the Examiners of Private Bills should be satisfied as to the bond fide character of the assent of the shareholders in regard to the conditions which I have specified. In that case I shall be perfectly content to withdraw my Motion.

MR. COURTNEY: I assent entirely to the stipulation which has been laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. So far as the remarks of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) are concerned, in reference to the assent of the agent for the promoters, I have only to say that I received the message from the agent since I entered the House.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): There is one question which I should like to put to the Chairman of Ways and Means, and it has reference to the proposed Reference to the Committee. Will the hon. Member accept the Motion which I have placed on the Paper that the Select Committee to whom the Bill is referred shall consist of nine Members; that the Petitioners against the Bill shall be entitled to be heard; and that the Committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records?

MR. COURTNEY: The proposal of the hon. Member is to increase the number of the Committee, which is always undesirable unless there is a special reason for it. I do not think it would be advisable to allow everybody to come in and to raise any matter which may not be legitimate to the issue submitted to the Committee.

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY (Oxford University): I agree with the Chairman of Ways and Means that, as a general rule, it is undesirable to increase the numbers of a Committee, especially in a matter like this, where you have already had the question tried six times over. I think that four Members are quite sufficient to deal with such a question as that which is proposed to be referred to the Committee, and I hope the House will not consent to increase the number.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton): On behalf of the Corporation of Liverpool, I believe I am justified in saying that they will be prepared to accept the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Mr. Solater-Booth

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: I am quite ready to withdraw my Amendment, on the understanding that the Chairman of Ways and Means will frame an Instruction to the Select Committee in regard to the points which I have mentioned.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I should like to remind the House that we have not yet had an assurance that the promoters of the Bill are prepared to accept the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: All I have to say is that I was not made aware of the negotiations with the promoters of the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means has referred. I received no information upon the subject of any kind. Now, however, I am given to understand that the promoters have been consulted. I shall not, therefore, further oppose the proposition. I still hold strongly the opinion that the course suggested is unnecessary. The Bill itself distinctly provides that certain formalities must be gone through before the works are commenced, in order that Parliament may be satisfied that the financial conditions have been fulfilled. For instance, the Company are bound to prove to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that £5,000,000 have been raised in a bond fide manner, and a certificate to that effect must be given before the work is begun. At the same time, as there appears to have been some kind of assent given by the promoters, although without my knowledge, to the course now proposed to be taken, I will not further oppose it.

MR. SINCLAIR: I cannot see that there is any great difference between the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means and the Motion which I have placed on the Paper; and, therefore, on the part of the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, I may say that I do not intend to persist with my Motion. At the same time, I think there would be considerable advantage in having the matter thoroughly investigated in the way I suggested.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): As the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means has come on the House by surprise, I should like to understand exactly what it is that is proposed to be done. It must be borne in mind that, up to the present time, the Bill has not been agreed to; and there may be fresh opponents whose opposition would have the effect of increasing, to an enormous extent, the delay which may arise in passing the Bill. What we complain of is that the course which is now being pursued may enable our opponents to do, by a side wind, something which they would not venture to do openly in the House. What I want to know is whether a number of persons who are interested in this question, but who have no locus standi, are to be allowed to appear before the Committee; and in that case it may be necessary to give a further Instruction to the Committee, somewhat similar to that which was given on Friday night in regard to an important public measure—namely, that the Bill must be reported to the House by a certain day? Unless something of that kind is done, I am afraid that the Bill may be defeated by the opposition that may be raised to it in certain quarters, although the opponents can have but a very small interest in the undertaking. For instance, I fail to see what interest the London and North-Western Railway Company can have in opposing a Bill of this kind. The only object of the Bill is to enable the promoters to raise the money which is necessary to enable them to carry out an undertaking that has already received the sanction of Parliament, and they are simply proposing to divide their capital. When I have witnessed the alacrity with which the opponents of the measure—some of whom, I am sorry to say, are sitting near me—accepted the compromise suggested by the Chairman of Ways and Means, I fear that if they succeed in carrying their opposition much further they will prevent the ultimate passing of the Bill. Therefore, I think we ought to know who the opponents of the Bill are, and how many of them are to be allowed a locus standi, and we ought further to know, to some extent, the reasons upon which a locus standi is to be granted.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): As a shareholder of the London and North-Western Railway, I cannot, for the life of me, see what that Company has to do with the matter. This is a question solely as to how the capital is to be raised; and I think the House ought to say that the only persons concerned are the shareholders of the Company and the public. Therefore, I hope that the Instruction moved by the Chairman of Ways and Means will be a very narrow one, or we may have this result—that the persons who have opposed the measure hitherto, and who have been beaten, will raise the whole of their opposition again in a more insidious form. I therefore trust that the Chairman of Ways and Means will take care that the London and North-Western Railway Company are not allowed a locus standi.

MR. COURTNEY: There is, I think, no danger of the multiplication of persons having a locus standi, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison) has suggested. You may be sure the agent will not consent to that. But to enter into the question now raised by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) would be really to argue the whole question. As a matter of fact, if we are asked now to go into the question whether the London and North-Western Railway Company are to have a locus standi to oppose this Bill, it would amount to a discussion of a question which had far better be left to the Select Committee upstairs. It was in order to avoid a discussion of that kind that I suggested the compromise between the promoters and the opponents, with the sincere hope that the consideration of the matter would not occupy any considerable amount of time. In all probability, the only bodies to whom locus standi will be granted will be the London and North-Western Railway Company, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the Corporation of Liverpool, who, in all probability, will be represented by the same counsel, although I am not absolutely entitled to say that that will be the case. At all events, the Reference will be a most narrow one. I believe that both the opponents and promoters of the measure are actuated by a sincere desire that the matter should not occupy much time, and that the Committee should be strictly confined to the point which has been raised. The promoters of the Bill are, I believe, satisfied that the proposal will not in any way imperil the scheme, owing to the efflux of time.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): The Chairman of Ways and Means cannot guarantee that the inquiry will be a short one, because that must depend upon the character of the opposition. I therefore wish to give Notice that when the Chairman of Ways and Means moves the Instruction to the Committee, I shall move, as a further Instruction, that the Select Committee shall report the Bill to the House by a certain date which I shall be then prepared to give.

MR. SINCLAIR: May I ask the indulgence of the House in order that I may refer to an observation which fell from the hon. and learned Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison). The hon. and learned Member referred to the alacrity with which the opponents of the Bill had accepted the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means. I would only say that those opponents would very much prefer to thresh the matter out on the floor of this House rather than in a Committee upstairs; but they have accepted the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means, in deference to the quarter from which it proceeded.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made, by leaving out 204 and 223.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 62 and 235 be suspended.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—PAROCHIAL RELIEF, 1886 —STATISTICS.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) asked the President of the Local Government Board, How many persons received parochial relief in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, in the year ending 31st December, 1886, and the number in each country of indoor and of outdoor paupers?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am unable to state how many persons received parochial relief in England, Wales, and Scotland respectively during the year ending December 31, 1886. As regards England and Wales, it is the practice of the Local Government Board to obtain Returns of the numbers of paupers on certain days only. On January 1 last there were 822,215 paupers in the country in receipt of relief, of whom 201,698 were indoor and 620,517 outdoor paupers. With respect to Scotland, I am informed by the Board of Supervision that, on January 14 last, the total number of paupers, registered and casual, including dependents, receiving relief was 99,734; and that on January 1 last the total number in poor-houses was 10,233. The Local Government Board for Ireland state that, according to the Returns for the week ended January 1, 1887, the total number of persons in receipt of relief on that day was 113,241, of whom 65,015 received outdoor relief, 47,477 were in workhouses, and 749 in blind, deaf, and dumb asylums.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—STATISTICS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the number of evictions and of persons evicted in Ireland during April and May, 1887?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the number of evictions in Ireland during the period mentioned was 1,013. The total number from the beginning of the year was 4,909, of which 2,733 persons were re-admitted as caretakers.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT—SCARLATINA—DR. KLEIN'S MILK THEORY.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he can give the House information as to any investigations which the veterinary officials of the Agricultural Department have been instructed to make into Dr. Klein's theory of scarlatina infection from the milk of diseased cows; whether, at present, any confirmation of that theory has been obtained by the investigations of other medical or veterinary observers; and, whether he can lay upon the Table of the House any Reports on the subject, and any communications which have passed between the Agricultural Department and the Local Government Board?

Sir Henry James

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): The inquiry respecting the alleged scarlatina outbreak by the agency of the milk of diseased cows is still being carried on. But, up to the present time, the investigations of medical and veterinary observers do not justify any positive conclusion. Communications on the subject have taken place between the Local Government Board—with which we are anxious to co-operate—and the Agricultural Department, and a Report will be laid before Parliament as soon as the inquiry is completed.

THE CURRENCY—FRENCH AND ITALIAN COPPER COINS.

Mr. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can state the quantity of 5 and 10 centime pieces received by the post offices up to the end of May; and, whether he intends to make any further provision for the withdrawal from circulation of French and Italian copper coins?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The total sum of about £23,000 will have been paid by the Mint to the Postmaster General for foreign bronze coin withdrawn from circulation by the Post Office in the United Kingdom to the end of last month. The weight of the coin withdrawn is rather more than 55 tons. By far the greater part of the coin has been withdrawn from circulation in London and the seaport towns in the South and South-East of England. There has been no special demand for British bronze coin, either in the Metropolitan district or the Provinces, in consequence of the withdrawal of foreign coin. It is the opinion of the postmasters that the withdrawal is practically complete, and that during the six weeks allowed for it, from April 20 till May 31, there has been ample time for the public to exchange the amounts which it held. There would not appear to be any necessity, therefore, now that public attention has been called to the matter, to make any further provision for the withdrawal of foreign coin; but notices will be circulated by means of the Post Office and Customs, at seaports, warning the public that the coin is not legal tender in the United Kingdom, and that its importation is prohibited.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1878—CERTIFICATES OF BIRTHS.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, under "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1878," section 11, a Secretary of State has, as therein provided, issued the particulars and fixed the fee regarding certificates of birth for the purposes of the Education Acts?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): An Order was issued by the Home Secretary dealing with this matter on the 10th of June, 1879, and was communicated to school boards in Scotland by the Scotch Education Department on 4th September, 1879.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—ANGUS MACLAUCHLAN.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether due inquiries have been made in reference to the complaint made by Angus MacLauchlan, Carpenter, Aviemore, Inverness-shire, for assault, oppression, and nimious conduct on the part of certain influential persons, the receipt of which complaint was acknowledged by the Crown Agent on 22nd April last?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Due inquiry was made into this complaint on the receipt of the letter acknowledged by the Crown Agent on 22nd April; and on 6th May, by my instructions, a letter was sent to Angus MacLauchlan to inform him that I did not consider there were grounds for a prosecution at the public instance.

ARMY — CADETS OF THE ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY AT ALDERSHOT.

COLONEL HAMILTON (Southwark, Rotherhithe) asked the Secretary of State for War, As to whether it is the intention of the Government to require the cadets of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, to pay out of their own pockets the expenses of attending the Jubilee Review at Aldershot?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said, that the expenses of the cadets in attending the Review would be borne by the Mess Fund of the Royal Military Academy.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN RYAN, AN EVICTED TENANT.

Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Ryan, who was committed to prison by the High Sheriff of the County of Tipperary on the 31st March, 1886, for taking possession of a holding from which he had been evicted, and whose period of imprisonment is stated in the Return, recently presented to the House, to be for an "indefinite term;" whether the High Sheriff of any county in Ireland has the power to commit to prison for an "indefinite term" an evicted tenant for re-taking possession of his holding; and, whether, having regard to the fact that John Ryan has been in prison for upwards of 12 months, the case will be brought under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: John Ryan appears to have been committed to prison on June 4, 1886, pursuant to an order of attachment for contempt issued from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland. The contempt committed was that stated in the Return; but the Governor of the prison, in sending forward the materials for the Return, erroneously stated that the committal was by the Sheriff, who merely signed the warrant pursuant to the writ of the Court. The Sheriff, of himself, has no power to commit to prison. Ryan was informed in October last, in reply to a Memorial forwarded by him to the Lord Lieutenant, that any application for his release should be made through the Judge who committed him for contempt; but he has not made any such application. It has been open to him to obtain his release at any time by purging the contempt, and the Government are unable to interfere in the matter.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—EXPERIMENTAL WIRE GUNS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a 10-inch wire howitzer and a 9·2-inch wire gun were constructed last year at Woolwich; and, if so, what was the weight and cost of each of them; and, also, whether he would be so good as to describe, in regard to the rounds fired from each of these guns—(a) the weight of charge and nature of powder; (b) weight of projectile; (c) muzzle velocity for each round; and (d) the maximum powder pressure, with any other particulars of an interesting character; and, whether he will kindly afford, in an Unopposed Return, any information that he is unable to embody in the answer to this Question?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The two guns in question are entirely experimental, and the Secretary of State does not think it would be to the interest of the Service to publish the details asked for by my hon. and gallant Friend; but he will have no objection to give him such details confidentially for his own information.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—SERGEANT MURPHY.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the case of Sergeant Murphy, of the Metropolitan Police, any Report has been received from the Royal Naval Hospital at Plymouth, stating the nature and cause of his illness; and, if not, whether he will make the necessary inquiries?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Deputy Inspector General of the Royal Naval Hospital at Plymouth, who states that the nature of Police Constable Murphy's illness is very obscure, and that the symptoms probably point to brain disease. He cannot say what the cause of the illness is, or whether it arises from drinking. However, the Chief Commissioner has no doubt from the evidence that this man was drunk on the 12th ultimo, for which offence he was reduced in rank before his present illness came on.

CENTRAL ASIA—TRADE COMMUNICATION WITH THIBET—THE CONVENTION WITH CHINA.

SIR JOHN SIMON (Dewsbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to two communications from Mr. W. Warry, of Her Majesty's Consular Service at Darjeeling, India, to the Dewsbury Chamber of Commerce, copies of which were sent in November or December last to the Secretary of State for India, relating to the opening up of trade with Thibet; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps for giving effect to the clause in the recent Convention with China relating to Thibet?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I have read the Reports referred to. Mr. Warry belongs to the Consular Service in China, and was detached for special service under the Government of India. I can add nothing to the reply which I have already given to the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) and others on this subject. The matter will not be lost sight of; but it is not considered advisable to take any further steps at present.

POST OFFICE (LONDON)—POSITION OF PORTERS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Postmaster General, If he will state what number of hours the General Post Office (London) porters have to work; whether there is any promotion open to them as sorters, postmen, or messengers; whether they are liable to a stoppage of pay when absent from sickness, which is not required from men similarly employed in other Departments; and, whether it is a fact that they are not allowed Bank Holidays?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The Post Office porters in London work, as a rule, from eight and a-half to nine hours a-day. Promotion is open to them as postmen, as messengers, and also, as far as the limits of age correspond, as sorters. During absence from illness they receive exactly the same proportion of their pay as members of corresponding, or nearly corresponding, class in the Post Office—that is to say, two-thirds. On Bank Holidays the indoor work of the Post Office is much the same as on other days. Anything in the shape of a general holiday is, therefore, impossible. But in the case of the porters, as of other members of the indoor force, the superintending officers have instructions to let as many as possible be away.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL—CARRIAGE OF TOWN REFUSE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether he is prepared to introduce a clause in the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, compelling the Railway Companies to carry town refuse at a cheap rate, in accordance with the Petition of the Wandsworth District Board of Works?

THE SECRETARY (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): It is not the intention of the Board of Trade to introduce on behalf of the Government such a clause as that referred to by the hon. Member.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS—THE TRINITY HOUSE REPORT.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, in reference to his statement that his chief objection to the investigation of the Trinity House Report on Lighthouse Illuminants was the expense which would be involved, Whether he has received an undertaking or guarantee from Mr. Wigham that the cost of that investigation would not exceed £2,000; whether Mr. Wigham had also previously offered his own services gratuitously in connection with the inquiry; whether he will consider the advisability of accepting Mr. Wigham's offer and his guarantee; and, whether the Board of Trade have received Memorials from shipowners of Liverpool, Belfast, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and other places; also from the authorities of Queenstown Harbour, repeating their demands made last Session that the Report of the Trinity House should be referred to independent authority for investigation?

THE SECRETARY (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I would point out to the hon. Member that the question of expenditure was not the only one adverted to in my statement to which he refers. But if such had been the case, the Board of Trade, in the present condition of the Mercantile Marine Fund, could not sanction any expenditure not absolutely essential and necessary to meet immediate requirements, even if it were admitted to be otherwise expedient. As regards the last paragraph, I would observe that the bodies referred to have repeated demands on which the Board of Trade came to a decision last year.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that in consequence of the reply of the hon. Gentleman he should, on going into Committee of Supply, call attention to lighthouse illuminants, and the action of the Trinity House in reference thereto.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the Postmaster General, Whether negotiations are now pending for the renewal of the monopoly of the Submarine Telegraph Company, which expires in 1889; and, whether, before any final decision is taken, the conditions will be stated, so that the various Chambers of Commerce may have an opportunity of considering them?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I am in communication with the Telegraphic Administrations of some of the neighbouring Foreign States with regard to the arrangements which it will be necessary to make for the transmission of telegrams between this country and those States when the concessions now held by the Submarine Telegraph Company from France and Belgium expire in 1889. I do not think that I can promise to submit these arrangements to the Chambers of Commerce; but I shall be ready to consider any suggestion that they may desire to make.

THE "BOARD OF TRADE JOURNAL"—ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Treasury was consulted and gave its sanction to the Stationery Office, prior to the decision having been taken, to insert commercial advertisements in The Board of Trade Journal; and, whether he can state when the existing contract for advertisements will terminate?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said, the Treasury had been consulted and had given its sanction in this matter. The existing contract for advertisements would terminate on December 31, 1889.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS—THE HAMMERSMITH AND WANDSWORTH DISTRICTS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is a fact that, although the population of London has increased since the year 1839 from under 2,000,000 to over 4,000,000 there has not been any increase in the number of the magistrates of the Metropolitan Police Courts, although during that period, in addition to this increase of population, the jurisdiction of the magistrates has been very greatly extended by many Acts of Parliament; and, whether, considering the great increase of population and rateable value in the Hammersmith and Wandsworth Police Court Districts, and inasmuch as this subject has now been under the consideration of Government for more than seven years, and he has twice stated in the House that it is necessary that these Courts should be made whole day Courts, the establishment of such whole day Courts will be carried out without any further delay?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The establishment of whole day Courts at Hammersmith and Wandsworth has been decided on, but not carried out at present, as the Treasury are anxious that the cost of additional magistrates should be saved by a redistribution of the existing magisterial strength. A Departmental Committee is now inquiring, and will shortly report to me, how far such a redistribution is possible. Pending these inquiries no change in these Courts has been made.

Baron Henry De Worms

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—INSANITARY STATE OF DOVER BARRACKS (FORT BURGOYNE).

MR. PRESTON BRUCE (Fifeshire, W.) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the expert of the Local Government Board has inspected Fort Burgoyne, with reference to the cases of typhoid fever which occurred there; whether he reports the sanitary condition of these barracks to be satisfactory, or as in need of improvement; and, whether it is still intended to quarter here, about the 23rd instant, a portion of the 4th Brigade Royal Artillery (Fife Militia)?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOE) (Exeter): The Report of the Inspector of the Local Government Board as to the sanitary condition of Fort Burgoyne has not yet reached me; but the General Officer at Dover has telegraphed that the Inspector is of opinion that the fort will be in a perfectly sanitary condition, providing certain small alterations are made. These can easily be effected before the 23rd instant; and, under these circumstances, the 4th Brigade, Scottish Division, Royal Artillery, will be moved there on that date.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE POLICE BARRACK AT MEENACLADDY, COUNTY DONEGAL—THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—SHERCOCK PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) had the two subjoined Questions on the Paper:—

To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the police barracks lately opened in Magheroarty, in the County of Donegal, have been rented under an agreement terminable at three months' notice, at a rent of £15 per year, from a woman named Tennant, whose husband is now in America; whether the six constables pay above that sum by money deducted out of their wages for rent; whether the Government in other cases pay a portion of the rents; whether the Government now insist on a sum of £40 being expended in repairs by Mrs. Tennant; and, whether the Government will put the house in proper repair at its own expense, making it suitable for a barracks?

To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is correct, as reported in The Anglo-Celt, a Cavan paper, that Shercock Petty Sessions was held on the 12th instant; whether Thomas Chambers, Esq., J.P., was Chairman on the occasion; Ben. S. Adams, Esq., J.P., was also present; whether five men were tried for drunkenness, three of them Catholics, and two Protestants; and, whether the Catholics were fined 10s. each, while the Protestants were fined only 2s. 6d. each?

MR. O'HANLON: I wish to postpone these two Questions until they can be answered by the Chief Secretary.

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I can answer the Questions.

MR. O'HANLON: I wish to reserve them for some future occasion.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is quite competent for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to answer the Questions on the Paper.

MR. O'HANLON: I propose to ask them—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: With regard to the first Question, the Constabulary Authorities report that this question must relate to Meenacaddy Barracks. It is held at an annual rent of £15 under the usual yearly agreement, terminable by three months' notice, from a Mrs. M'Ginley, whose husband resides in America. There are, at present, six men in the barracks, from whom a sum at the rate of £2 12s. each per annum is stopped, under Statute, on account of deductions for lodging allowance. The Government are not aware of any proposal with regard to an expenditure of £40 on repairs. With regard to the other Question, I have to reply that the Shercock Petty Sessions was held on the 12th May. The magistrates named were present. Ten persons were fined for drunkenness, eight of whom were Roman Catholics and two Protestants. Two of the Roman Catholics, who were disorderly, were fined 10s. each. One of the Protestants was fined 1s. 6d., it being his first offence, and the other Protestant, who did not appear, was fined 2s. 6d. The remainder of the Reman Catholics were fined the same as the Protestants.

MR. O'HANLON: Having got new matter, in addition to the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not answer the Questions fully. I shall repeat them next day.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE EVICTIIONS AT BODYKE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the descriptions in The Pall Mall Gazette of the evictions at Bodyke, and in particular to the statement that one of the bailiffs more than once threw his crowbar through an opening made in the walls of the houses, regardless of the fact that there were women and children inside; whether these men are men of respectable character; or, if not, whether they are in any, and how many, cases convicts or ex-convicts who have been in prison for various crimes; whether these men are employed by the Sheriffs or by the landlords' agents; and, whether, in any case, he will order that they shall be kept under more effective control?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: There was no such occurrence as a bailiff throwing a crowbar through an opening in the walls. A crowbar, on one occasion slipped from a bailiff's hand and entered the house through an aperture in the wall. This was purely accidental, and did not occur a second time. Of the 11 men employed nine are strangers, whom the police believe to be respectable men, and the other two are of the usual class of Sheriff's bailiffs, and have never been convicted of any serious offence. All these men were employed by the Sheriff. The local Constabulary officer reports that the statements in The Pall Mall Gazette about these evictions are highly coloured, quite inaccurate, and, in some cases, utterly untrue.

MR. CONYBEARE asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would give an assurance that only men who were competent to wield a crowbar should be employed in future?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is the right hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that one of the bailiffs engaged in these evictions is a bailiff named Woods, who was ordered to be prosecuted for perjury by Chief Baron Palles at the late Sligo trials, and on that occasion was censured by the Judge for his conduct at the Woodford evictions?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I am sorry to say I have no information on the subject.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman inquire?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN. If the hon. Gentleman puts a Question on the Paper I will.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman state to the House from whom he received the statement just read out?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: From the officer in charge of the Constabulary.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—THE NORTHERN MAILS.

DR. R. MACDONAND (Ross and Cromarty) (for Dr. CLARK) (Caithness) asked the Postmaster General, If he will give a Return of the weight of the mails sent by the 12.40 a.m. train from Perth to the North, and the 3.35 a.m. train from Aberdeen to Keith?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have given directions for the Return to be taken, and will forward a copy to the hon. Member.

WAR OFFICE—CONTRACTS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the statement which appeared in The Morning Post of the 10th instant, to the effect that the Government were now placing contracts for iron goods direct with manufacturers, instead of with "middlemen," having special regard to the quality of goods supplied, and not, as hitherto, exclusively to the matter of price, is correct; if this applies to goods of all descriptions required by the War Office; and, if he is prepared to consider the advisability of issuing a Circular to this effect to well-known manufacturers of high repute, who have hitherto abandoned submitting tenders for Government contracts, on account of the above-named reasons?

Colonel King-Harman

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: Iron goods and all manufactured articles are invariably obtained by competition among manufacturers only, and any contractor found sending in goods not made by him would be liable to be struck off the list of contractors. The only recent change has been to enlarge the scope of the competition, and the result has been beneficial. No addition to the War Office Circular of 1881, which has been generally communicated to manufacturers, appears to be necessary. The hon. Member has, however, slightly misquoted The Morning Post, which referred not to iron goods, but to iron itself. In this case two well-known firms of iron merchants have been employed for many years as contractors to the manufacturing departments for iron. When the practice of dealing with agents was discontinued in 1881 it was felt right to make some concession in favour of these two firms; and they are permitted, so long as the then principals continue in the business, to tender with manufacturers, naming in every case the maker of the iron for which they tender.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Do I rightly understand the hon. Gentleman to say that if any contractor sends in goods which are not of his own manufacture he will be struck off the list?

MR. NORTHCOTE: No one is to tender for goods not manufactured by themselves.

MR. MUNDELLA: In case of their doing so they are struck off the list?

MR. NORTHCOTE: They are liable to be struck off.

MR. HANBURY: Does that apply to the cases of Messrs. Latimer Clark and of Messrs. Wilkinson?

MR. NORTHCOTE said, he should be glad to answer that question if the hon. Member gave him Notice of it.

POST OFFICE — AN INSURANCE DEPARTMENT.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, since his statement, he has been able to institute such inquiries as might enable him to make a recommendation to the Government as to the formation of a Department, or otherwise, to undertake, at a reasonable charge, the insurance of letters containing bonds, scrip, or other valuable enclosures exceeding £10 in value?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): No, Sir. I have not; but attention will be given to the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR CHARLES WARREN'S BECHUANALAND EXPEDITION.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Despatches were received from Sir Charles Warren, dated 6th and 13th July, 1885, giving the military history of the Bechuanaland Expedition, and mentioning the names and services of the principal military officers who assisted in that Expedition; whether Sir Charles Warren's Despatches of 25th August and 18th November of the same year, mentioning the civil and political services rendered by officers and others, have been laid upon the Table; whether any reason exists for publishing the latter, and omitting to publish the former Despatches; and, whether a Copy of the Despatches of July 6th and 13th will be laid upon the Table?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The Despatches of the 6th and 13th of July, 1885, were confidential Reports by the General commanding the Expedition on the various officers and services under him. It is not customary to present such Despatches to Parliament.

MR. HANBURY said, he had been told that the Reports were not confidential.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE ADVANCE OF RUSSIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can state to within what distance from the present frontier of Afghanistan a Russian railway line is now laid?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Russian railway at present nowhere approaches within 130 miles of the Afghan Frontier. There have been reports that a branch line to Sarakhs, about 75 miles north of the frontier, has been commenced; but these reports have not yet been confirmed.

WAR OFFICE—REPORT OF THE ORD-NANCE INQUIRY COMMISSION.

Mr. R. POWER (Waterford) asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Report of the Evidence taken by the Ordnance Inquiry Commission will be presented to Parliament?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. Northcote) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The Secretary to the Royal Commission informs the Secretary of State that the Evidence will be printed in about a fortnight. I believe the indexing of the Evidence is the cause of the delay; but I will endeavour to see if the production cannot be accelerated. As the Commission was an entirely independent one, the War Office has had no control over the printing of the Evidence.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE BODYKE EVICTIIONS — CAPTAIN E. W. D.
CROKER.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Captain Edward W. D. Croker, now Sub-Sheriff of County Clare, and officiating at the evictions at Bodyke, is the same Captain Croker who was Governor of the Central Prison, Cyprus, and dismissed by Lord Derby for pecuniary irregularities, and is still an uncertificated bankrupt; and, if so, whether the Lord Lieutenant will cause inquiry to be made of the Sheriff of Clare as to Captain Croker's appointment?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I have not been able to ascertain the accuracy or non-accuracy of the hon. Member's Question; but the Government will make further inquiries on the subject.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND) — EVICTIIONS ON LORD KENMARE'S ESTATE, KILLARNEY.

Mr. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in The Daily News, of June 10th, that on the occasion of the evictions on Lord Kenmare's estate in the neighbourhood of Killarney last week, one case, that of a poor widow named Sullivan, and her seven children, was so distressing in all its features that many of the policemen present turned away and shed tears in silence; that one policeman suggested that a subscription should be raised on the spot; that the idea was warmly taken up by all save some Orange members of the Force, and would have been carried out but for the interference of Head-Constable Rowe, who threatened the men with all the pains and penalties of the Police Code; whether similar collections have repeatedly been made by the police on other occasions; and, whether there is really a provision in the Police Code forbidding members of the Force to contribute their own money for the relief of human misery?

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) also had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the account published in The Daily News, of the 10th instant, of the evictions on the Kenmare Estate, Killarney, is correct; whether it is true that the case of a widow named Sullivan was so miserable as to cause many of the police to shed tears, and to "speak in terms of condemnation of the cruel business;" whether, on an attempt being made to raise a subscription for the immediate relief of the family, the Head Constable Rowe refused to permit it, and threatened his men with punishment for transgressing the Police Code; and, whether there is any article in the Police Code prohibiting such acts of philanthropy on the part of the police; and, if so, why was such article not enforced in the case of the Glenbeigh Evictions when a sum of £1 2s. 6d. was collected for one of the victims among the constables present, headed by a donation from the Sub-Sheriff himself?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: I will now also reply to Question No. 39 put by the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) on the same subject. It is not true that the police shed tears, or spoke in terms of condemnation, in the case of the widow Sullivan. There was no attempt by any person to raise a subscription; therefore Head-Constable Rowe could not, and did not, act as alleged. There is no rule against members of the Royal Irish Constabulary contributing as individuals from their private means to any charitable object. At Glenbeigh a sum of £1 2s. 6d. was subscribed to pay for the conveyance of an aged woman to the workhouse. She was merely a sub-tenant, and lived on charity. The Sub-Sheriff's deputy subscribed. The Sub-Sheriff was not present.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to state his authority for the first part of the reply.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: The responsible officer in charge of the district.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN — THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the fact that, on Tuesday the 21st of June, the Metropolitan Police will not only be deprived of the enjoyment of the holiday in which all other classes of Her Majesty's subjects will participate, but will have unusually laborious duties to perform, and taking into account that a similar concession is reported to have been decided upon for the City Police, he will, on this entirely exceptional occasion, consent to grant an extra day's pay to the whole of the Metropolitan Force?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I shall be happy to consider favourably any application that the Chief Commissioner may make to me with the view of granting some special remuneration to those men to whom unusually laborious duties will be assigned on the occasion of the 21st instant.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to introduce the Employers' Liability Bill?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave last week—namely, that I hoped to lay this Bill on the Table before there was any reasonable prospect of the House being able to deal with it.

INDIA—SANITATION.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the letter of Mr. Justice Cunningham, in The Times of Thursday last, on the subject of sanitation in India; and, whether the Government are prepared to take any steps to carry out the objects indicated therein?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The sanitary condition of towns and villages in India is constantly under consideration by the Government of India and the Secretary of State; and every effort has been, and will be, made to introduce, from time to time, such improvements as may be practicable.

BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE—REDUCTION OF THE STAFFS OF THE INDOOR AND OUTDOOR DEPARTMENTS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the Board of Inland Revenue is reducing in any way the staffs both of the indoor and outdoor departments with a view to economizing the expenditure upon these departments; whether, in connection with the outdoor department, an Order has been recently issued stopping all promotion pending these contemplated alterations; whether, in the forthcoming re-organizations of these Services, it is contemplated to compensate in any way those who suffer from their promotion being deferred to considerably longer periods than they were led to expect when entering the Service; and, whether, with a view to increasing the efficiency of the said Services, and doing away with a widespread cause of complaint in a hard-worked and highly deserving branch of the Revenue Service, the Government will urge upon the Board the necessity there is for formulating some scheme whereby the junior officers and assistants of Excise may look with somewhat more certainty to increments of salary after certain definite periods of service?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's Hanover Square): Large reform

the Inland Revenue Service, both indoor and outdoor, are under consideration, which will, I believe, promote both efficiency and economy. I have no reason to believe that the prospects of any member of the Service will be injuriously affected by the changes under consideration.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—CONVEYANCE OF MAILS IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the present mail service by Bundoran to Bundoran Junction is by car; whether this service, by missing the connection with the mail train from Omagh to Enniskillen, causes serious delay to letters; whether the Bundoran Railway runs along the mail car road for its entire length to Bundoran; whether he has received a Memorial, dated 25th May, 1887, from the Town Commissioners of Ballyshannon, setting forth these facts at the request of the towns on the Bundoran line of railway; whether the present contract for the carriage of the mails is about to terminate; and, whether he, before entering into a new contract for a road service, will ascertain on what terms the railway, which runs parallel with the road, will convey the morning and evening mails between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The present mail service from Bundoran Junction to Bundoran is by car. This car is fitted to the night mail trains running in both directions between Omagh and Enniskillen. There were during the past winter several occasions when, owing to the heavy snow, the car failed to reach Bundoran Junction in time for the train; but, generally speaking, the car works satisfactorily. There is a railway running through the district to Bundoran; but the question of obtaining trains suitable for the mail service, as desired in the Memorial from Ballyshannon, to which the hon. Member refers, will require very careful consideration. There has not yet been time to deal with it since the Question appeared; but a Report is shortly expected. A fresh contract for the mail car has just been entered into. This can, however, be terminated at any time after three months' notice.

Mr. Goschen

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—THE ROYAL PROCESSION—POST OFFICES.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the officials, usually employed at the post offices along the route of the Royal Procession to Westminster Abbey, have received notice not to attend on that day, that room may be provided for some of the higher officials of the Post Office to view the procession without payment?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): No, Sir. In fact, the very reverse is the case. The Secretary of the Post Office made a personal inspection of the offices in question a few days ago, with the object of ascertaining what accommodation existed; and he then informed the officers in charge that it was my particular desire that none of the local staff should lose the opportunity of witnessing the procession.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—THE EVICTIONS AT BODYKE—ALLEGED VIOLENCE TO AN OLD WOMAN.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has inquired into the facts described in the following paragraph from The Pall Mall Gazette of the 9th instant:—

"It is true Pat Walsh's mother of 80 was bludgeoned in his house, as she sat in her chair, by a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who formed one of the volunteer storming party, and she has at this moment the marks of his baton in the shape of a bad black eye;"

and, whether the above statements are accurate; and, if so, whether he will take immediate steps to punish the conduct of the constable in question, and to prevent similar occurrences in future?

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): Before the right hon. and gallant Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to ask him whether it is true that, in certain cases, women have thrown scalding meal, boiling water, and even vitriol on the emergency men and policemen who were there only doing their duty in carrying out the law; and, what steps are going to be taken with regard to Michael Davitt, who has instigated them to commit such dastardly outrages?

MR. CONYBEARE: Arising out of that Question. I wish to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether there is any allegation that this old lady of 80 years threw scalding meal, or anything else?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: With reference to the first Question, I have to say that there is no truth whatever in the allegation that Mrs. Walsh was bludgeoned by a policeman. In regard to the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, it is true that in several cases scalding meal and boiling water have been thrown both on the bailiffs and the constabulary who have been engaged in the eviction cases at Bodyke. A case of vitriol throwing has been reported; but we have no statement as to any person having been injured by it. The Government are carefully noting the proceedings of those persons who have been especially prominent in the recent disturbances, and of those who have been the instigators to riot and to breaches of the law.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The right hon. and gallant Gentleman has made a very serious statement. I ask him for his authority in stating that a case of vitriol-throwing has been reported? That is a statement which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should not make except he is prepared to state to the House, in the first instance, the ground on which he makes the charge.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I wish also to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman on what authority he states that Mrs. Walsh was not bludgeoned by the police? She was seen half-an-hour afterwards with a black eye, which she received from a policeman.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I have no knowledge as to whether the lady received a black eye or received any injury—all I know is that she was not bludgeoned by the police —

MR. M. J. KENNY: Certainly she was.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: The information comes from Sir Redvers

Buller, who received it from the ordinary sources of information. With regard to the question of vitriol-throwing, the information comes by telegraph from the Resident Magistrate in charge at Bodyke, Colonel Turner.

MR. DILLON: Does the magistrate state that vitriol was thrown?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: The words came—"Vitriol was thrown."

ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES COMMITTEE—THE COMPOSITION.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) asked the First Lord of the Treasury. Whether, considering the late period of the Session, and the general dissatisfaction at the composition of the Army and Navy Estimates Committee, the Government will consider the desirability of asking the House to rescind such portion of the Resolution of the 6th of June as refers to the Army Estimates, and to appoint a separate Committee to consider those Estimates whilst the present Committee consider the Navy Estimates?

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) suggested that the present Committee might consider the Army Estimates, and a new Committee be appointed to deal with the Navy Estimates.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to my hon. and gallant Friend, I cannot hold out any hope that a separate Committee to consider Navy Estimates should be appointed. I am not aware of the general dissatisfaction which is stated to exist by the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby; and, looking at the close connection which exists between the Army and Navy, the difficulty of entirely separating the expenditure of the two Services, and also to the heavy calls already made on the time of Members of this House by numerous Committees, I am unable to hold out any hope of separate Committees being appointed, at all events in the course of the present Session.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)—THE REPORT.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When will the Report of the Scotch Fishery Board be laid upon the Table; and, will the Government undertake that the Civil Service Estimate for the expenses of the Scotch Fishery Board shall not be taken until the Report has been in the hands of Members a reasonable time?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) (who replied) said: This Report has been delayed by the complication attending the statistics collected by the scientific staff in regard to the experiments relating to trawling. But it is hoped that the Report, which is now in the printer's hands, will be finally thrown off in a fortnight. Although Her Majesty's Government can give no pledge as to the time when the Civil Service Estimate for the Scottish Fishery Board will be taken, owing to the state of Public Business, it is hoped that it may be possible to delay it till after the Report has been in the hands of hon. Members a reasonable time.

DOMINION OF CANADA—INCREASED DUTIES ON IRON.

MR. W. L. BRIGHT (Stoke-upon-Trent) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the fact that the Canadian Government has imposed an additional duty of 100 per cent on pig iron, 350 per cent on puddle bars, and 155 per cent on bar iron; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will make some representation to the Canadian Government, with a view to the modification of this tariff, injurious alike to the interests of Canada and of this country?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. Smith) (Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government have not received the details of the alteration of the tariff proposed by the Dominion Government; but they are not prepared to press the Canadian Government to modify the proposed fiscal arrangements, for which that Government is alone responsible. Her Majesty's Government will, however, transmit any representations on the subject made by the Chambers of Commerce to the Colonial Minister for presentation to the Premier of Canada. The last words in the Question of the hon. Member are an expression of opinion, which cannot be dealt with within the limits of an answer.

Mr. Anderson

JUBILEE THANKSGIVING SERVICE (WESTMINSTER ABBEY)—TICKETS OF ADMISSION TO THE PLATFORM OUTSIDE OF PARLIAMENT SQUARE.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): Can the First Commissioner of Works give the House any further information as to the platforms to be erected in Parliament Square?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. Plunkett) (Dublin University): If the Members of the House will apply to Mr. Speaker's Secretary, either personally or by letter, to-morrow, on Wednesday, or on Thursday, between the hours of 12 and 6, for one or two tickets, they will receive one or two tickets as they desire. The price, as I have already mentioned, will be 10s. for each ticket, and that, of course, should be paid at the time the application is made. This, of course, is to pay for the expense of erecting the platform, and I am glad to assure hon. Members that they, or their friends who may avail themselves of these tickets, will have, I believe, the best view of the procession that can be had; but it will be necessary that they should be in their places by half past 9 o'clock on the morning of the 21st. I again wish to say that I have desired only to consult the convenience of Members, and that I have done the best I could under the circumstances.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): If any profit arises from this transaction, what will become of that profit?

MR. PLUNKETT: That is a question which will be reserved for further consideration. At present I can assure my noble Friend that I have not much expectation of any large funds being realized by way of profit. But there would be no difficulty in disposing of a surplus, either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by myself.

Subsequently,

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, When he hopes to be able to inform the House as to the course of Business next week and the adjournment? as it would greatly facilitate the arrangements of those Members who do not care to be in London while the Jubilee is going on.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I will endeavour to make a statement to-morrow, if it will be for the convenience of hon. Members that I should do so. I had originally intended to state our proposals on Thursday; but I will see if it cannot be done earlier.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 9th June.]

[SIXTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PROCLAMATION OF DISTRICTS.

Clause 5 (Proclamation of district for the purpose of the preceding enactments of this Act).

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I propose, in the first line of this clause, to move the omission of the words "The Lord Lieutenant by and with the advice of the Privy Council," in order to insert "Her Majesty by Order in Council." The effect will be to provide that the proclamation of districts under the Act should be made by Her Majesty in Council instead of by the Lord Lieutenant. The Government are proposing to deprive a majority of Her Majesty's subjects of their Constitutional privileges, and the change involves so grave an exercise of authority that the responsibility of it should rest with the Cabinet as a whole, and not with the Lord Lieutenant. It is said that the Lord Lieutenant is responsible to Parliament; but his responsibility is very different from that of the Government, as a whole, defending its action in this House. The permanent officials of Dublin Castle, by whom the Act will be administered, are not in sympathy either with the people of Ireland or this House, and I should like to see a Ministry responsible to Parliament for the administration of such an Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, leave out line 30, and insert "Her Majesty by Order in."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Lord Lieutenant' stand part of the Clause."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I quite sympathize with the right hon. Gentleman in his effort to attach as much solemnity to Proclamations as possible. But I do not think, on the whole, a sufficient case has been made out for the Amendment. As the right hon. Gentleman says, the Government collectively are responsible, and in the present condition of Irish affairs, every important act is carefully considered by the Government as a whole. The Irish Secretary is undoubtedly primarily responsible, and the acceptance of the Amendment would take away the initiative of the Irish Secretary. I am not, therefore, prepared to depart from the precedent of a large number of years.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has admitted the responsibility of the Cabinet. Why, then, should not their responsibility be acknowledged on the face of a Proclamation? The Amendment may be contrary to precedent, but that by no means constitutes a conclusive argument against it, because the precedents made by the Irish Government in the past have all been bad, and the less they are followed the better. Liberal Unionists who on past occasions have not hesitated to condemn the "Castle," ought to support the Amendment, because it will to a certain extent transfer responsibility from the Castle to the Government.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I should like to have a distinct answer to the following Question. Is there a separate Cabinet for the management of Irish affairs? The Irish Privy Council is largely composed of Judges, and we have the statement of Chief Justice Morris that the judicial members of the Council never take any part in instituting or advising criminal prosecutions. By whom, then, are these duties performed? By the residuum of the Council, by men like The O'Connor Don, Mr. Bruen, and Mr. Kavanagh, who have been defeated at the polls by Nationalist Members. Every vile scheme that disgraced England's rule of Ireland in the 18th century was hatched in the Irish Privy Council. I hope that in future there will be no divided responsibility for the advice given to and the action taken by the Privy Council in Ireland.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I think the Amendment is extremely important, and it ought, I hold, to command the support of all Unionists, because its adoption would emphasize the unity of the Three Kingdoms. The liberties of the people in any part of the country ought not to be taken away by an inferior authority. Responsibility for what is done in Ireland under this Bill ought therefore to rest upon Her Majesty's Privy Council. Proclamations issued by the Lord Lieutenant in Council will be less likely to attract attention than Proclamations issued by the Privy Council in England. As it is of great importance that the Proclamations should be as public as possible, in order that they may be discussed and criticized, they ought to issue from the English Privy Council.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): The object of the Amendment is to prevent the Irish Privy Council from acquiring extra powers. At present reprehensible things are done every day in Ireland by persons connected with the Executive, and when Questions have been asked in this House with reference to them, they have been met with lying and evasive answers. I do not mean that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who read the answers out are guilty of falsehood and evasion, but the answers themselves are correctly described by the epithets which I have applied to them. They are generally obtained by the authorities in Dublin from the very persons whose conduct has been impugned.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This Amendment will not really affect the administration of the Act; and I would, therefore, put it to hon. Members opposite whether it is not desirable to go to a Division at once without further delay, so that other and more important points may be discussed?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): If this Amendment would make no difference in the administration of the Act, the Government ought to accept it. Since the Government have now decided to Report the Bill on a certain day, I hope that the closure will now be dropped, and that hon. Members will be saved the trouble of tramping into the Division

Lobby on the Motion "That the Question be now put."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): As there is only a limited quantity of time left to be spent in the consideration of this Bill in Committee, it would be well to expend that time on points of importance that require consideration. Under the circumstances there appears to be considerable force in the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who last spoke, with regard to the closure. Those who unduly prolong the debate will do so at their own cost.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government are prepared to accede, as far as possible, to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) enforced by the observations of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The Government desire to abstain from enforcing the closure at all times, and especially under the present circumstances. There are some points of considerable importance that have still to be discussed, and which the Government are most anxious to have discussed. But if unimportant Amendments are debated at length there will be no time to consider these important points. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentlemen would consider what they regard as the really important points with a view to having them fully discussed.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I am of the same opinion as when I moved the Amendment; but I do not desire that it should occupy any more time; and, as it was of no use going to a Division, I will ask leave to withdraw it.

MR. DILLON: I and my hon. Friends are quite competent to judge what are important Amendments; and within the miserable and inadequate space of time yet remaining, we ought to be allowed to discuss such Amendments as we choose, and at such length as we choose. We refused altogether to take the opinion of the Treasury Bench as to what are important Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has invited us to proceed to what he terms the important points in the Bill; but it is well known that the Government will not make any concession on those points, and the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman is therefore merely to proceed to full-dress parade debates, from which the Irish Members will gain nothing whatever. We have not hitherto obstructed this measure, and we shall not do so in the future; but we shall continue to contest it, as we have contested it in the past, with a view to getting such concessions as we can. The fact that the Bill is to be reported on a certain day will have no effect whatever in altering our course.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has not suggested that the Members on this side of the House should assist the Government in debating what the Treasury Bench may consider the important principles of the Bill. We, on this Bench, agree entirely with the observations that have fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). This is a Bill which chiefly concerns Ireland, and upon which Irish Members have a special right to speak, upon which the opinions of Irish Members are more important than those of English Members. We have no sort of intention of subscribing to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the two Front Benches should settle what are the important Amendments to be discussed, and what are not, and that then we, on this Bench, should be called upon to advise the Irish Members below the Gangway to agree only to discuss such important Amendments. The suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian rather was that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, in the short and artificially limited time remaining, should use it in discussing such Amendments as they themselves, and not the Government, consider to be essential.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 235; Noes 167: Majority 68.—(Div. List, No. 225.) [6.15 P.M.]

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) moved, in line 30, after "lieutenant," to insert—"A Judge of the High Court, after a local inquiry, shall so report, may." The hon. Member said: I am of opinion that a district, before it is condemned to martial law, such as is proposed in this Bill, should have an opportunity of testing the state of criminality upon which such a Proclamation as this is proposed to be made. My experience as to the nature of the information which reaches Dublin Castle is that, as a general rule, it is imperfect and ineffective; and if there exists a desire to proclaim a district, I fear that very little attention is to be paid to the actual state of facts, but a great deal more to the state of feeling which exists among a particular class. Much more is done by earwigging the officials of Dublin Castle than by proving the extent of criminality. Of course, we may not know upon what local grounds a man has been arrested; but there ought to be, as a condition precedent to the Proclamation of an entire district by the Lord Lieutenant, under the Act, that a Judge of the High Court should have held a local inquiry, and reported in favour of such Proclamation. The object I have in view in submitting this Amendment is to put an end, if possible, to a state of things which would enable a district to be proclaimed without previous inquiry. I am sorry that I do not see the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in his place, because he will remember that we had a controversy in regard to the issue of the Proclamation which ended in the wresting of the County of Donegal from the political power of the Hamiltons. In that case there was a Proclamation issued; but so strong were the views of the people in favour of their tenant rights that the issue of it virtually decided the election. I believe it was admitted at last that the Proclamation had been hurriedly made, and that it was based upon information which had been very loosely supplied. The circumstance, however, will give the Committee some idea of what may happen hereafter if precautions are not taken to guard against it. I do not know why the Government should oppose the Amendment, except upon the ground that it may occasion delay; but it must be borne in mind that the 1st and 2nd sections of the Bill cannot come into operation rapidly; and, above all things, the 3rd and 4th sections will necessarily entail delay, seeing that they involve the order for a special jury, and the order for a change of venue. Therefore, there cannot be any objection to the Amendment on the ground of delay. I ask the Committee to consider that the inquiry I am desirous of instituting is not as to the guilt or innocence of an individual, but as to the existence of a state of criminality—whether or not a crime or series of crimes has been committed. The existence of crime is a very different thing from proving the guilt or innocence of an individual; and all I ask is that before an entire district is subjected to martial law, the facts of the case shall be made perfectly clear by means of an inquiry conducted in a judicial manner.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 30, after the word "Lieutenant," to insert the words "if a Judge of the High Court, after a local inquiry, shall so report, may."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): There are two reasons why the Government cannot accept this Amendment, and they are reasons the force of which will, I think, be admitted by the hon. Member himself. In the first place, I doubt whether an inquiry like that suggested by the hon. Member would be possible, as the Judge would have no power in examining witnesses to administer an oath. The responsibility of proclaiming a district must, of course, rest upon the Executive, and by this clause power is given to the Lord Lieutenant to issue a Proclamation, "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," whenever it may appear to him necessary to put the powers of the Act into force. I think the Committee will be agreed that the whole of the Government, including the Cabinet, should be responsible for the issue of the Proclamation. If, instead of proclaiming a district on the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant, an inquiry of this nature were instituted, directing the Judge of the High Court to examine the facts, and to report to the Executive that a particular district ought to be proclaimed, the Executive would have no alternative but to act upon the Judge's Report, and the responsibility for what is purely an Executive act would be taken from the Executive altogether and placed upon the Judge. The Lord Lieutenant would naturally say that in proclaiming a district he had acted upon a Judicial Report, that he was not acquainted with the facts himself, and that he threw the whole responsibility upon the learned Judge who inquired into the matter. Upon all these considerations, I think it would be undesirable to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I certainly cannot appreciate the force of the reasons which have been given by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland for opposing the Amendment. He says that a learned Judge would have no power to examine witnesses or administer an oath, and, therefore, that his advice would be of no value. But can the Lord Lieutenant examine witnesses on oath? The Lord Lieutenant, of his own free will, will be able, under this clause, to proclaim a county or district when and how he likes, and so far as evidence of the existence of criminality is concerned, it will not be necessary at all that he should form an accurate opinion. The Attorney General has let the cat of the bag, because whatever information can be supplied to the Lord Lieutenant could equally be supplied to the Lord Lieutenant by a Judge, and my hon. Friend has moved his Amendment, because he thinks that a Judge would be more capable of examining into the matter than the Lord Lieutenant. It must be recollected that a Judge, when he is elevated to the Bench, ceases any longer to belong to a political Party, whereas the Lord Lieutenant is the direct Representative of a political Party—namely, the Party which may happen, at the moment, to be in power. He is always a Member of the Cabinet, and the proposed reference in the clause to the Privy Council is one of those myths with which we are occasionally indulged in this House. What is a Privy Council? It is a close borough.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is travelling somewhat wide of the Amendment.

MR. MOLLOY: The alternative given in this clause is that the Lord Lieutenant is to do certain things "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," and it was only in that sense that I presumed to call attention to the matter. I will, however, go no further, but will simply point to an analogous case—namely, that of Wales. There is no Lord Lieutenant in Wales, but there have been disturbances in Wales recently in reference to tithes, which disturbances have been somewhat similar in their character to those which have occurred in Ireland in reference to rent. What would the House say if a proposition were made by the Prime Minister that "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," the Government should have the power of proclaiming a district without submitting the evidence as to the existence and criminality to any properly constituted Court of Inquiry?

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has assigned a curious reason for the decision he has come to. He says it would be impossible for a Judge to take steps to arrive at any reliable opinion, because he cannot examine witnesses on oath.

MR. HOLMES: I did not say that a learned Judge could not arrive at a reliable opinion, but I said that if such an inquiry were held, he would not have the power of examining witnesses upon oath, and that his report would relieve the Government from their responsibility.

MR. WALLACE: I presume that any judicial inquiry is an inquiry by a Judge, and I fail to see why a Judge should not be as able to institute an inquiry into the state of a district as into any other matter. The principal argument for the introduction of the Bill at all was that the Government relied almost exclusively upon the Judges' charges. If that be so, how can they now say that an investigation by a Judge would fail to satisfy either the public or the Lord Lieutenant or the Judge himself? It is utterly impossible to reconcile the two sets of statements. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says the adoption of the Amendment would shift the responsibility from the Executive on to the Judge. That is the very thing that would be valuable. We know very well what value to attach to the phrase "the responsibility of the Irish Executive." I am afraid that they are not much troubled with notions of responsibility, but feel chiefly responsible to their own ideas and their own animosities. That is quite enough to satisfy them without having the slightest regard for the world outside. A Judge, however, is in a very different position. He has a reputation to sustain, and he would be slow to give a decision as to the existence of a state of criminality in a particular locality unless, in his opinion, there was a good deal to justify that decision. Then, again, a Judge would, in all probability, have been for some time in office, and would have acquired habits of impartiality. Whereas, the Lord Lieutenant or the authorities in Dublin Castle have certainly not strengthened their impartiality by the way in which they have acted. One-sidedness is the quality which their position tends most to intensify. For these reasons, I am more convinced than ever that there must be something valuable in the Amendment, in consequence of the inconclusive arguments advanced by the right hon. and learned Attorney General—arguments which are entirely at variance with the grounds upon which the Government profess to justify the introduction of their Bill. Their plea for the necessity of a Bill of this kind at all was that, in the opinion of the Judges, a considerable amount of criminality existed in certain parts of the country.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think that my hon. Friend has been somewhat too severe on the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, who feels it his duty at all times to support the administration of Dublin Castle. The right hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out that if there were a judicial inquiry by a Judge, and his Report was to the effect that no crime existed, that then the Lord Lieutenant could not proclaim the district, but that if the Judge did report the existence of criminality, however undesirable it might be politically the Lord Lieutenant would be left no alternative, but would be bound to proclaim the district. I can quite understand, therefore, the object with which the right hon. and learned Attorney General and the Government object to this Amendment, for I can fully see that the liability to obey the direction of a Judge might, in some cases, be extremely inconvenient. I can understand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) or some of his allies going to Ireland and declaring at an election time that South Tyrone was in a shaky condition, and that, therefore, the district had better be proclaimed with the usual accompaniment of batoning the people and running them into gaol for a few weeks until it might be possible to tide over the election. I have no doubt this would be a very convenient arrangement for the purpose of carrying a contested election, or even to secure the appointment of guardians of the poor and so on. I therefore think that the hon. and learned Attorney General, from his point of view, has acted with extreme wisdom in objecting to the Amendment; but I think it would have been more manly and straightforward if he had given the real ground for desiring to retain the clause as it stands—namely, that he may be able to use it hereafter for political purposes.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I cannot help thinking that there is something extremely suspicious about the refusal of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to allow a Judge to inquire into the state of a district before it is proclaimed. I can quite conceive why the Government refuse to accept this Amendment, the adoption of which would give the Irish people the satisfaction of knowing that if a district is to be proclaimed it will not be proclaimed in a haphazard manner according to back stairs information supplied to the Lord Lieutenant by interested parties, but that no district will be proclaimed without a Judge having first decided that there was a state of disturbance in the district which warranted its Proclamation. The simple difference between us as to the Amendment is this—that if the Amendment is accepted we shall all have the satisfaction of knowing that there must be an inquiry before a district is proclaimed, whereas if the Amendment is refused there will be no inquiry at all. If the Government were animated by fair and upright motives they would accept the Amendment, knowing very well that if an inquiry were held it would at least satisfy the public that there was an excuse for the Proclamation of a district, and more than that—if a district is proclaimed in Ireland Her Majesty's Advisers would be able to say to the people of England that the course taken was justifiable. They would be able to say—“It is quite true that we have been obliged to proclaim this district, but we did not do it until an inquiry was held, which inquiry was presided over by a Judge of the High Court, and we have his certificate that the district is in such a condition as to require its Proclamation.” If the real object of the Government were to put down crime and outrage they would not object to a Court of Inquiry; but, as a matter of fact, they do not wish to proclaim districts in Ireland because of the existence of crime and outrage, but simply in order that they may strike political opponents and combinations of tenants against harsh landlords. They desire to retain in the hands of the Executive, and of the advisers of the Executive, the power of proclaiming a district from private motives without the slightest regard to the existence of crime and outrage. I think we have proved quite sufficient, in this discussion, to show that what the Government are aiming at is not the Proclamation of a district on account of the existence within it of crime and outrage, but to put down lawful and legitimate combination. If it were otherwise they would not refuse this Amendment. But they know that the result of an inquiry, in almost every case, would be that the district would not be proclaimed. Of course, that would not suit the Government, because they wish to retain in the hands of Dublin Castle the right of doing this without reference to a judicial decision of any kind. I am glad that the Government have refused the Amendment, because it clearly shows what it is that they are really desirous of striking against. I think there is no hon. Member representing an English constituency who will not say that our request is fair and reasonable, and that the Government are unreasonable in refusing it.

MR. OLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I am surprised that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) should have talked of the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Executive. That responsibility has been shown again and again to be perfectly illusory, and to mean nothing whatever. In one passage of his speech the right hon. and learned Gentleman stated that if a Judge reported in favour of the Proclamation of a district the Government would have no alternative but to proclaim it. Now, to say that the desire of the Government would be not to proclaim a district is surely an attempt to impose upon the credulity of hon. Members. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that no means have been provided by which such a judicial inquiry could be held by a Judge, but the Government are not so destitute of resources that they are unable to provide the means. A clause of six lines would give them every power, and would enable them to send for persons, records, and documents. The right hon. and learned Attorney General, however, let the cat out of the bag, and gave up the whole of the case when he refused to submit to the decision of the Judges. What he says, in fact, is that these Proclamations will be issued as the result of secret ear-wiggling between the landlords and the officials of Dublin Castle. Let me give an instance, to show the value of one of those Proclamations, and the manner in which they are obtained. I refer to a case which occurred last summer. There were several prisoners tried on the 25th of June last in the County of Longford, under the Whiteboy Act, and the question of the state of the district was an element in the case of the prosecution. There was an attempt to prove that the district was in a disturbed state by producing a copy of The Dublin Gazette, in which the district had been proclaimed. Chief Baron Palles presided at the trial, and, not being satisfied with the mere production of the The Gazette, he addressed Mr. Trench, the Crown Prosecutor, in these words—"Do you intend to give evidence of the state of the district?" Mr. Trench—"We have The Gazette here proclaiming the district." The Chief Baron, not satisfied with this, proceeded to question the police constable, and this conversation occurred:—

"Chief Baron—"Is this district in a disturbed state, sergeant?"—Sergeant Jennings—"Well, not much; nothing extraordinary."—Chief Baron—"We do not want to hear anything about extraordinary. Was this district quiet on or about the 25th of June last?"—Sergeant Jennings—"It was quiet, my Lord."

Mr. Trench, Q.C., said he would close the case for the Crown by handing in The Dublin Gazette, proclaiming the district in question.

"Chief Baron—"Is there anything in the Statute, Mr. Trench, which says that the Proclamation in The Gazette is to be taken as conclusive evidence of the disturbed state of a district?" Mr. Trench—"No, my Lord, except that it may be taken as prima facie evidence." Chief Baron—"But it is of no value in the face of a statement of a witness who swears that it was quiet."

And the Crown Prosecutor had the grace to say, "No, my Lord." It appears that the Resident Magistrate, Mr. Benjamin Hill, R.M., was present. Mr. Trench thought his best course was to call Mr. Hill to contradict the statement of the sergeant of police, and I ask the Committee to watch the result.

"Mr. Trench, Q.C.—'With your permission, my Lord, I would like to go back and produce Mr. Hill, the Resident Magistrate, and ask him about the state of Longford.' Chief Baron—"It is very irregular. The thing has become serious now, for you are producing one witness to contradict another witness of yours." Mr. Trench—"Well, my Lord, he said, it was not much disturbed." Chief Baron—"He made use of the expression, but I made him go back and answer the question distinctly. I have his words down, and I will leave the question to the jury." Mr. Trench—"I know it is irregular, my Lord, but I wish to ask Mr. Hill some questions." Chief Baron—"Very well."

Mr. Hill, however, grievously disappointed the learned gentleman. Here is a report of Mr. Hill's examination—

"Mr. Benjamin Hill, R.M., was then called, and on being sworn, said—"That he could not say the district was very disturbed; but he had two police posts on derelict farms—one on Lord Annally's estate, and the other on the estate of M'Colloma's minors. The Annally protection post was in existence last June, and the other was established a month ago." Mr. Featherston—"Is not the County of Longford, and particularly the south, in a very quiet state? Was it not quiet last summer, and is it not so?" Mr. Hill—"Yes." Chief Baron—"Can you say, that at this time, it was in a state of disturbance?" Mr. Hill—"There were some cases of trespass on these derelict farms, but they had no serious outrage."

There can be very little doubt, after this evidence, that it was Lord Annally who got the County of Longford proclaimed on that occasion, and what we want to prevent is, that any man, like Lord Annally, engaged in a contest with his tenants, should be able to go up the backstairs of Dublin Castle and earwig the Lord Lieutenant into issuing a Proclamation to serve his private interests. The Irish Members have no objection to a judicial inquiry conducted by one of the Judges of the land; but they do object to Lord Annally or any other Irish landlord having a right to say a word on the subject, seeing that they are the very persons who are most deeply interested in the matter. If the individuals chiefly interested in getting a district proclaimed are to have the ear of the Lord Lieutenant, and are to be able to set the machinery in motion, then I maintain that it will be impossible to avoid doing the grossest possible injustice under this section.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): As I understand the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, the right of judging whether a district is in such a condition in reference to criminality as to justify its proclamation is to rest solely with the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that there is no precedent for this semi-official inquiry into the state of a district for which we now ask. Now, I assert that there is, and the Committee will have already gathered that that is so from the newspaper report of the case which occurred in the County of Longford which has just been read by my hon. Friend the Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy). Under the Whiteboy Act it is necessary to show that when a particular offence has been committed the district was in a disturbed state. If that were proved the offence thereupon became a criminal offence, which otherwise it would not have been. That being so, we certainly have a precedent in the existing legislation for submitting to a judicial tribunal the question whether a district was in a disturbed state or not. Under the Whiteboy Acts it was necessary that the matter should go through a jury. That, however, is not necessary under this Bill; but I wish to point out that it has a direct bearing upon the proposals contained in the Bill. The Act itself is to be set in motion by the finding of a tribunal in exactly the same position as a Judge would be in if he were to hold an inquiry of this kind. When Lord Cowper's Commission sat a large amount of evidence was taken in reference to Boycotting, but the Commission had no power to accept sworn testimony, and every item of evidence given before the Commission was evidence which could not be subjected to cross-examination, and they had no power of rebutting anything the witnesses stated. Nevertheless, that Commission had the power of summoning witnesses before them. That being so, we have surely a right to submit to the Committee that if the class of unsworn evidence taken by the Cowper Commission was a sufficient justification for applying the principle of coercion to Ireland, it will be a much less strong and a much less drastic proceeding to give power to a Judge to make a judicial inquiry before a district is proclaimed. That is my reply to one of the points raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The other point was the familiar one, that if before you proclaim a district you send down a Judge to hold an inquiry of this kind, and make it a condition precedent, you divest the Executive of all responsibility. That would be an effective argument if we either proposed to take away the responsibility of the Executive, or if the responsibility of the Executive really amounted to anything. We really do not think that it does, and on the principle that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," whatever value there may be in an inquiry of this kind, it is quite evident that the Irish people might occasionally get a fair decision, and would obtain more substantial justice than if they are left to the irresponsibility of the Executive. My knowledge of the Executive in Ireland induces me to believe that, no matter what Government happens to be in Office, the Executive would do anything the Government called upon them to do. At any rate, that is our experience of the past. We consider that this preliminary inquiry would have a special value. We ask, before the liberty of a district is taken away, by the whispering of a landlord or his agent into the ears of the officials of Dublin Castle, that the district, at any rate, shall have the opportunity of defending itself before a public officer who shall hold a regular constituted judicial inquiry.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I am surprised that the Government have refused to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The adoption of it would save them a good deal of this responsibility which they seem to regret; it would save the Lord Lieutenant himself from being advised by the Reports of the Resident Magistrates or of the police, who, of course, have an interest in sending them. In many cases a magistrate, such as Captain Plunkett, may be inclined to send in a Report as to the disturbed state of a district, which Report, when thoroughly inquired into by a Judge, would be found to be utterly destitute of foundation. Then, again, the Resident Magistrates themselves are liable to be deceived or mistaken by the Reports which they receive from the police and their subordinates. In many parts of Ireland it is said that there is what may be described as a state of siege, rather than the administration of the ordinary law; and the police in Ireland, as well as the Resident Magistrates, together with the ordinary officers of the law, are desirous that the law should be set aside, and that they should be armed with powers to enable them to perform their duties with as little trouble to themselves as possible. There is an old saying that nobody can rule in a state of siege; but the Irish police fancy that they can rule districts in the remote corners of Ireland when they are aided and assisted by the powers which this Act will give them. In point of fact, they are of opinion that they themselves may be enabled to place the country in a state of siege. But I think it would save the Lord Lieutenant himself from being betrayed into the commission of any serious mistake if this Amendment were adopted. We know that "distance lends enchantment to the view," and people who are removed to a distance from Ireland conjure up all kinds of fears as to the state of things which is prevailing in that country. Not long ago I met in London a lady who was about to visit Ireland, and who said that she was going there in fear and trembling for her life. I saw her again upon her return, and she told me that she had found the Irish people the kindest, the mildest, and the quietest in the world. It was "the distance" that led this lady to conjure up fears in regard to the disturbed state of Ireland; and so it is with the Lord Lieutenant. He sits in Dublin Castle, and he hears nothing but the reports of biased chief magistrates, or lazy sub-constables, and officials who desire to get this power, and who are in the habit of looking at these districts through a long telescope, which produces the picture of a terrible state of affairs. Having received these dreadful reports, the Lord Lieutenant is tempted to proclaim the districts to which they relate. All this difficulty would be avoided by the appointment of a Judge to conduct an official inquiry, and take evidence as to the state of the district on the spot. Let me give the Committee an instance to show the exaggerated character of the reports which are made to the Lord Lieutenant. In one district—that of Castleisland—a place which has been tolerably well known lately—there was found a Resident Magistrate who had a conscience, and who, on being put upon his oath, was disposed to tell the truth. I allude to Mr. Davis, of the Castleisland District, who stated, before the Cowper Commission, that the terrible accounts which had been given of that district had no foundation at all; that the district was not disturbed; and that there were only two persons who were suffering seriously from Boycotting. This is the very district which furnished the late Mr. W. E. Forster with all his statistics in justification of the Crimes Act of 1882; and yet you have a man—the Resident Magistrate attached to the district—declaring that there are only two people in it who are seriously Boycotted. I am informed by an hon. Friend of mine, sitting near me, that this fair-minded magistrate has since been transferred; it appears that his services are not wanted in the district of Castleisland, because he happened to tell the truth. It is for these reasons I say to the Committee, and to the Government in particular, that it is to their interest to accept the Amendment. It is certainly to the interest of the Lord Lieutenant to accept it, because it is likely to save him from exaggerated reports on the part of the Resident Magistrates and police. Further, it is to the interest of the good government of the country that the responsibility should be placed on some judicial personage, who would make an inquiry on the spot as to the necessity of the proclamation of the district. For these reasons I support the Amendment; and I would strongly urge upon the Committee the desirability of accepting it, and adding it to the Bill.

Mr. Clancy

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 202: Majority 76.—(Div. List, No. 226.)

[7.15 P.M.]

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I have to move an Amendment, in line 30, to leave out the words "by and with the advice of the Privy Council." I believe it is a fact that the Privy Council in Ireland does not occupy the same position as the Privy Council in this country. The Members of the Privy Council are certainly much too numerous for effective consultation; and, as a matter of practice, I believe they are never consulted as a body. On the contrary, the Lord Lieutenant and the Executive content themselves with seeking advice from a small number of the Council who are Members of the Cabinet. We all know very well what a Cabinet is; but, as a matter of fact, it is a body which has no legal existence. When an hon. Gentleman is promoted to Cabinet rank, the position he occupies is not recognized by any Act of Parliament, and, so far as the law is concerned, "the Cabinet" is altogether non-existent. We have been told that the Judicial Members of the Privy Council do not concern themselves with the initiation of criminal proceedings, or with matters appertaining to criminal proceedings. It follows, therefore, that when the Lord Lieutenant seeks the advice of the Privy Council with reference to such matters, he applies to what has always been described as the residuum of the Council, consisting of discredited politicians. In former times the English Privy Council was a consulting body; and, to some extent, that state of things still prevails in Ireland, with the necessary consequence that the Privy Council exercise a most dangerous and a most noxious influence upon political Parties in Ireland. It is that state of things we desire to put an end to, so far as the administration of this measure is concerned. We ask that the Lord Lieutenant shall not be permitted to evade his responsibility; we ask that if the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant happens to be impugned in this House or elsewhere, he shall not be permitted to say—"I acted, not upon my own initiative, but upon the advice of the Privy Council." We ask that the responsibility shall rest directly with the Lord Lieutenant and the Government of which he is a Member, and that in this case the old maxim, that "what is everybody's business is nobody's business," shall not be allowed to operate. Moreover, we ask that the advice given to the Lord Lieutenant as to the administration of the provisions of this measure shall not come from a body composed exclusively of men who for years past have been in bitter conflict with the mass of the people of Ireland. For these reasons I move the Amendment; and I cannot help expressing my regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), who has placed an Amendment on the Paper in precisely similar terms to that which I am now proposing, is not in his place this evening to move it. I think it would have been very interesting, as a matter of curiosity, to know what are the views of the particular body to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs upon this subject.

Mr. Maurice Healy

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 30, to leave out "by and with the advice of the Privy Council."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): It is usual to provide, in matters of this kind, that the Lord Lieutenant shall act "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," and the Government cannot accept the Amendment, which would be a new departure. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway seem to think that the Lord Lieutenant should be solely responsible for issuing Proclamations under this measure; but, in the opinion of the Government, it is more desirable that he should follow the usual course of acting "by and with the advice of the Privy Council."

MR. CLANCY: I judge from the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government cannot accept the Amendment, because they wish that the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant should be shared by someone else.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All that we say is that we are not prepared to accept the Amendment.

MR. CLANCY: It has been said that the Irish Judges give advice to the Lord Lieutenant in reference to proceedings in criminal cases; but I think I am bound to accept the statement of the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, made only recently, that the Irish Judges do not take part in matters of this kind except as a mere formality. Who, then, would be the persons left who, as Privy Councillors under this Bill, would perform the duty of advising the Lord Lieutenant? They are chiefly ex-Chief Secretaries of the Lord Lieutenant, such as Sir George Trevelyan, the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), Mr. James Lowther, who never, I believe, attended a meeting of the Privy Council, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley), who, also, has never been present at the meetings of the Privy Council. Consequently, the duty of advising the Lord Lieutenant will be left to the following persons:—In the first place, there is the Duke of Leinster. [An hon. MEMBER: He is dead.] I am reminded by my hon. Friend that the Nobleman whose name appears at the head of the list as Duke of Leinster, and who had a seat on the Privy Council, is dead. Therefore it will be necessary to omit him from the list. I very much regret it, because I was going to point out that he was the only decent man of the lot. The next name on the list is that of the Marquess of Waterford, a Nobleman well-known as one of the foremost champions of the Orange Landlord Party in Ireland, and noted for his rack-renting antecedents and for his quarrels with his tenantry. Only very recently the noble Marquess challenged his tenants to go into the Land Court. He asked them for an increase of 50 per cent upon the whole of their rents, and the judgment of the Court was to reduce the rents by 50 per cent instead of to increase them. The next name upon the list is that of the Marquess of Drogheda, a worthy brother-in-arms of the Marquess of Waterford. He is not merely a Tory—I do not object so much to his being a Tory. [A laugh.] I observe that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison), who was returned by the casting vote of the Returning Officer of that borough, and who is one of the most demonstrative Members in this House, laughs. Well, I have said that the Marquess of Drogheda is a brother-in-arms of the Marquess of Waterford; and, so far as rack-renting is concerned, I believe the Marquess of Drogheda to be one of the worst landlords, not only in Ireland, but in the civilized world. It is pretty generally known that the Marquess of Drogheda has been constantly engaged in conflicts with his tenantry, and that he has been proved over and over again to be a rack-renter of the most ferocious description. The next name is that of the Marquess of Headfort, who is another of the same class, and then comes the Earl of Belmore, who also takes premier rank among the landlord party, and who is followed by Viscount Monck, whose career as an Irish landlord has certainly not been unexceptionable. We come next to the Right Hon. W. H. Cogan, one of the gentlemen who have been expelled from the Irish representation. He is another member of the landlord class, and he will endeavour, no doubt, to assist the Lord Lieutenant by justifying the actions of His Excellency whenever a desire is expressed to proclaim a branch of the National League in a particular district. Then follow the names of Sir William Gregory and Mr. H. Bruen, the latter of whom was expelled from the representation of the County of Carlow. Mr. Bruen stands in the very front rank of the rack-renters of that county, and he has a personal interest in seeing that the provisions of this measure are put in force in the most merciless manner. The same may be said of Mr. Arthur McMurrugh Kavanagh, who was one of the principal landlord witnesses before the Cowper Commission, and who boasted before that Commission that he had cut out of the newspapers everything that reflected discredit on the National League; that he had pasted his cuttings on pieces of paper; and that he was ready to put them in as evidence before the Commission. That gentleman would, I feel satisfied, be most effusive in the advice he would tender to the Lord Lieutenant, and would feel it a sacred duty to tell him to suppress right off every branch of the National League in existence. Then we have the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, who is called here Colonel Edward Robert King-Harman. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] The Chief Secretary says "Hear, hear!" which means, I presume, that he is greatly assisted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in the discharge of his duties in this House. I congratulate him on his taste and judgment. I have mentioned the names of some of the gentlemen who will have to advise the Lord Lieutenant in putting the provisions of this Act in force. How this family party will work is clear enough. They will dine together on some special evening, and discuss the shortcomings of the National League;

and then they will advise the Lord Lieutenant that certain branches of the League are keeping the whole countryside in a state of disturbance, and that the district ought to be proclaimed. In that way the whole thing will be done, and the liberties of the people of the district will be completely taken away. A more disreputable and a more disgraceful mode of proceeding was never heard of in any civilized country. It is altogether foreign to anything like Constitutional government. We know very well that the statements we make on this subject will be characterized as exaggerated. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] But I will commend to the attention of the hon. Gentleman on the opposite side who says "Hear, hear" the recent statement by Sir George Trevelyan, which bears out, in substance, every single word the Irish Members have advanced from these Benches. Sir George Trevelyan states distinctly that he knows, from official experience, that a certain ring exists in Dublin Castle by means of which alone this sort of machinery is kept going. When we have an important witness like that upon our side I do not think it necessary to refer more particularly to the sneer of the hon. Gentleman on the other side. As I have pointed out, the Members of the Privy Council who will give advice to the Lord Lieutenant will consist of the working gang of the Council, who are the worst landlords who can be found in Ireland—landlords who have long been in conflict with their tenants, and whose rents have been cut down 40, 50, and 60 per cent by the Land Courts, and who have, therefore, personal motives for taking vengeance by a merciless use of this Act. It is a gang of this kind that is to advise the Lord Lieutenant as to the issue of these Proclamations, and it is to their will and by their fiat that you are to control the liberties of the Irish people.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I was under the impression that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman below the Gangway was superfluous, because I understood him to say that "by and with the advice of the Privy Council" was purely formal. I remember that when I was engaged in passing through this House a small measure last year, the same kind of criticism in reference to the Privy Council was made which is being made now, and on that occasion I felt it my duty to point out that the action of the Privy Council was little more than nominal and purely formal. I understand the Chief Secretary to say now across the floor of the House that the Irish Judges do take part in the deliberations of the Privy Council, and give advice in executive action?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was, that I could not accept an Amendment which stood in the name of the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), because it would prevent the Lord Lieutenant from taking the advice of the judicial element of the Privy Council. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) has pointed out that the reason why we cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) is, that we proposed to deal constitutionally with the matter in this Bill. It has been stated that it was not customary for the Judicial Members of the Privy Council to concern themselves with the initiation of proceedings; but, if that was so, the object is to provide that they shall concern themselves with it in future.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): It is impossible to understand that the Government can have any logical reason for objecting to this Amendment. When the last Amendment was proposed the Government alleged that they could not accept it, because it would remove responsibility from the Lord Lieutenant. That was the only answer they made to the Motion for inserting the words proposed. Now, we move the omission of words from the clause which would enable the Lord Lieutenant to take advice with reference to the proclamation of districts from whomsoever he pleased, in order that he might be responsible for proclaiming the districts; but this time we are met by the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) in quite a different strain. We find ourselves quite unable to fix the Government by any argument that it is possible to bring forward, because they slink away from every argument, even their own. After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and that of my hon. Friend the Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy), there is no doubt whatever as to what will be done in these cases of proclamation. As a matter of fact, instead of the words "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," the clause ought to run "by and with the advice of the executive or police in the county." That would be the true interpretation of the intentions of the Government. Besides that, it will be from the ranks of the permanent officials that appointments will be made when vacancies occur from time to time, and it will be upon the opinion of such gentlemen as these that the judgment of the Lord Lieutenant will be formed. I cannot understand why the Government should wish to retain these words, unless it be for reasons that have been given; and, without wishing to detain the Committee at greater length, I would suggest to the Government that, perhaps, the proper wording for the clause would be—"The Lord Lieutenant by and with the advice of a Council of War," and so on.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): In the absence of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Southwark (Mr. A. Cohen) I rise to propose the Amendment standing in his name, which is one of considerable importance. It is, besides, an Amendment in respect of which I appeal to the Government with great confidence, in the expectation that they will agree to insert the words I propose in the clause. During the discussions on this Bill we have had frequent references to the Act of 1882; and in the case of many Amendments proposed on this side of the House, when anything has been stated contrary to that Act, we have had the Act quoted against us. We have now to propose an Amendment in accordance with the Act of 1882. The clause before the Committee follows the words of the Act of 1882, with a single exception. The Act of 1882 provided that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should only proclaim a district where it was necessary to do so "for the prevention of crime and outrage;" and I propose, therefore, to insert these words in the clause which is now before us. I think I have shown a very strong case for appealing to the Government to accept this Amendment. Then, as to the importance of the Amendment. In the clause as it at present stands there would be no direction whatever to the Lord Lieutenant as to the circumstances under which he might proclaim a district in Ireland. It will be left entirely to his discretion whether he is to proclaim a district or not, and the causes which may influence him will be various. There may, for instance, be an article which appears in a newspaper in one of the districts which he may not like, and which the Law Officers might tell him could not form the subject of a prosecution with any chance of success, and he might endeavour to meet the difficulty by proclaiming the district. Then, again, it might be that owing to a combination among his tenants a landlord could not get his rents, and that the members of the combination, although not refusing to pay the rent, were only able to pay a reasonable amount. In this case the landlord might go to the Lord Lieutenant and induce him to believe that such a condition of things existed in the district that it ought to be proclaimed. Now, neither of these things could have been done under the clause of the Act of 1882, when there was a much greater danger to the landlords in Ireland than there is now. As I have said, the clause of the Act of 1882 directed that a district should only be proclaimed when it was the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant that it was necessary to proclaim it for the prevention of crime and outrage. I have looked back to several Coercion Acts, and I find that in them all there are words to this effect, generally limiting the action of the Lord Lieutenant. In the Act of 1833, which was the strongest Coercion Act passed in this House, as it came down from the House of Lords, there were no such restrictive words; but the House of Commons inserted words to provide that no proclamation should be made of any district merely for the refusal to pay tithes. The insertion of the words I refer to shows how necessary the House of Commons considered it, even under stronger circumstances than exist at the present moment, that the proclamation of a district should not take place on account of any agrarian movement. Now, the words which I propose to introduce, and which were contained in the last Cuercion Act, have been omitted from the present Bill, and I ask the Government why it is that those words are left out? We have heard often enough of the precedent of the Act of 1882. Why, then, have the Government not followed the precedent of the Proclamation Clauses in that Bill in this respect? There must be some reason for it, and I venture to ask the Government, even if they do not accept the Amendment—which appears to me to be both reasonable and proper, and for which there is the strong case I have brought before the Committee—I ask them why it is they have omitted these words? I do not wish to detain the Committee at any length in moving this Amendment; but I repeat that a strong case has, in my opinion, been made out for following the wording of the Act of 1882, which placed a limitation on the action of the Lord Lieutenant in proclaiming a district. If the Government do not accept the Amendment, they should, at least, tell the Committee why the words have been omitted.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 32, after the word "necessary," to insert the words "for the prevention of crime and outrage."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The right hon. Gentleman asks us for our reasons for not inserting the words of his Amendment in the present clause. If we had considered that these words were fit and necessary we should have been pleased to insert them; but our own opinion is that they would not be proper in the present Bill, and that they were out of place in the Act of 1882. I point out to the Committee that this is a Bill not only for the prevention, but for the punishment of crime in Ireland; there are several sentences in the Bill also referring to the detection of crime. That being the scope of the present measure, it would not be desirable to restrict its operation in the manner proposed by the Amendment; and our reason for objecting to the words is that they would not be in accordance with the principle of the Bill.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Surely the argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General is an extraordinary one. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman really mean to say that the Government have left out this most important restriction and limitation because it would have been inconvenient and cumbersome to insert three words? A more ludicrous argument could not be imagined. The real explanation is that the Government have left out the words because this is not a Bill for the prevention of crime and outrage, but because it is a Bill for the suppression of political combinations in Ireland; and the attitude of the Government, with reference to this Amendment, is one of the many illustrations with which they furnish us of their real object. We have already tested them by various Amendments; and this Amendment is only a test the more. We say that if your Bill is really aimed at crime and outrage, you should put into it the restriction which was in the Bill of 1882; and if you do not introduce the words, it is one more proof, as I have said, that the Bill is aimed at political combinations, and not at crime and outrage.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The hon. and learned Attorney General has said that the Government do not want to encumber the Bill with words which might lead to its further enlargement. These words would cover conviction for crime and outrage; and it must be that, in rejecting them, the Government want the Bill for something besides the prevention of crime and outrage—there can be no other reason for not accepting the Amendment. If they want to put down lawful agitation, it is necessary that they should leave out these words; but if they only want to prevent crime and outrage, the word "prevention" would cover everything. I trust the Government will not resist words which, if inserted, will limit the Bill to the prevention of crime and outrage, and which, if left out, will show that the Government only desire to use the clause as a means for putting down political combination. If the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) will permit me, I would move to insert, after the word "prevention," "and punishment," so as to make the clause run, "for the prevention and punishment of crime and outrage," so as to throw upon the Government the responsibility of rejecting the words.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to insert after "prevention" the words "and punishment."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I do not see how we can accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman if these words are inserted. It is not possible to catalogue all the proper motives which might induce the Lord Lieutenant to put this section in force.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The only argument used against this Amendment was that it did not go far enough. We have now met that argument, and I trust we shall be allowed to amend the Amendment in the sense proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton. When that is done, I can see no possible ground on which the Government should refuse to accept it. If they do not accept the Amendment in its then form, it is clear that they must be influenced by other motives than the prevention and punishment of crime.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I ask the Government to accept the Amendment last proposed without a Division, so as to give us an opportunity of discussing the whole Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, to insert, after "necessary," the words "for the prevention and punishment of crime and outrage."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: We have now the whole Amendment before us, and if the Government do not intend to add anything to the statement of the Attorney General I presume we must go on with the discussion. The attitude taken up by the Government upon this Amendment will and ought to regulate our action not only upon this, but every succeeding Amendment proposed to the Bill. I say this because an appeal was made to us by right hon. Gentlemen opposite to-day to confine our Amendments to matters of principle. In the acceptance of such a proposal there is something implied—namely, that we should be met by the Government with something like a disposition to accept an Amendment of some kind to the clause; but I am bound to say that if we are met by the Government with an obstinate resistance to every Amendment, good, bad, and indifferent, we shall gain nothing by our concession. We test the Government by this Amendment, and if they refuse it, then I say that we shall be driven to the conclusion that the Government intend to stand by every word of the Bill. If that is so, I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the use of our curtailing discussion—where will be the advantage of making this concession, if our doing so is to have the effect of leaving the Bill precisely where it was when we started? So much with regard to the attitude which we shall take up. I now come to the Amendment before the Committee, and upon this subject I may say that I have never seen a man more completely hoisted with his own petard than the hon. and learned Attorney General. He says that he does not object to the principle of the Amendment, but he objects to the Amendment because it is not sufficiently enlarged. Well, my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton enlarges the Amendment, and the moment he does so the hon. and learned Attorney General changes his mind.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I pointed out that we could not catalogue all the proper motives which might induce the Lord Lieutenant to put the section in force, and I expressly stated this, not by way of justification to ourselves, but in answer to the statement of the hon. Member opposite.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I say that we are just where we were before, unless we get this Amendment agreed to. That is what the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman have made absolutely clear. There are only three things which the Executive can do with regard to crime; they can prevent it; they can detect it; and they can punish it; and I defy the metaphysical genius of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to name any condition of being or ontology—which, I believe, is the word in favour just now in Scotland—with regard to crime that is not included within the terms "prevention," "detection," and "punishment." That being so, I suggest that the Amendment should be again amended by putting in the words "and punishment," and I say that these terms finally exhaust the whole category in respect of crime and outrage, and that if the Government will not accept the Amendment in that form it is because they want to extend the Bill beyond those limits. I say that we on these Benches are perfectly ready to be judged with regard to the Amendments we have proposed to this Bill, and that the Government will also be judged by the country for their refusals to accept them.

[Sixteenth Night.]

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) originally, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who amended it, and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who proposes to amend it still further, have all charged the Government with a sinister motive in not following the precise words of the Act of 1882. The particular charge is that the Government are aiming at political combinations instead of the detection and punishment of crime. But this is an accusation which we have always denied, and still deny. This section is only to enable the Lord Lieutenant to set in motion the other clauses of the Bill. The proper way would be to amend the clauses which define the offences, and not the clause for setting in motion the machinery directed against crime and outrage; but we believe that the Amendment, as proposed to be amended, would not have the effect of limiting in the slightest degree the operation of any other clause in the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then why do you not accept it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is exactly what we mean to do.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "prevention" insert the word "detection."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That the word be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, in page 4, line 32, after "necessary" insert, "for the prevention, detection, and punishment of crime and outrage."

MR. BRADLAUGH: I do not rise to offer any opposition to the Amendment. I merely wish to say that I do not follow the reasoning of the hon. and learned Attorney General in thinking that it is possible to punish crime without detecting it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 34, after the word "force," to insert the words "for the period of six months or such lesser period as may be stated in such Proclamation."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It is my duty to state that, as far as the Government are concerned, they must oppose this Amendment, as well as all others upon the Paper which have for their object the limitation of the period during which Proclamations shall continue. Whatever period was inserted, it might be that in one case it would be too long and in another too short for the necessities of the case. The provision of our Bill is that the Proclamation may be revoked at any time. In the case of former Proclamations it is within my own knowledge, and that of many hon. Members of this House, that they have been revoked at widely different periods; I have known Proclamations revoked after 14 days, after a month, after three months, and even after a period of years. I cannot, therefore, see what could be gained by adopting the Amendment proposed, or in other similar Amendments which contain nothing that would prevent the Lord Lieutenant issuing a new Proclamation immediately upon the withdrawal of the former. Under these circumstances we cannot accept the Amendment.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland states that his objection applies not only to this Amendment, but to every Amendment upon the Paper which proposes to limit the period during which the Proclamation is to run. I regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not turned to the next page, because he would see there a reference to the expiry of Proclamations. If there is no date mentioned for the expiry, it is obvious that the period of Proclamation cannot expire at all. We know that it is impossible to fix the date of expiry absolutely; but there would be nothing to prevent the Lord Lieutenant from proclaiming a district afresh on the eve of expiry, and the object of the Amendment is to compel the Lord Lieutenant to look into the matter and discover what the true state of the district may be. That we consider to be only a reasonable provision. The fact that the Proclamation depends upon the existence of crime and outrage makes this Amendment all the more reasonable. We know that the strongest pressure will be brought to bear by rack-renting landlords and broken-down country gentlemen upon the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary for Ireland to keep these Proclamations in force in order that they may get rid of those whom they consider to be objectionable neighbours. Therefore it is that we want to make the Lord Lieutenant responsible; we want to make his responsibility real, and to give him an opportunity of exercising those great abilities which he is supposed by some, although not by us, to possess.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland does not seem to understand the object we have in supporting this Amendment. The complaint is, that this is a Coercion Act which is to be everlasting. All former Coercion Acts were Acts which expired at a certain date, and the Proclamation necessarily terminated with the Acts themselves; and not only was that the case, but the rules and regulations were such as to afford a hope that the Proclamations would terminate when the causes which had brought them about had ceased. The case here is quite different, and I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman will see that if the necessity for the Proclamation continues after the time named in this Amendment, there will still remain a large amount of unused force in the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council, which can be exercised in re-proclaiming the district. The right hon. and learned Gentleman objects that the time named may be too long or too short; but we think, on the other hand, that the period stated would prove to be neither the one nor the other. Everyone who has had any experience in these matters will see that it is not a light thing to subject men for an undefined period to what is, as a matter of fact, equivalent to control by court martial. I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman will remember the observation of the learned Judge who said that a certain trial in Ireland represented to his mind the trial of a Kaffir at the Cape by a jury of Dutch Boers. These are the words of a Judge who knows the force of language; and I repeat that it is no light matter that a clause of this kind should be irrevocable. We have known the case of a district remaining under Proclamation until it was forgotten; and there have been others in which the liberties of the people have been suspended for indefinite periods, and these are among the reasons why we urge upon the Government the acceptance of the present Amendment.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): This Amendment, in the first place, has been proposed to show that there shall be a period for the expiring of an ordinary as well as a special Proclamation, and how it shall take place; another object is to make it obligatory on the Lord Lieutenant and his advisers to reconsider the Proclamation periodically. I think it is not too much to ask that the Officers of the Crown should periodically consider whether or not a Proclamation should be renewed?

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): In connection with the Coercion Act of 1882, there was a promise given by the late Mr. Forster that each individual case should be inquired into every three months. Now, Mr. Forster was a very stern man; but there were good-natured points in his disposition, and he held, among other things, that no Coercion Act should be passed for an unlimited time, and further, as I have said, that an investigation should take place into individual cases. If after three months investigation was regarded then as necessary, how much more necessary is it now that some limit should be put to the time during which the liberties of the people of Ireland are at the mercy of the Crown Prosecutor? Mr. Forster considered it unwise that a Government should have the powers of a Coercion Act to be hung like a sword over the people, and taken down to be used according to the disposition of any official. It is clear from this that Mr. Forster had some conscience left; but the present Government have none left whatever. I trust the conduct of Mr. Forster will not be lost upon the Government on the present occasion, although, up to the present time, they have simply turned their back on every Amendment which has come from this side of the House. When they accepted the last Amendment they were on the horns of a dilemma, and there was no escape for them; but now they say that they will not accept an Amendment of this reasonable and necessary character, although it has a very strong precedent in its favour—namely, that a similar proposal was adopted by Mr. Forster. For that reason, although I do not expect it, I still hope they may be induced to accept the words of limitation which my hon. Friend proposes.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to point out that the Bill refers to the expiring of the Proclamation, and I have to ask how, if there is to be no termination, any Proclamation can be said to expire?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I am surprised that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland does not think it necessary to answer the arguments of my hon. Friend. If a Proclamation be not limited in duration, what is the meaning of the words in the next clause? I understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman's explanation rather tells against his own position, because I understand him to say that he contemplates that these Proclamations should be limited, not in the words of the Proclamations, but in respect of the necessity for them. If that be so, I suggest that six months is not an unreasonable period to propose. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may be able to conceive that circumstances might arise in which a Proclamation should continue for an unlimited time; but I should be sorry to think that such a state of crime and outrage was about to last for ever in Ireland as would make it necessary to continue in existence such an Act as this, although I give the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Party credit for doing all they can to increase crime and outrage there. But if there be in Ireland any considerable amount of crime and outrage, or if the Government succeeds in bringing about such a condition of things, I do not think that it will last for ever; and, therefore, I do not see why they should take the precaution of making the Act everlasting. The Government say that we are limiting the period of Proclamation, but that we do not, at the same time, give any protection to the locality against re-Proclamation. We are, of course, not so ignorant as to suppose that the Proclamation could not be renewed by the Lord Lieutenant; but we want to secure that a district shall not be proclaimed for a longer period than is absolutely necessary. I was going to refer to the Act of 1882, but in that matter the hon. Member for South Tipperary (Mr. John O'Connor) has anticipated me, and it will not be necessary for me now to do so. I wish, however, to point out that the limitation of the period to three months in the Act of 1882 was not that dead letter which the right hon. Gentleman seems to imply would be the result of such a limitation in the Bill. It is true that, under Mr. Forster's Bill, a prisoner was not bound to be released at the expiration of three months; but, at the same time, by this clause the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was specially directed to the case of an individual whose release was, as a matter of fact, very often secured. That release was, I am sure, largely due to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant was compelled by the words of the Statute to give personal attention to the circumstances, and so reconsider the imprisonment of individuals. What we ask is that the same period for review should be given in the case of localities as in the former case was given to individuals; and if that is not conceded, it is clear to us that the Government want to make this Act still more merciless than the former.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The position taken up by the Government is that, having proclaimed a district because there exists a certain amount of crime and outrage, they mean to continue that state of things after every vestige of crime and outrage has disappeared. We charge them with doing that purely for political purposes.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I cannot see that the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman is consistent with the provisions of the Bill. He says that he would not have it understood that these Proclamations are to be for an indefinite period. But if that is so, why is it not stated in the Bill? Why not say that the Proclamations shall remain in force for such time as the Government shall think fit. I can see no objection to that unless they want to take greater powers than they wish the public to know of. There is a matter in connection with this subject which I think has not been touched upon, and which requires attention. Proclamations in Ireland are always attended with consequences other than the mere prosecution of offenders; they are followed by the billeting of an enormous force of police which have to be supported by the localities. This clause, therefore, gives the Government power of taxing for an unlimited period a proclaimed district. I cannot see any reason why the Proclamation should not be limited in respect of duration, just as it is limited in respect of area; and, therefore, in view of these indefinite powers I think the Amendment a very reasonable one, and shall give it my support.

Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary)

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland whether he will not agree to there being supervision every three months, leaving the Proclamation in force unless it be withdrawn? That would simply have the effect of calling attention to the actual state of affairs.

MR. HOLMES: I must point out to the hon. Member that Her Majesty's Government do consider that the provisions of the Act of 1881 would not be applicable to the present case. I have already explained to the Committee that the Government cannot accept any Amendment having for its object to limit the term of Proclamation.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland seems to forget that this is a permanent Act. Surely, having regard to that fact, and that so much has been made of the argument by Gentlemen opposite, we are entitled to ask that this point, with reference to the revision of Proclamations, shall be conceded. It is a very difficult thing to get a Proclamation withdrawn in Ireland. There are always 100 persons ready and eager that a district should be proclaimed; but there are very few who are ready to come forward and urge that the Proclamation should be withdrawn. That being so, we want some limit to be placed on the act of Proclamation; we propose that there should be a limit of time, and that when the period is drawing to a close it should be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to review the facts and circumstances relating to the district, and decide judicially whether or not the Proclamation shall remain in force. If there is anything in the contention of the Government that the limitation is of no use because we make no provision against renewal, I say that we cast on the officials in Ireland the responsibility and duty of periodically renewing the circumstances, and considering whether they warrant the continuance in force of the Proclamation. We know from the fact that no persons will take the trouble to examine the circumstances that a Proclamation may continue in force for an unlimited period, and unless our Amendment is accepted there will be nothing in the Bill to compel the officials in Ireland to examine into the necessity of continuing or withdrawing the Proclamation. That being the case, we know perfectly well that a Proclamation, being once issued, will remain upon a district, so far as the present Government are concerned, without anything being done for its removal.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN) (Dublin, College Green): I think that the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Donegal (Mr. O'Doherty) is well worthy of the attention of the Government. It takes from their hands no power whatsoever, and it simply provides that there shall be a periodical review of the circumstances of these Proclamations. I think it most desirable that this proposal should be accepted for the purpose of casting upon the officials in Ireland the duty of reconsidering the various Proclamations and, in case they see reason for it, withdrawing them. But from another point of view I think the suggestion an admirable one, inasmuch as it would have a good effect upon the proclaimed districts. I believe that if it were known that the state of a district would be brought under consideration at the Castle, it would be an inducement to the people of the district to present a better record. On the other hand, if no such provision is made, there would be no inducement to bring about an improved state of affairs. I cannot see that the position of the Government will be in any respect weakened by the introduction of the words proposed by my hon. Friend, nor can I see anything in favour of their opposition but the mulish obstinacy they have shown in refusing all Amendments from this side of the House.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I agree with my hon. Friend that unless you accept this Amendment it will be a matter of indifference to the people of the district whether crime exists there or not. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has, in answer to the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), tried to insinuate that the punishments under this Act would not be so great as under the Act of 1882; but we say that in that respect the two Acts cannot be compared for a moment, and that this Act curtails the liberties of the people more than any former Act. From the position taken up by the Government we can only conclude that they intend these Proclamations to be permanent.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 102; Noes 145: Majority 43.—(Div. List, No. 227.) [8.45 P.M.]

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I have an Amendment in line 34, to leave out from "Ireland" to "Proclamation" in line 35, and to insert "from a day not earlier than seven days from the date of such Proclamation." My object is to give reasonable notice of the proclamation of the districts for the purposes of the provisions of this Bill to persons who may be interested.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

DR. COMMINS: The clause as it stands is objectionable from two points of view, because it leaves you in doubt when the Proclamation will come into force, because it says "within any specified part of Ireland as from the date of the Proclamation." Well, we know that there is no division of a day in law; and, supposing the Proclamation is issued on the "13th June," that may mean any time of the day or night of the 13th June. The Proclamation may be issued at 10 minutes to 12 o'clock at night, and a person who may have done some act quite innocently, such as attending a meeting at 5 o'clock in the morning, 17 or 18 hours previously, may be proceeded against, prosecuted, and found guilty under the procedure sections of this Act, owing to the framing of this clause. This section is in reality, owing to the way in which it is worded, retrospective to the extent of 24 hours. That is a serious objection to the clause as it stands, as it is quite open to that interpretation. There is another interpretation that may be put upon it, and one quite as objectionable, and that is that the Proclamation will issue after the application of the Act. It does not exactly say it here—but it does not say the contrary in such a definite way as to preclude a person wishing to put that construction upon it from doing so. I suppose the construction is that the Act, if passed on the 14th, would come into operation on the 15th, and that the Proclamation may be issued on the 15th; but we know from previous experience how unfair it is to allow a Proclamation to issue at a period when it is too late to take precautions against it, or to avoid violating the particular provisions promulgated by that Proclamation. That is a thing we have constantly experienced in Ireland; it has happened hundreds of times. Say a meeting is called at a certain place on a given day. Placards announcing that meeting may have been out on the hoardings and on the roadsides for a week or a fortnight—I know a case where they have been out for a fortnight. People may come to that meeting from 20 miles round, but at half-past 11 o'clock at night on the day preceding that fixed for holding the meeting a notice may have been posted up proclaiming the meeting. That was done in the case I refer to, and the notice was handed to the chairman of the meeting in my presence. Not only has that occurred in my own experience, but we know that it has been done over and over again in Ireland. Proclamations are issued up to within a very short time of the hour at which the meetings are to be held, and people who come miles and miles to attend these meetings are liable to criminal prosecution under these Proclamations, although they were entirely ignorant that what they were about to do was illegal. I cannot think that the Government intended to render this sort of thing possible under this Bill. It has been so often complained of in Ireland, not only with regard to the present Government, but also with regard to other Governments, that I should have thought they would have taken measures to prevent its recurrence in connection with this Act. I am bound to hold that the Government are quite aware that this sort of thing is done. They must know the mischief they have brought about from time to time, and the danger to which it exposes the community, to riot and disorder. They must know that the Proclamations themselves have been the cause of serious disturbances—they must know that on many occasions it has been nothing less than sheer good luck which has prevented the breaking out of serious riot and disorder as the result of these Proclamations themselves. In many cases, so far from the Proclamations being a means of preserving law and order, and preserving the peace, they have been the very reverse. The Amendment I propose would prevent any of these dangers occurring. I do not think there is anything unreasonable in asking that some little notice should be given to the persons interested. At all events, let there be a word before a blow is struck. A week's notice is little enough. It might be said that dangers might arise within these seven days that I ask for. It may be said that a conspiracy may be growing up in a neighbourhood, or that some evictions like those at Bodyke may be coming on, and that the Executive must not be limited in point of time. It may be said—"In many cases it will be necessary to act immediately, and the mischief may be done before the seven days you ask for has expired." Well, there is nothing in that case. In the cases of evictions which bring about disturbances, such as those at Bodyke, our experience tells us that it is not likely that breaches of the peace are brought about in a day. Notice of evictions is given months before. It takes 14 or 15 days, even when an eviction motion is not defended, before a decree can be issued or a judgment obtained; and the Government will, therefore, have not one week, but several weeks' notice of the fact that there is going to be a battue of peasants at an eviction such as occurred at Bodyke or Glenbeigh. The Government will have plenty of time to issue their notice of Proclamation, in order to give fair intimation to the people. And the same thing applies to other matters which are made the subject of Proclamation. It may be said that there may be some secret combinations going on, and that it is necessary for the Government to have power to act immediately they find it out; but surely the Government find out these combinations rapidly enough. It is hard to draw a distinction between the office in Printing House Square and Her Majesty's Treasury, and it is hard to see that they are not identified with each other, and that the knowledge and suspicion of the one is not the knowledge and suspicion of the other. We know that there is not the slightest conspiracy of any kind in Ireland that The Times newspaper is not acquainted with. Surely The Times newspaper having this knowledge will not be so unpatriotic as not to communicate what they know to the Treasury. We know perfectly well that The Times newspaper does not keep secret anything from the Treasury, and that the Treasury does not keep anything secret from The Times. If there is anything in the reports which reach them about combinations, they know more about the matter than anyone else—they having means of knowing more about these things than anyone else that I know. Therefore, it would be arguing the utmost incapacity on the part of the Government if you were to say that the Government could not know anything about a conspiracy until it was on the eve of breaking out. I utterly repudiate the notion that they would not know, from their own means of information, what the combinations which exist in Ireland are, or when they are going to take place. I say give the people some notice of what is going to be done before they are brought under the provisions of this Act by the sudden springing of this Proclamation upon them. Give a word before a blow. Do not act like the treacherous Red Indian who springs upon his enemy from behind a hedge. Do not enact a retrospective law of this kind. I move the Amendment which stands in my name, and though I have not much hope of its being accepted, I put it down with some confidence that the arguments I have submitted in support of it will not be very easily disposed of.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 34, leave out from "Ireland" to "Proclamation" in line 35, and insert "from a day not earlier than seven days from the date of such Proclamation."—(Dr. Commins.)

[Sixteenth Night.]

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has seen the effect of his own Amendment—at any rate, if he has, he has very wisely refrained from acknowledging it to the Committee. His argument might have been a very good one as applied to the Crimes Bill of 1882; but there is no provision in the present measure as to proclaiming meetings with a certain penalty to persons who attend them. His principal argument appears to me to amount to this—that a Proclamation can be issued declaring a particular meeting, which had been called, illegal immediately before the hour fixed for that meeting to take place, supposing that the result of that would be that those persons attending the meeting could be subjected to punishment. He says it would be unfair that a Proclamation should be sprung upon such people when they had already started from their homes for the purpose of attending the meeting; and he suggests that the result, in all likelihood, would be a collision between such people and the police authorities. Well, I say that would have been a good proposal, or, at any rate, would have had some merit in it if made in connection with the Bill of 1882; but we have no provision in this Bill with regard to meetings taking place after proclamation rendering the parties attending such meetings subject to penalties. Let us see what the effect of the Amendment would be. The 1st clause of the Bill enables secret investigations to take place, the 2nd clause deals with the decision of cases summarily, and the 4th has reference to the change of the place of trial. Well, supposing evidence was required at a secret investigation, or suppose the attendance of witnesses was required in order that the Summary Jurisdiction Clause might be put into force, or suppose that the place of trial is changed and witnesses are required to come forward, and there is strong reason to believe that the required evidence cannot be obtained voluntarily by reason of the witnesses being intimidated, if this Amendment were accepted, and those seven days' interval were allowed, we may very naturally conclude that those witnesses who are withholding evidence by reason of sympathy with the crime, or by reason of intimidation, will take the earliest opportunity of putting themselves beyond the reach of the magistrates. So that these seven days would in reality be a kind of close time during which these people could escape the necessity of giving evidence. The Amendment would in this way destroy the value of the first provision of the Bill. Take the second provision, and suppose certain turbulence existed in a district, and that for the purpose of putting it down in an effective way it is necessary to resort to the application of summary jurisdiction, it is clear that these seven days' notice which would be required under the Amendment would be, in the highest degree, antagonistic to the operation of that clause. In the same way, as regards the 3rd clause which refers to the order for a special jury, and the 4th clause, which deals with the change of venue, where you have a person returned for trial, and where it is necessary in order to have a fair trial that you should have this clause put into operation, it will be seen that if this Amendment were adopted it might cause a delay which would prevent the trial taking place at the Assizes then being held in the town to which the venue had been changed. The delay might render it absolutely necessary to try the prisoner without change of venue and without appeal to a special jury. It is for the purpose of avoiding these inconveniences and difficulties that the Government are compelled to oppose this Amendment.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I deny that it follows that, in order to make the present clause effective, we must negative the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for South Roscommon (Dr. Commins). I do say that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, in giving the answer he has done, has limited himself to arguing the matter in an altogether technical manner. He will not deny that my hon. Friend put a case for his Amendment in the matter of the proclamation of meetings, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself saw the force of the argument founded upon that illustration, because he took it upon himself to deny that the Bill would have any relation to such a case. But he will not assert that there is not a clause in the second part of this Bill dealing with unlawful assemblies, nor will he attempt to deny that that may in certain cases be made use of for the purpose of prosecuting parties connected with meetings, and of course, indirectly, for the purpose of suppressing meetings. If that be so, it is disingenuous to say that the case which my hon. Friend has put—namely, the case of a meeting proclaimed suddenly and without notice—would be a case which could not occur under this Bill. To me it is perfectly plain that the contingency mentioned by my hon. Friend is quite possible. It is plain that the Government, under this Bill, may prosecute parties who have taken part in what they are pleased to call unlawful assemblies; and with that power in their hands—namely, the power of preventing the holding of meetings, and of dispersing meetings which they allege to be illegal—having that power in their hands, they will, as a result of it, disperse meetings which otherwise they would not be led to interfere with. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that this Bill does not extend that far. He may be right in regard to form, perhaps; but in substance it does, because meetings which the Government would otherwise have no chance of deciding to be illegal, they will be able under the provisions of this Bill to get juries and magistrates to pronounce upon as illegal. Therefore, though no new offence in this matter of public meetings is set up by this clause, yet, in truth and in fact, the class of meetings which it will be in the power of the Government to disperse will be largely increased in consequence of the setting up of the new tribunal by the Bill. If that be so—and I think that no one can deny it—I do say that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has completely avoided the real point raised by this Amendment. It is idle to say that this Bill does not give power to the Government to suppress meetings. We do not say that it does in all cases directly—though in the subsequent clause in certain cases that is expressly provided for, although that point is not material. We say that consequent on Section 2 of this Bill the effect of this clause without the Amendment would be to largely increase the danger of having meetings arbitrarily put a stop to by the Executive. The only really effective reply the right hon. and learned Gentleman has tried to give was where he pointed out certain imaginary effects of the Amendment—certain effects that he imagined would ensue in connection with Section 1. He says that in connection with Section 1, if you accept the Amendment and provide that the Proclamation is not to come into force until a week after it is issued, that the people whom it may be necessary to call up as witnesses before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction will take advantage of the interval to make themselves scarce, and in that way to defeat the object of the Bill. Does he think that there are witnesses in any district who apprehend that the Government are going to call upon them to give evidence, who, if they do not desire to be examined, will wait the passing of this Bill to be placed in the witness box? Does he think these witnesses will not leave upon the notice they have already got without waiting the passage of this Bill? If these witnesses are on the look out for the action of the Government, are apprehensive that the Government will make use of any extraordinary power which may be given to them under this Bill to take them up and examine them, why, of course, they will leave the country before ever the Bill becomes law, and the close time which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers to as a result of allowing this seven days' interval will be, for their purposes, absolutely unnecessary. The close time in their case would be the interval between the present moment and the day the Bill receives the Royal Assent. That an additional mischief would be done by giving the people an additional seven days I take leave to deny. I say the suggestion is absurd. It is absurd to suppose that men who are keen enough and sharp enough to catch at a seven days' interval will not be keen enough to catch at the interval between this and the passing of the Bill. That being so, the only effective argument by which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has endeavoured to resist this Amendment falls to the ground.

Question put, and agreed to.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am sorry that the Amendment we have just disposed of was not accepted by the Government; but since the Government will not accept the principle one way I will see if they will accept it in another. I would move to omit the words "or any later date specified in the Proclamation." Since the Proclamation can only now be issued where outrage and crime is apprehended, it is unreasonable to suppose that a later date would be specified in the Proclamation for putting an end to it.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 35, to leave out "or any later date specified in the Proclamation."—(Mr. Chance.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I think that is a very reasonable proposition.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to move, in page 4, line 39, after "mentioned," to insert—

"Any such Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired if an Address is presented to Her Majesty, by either House of Parliament, praying that such Proclamation shall not continue in force."

Now, Sir, the object of that Amendment is this. It deals in one sense with what I may call the perpetuity of this Act. We have taken exception to this measure on the ground that there is no period put in for its termination, and the argument that has been used in favour of a Coercion Bill not being temporary is that from time to time the attention of Parliament is drawn to the question of the continuance of such a measure. The precedent that I have followed in preparing this Amendment is one that the Government have followed in the next clause. In Clause 6 the Government have provided that—

"Any such special Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired if within a period of fourteen days after the same has been laid before Parliament an Address is presented to Her Majesty, by either House of Parliament, praying that such special Proclamation shall not continue in force."

What I am seeking to do by this Amendment, which I hope the Government will accept, is to require that the Proclamation mentioned in this clause, which is practically the putting in force of the Act with the exception of the dangerous association part of it, shall be subject to the veto of either House of Parliament. That, if adopted, will secure to either House of Parliament constant control over the working of this Act. It will prevent a difficulty which we have pointed out from time to time in the course of this discussion—namely, the difficulty in the way of repealing the Act. If it were not for some provision of this kind, though the House of Commons might be of opinion that this Act should cease to be in force, yet "another place" might have to be consulted before it could be repealed. No Act of this kind has ever before been made perpetual. Previous Acts have either come to an end at the expiration of a specified time and have not been renewed, or, if they have been renewed, on their renewal Parliament has had an opportunity of pronouncing a definite opinion upon them. What I want to effect by my Amendment is that either House of Parliament should have the power of saying that the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant, which deals with the offences specified in the preceding clauses, shall expire. Having admitted that principle in reference to the special Proclamation for putting in force the enactments of the Act relating to dangerous associations, I hope the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland will not decline to accept it as applied to this clause. If the principle is good for the next clause it surely is good for this. If the Government are prepared to accept this Amendment, I should be prepared to alter the terms of it, so as to put it on all fours with the principle of Sub-section 3 of Clause 6. The acceptance of this Amendment will enable Parliament to put an end to the application of the Act without being compelled to resort to the measure of disturbing the whole administrative system of the country and turning the Government out of Office. I propose that the House should at any time have an opportunity of saying that this Proclamation shall expire.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 39, after "mentioned," insert—
"Any such Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired if an Address is presented to Her Majesty by either House of Parliament, praying that such Proclamation shall not continue in force."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I need hardly say that in framing this clause in the terms in which it has been framed there was no wish to withdraw from Parliament the power it has undoubtedly always exercised with regard to matters of this kind. The Government must be in accord with the feeling of Parliament in regard to these things, otherwise it will not be allowed to retain its position. However, the right hon. Gentleman has advanced cogent reasons for the acceptance of the Amendment of which he has given Notice. Though we do not think that it does materially alter, in the direction the right hon. Gentleman has indicated, the clause as approved by us, yet as it is conceived by him, and as it may be conceived by others, that the Amendment will give a greater safeguard, we are prepared to concede the point and accept the Amendment.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have given Notice of an Amendment which is similar to Sub-sections 2, 3, and 4 in Clause 6, with slight verbal alterations, with the intention of providing that a copy of every Proclamation issued under this section shall be laid before each House of Parliament within seven days after the making thereof, if Parliament is then sitting, and, if not then, within seven days after the next meeting of Parliament. I also propose that—

"Whenever any Proclamation is issued under this section, if Parliament be then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within twenty days, such special Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired at the end of a week from the date thereof, unless during that week Parliament shall be summoned to meet within twenty days from the date of the summons; and when a Proclamation has been allowed to lapse in the manner above specified the district to which it applied shall not be proclaimed during the ensuing six months without the consent of Parliament."

THE CHAIRMAN: As a point of Order, I wish to say that the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) has not been put; if it is put, it will be added to the clause; and the object which the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) seeks to obtain in bringing forward his Amendment can be secured by inserting further sub-sections after the 1st sub-section of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, leaving out the last of the three, or moving it with Sub-section 1.

Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: Now the hon. Member for East Mayo can move his Amendment.

MR. DILLON: The best course for me to adopt will be to move only two sub-sections, omitting Sub-section 3. The Amendment which I will now move will read as follows:—

"A copy of every Proclamation issued under this section shall be laid before each House of Parliament within seven days after the making thereof, if Parliament is then sitting, and if not then within seven days after the next meeting of Parliament.

"Whenever any Proclamation is issued under this section, if Parliament be then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within twenty days, such special Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired at the end of a week from the date thereof, unless during that week Parliament shall be summoned to meet within twenty days from the date of the summons; and when a Proclamation has been allowed to lapse in the manner above specified, the district to which it applied shall not be proclaimed during the ensuing six months without the consent of Parliament."

I propose to add, if Section 6 be retained, that when a Proclamation has been allowed to lapse in the manner there specified the district to which it applied shall not be proclaimed in the ensuing six months without the consent of Parliament. I do not see why the same safeguards that are applied in the case of what are called special Proclamations under this Act should not also be applied to the ordinary Proclamations under this Act. The powers that are given to the Lord Lieutenant for enforcing the ordinary powers under this Act are exceedingly great. Inasmuch as it is proposed by this Act, and as it is the ordinary course of Parliament to deprive the people of Ireland of all power of criticizing the government of their own country, for that is what the policy of the Government means, the least we can claim is this, that wherever a large district or section of country is placed under this oppressive legislation we should have an opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government in keeping it under that system. I do not see how the Government can possibly deny us that opportunity. If the theories and declarations of those who support the Union were honestly carried into effect the same reasonable government would exist in Ireland as exists in England; but we know very well, and it is useless to repeat it, because it has been said over and over again, that no such thing exists, or is likely to exist, there. All I would ask in the Amendment I am now proposing is that at least we may have the liberty, and that that liberty shall be secured to us, of criticizing and drawing attention to the action of the Government whenever they place a large section of the population of Ireland under the provisions of this Act. Now, with regard to the Amendment that the Government have just accepted, I desire to point out that it does not afford to us any security—any real security. It is an improvement, so far as it goes, which to my mind is of an exceedingly slender character. It does not afford to us any security whatever that what seems to be legitimate criticism can always be applied in the case of any fresh Proclamation under this Act—

“Any such special Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired if an Address is presented to Her Majesty by either House of Parliament, praying that such special Proclamation shall not continue in force.”

What does that amount to? It amounts to this, that the Front Opposition Bench may, after a Proclamation has been for a long time in existence, obtain an opportunity of moving that it be withdrawn. That, as I say, will only be when the Proclamation has been a long time in existence. In my opinion, it will never occur, because the pressure of Irish Business is already very great; and I doubt whether the Government, judging from the autocratic spirit in which they treat us and our demands, will ever be able to find time for such a thing as the discussion of these Proclamations. Even if they do, and there is a chance that the Government would allow a debate upon such a matter to Members of this House, it is manifest that no such opportunity will be afforded to the Irish Members. We should be perfectly and entirely powerless to make any Motion of that kind. How are we to get an opportunity to move a Motion? We must obtain the permission of the Government in order to do so; and we know well enough from past experience that they are far from anxious to give permission for us to make a Motion of that kind. They have always been opposed to granting an opportunity for making such a Motion, and therefore I am afraid that I have very good grounds for believing that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, though no doubt well intentioned, will, in the end, prove to be a barren Amendment, for the reasons I have explained, and that we shall never have an opportunity of moving such an Address to Her Majesty at all. What I desire to secure by the Amendment I move is, that there shall be an opportunity—a real bond fide opportunity—conferred upon our Party in this House without the consent of the Government of criticizing every proclamation of a district in Ireland. I am bound to say that I do not think this is in the least degree an unreasonable proposal. If a large portion of the Irish people are to be placed under the provisions of this Act, a few hours spent in criticism when the Proclamations are issued will not be wasted. You have the clôture now, and can put a stop to discussions of this kind when you like. You can urge no substantial objection to what we claim. The theory of the Government, the idea of the Union seems to be that an Irish Member should have the smallest influence on any matter that is Irish. That is what it amounts to, and if you deny me this Amendment, it is equivalent to saying that we are not to be allowed even to criticize, except in some of the roundabout ways which the well-known ingenuity of Irish Members discovers—that we are not permitted to criticize the action of the Executive Government in the administration of this unusual and oppressive Bill in Ireland. If that is to be the determination of the Government, and if they have made up their minds to refuse this Amendment, all I can say is, that they will have robbed themselves of all right or shadow of justification of complaint if the ingenuity of Irish Members branches out in new directions. They have had a fair example in the past of what the result of putting the screw too hard on the Irish Members is, and I warn them that every turn that they give the screw will be a torture to themselves more and more. If they meet us fairly, we will meet them fairly; but if they meet us unfairly, we will meet them unfairly in every way we possibly can. If they treat us unfairly, it will be at the cost of their own comfort, and at the cost of a dignified method of carrying on the Business of this House. They will find that the dignity of this House will not be supported by harshly refusing to us that ordinary and reasonable justice which we ask of them. If they seek to prevent us from legitimately criticizing the administration of this abominable Act in Ireland, we shall endeavour in our own peculiar way to bring home to them the inconveniences that they are bringing home to us.

Mr. Dillon

Amendment proposed,

At end of foregoing Amendment, to insert—

A copy of every Proclamation issued under this section shall be laid before each House of Parliament within seven days after the making thereof, if Parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within seven days after the next meeting of Parliament.

“Whenever any Proclamation is issued under this section, if Parliament be then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within twenty days, such special Proclamation shall be deemed to have expired at the end of a week from the date thereof, unless during that week Parliament shall be summoned to meet within twenty days from the date of the summons; and when a Proclamation has been allowed to lapse in the manner above specified, the district to which it applied shall not be proclaimed during the ensuing six months without the consent of Parliament.”—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I do not intend to inquire as to what are the “peculiar ways” that the hon. Gentleman referred to. Different persons may have different opinions as to that. All I can say on the part of Her Majesty’s Government is, that I think we should not be justified, in deference to a threat of that kind—

MR. DILLON: I rise to Order. I desire to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman is using orderly language in imputing such a statement to me? I used no threat. [Cries of “Oh, oh!”] No; I used no threat; and to say that I did, is unjustly to impute to me a course which I did not take. I did not use the words in the sense of a threat; but I mentioned what would be the result of the action of the Government.

MR. HOLMES: I understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he and his Friends would try to oppose the Government in their own peculiar way. My own observation was that the Government would not be justified, in deference to a threat of that kind—and I conceive it to be a threat—to accept an Amendment which, on considering it on its merits, we should reject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, in moving the Amendment we acceded to, stated that he would not ask the Government to accept consequential Amendments. He said that having regard to the character of the Proclamations, it might not be convenient to the Government to accede to Amendments of that kind. The Proclamation under the 6th section is, we admit, a peculiar Proclamation for which there is no precedent, and with regard to that it is intended to give Parliament control over it; therefore we have provided in reference to that section that if Parliament be not assembled at the time the Proclamation is made, but be then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within 20 days, such special Proclamation should be deemed to have expired at the end of a week from the date thereof, unless during that week Parliament shall be summoned to meet within 20 days from the date of the summons. In that way Parliament will be given an opportunity of deciding the matter. I think that is a proper provision in reference to the special Proclamation in Clause 6; but as regards the ordinary Proclamation, it seems to us that it stands in an entirely different position. The ordinary Proclamation refers to provisions contained in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th clauses. It refers to the preliminary inquiry by order of the Attorney General, for the application of the summary jurisdiction, the order for special jury, and the order for change of venue. Let us take a case illustrative of what might be the result, if we accepted the Amendment. In old times we generally adjourned Parliament in the early days of August, and did not meet again until an early day in February. Though in past years we have not been so happily circumstanced as we were formerly, and have not been able to confine our Sittings within such reasonable limits, at any rate we may expect that we shall have three or four months of the year in which we shall not be occupied with the constant Parliamentary duties which are now claiming our attention. Well, supposing Parliament adjourns at the end of August, if it is necessary in some small and limited districts to put in force some of the provisions of this Bill, or all the provisions, it may be, which are consistent with the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th sections, then, if this Amendment were accepted, it should be necessary before we could carry out that purpose, that Parliament should be called together. Parliament would meet on the earliest day, and, having considered the point brought before it under this Amendment, it would be again prorogued. Subsequently, the state of things which led to the Act being put in force in that small district might spread to an adjoining barony, and it might be necessary to apply the Act to that part of the country. Before that could be done, however, it would be necessary to have another meeting of Parliament and another prorogation, and we should have to act in that way in regard to every district whenever an outburst of crime took place. During the few weeks interval between one ordinary Session and another, we might have Parliament called together again and again to consider matters of this kind. If crime and intimidation exists in remote districts, the proposal is that the Act should be put in force, but that, seeing that this is merely executive action, Parliament should not be called together from time to time to pronounce an opinion upon it. In Clause 6, which deals with a special Proclamation, we give the House full control over those proceedings. As to the manner in which the powers contained in this Bill will be exercised without the safeguard the hon. Member proposes, I would point out that it is not at all likely that any Government will run the risk of incurring a Vote of Censure by acting against the general feelings of Parliament. Though Parliament might not be in a position to exercise immediate control over the action of the Government, it will always, when it meets again, have it in its power to pass a Vote of Censure; and that fact, I take it, is not likely to be lost sight of by the Government.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has told us that a great distinction exists between the special Proclamation under Clause 6 of this Bill and the ordinary Proclamation under Section 5. It seems to me an unfortunate thing to debate, under Section 5, the precise provision of the Proclamation under Section 6 of this measure, and I presume I must attribute to that simple fact the remarkable circumstance that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not proceed to show us what was the distinction between the two Proclamations. He left this entirely in nubibus. I shall wait with considerable curiosity to hear the points of difference between the ordinary Proclamation and the Proclamation under Section 6. He tells us that usually there is not an Autumn Session, and he points out that it would be an unusual thing to put this 4th section into operation in a district when Parliament is not sitting. Well, it seems to me that the whole of this Bill has been planned for the purpose of destroying associations; and yet the case of the Government is, that while they take power to punish certain species of crime without the control of Parliament, they are perfectly willing to give Parliament control over the matter of proclaiming dangerous associations under Section 6. That might have been an argument against the permanence of the first provisions of the Act; but the Government knew that they intended to make those first provisions part of the general law of the country, and, having made them part of the general law of the country, it seems to me that they should not deal with one class of case in a different manner to the way in which they treat another. I must demur to one expression of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He told us that if certain districts were proclaimed during the Autumn Parliament, having been called together for the purpose of that Proclamation, after Parliament had been prorogued, or got rid of by some Constitutional method, there might be an outburst of crime, and that that was one of the peculiar ways with which the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) had threatened the Government. Now, I do not desire to appeal to the Chair on a point of Order. I do not desire to appeal, and none of my hon. Friends desire to appeal, from this puny attempt at sarcasm on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, but we would desire him and his Friends—seeing that the time of the House up to Friday is supposed to be ours—to have the decency to rein his professional ardour to some extent, and not use phrases which the Chair, if they were brought under its notice, might visit with condemnation. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman means to convey that the bringing on of outbursts of crime in the districts of Ireland is part of the tactics of Gentlemen connected with the Party to which I belong, I must characterize such insinuation as mean and wretched to the last extreme. [Laughter.] Of course, it is a laughing matter—the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland laughs. I recollect hearing it said, about the time of his appointment to his present position, that his great qualification to the post of the Chief Secretaryship was that he despised the Irish people so. It does not seem to me at all extraordinary that he should sit there and amuse himself by sneering and jeering at everything that falls from this side of the House. It is precisely what we expect from him. It is said that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) will give full control; but what would be full control under one section will not be full control under another section. It seems to me that the argument applies quite as much to Section 5 as to Section 6. I can see no real distinction, and I fail to make out why the Government should give control—though it may be an illusory one—under one section and should deny it under another.

Mr. Holmes

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland began his speech by a bold statement that the Government would not yield to threats from this quarter of the House. The Government are able to use language of that kind now that they are able to command the support of the Liberal Unionists; but there was a time—and it was not so very long ago—when not a threat, but a mere nod, on the part of the Irish Party was enough to make the Conservatives do anything at all. They changed their whole policy at a nod; they dropped the old Coercion Bill at a nod from the Irish Leader. Lord Salisbury went in for Home Rule at the nod or the beck of the Irish Party. I am sorry that we have again been treated to some talk about the so-called responsibility of the Irish Executive. That responsibility has again and again been shown to be the merest sham, and talk about it is only calculated to mislead and deceive. The difference between the Amendment accepted by the Government and that proposed by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) is this, that my hon. Friend's Amendment will insure a discussion in this House regarding alleged conspiracies, while the Amendment accepted by the Government will not do anything of the kind, and therein lies all the difference. If we are sure of having those questions discussed in the House when they arise, and according as they arise, then there would be some reason to think that there was something in the so-called responsibility of the Government; but when there is to be no certain opportunity of discussing those matters, it appears to me that this so-called responsibility is all fudge and humbug. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General described the difficulties that would have to be encountered in summoning Parliament together to discuss these matters. I think, if the Tory Party have been praised for anything, and if the Liberal Unionists have been praised for anything during the last few days, it was for their self-sacrifice. We supposed that if at any time the Government should feel it necessary to call the Liberal Unionists and the Tory Party together, they would have a sufficient amount of this spirit of self-sacrifice remaining to induce them to meet together at Westminster without a murmur. So far as I can see, they have nothing else to do; they do not care, especially the Liberal Unionists, very much for facing the country except at packed ticket meetings, and at large Committee meetings here and there—in places such as Birmingham. Therefore, all the Government will have to do, if they are possessed by this spirit of self-sacrifice to such an extraordinary extent as we are told—all they will have to do will be to ask their followers and the Liberal Unionists to come here as often as is necessary. I am sure they will find no objection to this on the part of these hon. Gentlemen if they give out that the great pièce de resistance of the play is a fresh Coercion Bill, and a re-approval of the policy of the Government. In that way, they will be able to get the Liberal Unionists to come to the front and do their duty to the nation. The Amendment now before the Committee tests, better than any other which has been before proposed, whether there is anything at all in the so-called responsibility of the Government. If this Amendment is not carried, there can be no such thing as Governmental responsibility in these matters. The Government will prevent the discussion of—they certainly will not afford any occasion for discussing—any of their Acts in Ireland. The Amendment proposed would insure discussion upon those subjects. If it is rejected, I hope we shall hear no more about the great responsibility of the Government.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I do think there is something to be said in favour of this Amendment, and I am at last to understand the distinction which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland sees so plainly and clearly between the ordinary Proclamation of this section and the special Proclamation under Section 6; and I certainly do not admit that any of the reasons that would warrant the application of this particular provision to the Proclamation under Section 6 would not equally hold with regard to the application of the Proclamation under the present section. The Proclamation is practically a declaration that associations which exist in certain places are unlawful associations, and that the Lord Lieutenant thinks it right to take power to suppress such associations. For my part, I consider a Proclamation of that kind of thing in its nature not nearly so strong as a Proclamation by virtue of which the Lord Lieutenant can send to be tried under Section 2, before two Resident Magistrates, such of his political opponents as he can drag into a charge of conspiracy with any other charge dealt with in the section. It is a most startling departure from present practice—a much greater departure from Constitutional practice. When we make an analysis of the previous sections of the Bill, and find their political nature, the trial before two paid henchmen of the Government, two Resident Magistrates, it is a much greater departure from Constitutional practice than to suppress a particular form of association. Now, Sir, so much for the argument founded on the alleged distinction in principle between those two classes of population. As regards the argument founded on convenience, I apprehend that is an argument directed against the whole of the machinery of submitting Proclamations to Parliament, and which does not peculiarly apply to submitting the Proclamations under Section 4 to Parliament. If it is inconvenient, absurd, and unreasonable to ask that the Proclamations under Section 4 shall be submitted to Parliament, it is equally inconvenient, absurd, and unreasonable to ask that the Proclamations under Section 6 shall be submitted to Parliament. Every one of the enormous inconveniences that follow from the one course will equally follow from the other. Therefore, Sir, I am at a loss to understand why the right hon. and learned Gentleman should use the argument of convenience. He says, Sir, that the Government might find it desirable to proclaim a small district or barony in Ireland, owing to the prevalence of crime and outrage, and that then they would have to call Parliament together to submit to it the Proclamation, and that, perhaps, the week after they had got Parliament to sanction the Proclamation, a state of things might arise in an adjoining barony which would necessitate the proclamation of that barony also; and, thereupon, they would have to call Parliament together again to ask permission to issue a second Proclamation. Every one of these considerations, as affecting special Proclamations under Section 6, can be equally applied to Proclamations under Section 4, because Section 6 and the following section, dealing with unlawful associations, do not provide, as former Acts did, for the suppression of one large association, and the issuing of one Proclamation of that body. On the contrary, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland drew attention to the fact in his speech in introducing the Bill, an association may be a perfectly lawful and legitimate association in one county and an unlawful association in an adjoining county. I quite admit that the whole of the machinery for calling Parliament together is most cumbersome and unworkable; but I think this objection only shows the straits to which the Government, in conducting the administration of the country by brute force, will be compelled to resort to. Now, Sir, it seems to me that what right hon. Gentlemen opposite are afraid of, is not the increasing necessity for calling Parliament together, but the supervision which Parliament, when so called together, will be compelled to exercise upon the doings of the Government in Ireland. It is not the convenience of Parliament right hon. Gentlemen opposite are considering, but they are determined that the light of day shall not be thrown on their proceedings in Ireland; they are determined that they will have the country to themselves so far as the greater part of this Bill is concerned during the whole Parliamentary Recess, and that hon. Gentlemen sitting upon the Irish Benches shall not be permitted to submit their proceedings to any effective review in Parliament until events have lost all their actuality by the lapse of time which will be necessarily involved by waiting till Parliament is summoned together in the ordinary way. This is another instance in which we have, in moving our Amendments, founded ourselves upon the very words which the Government have made their own. This is not a proposition of ours; this is not an idea we have invented; it is a proposition which the Government have made themselves; it is one of the provisions which they have introduced in their own Bill. All we ask is that as they apply to it one case they should apply it to the other, especially when we show, as we have shown, that the position of the two cases is actually parallel. We say that this provision should apply in all cases, and that Parliament should be called together whenever the Government wish to suppress an unlawful association, whenever they wish to apply to any portion of Ireland any of the provisions of this infamous Bill.

Mr. Clancy

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I suppose we may now go to a Division on this particular Amendment; but allow me to say that every single argument put forward by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) applies to Clause 6 just as well as to Clause 5. The right hon. and learned Gentleman argued on the supposition that the Proclamations under Clause 5 were of an ordinary character in Ireland, and that because there were precedents for them they were to be treated lightly. His argument was based also on the suggestion, equally monstrous and false, that the powers granted under Clause 6 are directed against crime, and do not interfere with liberty. That argument has been used all through this Bill. But there was no attempt on the part of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to combat our contention. It is perfectly plain it is only for an Amendment to be proposed by an Irish Member to settle its fate. It seems that the Government have now come to the conclusion that, during the consideration of the rest of this Bill, no Amendment coming from these Benches is to be tolerated. The right hon. and learned Attorney General made use of what I consider a most uncalled for and disorderly observation. He accused me, in the first place, of threatening the Government. He may call it a threat if he likes. I stated what I am perfectly ready to state again and maintain, that so long as we are in this House, and so long as we are not treated as the Representatives of other portions of the United Kingdom are treated, so long as we are driven to various shifts and devices to endeavour to force in the attention of Parliament the views of our constituents we shall resort to peculiar methods—they are methods forced upon us—and we shall practice them until we are treated in the same way in which other Members coming from other parts of the United Kingdom are treated in this House. It is nonsense for anyone to say that Irish Members occupy the same position in this House as Members from other parts of the United Kingdom. It was monstrous, and most unadvisable, for the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to say, in the course of his speech, that during the long vacation there may be outbursts of crime in a neighbouring barony, which I suppose we may call the "peculiar methods the hon. Gentleman alluded to." I say this was a disorderly, and insolent, and indecent observation. I spoke of Parliamentary methods which may be inconvenient and unpleasant to Members of this House and to the Government, but which are perfectly legitimate, and which we intend to pursue. For the right hon. and learned Attorney General to say that an outburst of crime in Ireland was part of the peculiar methods to which we resorted was an indecent observation to be made by any Member of this House.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed to a Division, I may say, concerning the observations of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), in regard to threats, I am not aware that it is un-Parliamentary to threaten the Government. As to the second point raised by the hon. Gentleman, I may say I did not understand the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to accuse the hon. Member personally of being guilty of resorting to peculiar methods.

MR. DILLON: I do not want to prolong the discussion; but I may remind you, Sir, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman distinctly said—"I suppose we may take that as one of the peculiar methods mentioned by the hon. Gentleman."

MR. HOLMES: I should be very sorry if any remarks of mine caused the hon. Gentleman any pain, and I withdraw in the fullest manner any expression which may have caused him any annoyance.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman withdraw also the cheers on his own side of the House?

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 234: Majority 97.—(Div. List, No. 228.) [10.45 P.M.]

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I now propose to add at the end of the section these words—

"A Return, showing the number and extent of the districts so proclaimed, and the time of such Proclamations shall be made to Parliament once in every three months."

The Amendment amounts to this—certain Proclamations will be made under this Clause, and I think it is advisable that they should be known to this House. In the case of crimes committed in Ireland, there are Returns made every three months. Also with regard to evictions, there is a Return issued once every three months. My Amendment is that a Return shall be made to Parliament once every three months, which shall give the name and extent of the district which has been proclaimed, and the duration of the Proclamation. I have followed here exactly the rule which is observed with regard to evictions, and with regard to crimes. The only point, as it seems to me, which might be made in answer to my Amendment is that the Proclamations will appear in The Dublin Gazette. But Members of this House do not see The Dublin Gazette, and, so far as the knowledge of this House goes, The Dublin Gazette might not exist at all. I trust the Government will see their way to accept what I cannot but regard as a very moderate proposal.

Amendment proposed,

At end of Clause, to add the words—"A Return, showing the number and extent of districts so proclaimed, and the time of such Proclamations shall be made to Parliament once in every three months."—(Mr. Molloy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The cases which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Molloy) has brought forward do not seem to me to be at all analogous. In the matter of evictions there is no record except for the purpose of this House, and the same may be said with regard to crimes committed throughout Ireland. When we were discussing the first section it was suggested that a Return should be made of the preliminary inquiries, and the Government consented to such a Return being presented to Parliament; but, as regards the Proclamation of districts, we have made provision in this Bill that the publicity shall be most formal—we have provided that the entire Proclamation must be published in The Dublin Gazette. The hon. Member says that The Dublin Gazette is not much seen; it is very true many persons may not read The Dublin Gazette; but it is supplied in the Library of this House, and may be consulted by any hon. Gentleman who is interested. If at any time hon. Gentlemen require further information than that afforded in The Dublin Gazette, they have only to move for a Return, and if the House orders the Return the order will be obeyed.

Mr. Dillon

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I think it is very strange that the Government should keep from the knowledge of this House information of what is going on in Ireland, and at the same time persist that this Parliament is the Parliament of Ireland. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has spoken of baronial Proclamations; but if we had a Parliament in Ireland it would exist for the purpose of discussing all baronial and even parochial questions. You refuse us a Parliament of our own, and yet you will not bring within the cognizance of Parliament your methods of governing Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland says that The Dublin Gazette is taken in this House. I have been here something like 18 months, and it was by the merest fluke I found out the other day that The Dublin Gazette was taken in the Library. I had already inquired of 50 or 60 Gentlemen what was the best method of obtaining information, which I subsequently got in The Dublin Gazette. But it is not the point that The Dublin Gazette is taken in the Library, even if The Dublin Gazette came here as regularly as The Times. The point is this—Will you, when you take, as we maintain, exceptional methods of governing Ireland, give in the papers which come into the hands of hon. Members of this House information from day to day which will enable them to judge of what is taking place? I really believe that the Amendment which has been proposed is an Amendment to which no answer can be given except that stolid refusal the Government have persisted in giving to all Amendments from these Benches.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): It is quite evident the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland entertains a very different opinion of The Dublin Gazette to many other people. I do not know whether he has ever heard what Chief Justice Morris said about The Dublin Gazette. As a matter of fact, Chief Justice Morris once said while sitting on the Bench that he had never seen a copy of that publication. That learned Judge frequently boasts that he is the oldest Judicial Officer in Ireland or England, that he has been sitting on the Bench longer than any other Judge in the United Kingdom. If he has not seen a copy of The Dublin Gazette, we may judge of what value that publication is, and the amount of publicity which will be given to these Proclamations. But it is not a question of whether or not The Dublin Gazette is largely circulated; it really does not matter a fig whether it is or not. If instead of publishing these Proclamations in The Dublin Gazette the Government published them in The Times or in The Freeman's Journal, there would, at the same time, be a strong argument for proposing that there should be a periodical Return of the Proclamations made to Parliament. It is one thing to read casually at your breakfast when you get your paper that the Lord Lieutenant has issued such and such a Proclamation; but it is a very different thing to be able to have before you in a nutshell the action of the Government for three months or six months. Everybody knows that the mere fact that you read of these occurrences leaves no distinct idea in the mind as to the number and language of these Proclamations, and that if any accurate idea on the subject is to be brought home to Members of Parliament, or brought home to the public, information must be presented to them, not in pieces, but in a Return showing what has happened in three, six, or 12 months, as the case may be. Now, the Government admitted the principle of this Amendment on the 1st section of the Bill; they admitted that, in the case of secret inquiries, such a Return as this is desirable; they further admitted the principle that Parliament has some right of supervision over these Proclamations, for they have provided that a copy of every Proclamation should be laid on the Table of Parliament, and that the Proclamation shall not come into force if Parliament adopts an Address against it. That being so, unless the Government wish to save to the country the cost of printing and stationery involved in issuing this Return, I cannot imagine any reason for refusing this Amendment, save, indeed, that the Government desire that the manner of their government in Ireland should not be exposed, as it would be undoubtedly if hon. Members had presented to them periodically a Return showing exactly how matters stand with respect to Proclamations.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I should like to point out that there is no provision in this Bill which would compel the Government to insert in The Dublin Gazette any Proclamation made by the Lord Lieutenant. I should like to hear whether, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, any Proclamation by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would be invalid unless it appeared in The Dublin Gazette. It is perfectly open to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to issue a Proclamation, and to publish that Proclamation in any other manner than by insertion in The Dublin Gazette, there will be no necessity whatever for any one Proclamation to appear in The Dublin Gazette. Under these circumstances, it would be impossible for The Dublin Gazette to contain a perfectly safe and trustworthy record of the Proclamations of districts. I also desire to point out, in addition, that Proclamations will be from time to time altered and varied. One provision of a Proclamation may be revoked while the rest may be allowed to stand; and in this state of things ordinary Members of the House of Commons will get into a muddle as to the precise condition of the Proclamations. What is proposed by this Amendment is that a simple Return, a page or two long, shall be laid before the House once every three months. I think that is a distinctly reasonable proposal, and it is very stubborn of the Government to refuse this Amendment, which cannot be said to affect the principle of the Bill. I am surprised that on a small point of this kind the Government have not seen their way to graciously yield to our wishes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 153; Noes 260: Majority 107.—(Div. List, No. 229.) [11.15 P.M.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I now beg to move to add, at the end of the clause, the following provision:—

“When any of the provisions of section two of this Act, relating to summary jurisdiction, are declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, such provisions shall apply to offences committed in the district after the passing of this Act, whether before or after the date of the Proclamation. When the provisions of section three or section four of this Act, relating to special juries or change of place of trial, are declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, such provisions shall apply to crimes committed in the district before or after the passing of this Act.”

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Mr. Courtney, I rise to Order. Allow me to call your attention to the fact that by this Amendment the provisions of Section 2 of the Bill will be made to apply to offences committed before the Proclamation of the district in which offences have been committed. Section 2 commences—“Any person who shall commit any of the following offences in a proclaimed district.” Now, the Committee having already confined the summary jurisdiction of the provision to offences committed in a proclaimed district, I submit this Amendment is not in Order, because it would extend the provisions of Section 2 to offences committed in a district before that district had been proclaimed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question was raised to Section 2, and an Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy), to insert, after the word “shall,” the words “after the passing of this Act,” was negatived. The Committee, at that time, therefore, refused to except offences committed before the passing of the Act.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Mr. Courtney, my Amendment was negatived because the Government declared the words to be superfluous on account of the previous word “shall” in the clause.

MR. CHANCE: The second paragraph of this Amendment makes Sections 3 and 4 of this Bill retrospective, although Sections 3 and 4 refer to indictments for crimes committed in a proclaimed district. I think, Sir, I am correct in stating that there was not on Sections 3 and 4 any Amendment moved of the nature to which you refer as regards Section 2 of the Act.

MR. HOLMES: Perhaps I may explain that this is a matter which has been repeatedly brought before the notice of the Committee, as the hon. Member himself will see.

MR. CHANCE: I have risen to a point of Order. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General desirous of raising one, too?

MR. HOLMES: I would just call attention to what actually occurred. This question was brought forward on the 1st sub-section of the 1st clause of the Bill; and we on this side contended that whether the offence had been committed in a proclaimed district before or after the passing of the Act that section would apply to it. In the course of the discussion it was suggested that the Government, at all events, ought to make the matter clear, and a pledge was given by us that it should be made clear. Accordingly, my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) moved, on the 1st clause of this Bill, a Proviso very similar to the Proviso which I am moving now, except that it was adapted to the peculiar circumstances of that clause. At the beginning of the 2nd clause the question arose whether it should be made retrospective or not; and it was objected that the clause should not be made to apply to offences committed before the issue of the Proclamation. The question was raised again upon the 4th clause, and a Division took place upon it; and we say that the principle has been abundantly accepted that it is to apply to offences whether committed before or after the issue of the Proclamation. We are now engaged in simply carrying out the pledge which we gave when the matter was under discussion upon the 1st clause, and which has been already carried out in part. We propose that the clause shall only apply to offences committed within the district after the passing of the Act; but whether before or after the issue of the Proclamation. What we are now doing is simply to carry out what we stated in the first instance we would do, and which was done upon the 1st clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 41, at end of Clause, to add the words—"When any of the provision of section two of this Act, relating to summary jurisdiction, are declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, such provision shall apply to offences committed in the district after the passing of this Act whether before or after the date of Proclamation."

"When the provisions of section three or section four of this Act, relating to special juries or change of place of trial, are declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, such provisions shall apply to crimes committed in the district before or after the passing of this Act."
—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The view I take of this Amendment is that it is a distinct breach of faith on the part of the Government. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour) cannot be so very hard-pressed that he needs to sneer at that—so very brilliant a person as he promises to be. Perhaps he will give us some argument instead of that kind of sneer. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that what he does not know about this Bill and about Ireland would fill a very large library, and therefore a little modesty on his part would be more becoming. Now, Sir, I say that this proposal is a distinct breach of faith on the part of the Government, made mainly for the purpose of filling up time between this and next Friday, and for the purpose of preventing debate. Why do the Government make the proposal? Because, they say, a distinct pledge was given by them that they would remedy what they recognized as a defect in the Bill when it was pointed out to them by the Liberal Unionists. They made the alteration in the 1st clause, but there was no thought that it was to be repeated subsequently, and it was done then in what they call the fulfilment of a pledge. How anxious they are to fulfil their pledges! If Her Majesty's Government are so very anxious to fulfil their pledges, why does not the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland fulfil the pledge which he gave, and put down the Amendment which he promised in reference to the question of appeal, unless, indeed, he has been intimidated out of it by the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Fulton), or some other Metropolitan Member? That is our point, that this pledge was given to the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), and was not a pledge given in any sense to the House. Under cover of that specific pledge, the Government are now inventing a whole series of additional crimes. That was done from their point of view on the 1st clause, and I say that in spite of the somewhat incoherent noises made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews)—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman must be confined to the matter of the Amendment.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: I can only say that the incoherent noises which have been made will not deter me from continuing my argument. Now, Sir, I say that Her Majesty's Government on the 1st clause declared that it should be retrospective on the principle that it was a fair thing that the crimes under that clause should be inquired into at any time, because that clause dealt not only with trivial, but with serious crimes, such as the crime of murder and other serious outrages. But now what is proposed is this, that if, after the passing of this Act, some crime such as that of so-called Boycotting were committed, then, seven years afterwards, if on some other ground, quo ad, a particular murder in a district, that district is proclaimed, then Her Majesty's Government should, by the elasticity of these provisions, be able to make this section relate back to that previous antecedent date, and be able to punish that offence of Boycotting under this Bill. If that be the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, would it not be reasonable to put in some limit of time within which the Proclamation might have that retrospective effect? Supposing a crime were committed on the 1st of January, and you should issue your Proclamation on the 31st of December following, would it be a reasonable thing that for 12 months the man who committed it should rest under the supposition that he was not to be punished? Perhaps his witnesses might have disappeared and gone to America, and a year after, through the present tide of emigration from Ireland, everybody connected with the offence had disappeared. Her Majesty's Government might issue a Proclamation, and under it they might have this particular man arrested, having got his witnesses out of the way under the free emigration which so largely prevails now. I would respectfully say that that would be a most unfair thing to the individual. The very least we can claim on an Amendment of this description from Her Majesty's Government is this—that they should fix some particular time. They should put in some particular moment when the Proclamation should have effect; and if the Proclamation be not issued within that time, then the so-called crime should be supposed to be done with so far as the power of the Proclamation is concerned—the Proclamation, in short, should be considered to have spent its force. It is an almost unimaginable state of things that if you issue a Proclamation five years hence, and this Bill should be passed into law on the 1st of August next, that then, five years afterwards, after all the witnesses have left the district, you should turn round upon the venomous action of some policeman who remembered some piece of Boycotting in the district, and should be able to prove that crime. That would be a most extraordinary proceeding, and would re-act upon many Members of the Orange Party when a Home Rule Government came into power, because you will have a proclaimed district, and though, while a Tory Government is in Office, they would not punish Orangemen's crimes, yet there will be those who will be taking notes and collecting evidence for the coming time, and they will issue a series of summonses under that Proclamation when the proper time comes. Now, I am not in favour of anything of the sort being done. It is most undesirable to have punishments of that kind; but if you proceed in such a way as to invite reprisals or retaliation, that will be the effect. Now, I would ask the Government—they say their Bill is so crystalline that it cannot be made any clearer—but I would ask them not to put in this Amendment, against their own better judgment, simply to please the Liberal Unionist Party who never attend these debates, who do not know anything of the Bill or of its provisions, and who probably have forgotten all its clauses and all the pledges made about them. I would respectfully ask the Government not to do this—not to waste the time of the House in this manner. At any rate, if we are to have this particular Amendment, it should be inserted with the modification which I have suggested—that some particular date should be fixed in it. If the Proclamation is issued on the 1st of August, then let the Amendment refer no further back than to crimes committed within the preceding month. Do not let us go back to some pre-Adamite period when everybody connected with the offence and with the district will have forgotten all about it, except some police sergeant who has taken a note, or some secretary of some proclaimed Land League who will have been waiting for a prosecution on some future day.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkeenny, S.): This Amendment has been held to be regular, and the case of the Government is that the words of the clause may apply in a district that is not proclaimed, but which may be proclaimed. If that be so, the Amendment is absolutely unnecessary and insensible; and our position is that, having limited ourselves to four Parliamentary days for the discussion of Amendments to this Bill, the Government themselves propose Amendments which are only regular on the supposition that they are entirely unnecessary and worthless.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I have risen for the purpose of moving an Amendment to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland; but, in the first place, I would like to say that the Government have certainly made their meaning perfectly clear on this question, but in a contrary sense to that which they originally intended. We expected that the principle of ex post facto legislation—for that is what this really amounts to—would not be adopted by the Government, because it assumes an operation of the law which may be held in suspense at the wish of the Government over all the country. This is, practically, a system of ex post facto legislation; and, therefore, I object in toto to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General. But, Sir, if it is strange that the interpretation of the words already in the Bill would simply amount to or ensure that offences committed in any district or part of Ireland not already proclaimed shall be punishable, surely on the other hand there is no necessity for the insertion of these words. These words are of an extremely sweeping character, and they are also, to my mind, of an extremely prejudiced character, for they are intended for the purpose of ensuring the conviction of all persons who may be accused to the present Government, or who may have been accused within the past year or so of offences in Ireland. Now, Sir, the 2nd clause of the Bill is extremely long. I include a great number of offences given under a variety of sub-heads, and my proposal would be to exclude from the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General the first subsection, which provides for the prosecution before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction of any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person either not to fulfil his or their legal obligations or to interfere with the administration of the law.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be clearly out of Order to make that exception here, for that has already been decided upon.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Is it in Order to propose the affirmative of a thing, and not to propose the negative of it? If my hon. Friend is out of Order in moving to omit a certain section, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in Order in moving the insertion of it? If the right hon. and learned Attorney General is in Order, I submit that my hon. Friend is also in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is put in far greater caution to avoid misconception.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then might not my hon. Friend, out of the abundance of his caution, move the omission of the same thing?

THE CHAIRMAN: Not if it contradicted what has already been done.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should think the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would not resist this Amendment which I have to propose. The grammar of the first part of his Amendment is false. What I propose to do is to omit the word "provision," in line 3 in order to insert the word "provisions."

MR. HOLMES: I accept that Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DILLON: I now move the omission of the words "after the passing of this Act, whether before or." Then the first paragraph will read as follows:—

"When any of the provisions of Section 2 of this Act, relating to summary jurisdiction, are declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, such provisions shall apply to offences committed in the district after the date of the Proclamation."

THE CHAIRMAN: That is a point which has already been ruled to be inadmissible, having already been decided on a previous clause.

MR. DILLON: I just want to be clear on this. Either there is doubt as to the meaning of Clauses 2, 3, and 4 in this respect, or there is none. If there is doubt, this is to define the meaning. If the Government are entitled to define it one way, surely we are entitled to attempt to define it another. I would also like to take your judgment, Sir, as to the next paragraph of this Amendment, because you will notice that bad as the first paragraph is, the second paragraph is infinitely worse. In the first paragraph the right hon. and learned Attorney General only provides that the action shall be retrospective to the date of the passing of the Act, but the second paragraph of the Amendment provides that Clauses 3 and 4, which are equally objectionable and tyrannical with Clause 2, shall be retrospective to an unlimited extent. Now, Sir, that is a provision to which we naturally have the very deepest objection.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I have an Amendment to move to the first paragraph, to add after the word "Proclamation" in line 4, the words "provided it be so expressly provided in the Proclamation." I presume there will be no objection to that Amendment. If that be accepted I will also propose to add several words at the end of the paragraph. I think it is not unreasonable to ask that if the Government really intend that their Proclamation shall have a retrospective effect, they should say so on the face of it. It is bad enough for it to be retrospective under any circumstances, but if that is to be so, it should be expressly set forth on the face of the document itself. I do not know what line the Government will assume towards this Amendment, but I think it will be hard to show that there is anything unreasonable in it, having regard to the construction—the peculiar construction—which the Government have given to preceding sections—and to their expressed intention that a district should be proclaimed after a crime has been committed. The principle of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General cannot be further questioned as it has been sanctioned, but, at any rate, that principle need not be carried to a needless extent. And though that principle of making the Proclamation retrospective in certain cases where necessary may be sanctioned, it should only be retrospective by virtue of an express statement. I beg to move that Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The same objection applies to the addition of these words that I have already made with regard to the alteration that I have already dealt with.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I have an Amendment to provide that the offence must have been committed within some date previous to the issue of the Proclamation, and I would propose that it should be within one month. I would move the insertion of these words:—"Provided that such offence should have been committed within one month prior to the date of such Proclamation." It is only reasonable to ask that they should issue their Proclamation at once after the offence, and that the people should have notice of the intention of the Government to deal with such offences, and that the all-seeing eye of Her Majesty's Government is upon their iniquity. It is reasonable to provide that they should not be allowed to run on in their ignorance without some warning from Her Majesty's Government—that there should be something like a Statute of Limitations. That is only reasonable in such matters, if anything that comes from these Benches is reasonable. I move that Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

After line 4, to insert the words "Provided that such offence has been committed within one month from the date of Proclamation."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HOLMES (who was very indistinctly heard) was understood to say that the point had already been discussed and decided, so far as its principle was concerned.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland does not suppose that he has said one word by way of meeting my argument. He has said that this was previously fully discussed; but it was not. My proposition is that the Lord Lieutenant should not have a right in December to issue a Proclamation that should reach back for two years. That is a most reasonable thing. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has recommended this measure on the ground that it is a moderate Bill, which only refers to proclaimed districts. But what is the good of such an argument if the Lord Lieutenant, by a mere scratch of his pen—if by the mere autograph of the Lord Lieutenant—he can apply the Bill to the whole of Ireland, and make it absolutely operative at any time? For that reason we bring in a proposal to mitigate that, by proposing that if you do proclaim, your Proclamation shall only go back to some particular crime. How is that met? Simply by stating that it was debated before. If it was debated before it was decided before, and if decided before it is necessary, because it must be in relation to something which is already an active principle in the Bill. It is, therefore, necessary to introduce this provision, for nothing could be more calculated to promote harmony in the attitude of Her Majesty's Government. The clause brings in and negatives the action the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has been commenting upon from the commencement. He says the proposal is limited, and very properly, to proclaimed districts, when I say that the whole thing dates back to the very passing of the Act. You should be obliged to proclaim a district from the commencement. Do not get up in the middle of the night and induce the Lord Lieutenant to put his signature to some Proclamation bringing the whole of Ireland under the operation of the Bill from the very date of his sign manual. That is an absurdity, and I submit that that contention ought to be met in some other way by Her Majesty's Government. Either the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary's argument at the commencement of the proceedings on this Bill was good, or it was bad. If it were bad, there is a complete negative to the proposal. I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should have made this proposal in the spirit in which he has made it. If one month does not suit him will two months satisfy him? If one year does not suit him will two years? This is a Bill for perpetuity. The day after the passing of this Bill a summons may be issued in order to put you into gaol for six months. Was anything more absurd? You say that the whole of Ireland does not require this Act. That is your point. But because some policeman has something against a man in his note-book he is to have the immediate power of summoning that man. I think the Government ought to proclaim the whole of Ireland at once. If you can proclaim a district seven years hence, and apply summary jurisdiction powers when all the witnesses have disappeared, and the memory of man has been dimmed to a large extent as to the transactions which were the subject of the legal proceedings, you are bringing about a mere travesty of justice. Crime, if punished at all, should be punished immediately. The least we can ask of the Government is that where crimes are committed they should bring them within the region of punishment, somewhere or other, without delay.

Mr. Dillon

MR. HOLMES: I would point out that under the summary jurisdiction powers of this Bill persons cannot be prosecuted for offences committed more than six months before the trial of the offence.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I am surprised that there should be a controversy on a question of fact as to what happened at a previous stage of these debates; but I was obliged to take the direct issue from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on this matter, that it had been properly discussed at a previous stage. The first paragraph of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment is this—whether, when summary jurisdiction is declared by Proclamation to be in force in a district, it really applies to offences committed in the district after the passing of the Act, whether before or after the date of the Proclamation; the question is, is the Proclamation to be retrospective—not is it to be absolutely retrospective, but is it to be retrospective as regards the period between the passing of the Act and the issue of the Proclamation? I contest the assertion that this matter has ever been discussed in any shape or form before. I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman what happened. I moved that in the 2nd clause of the Bill, after the word “shall,” the words “after the passing of this Act” should be added; and I did so on the ground that the word “shall” meant here the passing of the Act, that there could be no harm in making the meaning clearer.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary got up then and told me that my Amendment did not do anything, and did not make anything clearer; and, therefore, the Government could not assent to it. Thereupon the right hon. Gentleman sat down, and, if my recollection serves me rightly, it was because the right hon. Gentleman gave us such a sharp answer, and did not even condescend to discuss the matter, that an hon. Friend of mine on this side of the House immediately moved to report Progress, as an expression of dissatisfaction with the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had treated us. On no previous occasion has the point touched by this Amendment been raised. The only reply which the right hon. Gentleman has ventured to give to this Amendment on the merits of it, is that an offence to which the 2nd clause of the Bill applies could not be prosecuted more than six months after the issue of the Proclamation, after the passing of this Bill. I can tell the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland that the matter is not at all so clear as he thinks. No doubt the general law as to the summary trial of offences is that a case should be proceeded with within six months; but if he will take up a subsequent clause of the Bill he will see that the point is not so clear as he thinks. I think that the period of six months is a most extravagant period, considered as the period of limitation for the 2nd clause of this Bill. It is to be suggested that where an offence is to be committed—an offence of the character that will warrant the Proclamation of the district—that, with a provision of this kind staring you in the face, the Government would deliberately wait six months, and then proclaim the district when all recollection of the matter, in respect of which it was proclaimed, has passed away. I intend at a later stage to move that the period of limitation may be reduced to two months; and, if an Amendment of this kind is accepted, plainly there will be some force in the last argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. As long as the clause stands in its present form there is a doubt in the matter. I think, therefore, that the Amendment should be accepted.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I think we have a claim upon the other side in this matter. We stand here in the position of condemned criminals. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] Yes, in the position of condemned criminals, and you are the judge, the jury, and the hangman.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will please address the Chair.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I am afraid that my remarks are rather strong. Sir, to address to the Chair. I think, as I was saying, we have a right to appeal to the House. Notwithstanding the short period the Government have allotted to us for our repentance and the making up of our affairs, the Government very irreverently break in upon us by shouting "Divide, divide!" I think we have not decided—as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has tried to lead the Committee to consider that we have decided—I think we have not decided yet this period of six months with regard to summary jurisdiction, because if we had so decided the matter we should not have been discussing the point now. What we have to decide at this moment is, whether the Government wish to put down crime in Ireland or not. They say they do; then I grant you that you wish to do so. Do you wish to do so promptly, or to allow an inordinate time to elapse after the issue of the Proclamation? I think that is a very simple issue, and I think that if hon. Gentlemen will apply themselves to matters before them, they will nearly all be on our side in this matter. Once in a while I think it would be a great deal if they could say—"You see we are not such bad fellows after all." The Lord Lieutenant is to receive power to proclaim a district for the purpose of summary jurisdiction. We ask that, after that Proclamation is issued, steps should be taken to try the cases which have been the cause of this Proclamation. We wish to insert the limit of a month in the Amendment, believing that this will leave sufficient time for all the purposes of the prosecution of the crime; but if the Government think that any limit between six months and a month is reasonable, they should point it out. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has deceived the House by stating that it is decided that these matters should be prosecuted within six months of the issue of the Proclamation. We are making a new Criminal Law—we have not yet decided the point of time. When we come to the question we shall have the privilege of voting on it. It is quite possible that the six months may not be accepted. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman says that one month is not sufficient, then we will make a compromise, and say two months; but I think it is a very bad comment upon one's apparent anxiety for the passing of the Crimes Act, and on the statement of anyone who says there is a great need for it, to say that you are afraid to limit yourselves to a month or two months after the issuing of the Proclamation for the prosecution of the offence. If the Government have the same desire that they say they have to prosecute offences summarily, they would not throw any objection in the way of grappling with those offences at once.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The sub-section that we have here is a most vague and general one, and might be supposed to be dealing entirely with procedure. I would propose that a limitation should be accepted to this effect—"Subject to the provisions of the section of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851." I leave the section blank, because for the moment I do not remember which it is. I would ask leave to withdraw my previous Amendment, in order that the Government may accept this limitation to that point.

MR. HOLMES: I do not think there will be any objection to that, if it were found necessary; but we shall see later on how that is. When we come to the Report stage we shall be able to decide whether or not it would be advisable to adopt the precedent of the Act of 1851 to meet the difficulty.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The right hon. and learned Gentleman promised me that he would point out the distinction between this case and other cases to which he referred where offences had been rendered punishable by summary conviction—cases in which offences were rendered summary offences for all purposes. We asked the Government to give a summary punishment for offences which were indictable offences. They refused to do so. I moved an Amendment to the effect that if the Government would treat these offences as summary offences they should be summary offences for all purposes; but, as I say, they declined to accept it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The Amendment I propose to the proposed Amendment is as follows:—To leave out the last line of this Amendment the words "before or after the passing of this Act," in order to insert "after the date of such Proclamation." You will notice that the second paragraph of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment relates to Section 3 or Section 4 of this Act which deals with special juries, or change of place of trial, just as the first paragraph refers to Section 2 of the Act relating to summary jurisdiction. The second paragraph set forth that when the Proclamation has been issued, declaring that Section 3 or Section 4 is in force, those sections shall apply to crimes committed in the district before or after the passing of the Act. The first paragraph is only retrospective after the passing of the Act; but it will be observed that so far as Section 3 and Section 4 are concerned, according to the second paragraph of the Amendment, the provision is retrospective indefinitely. I maintain that this is a most monstrous proposition. The Government, in order to make out any ground whatever for such a time as that, ought to have placed before us a large mass of undiscovered and unpunished crime in Ireland. But they have done nothing of the kind. I contend that as they have failed to lay before the Committee details of any large amount of undiscovered and unpunished crime in Ireland, as with the system of packing juries they might have been supposed to have been able to deal with, we are, at least, entitled to require that they should not make such a proposal as this indefinitely retrospective. This I conceive to be a most important Amendment which I propose; and it is one which we think natural and reasonable that the House should accept, and it is one which we shall make a great struggle to get the Committee to adopt. If you turn back to Clauses 3 and 4, that were debated at considerable length by the Committee, you will see that a most tremendous machinery has been given for the changing of venue and the packing of the jury. But those are not all the powers the Government take to deprive a prisoner of his chance of fair play, for in Clause 15—as I suppose by the Resolution the Committee is coming to at the termination of these proceedings we shall be deprived of the opportunity of discussing—the Lord Lieutenant is to have, in future, power to make rules, by the advice of the Privy Council, for an immense number of matters dealing with the conduct of the criminal trials in Ireland which come under the provisions of this Act. I am not lawyer enough to understand how far the chance of the prisoner is interfered with by the vast number of these provisions that seem to hand over the whole procedure of the Criminal Law in Ireland into the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. The Lord Lieutenant is not only empowered to deal with indictments, writs, processes, and so forth, including a great many matters that I do not understand, but he is also entitled to make rules, in cases where special juries are required, as to the number of jurors that are to be required on every panel. That is to complete the machinery when a jury is to be packed—where the panel is, perhaps, no more than 200 or 300, and the whole of the special jurors of the district are brought in. That being so, seeing that this tremendous machinery is being adopted, is it not reasonable to ask that if the Government want the machinery to be retrospective they should tell us what class of cases they mean to apply it to? If this Committee would act with even a show of decency, if they will not accept this Amendment, I think they should insist on the Government stating fairly and honestly who are the men, and, if they cannot say that, at any rate what are the offences they have in their mind when they ask for this retrospective power. The Government ought to have in their minds—and I am certain they have—a perfectly clear idea of the particular offences they wish to have this retrospective power for. They have not stated to the Committee what these offences are and what their demand has reference to. We are entitled to insist upon hearing from the Government a frank and full statement of what class of cases this retrospective machinery is to be applied to before this provision is to be allowed to pass. It must be manifest to every Member of the Committee that it cannot have any effect in the way of repression of crime in Ireland, because in the course of the early debates on the second reading of this Bill, and previous to the second reading of this Bill, it was admitted by the Government that the condition of crime in Ireland, more especially undetected and unpunished crime, was not of an abnormal or very shocking character. If the Government are honest in their contention, and their object is to get at certain serious crime, like the murder of Murphy which took place near Killarney, and the murder of the Emergency man in the County of Clare, those crimes being committed in small restricted districts, they would not be put forward for the whole of Ireland as an excuse for this Act. But the fact is that a so-called criminal conspiracy, which embraces three-fourths of the people of Ireland, is under this measure to be left at the mercy of a packed jury, and condemned simply and solely because certain murders have been committed in a small portion of the County of Kerry and in a small portion of the County of Clare. I cannot but expect that considerable and prolonged debate will take place on this clause if the Government do not yield to the reasonable proposal of this Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, in last line, to leave out the words “before or after the passing of this Act,” in order to insert the words “after the date of such Proclamation.”—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment.”

Mr. HOLMES: It is very much to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman was not in his place on the evening of Tuesday, 7th June, because he would have found that an Amendment was moved to insert in Clause 3, after the word “where,” the words “after the passing of this Act.” A great deal of argument then took place, and it was strongly urged that the clause should not be retrospective. The hon. Member who moved that Amendment spoke some time on it. He was replied to by myself. Three or four hon. Members spoke to the question from the Benches opposite, and one speech which we listened to was very much the same as that we have just heard from the hon. Gentleman asking what crimes this Act would apply to. That hon. Member also was answered, and after considerable discussion the hon. Gentleman withdrew his Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman opposite had known this I am sure he would not have gone on with his proposal. It is to be regretted that on Wednesday afternoon, 8th June, he was not in his place at half-past 3 of the clock, when another and a similar Amendment was moved by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Donegal (Mr. O'Doherty). I cannot say whether we divided on that Amendment, but I think we did. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) has gone out to see whether we did or not. The Amendment was discussed, at any rate, and a speech was made very similar to that delivered on the occasion of the moving of the former Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dillon) is in Order in moving the present Amendment, it is because of the technical circumstance that the original Amendment was withdrawn. I must decline to discuss a matter which was discussed so lately as Tuesday and Wednesday in last week.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The proposed Amendment is to insert "after the date of such Proclamation." The Amendment negatived was "after the passing of this Act;" there is a great distinction; and I submit that, if there had been a decision, the effect of that decision would have been to render this proposed Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland wholly irregular.

THE CHAIRMAN: The effect of that Amendment evidently was to make the provisions of Section 4 applicable to crimes committed before the passing of the Act as well as after. But in the case of Section 3 the Amendment was withdrawn; therefore the point is practically open with respect to Clause 3. The matter can only be dealt with by the Committee as regards Section 3.

MR. CHANCE: The fact of that Amendment could not extend or diminish the effect of the words "committed in a proclaimed district." These are the words we are now seeking to define, and I submit to you, Sir, that in pursuance of your ruling it is open to us to define the words "committed in a proclaimed district."

THE CHAIRMAN: No; I have not said that the words "committed in a proclaimed district" have any reference to the date of the Proclamation. It is a mere question of geographical description. Last Wednesday it was decided that Section 4 should be equally applicable.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): All I can do is to divide the Committee on the question of the special jury, as the special jury is the machinery by which the Government will be able to try myself and others for recent transactions in which we were engaged.

MR. CHANCE: Would it be in Order, Mr. Courtney, to move to leave out the words "before or?"

THE CHAIRMAN: It is impossible to avoid the substantial question. The question was concluded, as I have told the hon. Member, by the vote of last Wednesday.

MR. CHANCE: All I asked, Sir, was whether it would be in order to move to leave out the words "before or?"

THE CHAIRMAN: No; not as regards Section 4.

MR. CHANCE: Then I move to add, after the word "Act," "as to Section 4, and as to Section 3 after the date of such Proclamation." I submit, Sir, that that will be in Order.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add, at the end thereof, the words, "as to Section 4, and as to Section 3 after the date of such Proclamation."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Loughford, N.): I think it would be only reasonable for the Government to tell us the exact number of people they intend this section to apply to. We shall not dispute the desirability of this provision; but we are, at all events, entitled to know if the Government have some warranty and necessity for this provision, and who are the persons it is to apply to. If my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) is indicted he may be taken to Belfast, and tried by a special jury.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Gentleman asks who are the persons against whom indictments will be brought. If he will put a Question to me in the ordinary way I will try to answer it. He then referred to proceedings taken against the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon.) I do not know whether he is aware that those proceedings have been abandoned by the Government, and that they do not intend to take any further steps in regard to them. That was announced in all the public newspapers, and therefore it is hardly conceivable that the Crown will revive those proceedings.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Those proceedings were undoubtedly dropped in County Dublin; but I have seen nothing to prevent my hon. Friend being dragged up to County Antrim, and there tried by a jury of 12 landlords. There has certainly been a Parliamentary evasion of the question asked. We have asked whether it is intended, in respect to those transactions, to bring the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and his political Colleagues before a jury in the North of Ireland under Section 4 of this Bill? We believe that it is intended to revive those proceedings; we believe that this Amendment has been moved for the purpose of making it clear to the Courts that the Executive will be entitled to revive the proceedings; and we ask for a plain answer, Yes or No, upon the subject. I must remark that, having limited us to four and a-half days', or thereabouts, discussion, it is in the highest degree unreasonable and unfair for the Government to put down an Amendment of this character, which certainly raises very contentious matter, and re-opens questions which have been already argued and decided.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I think it will be a sufficient answer to the last charge brought against the Government when I say that you, Sir, have ruled that, as regards three of these special sections, the matter has been already decided by the Committee. Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite appear to understand the language of the Treasury Bench as always used in a different sense to that intended, and I do appeal to English Members to believe that when I state that proceedings have been abandoned I state what I mean—that proceedings have been really abandoned and will not be revived.

Mr. Holmes

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): It is all very fine for the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) to get into a frenzy over this question, and to say the Government mean what they say. I will not contradict his assertion, but I have practical experience of the way things are conducted in Ireland; they are conducted differently to the way they are described in the House of Commons. I have gone through this business. I was proceeded against last winter; first of all, in a police court in County Galway. The proceedings there were definitely dropped by the Crown, and notice was served on me at my house in Dublin that those proceedings were at an end. Then I was proceeded against in the City of Dublin in respect to the very same transactions. I was transferred to the County of Dublin, and then the trial proceeded, and the Crown was defeated. They intended to proceed again at a subsequent Assize, but they changed their mind, and gave notice that the proceedings were dropped. I have been twice proceeded against on the same transactions. Having received notice before the proceedings in the City of Dublin that the proceedings would be dropped, I have no confidence, even after the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland, that I shall not be proceeded against again on the same transactions. This may appear a trivial and absurd thing to some hon. Members; but, at the same time, I do want something more straightforward and plain from the Attorney General for Ireland before we allow this section to pass. He stated that the Crown had no intention of resuscitating these proceedings. Now, this is a retrospective clause, and may be used against the men who were tried in Dublin last winter, or against others who took part along with them. I am not thinking of ourselves alone, but of the hundreds and thousands of men who are engaged in similar work. If these clauses are passed in their present shape we and many others will be absolutely at the mercy of the Attorney General for Ireland, who is exceedingly polite in this House, but who is the very reverse when he is prosecuting in Green Street. When he gets us into Court he will hit below the belt. ["Oh, oh!"] I mean that he will hit below the belt in the sense of packing juries in a legal sense. He will resort, as every Irish official before him has resorted, to every legal dodge to secure the conviction that the Castle has set its heart upon. Therefore, it is absurd to expect our opposition will be disarmed by the plausible statements of the Attorney General for Ireland, and by his appeals to English Members. We know perfectly well what we in Ireland have to expect from the Irish Government. Unless the Government will give us an assurance that this particular retrospective power will not be used in the way we fear it will, it is our bounden duty to resist this Amendment to the last.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We are asked to believe what the Government say. But we are dealing with Gentlemen who, when they were elected, said they did not mean to propose coercion, yet they have brought in this Bill. It is absolutely necessary we should examine very closely the words used by the Government. Now, I asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to whom this section is to apply—not an unreasonable question to ask. He says that if I will put a Question upon the Paper he will endeavour to answer it. Does he think we have nothing to do but to write out Questions to be asked in this House?

MR. HOLMES: The hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to what number of persons the section was intended to apply, and I asked that he should put a Question in the usual way upon the point.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When Sir George Trevelyan was in Office he found all his information in his box. When the Government knew this clause was coming on, is it reasonable they should think it sufficient to say that it is similar in effect to the provision discussed last Wednesday? Last Wednesday we asked for this information, and now, forsooth, we are to be put to the trouble of writing out a question to get at the information! What is the good of having a Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland if he cannot telegraph to Dublin to get information on such points as these? You do not spare expense, and I do think it is reasonable when you put a special Amendment on the Paper, evidently the result of second thoughts, and not at all arising out of the Bill as originally framed, that you should give us the information we now ask. You have had plenty of time to obtain the information. We ask who are the individuals against whom this clause is intended to be put in operation? We have considerable reason to complain that this information is not forthcoming. We did, at least, expect that the Department of the Attorney General for Ireland would have obtained information as regards these prisoners. It is unreasonable to ask us to put down Questions on this subject. If we do put down Questions we shall be attacked for doing so; it will be said they are nothing but obstructive Questions. Will the Government give us this information on Report? That would be a fair compromise.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Holmes) would shorten this discussion if he could bring himself to give a straightforward answer to a straightforward question. This is entirely a matter of definition. He says he has served notice on the defendants in the recent trials that he has discontinued these proceedings. What does he mean? Of course, we know the proceedings in Green Street are ipso facto discontinued. Will he say he does not intend, under this Bill, to bring further proceedings in reference to transactions out of which the recent trials arose? We should then be satisfied with what he said, because we would understand the meaning of his words. But at present we do not understand what he means. The Government talk about not coercing the Irish. That is another case of definition. We think they are coercing Ireland. By-and-bye in Court the Attorney General for Ireland may say that when he said he was going to discontinue these proceedings he meant the true bill given by the Grand Jury. What we want to know is whether any other prosecutions arising out of the recent transactions will be instituted? If he will make that clear we shall be satisfied.

MR. CHANCE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland appealed to English Gentlemen, and asked them to believe what he said. I am sure they do believe what he said. We believe it. But I am a lawyer. I have defended my hon. Friends in political trials, and I know precisely the value of what he said. I ask the Committee to note what he said. He couched his observations in the most strict and accurate legal language, so that if proceedings are taken in Belfast or Antrim against my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) he will be able to turn to the pages of Hansard, and say he has observed the very letter of his undertaking, although, at the same time, he may have broken the spirit of it. Now, he has said the proceedings have been abandoned. I assume by the proceedings he means the indictment upon which my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo and his Colleagues were brought up in Green Street before a jury of County Dublin. We ask the Attorney General for Ireland now to state straightforwardly and plainly does he mean the Crown will not take any proceedings in respect to the transactions for which the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo was indicted? I am entitled to appeal to English Gentlemen in the House, and I do appeal to them with confidence, that they should insist upon getting a straightforward answer to the very simple question we have put. I warn hon. Gentlemen that if they do not do this it will be in the power of the Crown, without the slightest breach of faith, to indict my hon. Friend again, this time in the North of Ireland, before a jury of Northern landlords, and in doing so to point to Hansard, and say—"We have broken no pledge; we did not continue the proceedings in Green Street; but we took independent proceedings." They did that at Loughrea. They took certain proceedings by warrant; then they served notice that the proceedings were abandoned, and as soon as the notice was served they served a summons, recommencing the very same proceedings in the Dublin Courts. I beg that hon. Gentlemen will insist upon an answer being given to our question.

Mr. HOLMES: It is quite evident hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite have taken up a position that no language will cause them to alter. I have already said that the proceedings have been abandoned by the Crown, and there is no intention of reviving them. I now say, further, that if what has been asserted by hon. Members opposite were possible—namely, that a bill against the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) based upon the same transactions could be sent up to some other Grand Jury, it would only be possible by virtue of the grossest breach of faith. I have no intention of reviving the proceedings, and I said the same thing half-an-hour ago.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 233: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 230.) [12.50 A.M.]

Question put, "That the Amendment, as amended, be added to the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 227; Noes 118: Majority 109.—(Div. List, No. 231.) [1.10 A.M.]

Question put, "That Clause 5, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 229; Noes 117: Majority 112. [1.25 A.M.]

AYES.

Addison, J. E. W.	Caine, W. S.
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	Caldwell, J.
Ainslie, W. G.	Campbell, Sir A.
Alsopp, hon. P.	Campbell, J. A.
Ambrose, W.	Campbell, R. F. F.
Amherst, W. A. T.	Charrington, S.
Anstruther, Colonel R. H. L.	Clarke, Sir E. G.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Coghill, D. H.
Baden-Powell, G. S.	Commerell, Adml. Sir J. E.
Baggallay, E.	Compton, F.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Cooke, C. W. R.
Baird, J. G. A.	Corry, Sir J. P.
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.	Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Balfour, G. W.	Cranborne, Viscount
Banes, Major G. E.	Cross, H. S.
Barry, A. H. Smith-	Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Bartley, G. C. T.	Davenport, H. T.
Bass, H.	Davenport, W. B.
Bates, Sir E.	De Cobain, E. S. W.
Baumann, A. A.	De Lisle, E. J. L. M.
Beach, W. W. B.	P.
Beadel, W. J.	De Worms, Baron H.
Beaumont, H. F.	Dimsdale, Baron R.
Bentinck, Lord H. C.	Dorington, Sir J. E.
Bentinck, W. G. C.	Dugdale, J. S.
Beresford, Lord C. W.	Dyke, right hon. Sir W. H.
De la Poer	Eaton, H. W.
Bethell, Commander G. R.	Edwards-Moss, T. O.
Bigwood, J.	Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Birkbeck, Sir E.	Elcho, Lord
Blundell, Colonel H. B. H.	Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
Bond, G. H.	Elliot, G. W.
Bonsor, H. C. O.	Elton, C. I.
Boord, T. W.	Evelyn, W. J.
Borthwick, Sir A.	Eyre, Colonel H.
Bridgeman, Col. hon. F. C.	Feilden, Lt.-Gen. R. J.
Bristowe, T. L.	Fergusson, right hon. Sir J.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.	Fielden, T.
Burghley, Lord	Finch, G. H.
	Finlay, R. B.
	Fisher, W. H.

Fitzgerald, R. U. P.
 Fletcher, Sir H.
 Folkstone, right hon. Viscount
 Forwood, A. B.
 Fowler, Sir R. N.
 Fraser, General C. C.
 Gathorne-Hardy, hon. A. E.
 Gedge, S.
 Gent-Davis, R.
 Gibson, J. G.
 Gilliat, J. S.
 Godson, A. F.
 Goldsmid, Sir J.
 Goldsworthy, Major-General W. T.
 Gorst, Sir J. E.
 Gray, C. W.
 Green, Sir E.
 Grimston, Viscount
 Grottrian, F. B.
 Gunter, Colonel R.
 Gurdon, R. T.
 Hall, C.
 Halsey, T. F.
 Hambro, Col. C. J. T.
 Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
 Hamilton, Lord E.
 Hamilton, Col. C. E.
 Hanbury, R. W.
 Hankey, F. A.
 Hardcastle, E.
 Hardcastle, F.
 Heathcote, Capt. J. H. Edwards-
 Herbert, hon. S.
 Hermon-Hodge, R. T.
 Hervey, Lord F.
 Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
 Hill, Colonel E. S.
 Hoare, S.
 Holland, right hon. Sir H. T.
 Holmes, rt. hon. H.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Houldsworth, W. H.
 Hozier, J. H. O.
 Hubbard, E.
 Hughes, Colonel E.
 Hulse, E. H.
 Hunt, F. S.
 Isaacs, L. H.
 Isaacson, F. W.
 Jackson, W. L.
 Jarvis, A. W.
 Johnston, W.
 Kelly, J. R.
 Kenrick, W.
 Kenyon, hon. G. T.
 Kenyon - Slaney, Col. W.
 Kerans, F. H.
 King - Harman, right hon. Colonel E. E.
 Knowles, L.
 Lafone, A.
 Lambert, C.
 Laurie, Colonel R. P.
 Lawrence, W. F.
 Lea, T.
 Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.

Lees, E.
 Leighton, S.
 Lewisham, right hon. Viscount
 Llewellyn, E. H.
 Long, W. H.
 Low, M.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Lowther, J. W.
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, right hon. J. H. A.
 Maclure, J. W.
 M'Calmont, Captain J.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Mallock, R.
 March, Earl of
 Marriott, rt. hn. W. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N. Story-
 Matthews, rt. hn. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mayne, Admiral R. C.
 Mildmay, F. B.
 Milvain, T.
 More, R. J.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Newark, Viscount
 Noble, W.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 Norton, R.
 Paget, Sir R. H.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Penton, Captain F. T.
 Plunket, right hon. D. R.
 Powell, F. S.
 Price, Captain G. E.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Reed, H. B.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Ritchie, rt. hn. C. T.
 Robertson, J. P. B.
 Robinson, B.
 Rollit, Sir A. K.
 Ross, A. H.
 Round, J.
 Royden, T. B.
 Russell, Sir G.
 Russell, T. W.
 Saunderson, Col. E. J.
 Sellar, A. C.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sidebottom, W.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Swetonham, E.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Tapling, T. K.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Thorburn, W.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Townsend, F.

Trotter, H. J.
 Verdin, R.
 Walsh, hon. A. H. J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 Wharton, J. L.
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Wilson, Sir S.

Wolmer, Viscount
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Wroughton, P.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)
 Acland, A. H. D.
 Allison, R. A.
 Blane, A.
 Broadhurst, H.
 Burt, T.
 Campbell, H.
 Carew, J. L.
 Chance, P. A.
 Channing, F. A.
 Clancy, J. J.
 Cobb, H. P.
 Coleridge, hon. B.
 Commins, A.
 Connolly, L.
 Conway, M.
 Conybeare, C. A. V.
 Crilly, D.
 Dillon, J.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Ellis, J. E.
 Ellis, T. E.
 Esmonde, Sir T. H. G.
 Evershed, S.
 Fenwick, C.
 Finucane, J.
 Foster, Sir B. W.
 Fox, Dr. J. F.
 Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
 Gill, T. P.
 Grey, Sir E.
 Harrington, E.
 Hayden, L. P.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Healy, M.
 Healy, T. M.
 Holden, I.
 Hooper, J.
 Hunter, W. A.
 Jacoby, J. A.
 James, C. H.
 Joicey, J.
 Kennedy, E. J.
 Kenny, C. S.
 Kenny, J. E.
 Kenny, M. J.
 Labouchere, H.
 Lawson, Sir W.
 Lawson, H. L. W.
 Lewis, T. P.
 Macdonald, W. A.
 Mac Neill, J. G. S.
 M'Arthur, A.
 M'Arthur, W. A.
 M'Cartan, M.
 M'Carthy, J.
 M'Donald, P.
 M'Lagan, P.
 Maitland, W. F.
 Marjoribanks, rt. hon. E.

Marum, E. M.
 Mason, S.
 Montagu, S.
 Morley, A.
 Neville, R.
 Nolan, Colonel J. P.
 Nolan, J.
 O'Brien, J. F. X.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Brien, P. J.
 O'Connor, A.
 O'Connor, J. (Kerry)
 O'Connor, J. (Tipperary)
 O'Connor, T. P.
 O'Doherty, J. E.
 O'Hanlon, T.
 O'Hea, P.
 O'Kelly, J.
 Paulton, J. M.
 Pease, A. E.
 Pease, H. F.
 Pickard, B.
 Pickersgill, E. H.
 Pinkerton, J.
 Powell, W. R. H.
 Power, R.
 Price, T. P.
 Priestley, B.
 Provand, A. D.
 Pyne, J. D.
 Quinn, T.
 Redmond, J. E.
 Redmond, W. H. K.
 Rendel, S.
 Roberts, J.
 Roberts, J. B.
 Rowlands, J.
 Rowlands, W. B.
 Sexton, T.
 Shaw, T.
 Sheehan, J. D.
 Smith, S.
 Stack, J.
 Stanhope, hon. P. J.
 Stuart, J.
 Sullivan, D.
 Sullivan, T. D.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Thomas, A.
 Tuite, J.
 Wallace, R.
 Watt, H.
 Williams, A. J.
 Williamson, J.
 Wilson, H. J.
 Wilson, I.
 Yeo, F. A.

TELLERS.

Biggar, J. G.
 Sheil, E.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) [EXPENSES].

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Mr. Speaker, the other night I asked a distinct question as to the expenses arising under this Bill. It was provided by the sub-section which has been struck out that if a man was taken over to England, all his expenses and those of his witnesses, counsel, and so on would be paid. I have already pointed out that England is much nearer to some parts of Ireland than some parts of Ireland, such as Belfast, are to Kerry and Cork. I must say that if a man engages a solicitor or a counsel in one county, or in one Circuit, and the venue of the trial is changed to a division or a county, or a district where the solicitor or counsel does not practise, the result is to inflict on the accused person the necessity of paying fees to a second counsel and engaging a second solicitor. And it is not only a question of the expense involved. When a person requiring legal advice is in prison, the solicitor has either himself to visit him or to send his clerk, and thereby he obtains the confidence of the prisoner. If you change the venue to some distant place—say, Belfast—you throw the prisoner into the hands of a solicitor of, perhaps, a totally different character. Perhaps the solicitor has found the counsel. It is perfectly notorious that counsel pocket all the fees they get, whether they have earned them or not. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) will not deny that proposition. It would be a very great hardship to the prisoner if he was obliged to fee a second counsel. I will further say that I do not see for one moment why the counsel or the solicitors of a particular Circuit ought to be Boycotted in favour of the Orange attorneys and barristers of the North of Ireland. I say this with some feeling. You will change the venues to the North of Ireland, and thereby Boycott the entire Circuits of Leinster, Connaught, and Munster. We are entitled, I think, to base a distinct understanding on this question before we allow the House to go into Committee. I am not at all in favour of giving the existing Law Officers any bigger salaries, and I see no necessity for going into Committee if it is only for granting them these little consolations.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I rise merely for the purpose of pointing out that whilst power is to be taken for providing for the expenses and personal charges of counsel and witnesses solicitors are to be omitted altogether. I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it will be competent for me to move an Amendment on this subject in Committee, or whether it is necessary to propose an Instruction now?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The same question as that which the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) raises now was brought forward the other evening in Committee on the Bill, and I then gave the answer which I must now repeat—namely, that we propose to pay all the costs which the prisoner or accused person will be put to by reason of the change of venue, and that this will be done on the same principle as was adopted in the case of the Act of 1882. I can say, of my own knowledge, that under the Act of 1882 the provision was carried out fairly and liberally, as far as I could judge, and I am not aware that any single complaint was made. [MR. T. M. HEALY: I complained myself.] I will just explain what I consider a reasonable case of change of venue. Supposing a prisoner is arrested in the County of Cork, I admit it is a reasonable thing that he should have an opportunity of consulting a solicitor in that county. Now, if the venue is subsequently changed to some place upon another Circuit—say, for instance, to Waterford—I think it would be a reasonable thing that a solicitor who goes from Cork to Waterford should receive the proper fee payable to a solicitor for going from one county to another. But if the venue is changed, as, under most circumstances, it will be changed, to the Waterford Assizes, there are very competent counsel going on that Circuit, and the solicitor only engages his counsel when they come upon Circuit. If the venue had been changed to England, we considered that it was desirable that the prisoners should have the advantage of obtaining the assistance of counsel whom the Irish solicitor might consult. The hon. and learned Member suggests that the venue might be changed after the jury is empanelled. I can quite understand that it would be improper, under such circumstances, to deprive a man of the counsel who had been briefed, and who knew all the circumstances of the case. I know that under the Act of 1882, where arrangements were made to bring such a counsel to the changed venue—[Mr. T. M. HEALY: He would be paid?] He would be paid. That was done under similar clauses in 1882. The hon. and learned Member appears to assume that all these cases are to be transferred to Belfast. Now, under the Act of 1882, there was no change of venue from the South of Ireland to Ulster. There were cases in which the venue was changed from Ulster to other parts of Ireland, but not from the South to Ulster. The cases that would be transferred to the North would naturally be very exceptional cases. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance), the solicitors are covered by the words of the clause.

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the question which was put to me by the hon. Member for South Kilkenny, I certainly think that the Resolution to be proposed in Committee would cover the expenses which would be thought proper for solicitors.

Question put, and agreed to.

MATTER considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any allowances that may be made, and Expenses that may be incurred, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): In the main I think the answer given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to my questions before going into Committee was satisfactory; but what I wish to ask is whether rules will be made and hung up in the prisons, so that the prisoners may understand what they are entitled to claim? When a prisoner is subjected to change of venue, the least we can ask is that such rules shall be made, and that he shall be able to understand the purport of them. I have known of many cases of prisoners pleading guilty, simply because they could not afford to keep their witnesses any longer. Anyone who will ask the Judge or the counsel who attended the Winter Assizes of 1881 in Cork will learn that the witnesses for some of the prisoners spent their Christmas in the workhouse, because money was not forthcoming to maintain them, and the prisoners were afterwards obliged to plead guilty because the witnesses could not be kept any longer in Cork. I heard a similar complaint about a case at the Assizes in the town of Omagh. What, then, would be the case when witnesses have to be sent from Kerry or Cork to Ulster, hundreds of miles away? How can an unfortunate prisoner find the railway fare for his witnesses from Cork to Belfast, or, it may be, to Dublin? I may be told that he has only to give the names of his witnesses to the Solicitor for the Crown. Well, what would be the result? They would, every one of them, be examined by a Resident Magistrate under the 1st clause of the Bill. Now that that section has been passed I cannot conceive the possibility of any accused person escaping conviction, however innocent he may be. With this Act in your hands you might charge the Archbishop of Dublin with the Phoenix Park murders, and I would undertake to convict him in the twinkling of an eye with the aid of a packed Dublin or Ulster jury. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) has stated that the majority of cases will not be brought to Belfast. That may be true when there is no political question involved; but will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give us an undertaking that if they are brought to Belfast the special expenses of counsel will be provided? It is no good, as a general rule, for any Catholic counsel to go to Belfast, and hence the Bar there is almost entirely in the hands of a particular section. Of course, a few Catholics are now going the Northern Circuit; but it is not worth the while of most to do so. I had a case the other day myself, and I gave it to an Orangeman to advise upon, because I was quite sure that the integrity of the Bar was to be relied on. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes; that may be very well when you have educated men concerned; but the poor prisoners will not think so. You must assume that among the prisoners there will be one innocent man. That is not a very large assumption. Well, for the sake of that one innocent man I do think that we should adopt some precautions. I think that when a counsel has to travel from Kerry to Ulster the least that can be asked is that his expenses should be paid.

MR. HOLMES: The clause in the Bill contemplates that the Lord Lieutenant, with the consent of the Treasury, should make rules from time to time. I am sorry to say that I cannot assent to the rest of what the hon. and learned Member says. It amounts to this—that if there is a change of venue to Belfast there are to be special fees. I cannot consent to that. It would be perfectly unnecessary when upon a Circuit like the Northern Circuit, where there are, perhaps, 50 or 60 men who honourably carry on the profession of the Bar. I must protest against the idea that amongst those 50 or 60 men you could not find any who would act with integrity. [MR. T. M. HEALY: I have said the reverse.] I must protest against the idea that there are not to be found on the Northern Circuit counsel of the same ability as gentlemen in other parts of Ireland.

MR. CHANCE: The reference of the right hon. and learned Attorney General is, I presume, to a case in which an old friend of the Treasury Bench was plaintiff for the Government and Mr. William O'Brien was defendant. It happened that I was solicitor for the defendant, and I remember I had to take down counsel and to pay the ordinary special retainer. Some distinction should be made in such cases. No doubt the services of excellent counsel can be obtained who practise in the locality; but witnesses will not submit themselves satisfactorily to the examination by counsel as to whom they know nothing, of whom they hear that he is an Orangeman, and so forth, and who they may see on another day prosecuting one of their own Party. But the right hon. and learned Attorney General said nothing about the expenses of witnesses. He did not tell us whether counsel will have to disclose the names of witnesses first before any arrangement will be made as to expenses. We require some pledge that the Crown, having obtained the names of witnesses thus, will not, as has been often done, go to the witnesses and bully, badger, and threaten them in order to get them to give evidence for the prosecution. This is a most undesirable state of affairs; the Crown ought not to interfere in this way, and it ought to be rendered impossible to do so. We want assurance that, the names having been submitted to the Crown Solicitor, that shall not take place which undoubtedly has taken place; that some constable or sub-constable shall not attempt to work up the case for the prosecution by getting at the witnesses for the defence under the stimulus of the reward their zeal may gain.

MR. MAURIOE HEALY (Cork): I respectfully ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give some reply on the point to which his attention has been called by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford. It is really the most important of the three points that have been raised, and one that will have to be fought out either now or at a later stage. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the administration of the Crimes Act in the past was such that no complaint could fairly be made; but I think if he had consulted the counsel for the prisoners he would gather a very different account. It is within my own knowledge and my experience at Winter Assizes that on the point of the expenses of witnesses prisoners have grave causes of complaint. Several such cases have been referred to, and others have come under my personal knowledge in which witnesses brought up from Kerry to Cork have been kept hanging about day after day waiting for the trial in which they were concerned to come on, until they have had actually to go to the poor house, night after night, to get their food and lodging, owing to the want of means of the prisoner to sustain them. Of course, the natural result is that the bulk of the witnesses have to go away before the trial comes on, and the unfortunate prisoner is left with a very small portion of the evidence he was prepared to bring forward. The rule of the Crown Solicitor is this—I have had experience of it over and over again—that, as sometimes the Court disallow the expenses of a witness because his evidence has been shown to be false, the Crown Solicitor proceeds on the assumption that this is always going to be the case, and will pay no expenses until the trial is over. Now, having regard to the fact that the Winter Assizes sometimes last a long time, it is a great hardship, when a prisoner is tried 20, 30, or 40 miles from his home, for him, if not in prison, to maintain himself, and in many cases his witnesses, during a long and uncertain interval of waiting. If criminal cases were taken in any consecutive order like the processes at Sessions, he might calculate when his trial was likely to come on, and not bring up his witnesses until they were likely to be required; but the Crown officials bring on the cases when and how they please; they give no notice; and if the prisoner's witnesses are not there at the minute it is decided to go on, the chances are the case will be heard without them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says this is a matter to be dealt with by rule rather than by direct enactment; but we ask for some undertaking that when the Lord Lieutenant proceeds to make the rules, which, of course, will be done through his Legal Advisers in Dublin Castle, he will so draw those rules that some justice shall be done to the prisoner; that he will not keep up this barbarous and grossly unfair practice of treating prisoners, so that, in nine cases out of 10, the prisoner is driven to great straits to keep his witnesses, and is sometimes obliged to go to trial without them.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. HOLMES: I have already said that the expenses of bringing witnesses to the place to which the venue is changed will be borne by the Crown, and as to keeping them while there that is a matter that must be dealt with by rules, which rules will be framed so that justice shall be done. I do not mean to say that expenses can be advanced for every possible witness; there must be a certain amount of examination in each instance before that is done. I am sure hon. Gentlemen will see the fairness of that. I cannot give any pledge as meaning that no Crown official shall address a witness for the defence in reference to any particular case. I might as well say that a prisoner or his solicitor has no right to speak to a Crown witness; of course there is the right. So far as the expenses of witnesses who are obliged to go to the place to which the venue is changed, that will be borne by the Crown, and so also as to the expenses of keeping them there, and this will be according to rules to prevent abuses and to secure that justice shall be done.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And will the cases be in an alphabetical list?

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any allowances that may be made, and Expenses that may be incurred, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

PLACES OF WORSHIP (SITES) BILL.

(Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Borlase, Mr. Burt, Mr. McArthur, Mr. Henry Wilson.)

[BILL 5.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I need hardly say it is not my intention to detain the House at this hour—2.10 a.m.—with a speech in support of this Bill. It was introduced some years ago by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), and discussions were taken upon it in 1884-5. Last year it was placed in my hands, when my hon. Friend became Under Secretary to the Home Department, and it passed its second reading without any Division. I hope I may appeal to the Government not to throw any obstacle in the way of the second reading now. It is a simple and a small measure, having for its object the giving facilities for the acquisition of sites for places of public worship. It contains 11 clauses and provisions by which persons belonging to any religious denomination can obtain compulsorily by a certain procedure set forth land for the purpose of building a church or chapel. There are many districts where such persons are placed at great disadvantage by reason of landowners refusing to sell for the purpose, and this Bill is to place all denominations in possession of an advantage now possessed by one particular denomination—the Church of England. I am sure there will be a general disposition that power possessed by one denomination should apply to all. Strictly adhering to my promise not to make a speech at this late hour I now move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. E. Ellis.)

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I do not propose to follow the example of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis) and not discuss the principle of this Bill, and so, I think, I have sufficient justification for the course I propose to take to move the adjournment of the debate. There is a simple reason and a conclusive one; the Bill explained in a very moderate speech by the hon. Member, who affirms that its principle is a moderate one, really does go a very great way in the direction of confiscation. It proposes to take property, whether the owner wishes it or not, for what is called public purposes, though I am not quite sure that it can be maintained it is for a public purpose. But this is not a question we can argue now, and at this late hour I believe I shall be consulting the convenience of the House by moving the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I do not know who is in charge of the Party opposite. I do not see the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith); but whoever is in command of the army, or exercises control in the ranks opposite, I sincerely hope that he will use his influence to induce the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion just made. The subject this Bill deals with is a perfectly simple one and is, I think, well understood by every Member in the House, and it has frequently been debated in the House. It is but a simple act of justice to confer on Nonconformists the same privileges as are now possessed by the Church in regard to acquiring space for places of worship. I sincerely hope that the Government, having appropriated all the time of the House for purposes of their own, will not crush out this little attempt at legislation, but will allow the Opposition this crumb of comfort of having obtained the second reading of a measure that excites the greatest interest throughout the country among persons of both Parties, for this is by no means a political Bill. It is simply to confer on Nonconformists a position of equality with that possessed by Churchmen. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) appears to look as though he has taken the position of Leader opposite. I appeal to him to induce his supporter to withdraw this unreasonable Motion, and allow us to take a decision on the Bill. If the Government do not think proper to do that, I sincerely hope my hon. Friend the Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) will take a Division on the adjournment, and we will count that as a Second Reading Division.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I will only remind the House that I originally brought in a Bill of this kind for Ireland, and I may say the whole of Ireland wants it just as much as do the Nonconformists of England. I will not detain the House now; but I do think it is shockingly unfair to adopt this means of defeating a Bill of this kind. We have an opportunity of doing a little good after passing whole nights in unprofitable discussion of the Crimes Bill. Here we have a pennyworth of wholesome bread to the "intolerable deal of sack" we have been spilling so freely, and we are met with a motion for adjournment! I will only say the Bill is very much wanted in Ireland, and I hope the Government will take some step to check the misdirected zeal of their followers.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I do not think that anyone on the other side can complain of taking the Bill at this hour, considering that every available moment of what may be called reasonable time is employed by the Government for another purpose. We are perfectly justified in availing ourselves of such a chance as this when we get it. If you are afraid of this Bill then say so fairly and boldly; do not endeavour to get rid of it by a side wind. I agree with the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) if we are to have a Division then that Division shall be considered as a Second Reading Division. I should not have risen to say one word in support of the measure if it had not been for a remark of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot), who said he doubts whether this Bill has to do with public purposes. Well, it is usually considered that the religion of the country might well fall under the definition of public purposes, and I fail to see why the religion of the greater part of the population is less a public object than that of one particular denomination. We are met by the cry of confiscation. I will only—

Mr. J. E. Ellis

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Motion before the House is the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. CONYBEARE: Very well, Sir. I quite understand it is impossible, under the circumstances, to meet the objections the hon. Gentleman has urged against the Bill. It only shows how exceedingly inconvenient—I will even say how unjust—such a Motion is, especially when the hon. Gentleman made a speech against the Bill before he concluded with his Motion for Adjournment.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I hope the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot) will not press his Motion. Some of us have been waiting here eight or ten hours for this Bill to come on, because we understood it was to come on, there being no strong objection to it, nor could there be, for it is a most reasonable Bill. It is brief, the clauses are few, and once the second reading is passed we should dispose of it quickly. I hope it will not be postponed in this indirect manner. If there is to be a Division at all, let it be upon the Bill itself.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I join in the appeal to hon. Members opposite to allow us to take a Division on the second reading. I think the fact that the Order is not blocked, that there is no Notice of objection put down, will justify us in pressing the desire in which I heartily join to take a Division on this stage of the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I will not stand between the House and a Division for more than a second or two, but I must express my regret that no Gentleman from the Treasury Bench seems to be in a position to state what is the attitude of the Government towards this Bill. I do not say that as desiring to find fault; but I think this is a question on which we have a right to ask the opinion of the Government. I know that many of my constituents who do not belong to the same persuasion as myself are deeply interested, and it does not raise any Party issues. As to the time of the morning, I do not think there is much force in that objection, for—and I do not refer to that now in any controversial spirit—we know that all the time of the House is taken by the Government for Business they consider necessary; and, unless a Bill of this kind comes forward at an hour such as this, there is no opportunity of discussing it at all. But, late as it is, we have a full House. I have rarely seen so large an attendance at half-past 2 in the morning, and from appearances there does not seem the smallest reason for supposing that either Party is taken at a disadvantage; certainly the Party to which my hon. Friend belongs has no advantage in numbers over his opponent. But, from personal experience, I think hon. Members opposite are much more inclined to take an impartial view of questions at this hour than they are earlier in the Sitting. On one or two occasions when we have had another Bill before the House, we have found hon. Gentlemen opposite willing to desert their own Friends and support a Bill on the Liberal programme. I hope, when the Division is called, hon. Gentlemen on the other side will be true to the assurances they have given, and assist us to remove a small remnant of religious bigotry that does not commend itself to the mind of any reasonable, tolerant man.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I wish to join in the appeal that the Motion may be withdrawn. This is a Bill in which many of my constituents are very much interested, and I happen to know one instance where a congregation found it absolutely impossible to get the land to build a place of worship. They made application for land, but the owner held different religious opinions, and absolutely refused to sell for the purpose. I know that a feeling also exists in favour of the Bill in the neighbouring parish of Clapham, the hon.

Member for which constituency showed a readiness to second the Motion for Adjournment. At half-past 11 to-night the hon. Member for Wandsworth asked me to pair with him, and I agreed, making an exception in favour of this Bill, and it would be hard and unjust to many of us who have waited for the same purpose if the Bill were shelved by adjournment.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.) : I rise simply for the purpose of appealing to the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot) and to Her Majesty's Government not to insist on the Motion for Adjournment, but to allow us to decide on the second reading. I think it would be an advantage to the House if the hon. Gentleman opposite in charge of the Bill were allowed to go on with the discussion to-night, and for us to devote a brief space to the discussion of its principle. I, personally, have no wish to take any action that would lead to delaying the Bill, but I know on this side there is a strong feeling of objection to the measure, and some of us are prepared to debate it on its merits if the opportunity is given either to-night or on some other occasion. I appeal now to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion for Adjournment.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 160 ; Noes 130 : Majority 30. [2.30 A.M.]

AYES.

Ainslie, W. G.	Bonsor, H. C. O.
Ambrose, W.	Borthwick, Sir A.
Amherst, W. A. T.	Bridgeman, Col. hon.
Anstruther, Colonel R.	F. C.
H. L.	Bristowe, T. L.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Brodrick, hon. W. St.
Baden-Powell, G. S.	J. F.
Baggallay, E.	Burghley, Lord
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Campbell, J. A.
Balfour, G. W.	Charrington, S.
Bass, H.	Clarke, Sir E. G.
Bates, Sir E.	Commerell, Adml. Sir
Baumann, A. A.	J. E.
Beach, W. W. B.	Compton, F.
Beadel, W. J.	Cooke, C. W. R.
Bentinck, Lord H. C.	Corry, Sir J. P.
Bentinck, W. G. O.	Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Beresford, Lord C. W.	Cranborne, Viscount
De la Poer	Cross, H. S.
Bethall, Commander G.	Davenport, H. T.
R.	Davenport, W. B.
Bigwood, J.	De Cobain, E. S. W.
Birkbeck, Sir E.	De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H.	De Worms, Baron H.
Bond, G. H.	Dimsdale, Baron R.

Mr. O. V. Morgan

Dorington, Sir J. E.	Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
Douglas, A. Akers-	Leighton, S.
Dyke, right hon. Sir	Lewisham, right hon.
W. H.	Viscount
Eaton, H. W.	Long, W. H.
Edwards-Moss, T. C.	Low, M.
Egerton, hon. A. de T.	Lowther, hon. W.
Elcho, Lord	Macartney, W. G. E.
Elton, C. I.	Macdonald, right hon.
Feilden, Lieut.-Gen.	J. H. A.
R. J.	Maclure, J. W.
Fergusson, right hon.	M'Calmont, Captain J.
Sir J.	March, Earl of
Fielden, T.	Marriott, right hon.
Finch, G. H.	W. T.
Fisher, W. H.	Matthews, rt. hon. H.
Fitzgerald, R. U. P.	Maxwell, Sir H. E.
Fletcher, Sir H.	Mayne, Admiral R. C.
Folkestone, right hon.	Morgan, hon. F.
Viscount	Mount, W. G.
Fowler, Sir R. N.	Mulholland, H. L.
Fraser, General C. C.	Murdoch, C. T.
Gathorne-Hardy, hon.	Newark, Viscount
A. E.	Noble, W.
Gent-Davis, R.	Northcote, hon. H. S.
Gibson, J. G.	Norton, R.
Gilliat, J. S.	Pelly, Sir L.
Godson, A. F.	Penton, Captain F. T.
Goldsworthy, Major-	Plunket, right hon.
General W. T.	D. R.
Gorst, Sir J. E.	Price, Captain G. E.
Grimston, Viscount	Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
Gunter, Colonel R.	Rankin, J.
Hall, C.	Reed, H. B.
Halsey, T. F.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Hambro, Col. C. J. T.	Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
Hamilton, Lord E.	Ross, A. H.
Hamilton, Col. C. E.	Round, J.
Hanbury, R. W.	Royden, T. B.
Hankey, F. A.	Russell, Sir G.
Hardcastle, E.	Saunderson, Col. E. J.
Hardcastle, F.	Sidebottom, T. H.
Herbert, hon. S.	Sidebottom, W.
Herron-Hodge, R. T.	Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
Hervey, Lord F.	Smith, A.
Hill, right hon. Lord	Stanley, E. J.
A. W.	Sykes, C.
Hill, Colonel E. S.	Temple, Sir R.
Hoare, S.	Tomlinson, W. E. M.
Holmes, rt. hon. H.	Townsend, F.
Houldsworth, W. H.	Trotter, H. J.
Hozier, J. H. C.	Walrond, Col. W. H.
Hubbard, E.	Webster, Sir R. E.
Hulse, E. H.	Weymouth, Viscount
Hunt, F. S.	White, J. B.
Isaacson, F. W.	Whitley, E.
Jackson, W. L.	Whitmore, C. A.
Jarvis, A. W.	Wilson, Sir S.
Kenyon-Slaney, Col.	Wood, N.
W.	Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
Kerans, F. H.	Wroughton, P.
King-Harman, right	Young, C. E. B.
hon. Colonel E. R.
Knowles, L.	TELLERS,
Kynoch, G.	Powell, F. S.
Lambert, C.	Talbot, J. G.

NOES.

Abraham, W. (Lime-	Baird, J. G. A.
rick, W.)	Banes, Major G. E.
Acland, A. H. D.	Barry, A. H. Smith-
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	Bartley, G. C. T.
Allison, R. A.	Bigger, J. G.

Blane, A.
Bright, W. L.
Burt, T.
Caine, W. S.
Caldwell, J.
Campbell, Sir A.
Campbell, H.
Chance, P. A.
Channing, F. A.
Clancy, J. J.
Cobb, H. P.
Coghill, D. H.
Coleridge, hon. B.
Commins, A.
Connolly, L.
Conway, M.
Conybeare, C. A. V.
Craven, J.
Crilly, D.
Dillon, J.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Ellis, T. E.
Esmonde, Sir T. H. G.
Evelyn, W. J.
Evershed, S.
Eyre, Colonel H.
Fenwick, C.
Finucane, J.
Foster, Sir B. W.
Fox, Dr. J. F.
Gedge, S.
Gill, T. P.
Grey, Sir E.
Grotrian, F. B.

Harrington, E.
Hayden, L. P.
Hayne, C. Seale-
Healy, M.
Healy, T. M.
Holden, I.
Hooper, J.
Hughes, Colonel E.
Hunter, W. A.
Jacoby, J. A.
James, C. H.
Johnston, W.
Joicey, J.
Kelly, J. R.
Kenny, C. S.
Kenny, M. J.
Kenyon, hon. G. T.
Lawson, Sir W.
Lawson, H. L. W.
Lea, T.
Lees, E.
Lewis, T. P.
Lowther, J. W.
Mac Neill, J. G. S.
M'Arthur, A.
M'Arthur, W. A.
M'Cartan, M.
M'Donald, P.
M'Lagan, P.
Maitland, W. F.
Mason, S.
Milvain, T.
Montagu, S.
Morgan, O. V.

Neville, R.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.
Nolan, J.
O'Brien, J. F. X.
O'Brien, P.
O'Brien, P. J.
O'Connor, J. (Kerry)
O'Connor, J. (Tippry.)
O'Connor, T. P.
O'Doherty, J. E.
O'Hanlon, T.
O'Hea, P.
O'Kelly, J.
Paulton, J. M.
Pickersgill, E. H.
Pinkerton, J.
Powell, W. R. H.
Power, P. J.
Power, R.
Price, T. P.
Priestley, B.
Pyne, J. D.
Quinn, T.
Rendel, S.
Roberts, J.
Roberts, J. B.
Rowlands, J.
Rowlands, W. B.
Russell, T. W.

Sexton, T.
Shaw, T.
Sheehan, J. D.
Sheil, E.
Stack, J.
Stanhope, hon. P. J.
Stuart, J.
Sullivan, D.
Sullivan, T. D.
Swetonham, E.
Tanner, C. K.
Tapling, T. K.
Thomas, A.
Tollemache, H. J.
Tuite, J.
Verdin, R.
Wallace, R.
Watt, H.
Williams, A. J.
Williamson, J.
Wilson, H. J.
Wolmer, Viscount
Wright, H. S.
Yeo, F. A.

TELLERS.

Broadhurst, H.
Ellis, J. E.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

[INDEX.]

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCCXV.

SIXTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1887.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—L., Lords.—C., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings:"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

ABERCORN, Duke of
Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 6, 37, 243;
cl. 20, Amendt. 1886; cl. 22, Amendt. 1899.

ABRAHAM, Mr. W., Glamorgan, Rhondda
Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 221

Accumulations Bill (Lord Herschell)
l. 2R. discharged * May 19 (No. 81)

ACLAND, Mr. A. H. D., York, W.R., Rotherham
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1320

ADDISON, Mr. J. E. W., Ashton-under-Lyne
Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. 1716

VOL. CCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Admiralty—see Navy

ADMIRALTY—First Lord (see HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.)

ADMIRALTY—Secretary to (see FORWOOD, Mr. A. B.)

ADVOCATE, The LORD (see MACDONALD, Right Hon. J. H. A.)

Afghanistan—see Central Asia

Africa (Central)
Transit Tariff through Portuguese Territory, Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 10, 1886

Africa (South)

Sir Charles Warren's Bechuanaland Expedition, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 13, 1734

Swaziland, Affairs of, Question, Observations, Viscount Middleton; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (The Earl of Onslow), May 23, 853

ZULULAND

Questions, Mr. W. Redmond, Mr. Labouchere; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 16, 87; Question, Sir Richard Temple; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 17, 254

Annexations in Zululand, Questions, Dr. Clark, Mr. Osborne Morgan; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 19, 501; Questions, Mr. W. Redmond, Mr. John Morley; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 19, 503

Agricultural Department—Scarlatina—Dr. Klein's Milk Theory

Question, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth; Answer, The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners) June 13, 1720

Allotments for Cottagers Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Jersey)

L. Presented; read 1st May 23 (No. 109)

ANDERSON, Mr. C. H., Elgin and Nairn

Agricultural Labourers (Scotland), 1035
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 265, 359; Amendt. 360, 362, 364, 375, 378, 379; cl. 2, 458; Amendt. 459, 460, 465, 472, 962, 1007, 1008; cl. 3, 1322; cl. 4, 1471

Scotland—Crofters' Holdings Act, 1886—Eviction of Alexander Taylor, Co. Elgin, 878

Fishery Board—Report, 1742

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c., 1144

ANSTRUTHER, Colonel R. H. L., Suffolk, Woodbridge

War Office—Regimental Transport at Aldershot—General Service Waggon, 705

ARGYLL, Duke of

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland), 2R. 240
Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 19; Amendt. 25, 27, 29; cl. 5, 35

Scotland—Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow)—The Botanic Gardens and the University, 640

ARMY (Questions)

Aldershot, Regimental Transport at—General Service Waggon, Question, Colonel Lloyd Anstruther; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) May 20, 705

Army Abroad and in India—Audit of Accounts, Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodrick) May 20, 704

Burmah—Licensing and Regulation of Immorality, Questions, Mr. Atkinson; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) May 20, 726; May 23, 881; May 24, 1028

Contracts, Questions, Mr. Watt, Mr. Mandella, Mr. Hanbury; Answers, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 13, 1732

Corporation Road round the Citadel Fort, Plymouth, Question, Mr. Coghill; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) May 20, 725

First Army Corps—The Horses of the Cavalry Regiments, Question, Mr. Lawson; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 23, 859

Insanitary Condition of Dover Barracks (Fort Burgoyne), Questions, Mr. Preston Bruce; Answers, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote), May 17, 250; June 13, 1729

The Chesil Beach (Portland)—Removal of Wrecks, Question, Colonel Hambro; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 7, 1225

Personnel

Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Extra Queen's Cadetships, Question, Dr. Tindal Robertson; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 9, 1433

Medical Department—Surgeon Major Sandford Moore, Question, Dr. Tindal Robertson; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 9, 1432

Medical Officers, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 19, 500

Regimental Bandsmen at Political Gatherings, Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 19, 501

Royal Engineers, The—Transference of Lieutenant Gordon of the Royal Marine Artillery, Questions, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 6, 1071; June 9, 1438

Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, Cadets of the—The Review at Aldershot, Question, Colonel Hamilton; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 13, 1722

Senior Majors, Compensation to certain, Question, General Sir William Crossman; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodrick) May 20, 704

Yeomanry Cavalry, Allowance to the—The Review at Aldershot, Question, Mr. Hermon Lodge; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 17, 56

ARMY—cont.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT

Captain Horton, Inspector of Saddlery at Woolwich, Question, Colonel Hughes-Hallett; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) May 16, 60
Colonel Maitland, Superintendent of Gun Factory, Woolwich, Questions, Major Rasch, Mr. Hanbury; Answers, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) May 20, 709
Contract for Sword Bayonets, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 7, 1223
Experimental Wire Guns, Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 13, 1724
43-ton Gun, The, Question, Major Rasch; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 9, 1432
Ordnance Inquiry Committee, The—Appointment and Constitution, Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 20, 722
Ordnance Inquiry Commission, Report of the, Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 19, 524; Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) June 13, 1735
Skilled and Ordinary Workmen at Enfield, Question, Colonel Hughes-Hallett; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) May 16, 62

Defective Weapons

The Tests, Questions, Mr. Hanbury, Sir Henry Havelock-Allan; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 19, 515; Correction of Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope); Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope June 6, 1076

Issue of Defective Weapons—The Responsible Officials, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 896

Sword Bayonets of the City of London Artillery Volunteers, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 7, 1226

ARMY (INDIA)

Special Allowances to two Engineer Officers, Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 10, 1582

The Artillery—The 9-Pounder Muzzle-Loading Gun, Question, Sir William Plowden; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 856

AUXILIARY FORCES

The Irish Militia, Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 23, 905

The Volunteers

Assistant Instructors in Signalling, Question, Colonel Eyre; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 10, 1567

ARMY—The Volunteers—cont.

Retired Sergeants, Question, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 16, 61
The New Regulations as to Shooting, Question, Colonel Eyre; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 23, 879

ASHBOURNE, Lord (Lord Chancellor of Ireland)

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 18; cl. 5, 33, 34, 35; cl. 6, 36; cl. 7, 38, 39; cl. 11, ib., 41; cl. 16, 42, 43; cl. 17, 45, 46, 47; cl. 20, 1680, 1688; cl. 22, 1700

ATHERLEY-JONES, Mr. L., Durham, N.W.
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 482

ATKINSON, Mr. H. J., Boston

Burmah—Licensing and Regulation of Immorality, 726, 881, 1028
Ireland—High Court of Justice—Court of Appeal—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 1058
Madagascar—Capture of Natives by the French, and Transport to Reunion, 877
Merchant Shipping—Hours of Unloading, 519
Post Office—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—The Officials, 1434
Wreck Commissioners' Courts, Hull—Nautical Assessors, 252

ATTORNEY GENERAL (see WEBSTER, Sir R. E.)

ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (see HOLMES, Right Hon. H.)

BADEN-POWELL, Mr. G., Liverpool, Kirkdale

Egypt (Finance, &c.)—"An Unacknowledged Floating Debt," 261
Imperial Defences—King George's Sound—The Colonial Conference, 1435
Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—The Royal Titles, 521
Trinidad—The Pitch Lake, 1217

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Manchester, E.

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 673
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 274, 281, 284, 291, 292, 295, 313, 317, 355, 388; cl. 2, 419, 420, 421, 423, 444, 445, 460, 464, 465, 489, 541, 542, 580, 583, 591, 770, 909, 924, 954, 965, 966, 968; Amendt. 1010, 1014, 1015, 1017, 1023; cl. 3, 1233, 1234, 1235, 1237, 1244, 1254, 1265, 1266, 1269, 1272, 1310; Motion for reporting Progress, 1334, 1355, 1356, 1364; cl. 4, 1458, 1459, 1460, 1464, 1522; Amendt. 1534, 1538, 1553, 1554; cl. 5, 1746, 1747, 1764, 1768, 1775

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.—cont.

Ireland—Questions

Agrarian Crime, 898

Crime and Outrage—Return for April and May, 1439

Evictions—Co. Mayo, 1228, 1229;—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare—Alleged Misconduct of the Constabulary, 1430

Executive—Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, 721, 722

Irish Land Commissioners—Sitting at Clonmel, 714

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Royal Irish Constabulary, 1217

Law and Justice—Imprisonment of Father Keller, 304

National Education—Carrickawilkin (Co. Armagh) National School, 711;—Classification of Teachers, 1219

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission—Report, 1219

Ireland—Public Meetings—Questions

Proclaimed Meetings—Protestant Home Rule Association, Kilkeel, 1222

Proclamation of the Dungannon Meeting, 522, 523, 524

Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster, 258, 718

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 163, 168, 169, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 191, 193, 197, 203, 204, 206, 208, 214, 219

Report, 620

United States—Emigration of Pauper Families from Ireland, 1218

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B., Clackmannan, &c.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 562

BALFOUR, General Sir G., Kincardineshire

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 135

BANGOR, Bishop of

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. 636

BARBOUR, Mr. W. B., Paisley

Truck Acts—Violation of their Provisions, 57

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.

Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 1193

Education Department—Vacant Building

Land in Victoria Street, Westminster, 865

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 798

BARTHELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, North-West

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 84

Ireland—Evictions—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare—Alleged Violence to an old Woman, 1740

BAUMANN, Mr. A. A., Camberwell, Peckham

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 292

BEAUCHAMP, Earl

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 3, 841

BECKETT, Mr. W., Notts, Bassettlaw

Currency—New Coinage, 1589

Belfast Main Drainage Bill (by Order)

c. Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th April], "That the Lords Amendments be now taken into consideration;" Question again proposed; Debate resumed May 20, 651; after short debate, Amendt. to leave out "now," add "on Monday 20th June" (Mr. Conway); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after further debate, Question put, and negatived; Question, "That 'on Monday 20th June,' be there added," put, and agreed to; Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

BELMORE, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 24, 31; cl. 6, Amendt. 36, 37; cl. 7, 39; cl. 11, 40; cl. 20, 1687; cl. 21, 1694; Amendt. 1697, 1698

BELPER, Lord

Registration of Dogs in the Metropolis, 2R. 237

BENTINCK, Right Hon. G. A. C., Whitehaven

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1097, 1129

BETHELL, Commander G. R., Yerk, E.R., Holderness

Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 1214

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 782

BIGGAR, Mr. J. G., Cavan, W.

Supply, Report, 407, 411

BIRKBECK, Sir E., Norfolk, E.

North Sea Fisheries Convention, 1882—The East Coast Drift Net Fisheries, 1424

BLANE, Mr. A., Armagh, S.

Ireland—Public Meetings—Proclaimed Meetings in Ulster, 718

BLUNDELL, Colonel H. B. H., Lancashire, S.W., Ince

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 128

BOARD OF TRADE—Secretary to (see DE WORMS, Baron H.)

"Board of Trade Journal," The—Contract for Advertisements

Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 23, 879; Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, Sir Herbert Maxwell (A Lord of the Treasury) June 13, 1727

BONSOR, Mr. H. C. O., Surrey, Wimbledon

Excise—Adulteration of Beer, 1220

BRABOURNE, Lord

Police Force Enfranchisement, 2R. 4
Tithes Rent-Charge, Comm. 823; cl. 2, 840; Report, cl. 2, Amendt. 1560, 1574; add. cl. 1576; Schedule 1, 1577

BRADLAUGH, Mr. C., Northampton

Burmah (Upper)—Ruby Mines, 1028, 1029, 1030, 1073, 1074, 1580

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 265, 306; cl. 3, 1356; cl. 4, 1461, 1463; cl. 5, Amendt. 1772, 1775

Employers' Liability Act — Renewal and Amendment, 1220

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 677, 684, 687, 697, 698, 699, 700

Greenwich Park, 1419, 1420

High Court of Justice—Appeals in the House of Lords, 1028

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Accommodation for Servants of this House, 1232

London Corporation (Charges of Malversation), 893

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1352

Over Darwen Corporation, Consid. 494

Parliament—Public Business—Oaths Bill, 66

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1624

Scotland—Pollution of Rivers—Discharge of Sewage, &c. into the River Clyde, 1579

Superannuation and Retired Allowances — Pension to a Custom House Officer — Fraudulent Drawing, 519

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 219

Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1079, 1091, 1092, 1093

BRAMWELL, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 27, 1703, 1704

Tithes Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 2, 810; cl. 3, 843; Report, cl. 2, 1573

BRIDGEMAN, Colonel Hon. F. C., Bolton

Egypt — Soudan Campaign, 1885 — The Khedive's Bronze Star, 1427

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Manchester, S.W.

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1348

BRIGHT, Mr. W. L., Stoke-upon-Trent

Dominion of Canada—Increased Duties on Iron, 1743

Metropolitan Police—New Station on the Thames Embankment, 1582

British Guiana—Ecclesiastical Affairs

Question, Mr. Crossley; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 23, 861

BROADHURST, Mr. H., Nottingham, W.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1020

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Metropolitan Police, 1737

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 228

Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1847

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F. (Financial Secretary, War Department), Surrey, Guildford

War Office—Army Abroad and in India—Audit of Accounts, 704

Compensation to certain Senior Majors, 705

BROWN, Mr. A. L., Hawick, &c.

Scotland—Tweed Fisheries—Alleged Tresspasses, 708, 709

BROWNLOW, Earl

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis), Comm. 1416

BRUCE, Hon. R. P., Fifeshire, W.

War Office—Insanitary Condition of Dover Barracks (Fort Burgoyne), 250, 1729

BRYCE, Mr. J., Aberdeen, S.

Egypt—Anglo-Turkish Convention, 899

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh, W.

Africa (Central)—Transit Tariff through Portuguese Territory, 1596

Free Church of Scotland—Mission Station at Constantinople, 512

Scotland—Literature, Science, and Art—The Votes, 258

BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS, Duke of (Chairman of Committees)

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 6, 36

BURDETT-COUTTS, Mr. W. L. A. B., Westminster

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. Amendt. 677, 688, 689, 690, 691, 698

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Metropolitan Police, 1737

Burma

Licensing and Regulation of Immorality, Questions, Mr. Atkinson; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) May 20, 726; May 23, 881; May 24, 1028

Burma (Upper)

The Ruby Mines, Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) May 24, 1028;

[cont.]

Burmah (Upper)—cont.

Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 6, 1873; Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 10, 1880

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 1828

Parliament—Business of the House—Coal Mines, &c. Regulation, 1438, 1594

Butter Substitutes Bill

c. Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Butter Substitutes Bill, that they have power to consolidate the Butter Substitutes Bill and the Oleomargarine (Fraudulent Sale) Bill into one Bill (Mr. Selater-Booth) May 20

BUXTON, Mr. S. O., Tower Hamlets, Poplar

Education Department—Recent Disturbances at Exeter Training College, 876

CADOGAN, Earl (Lord Privy Seal)

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 16, 17, 24; Amendt. 35, 27, 30; cl. 3, 32; cl. 4, Amendt. ib.; cl. 5, Amendt. ib., 34; cl. 6, 37; cl. 11, Amendt. 40, 41; cl. 17, 46; cl. 19, 48; cl. 20, Amendt. 48, 1679, 1684, 1685, 1686, 1687, 1688, 1689; cl. 21, 1690, 1691, 1697; cl. 22, 1698, 1699, 1701; cl. 28, ib.; cl. 27, 1705

CAINE, Mr. W. S., Barrow-in-Furness
Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1849CALDWELL, Mr. J., *Glasgow, St. Rollox
University of Glasgow—Professor of Scots Law, 1226CAMERON, Dr. O., *Glasgow, College

Court of Bankruptcy—Mr. E. M. Langworthy—Private Examination, 511

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1105, 1117, 1120

Post Office Telegraph Services, 1163; Amendt. 1168

CAMERON, Mr. J. M., Wick, &c.

Board of Inland Revenue—Reduction of the Staffs of the Indoor and Outdoor Departments, 1738

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 90, 100

British Parliament and the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, 893

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 591; cl. 3, 1302; Amendt. 1314; cl. 4, 1507, 1509; Amendt. 1516

CAMPBELL, Sir G.—cont.

Jubilee Thankgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Letting of Seats on Public Ground, 1585

North Borneo—Operations against the Natives, 871

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 534

Parliament—Public Business—Legislation of the Session, 1230

CAMPBELL, Mr. H., Fermanagh, S.

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Promotion of Sergeant Magee, Belfast, 1592

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. H., Stirling, &c.

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 172, 175, 179, 180

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 20

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 3, 843; Amendt. 844

Canada

Canadian Pacific Railway, Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 20, 780

Increased Import Duties on Iron, Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 19, 521; Question, Mr. W. L. Bright; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 13, 1743

[See titles North American Fisheries—United States]

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 7, 846

CARNARVON, Earl of

Egypt—Anglo-Turkish Convention—The Papers, 1564

Duration of the English Occupation—Mission of Sir H. Drummond Wolff, 634

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. 637

CASTLETOWN, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 27, 30; cl. 7, Amendt. 37, 38; cl. 11, Amendt. 40; cl. 16, Amendt. 42, 43; cl. 19, Amendt. 47; cl. 20, Amendt. 1684, 1685, 1686; cl. 21, 1694; cl. 22, Amendt. 1699

Central Asia

Afghanistan—The Anglo-Russian Delimitation Commission, Question, The Earl of Harrowby; Answer, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) May 20, 634

Affairs of Afghanistan, Question, The Earl of Rosebery; Answer, The Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) June 13, 1678

Central Asia—cont.

Advance of Russian Railways, Question, Mr Hanbury; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Ferguson) June 13, 1734

Trade Communication with Thibet—The Convention with China, Question, Sir John Simon; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Ferguson) June 13, 1725

Ceylon

Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Legislative Council—Proposed Reform of Constitution, Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) June 6, 1073

Dock Accommodation at Colombo, Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge, Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) June 9, 1420

CHANCE, Mr. P. A., Kilkenny, S.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 263, 264, 266, 267, 348, 364, 399, 400, 401, 402; cl. 2, Amendt. 415, 416, 417, 419, 420, 421, 422, 424, 446, 447, 466, 547, 553, 595, 611, 713, 734, 739, 742, 743, 744, 747, 748, 784, 786, 787, 939, 940, 942, 944, 956, 974; Motion for Adjournment, 995, 1025; cl. 3, 1238, 1256, 1264, 1278, 1287, 1295, 1309, 1317, 1318, 1328, 1382, 1397, 1408; cl. 4, 1468, 1469, 1470, 1481, 1675; cl. 5, 1754; Amendt. 1770, 1780, 1791, 1800, 1811, 1812, 1817, 1829, 1830, 1831, 1834

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses], Comm. 1840, 1843

Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 815; cl. 8, 816, 817, 818; cl. 11, 1341; cl. 15, Amendt. 1342; cl. 17, Amendt. 1343; Preamble, Amendt. 1344

East India Stock Conversion, Comm. cl. 2, 412, 413; Consid. 624; cl. 2, 625; add. cl. 626, 627

First Offenders, Comm. add. cl. 803, 804, 805

Ireland—Law and Justice—Court of Bankruptcy—Imprisonment of Father Keller, 722, 904

Public Meetings—Nationalist Meetings in Ulster, 890

Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, 3R. 492, 493, 650

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 630; cl. 3, 808; cl. 5, 809, 810; add. cl. 813; Amendt. 814; Consid. add. cl. 1556, 1559

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 230

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. Amendt. 1651

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 143, 171, 197, 210, 213, 220, 221

Report, 408, 621

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (see HALSBURY, LORD)

CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND, The LORD (see ASHBOURNE, LORD)

CHANCELLOR of the DUCHY of LANCASTER (see MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R.)

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (see GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.)

CHANNING, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E. Metropolitan Police—Extra Duty of the "A" Division, 868

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 231

Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874—The Rev. J. Bell Cox, 892

Railways—Inspectors' Reports upon Accidents, 506

Charity Commissioners

The Judd Foundation, Tonbridge, Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 19, 506

CHURCHILL, Right Hon. Lord R. H. S., Paddington, S.

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Tickets of Admission to the Platform outside Parliament Square, 1744

Church of England

Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. II. Smith) May 16, 65

Civil Service Writers

The Treasury Minute, Question, Mr. T. C. Harrington; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 19, 498; Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 20, 711

Sub-Commission of Inquiry, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) June 10, 1588

The Lower Division—Examinations in Dublin, Question, Mr. Tuite; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 23, 875

CLANCOY, Mr. J. J., Dublin Co., N.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 318; cl. 2, 441, 577, 931, 950, 960, 975; cl. 3, 1380; cl. 4, 1485; cl. 5, 1747, 1756, 1764, 1801

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 231

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 174

CLARK, Dr. G. B., Caithness

Africa (South)—Annexations in Zululand, 501, 502

Agricultural Labourers (Scotland), 1031

[cont,

CLARK, Dr. G. B.—cont.

Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 1213

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Motion for reporting Progress, 386, 387, 388; cl. 2, Motion for reporting Progress, 610, 611; cl. 4, Motion for reporting Progress, 1526, 1529

East India Stock Conversion, Comm. cl. 2, 413

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 539

Post Office—East India and China Mail Contract, 1233; Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1334

Scotland—Questions

Action of the Crofter Commission, 1040, 1041

Crofters Holdings Act, 1886—Loans for Fishing Harbours, 1584

Fishery Board—Crofters and Cottars Fishing Boats—Loans, 897

Supply, Report, Motion for Adjournment, 403, 404, 405

Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1126

CLARKE, Sir E. G. (Solicitor General), Plymouth

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 934, 955, 987

Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm. cl. 8, 816, 817

CLONOURRY, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 35

Coal Mines

Colliery Accident at Motherwell, Question, Mr. D. Crawford; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 8, 1352

Colliery Accident at Udston, Lanarkshire, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Tomlinson; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 6, 1077; Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 9, 1436; Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 9, 1439

Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Stuart-Wortley)

c. Committee deferred May 16, 226 [Bill 130]

COBB, Mr. H. P., Warwick, S.E., Rugby

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 727

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 227, 229

COGHILL, Mr. D. H., Newcastle-under-Lyme

War Office—Corporation Road round the Citadel Fort, Plymouth, 725

COHEN, Mr. A., Southwark, W.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 551, 771, 971

COLERIDGE, Hon. B., Sheffield, Attercliffe

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 546, 968; cl. 4, 1513

COLOMB, Captain J. C. R., Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 310

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 799

Colonial Service (Pensions) Bill

(The Earl of Onslow)

l. Read 2^a, after short debate May 20, 642 (No. 98)

COLONIES—Secretary of State for (see HOLLAND, Right Hon. Sir H. T.)COLONIES—Under Secretary of State for (see ONSLOW, Earl of)COMINS, Dr. A., Roscommon, S.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1490, 1491, 1495, 1499, 1513, 1541, 1548, 1549; cl. 5, 1780; Amendt. 1783

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—Vice President (see DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H.)

Commons Regulation (Ewer) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Secretary Matthews)

c. Report * May 19 [Bill 237]

Considered * May 20

Read 3^a May 23

l. Read 1^a * (E. Brownlow) May 23 (No. 108)

Read 2^a * June 13

Commons Regulation (Laindon) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Secretary Matthews)

c. Report * May 19 [Bill 238]

Read 3^a * May 20

l. Read 1^a * (E. Brownlow) May 21 (No. 107)

Read 2^a * June 13

Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts Amendment Bill

(The Lord Advocate,

Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland)

c. Ordered; read 1^a * May 20 [Bill 270]

Read 2^a * June 9

CONWAY, Mr. M., Leitrim, N.

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts.

Consid. Amendt. 652

Education Department—Drawing in Elementary Schools, 1227

CONYBEARE, Mr. C. A. V., Cornwall, Camborne

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1018; cl. 3, 1375, 1377, 1676

Ireland—Questions

Evictions—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare, 1423, 1424, 1731;—Alleged Misconduct of the Constabulary, 1438, 1591, 1741;—Lord Kenmare's Estate, Killarney, 1736

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Royal Irish Constabulary, 1216, 1217;—Circular of the Inspector General, 1429, 1431

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1423

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Accident to a Workman, 1231

Metropolitan Police—Sergeant Murphy, 1229

Parliament—Business of the House—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Notice of Instruction, 1442

Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1848, 1849

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1145

COOKE, Mr. C. W. R., Newington, W.

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Retired Sergeants of Volunteers, 61

First Offenders, Consid. 1353; 3R. ib.; Motion for Adjournment, 1338

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 227

CORBET, Mr. W. J., Wicklow, E.

Ireland—Questions

Charitable Donations and Bequests—Eaton Bequest, 710

Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum—Resident Medical Officer, 499

Labourers' Act—The Return, 55

Piers and Harbours—Arklow Harbour Works, 718, 719

North Borneo—Operations against the Natives—H.M.S. "Zephyr," 881

War Office—Army Medical Officers, 800

CORK, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 30

Corn Sales Bill

(Mr. Rankin, Sir Joseph R. Bailey, Mr. H. T. Davenport, Mr. Williamson)

c. Order for 2R. discharged; Bill withdrawn June 6, 1904 [Bill 91]

CORRY, Sir J. P., Armagh, Mid

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. Consid. 670

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 628, 630, 632; Amendt. 805; cl. 2, 806; cl. 3, Amendt. ib., 807; cl. 5, 809; Motion for reporting Progress, 810; add. cl. 812, 814; Consid. 1026

COSSHAM, Mr. H., Bristol, E.

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1638, 1639

Supply, Report, Motion for Adjournment, 404

County Courts Consolidation Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Read 2^a * May 17 (No. 78)

Committee *; Report May 20

Read 3^a * May 23

COURTNEY, Mr. L. H. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cornwall, Bodmin

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. Consid. 661, 662, 664, 667

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.

cl. 1, 261, 273, 311, 353, 358, 359, 360, 379, 386, 388, 401, 402; cl. 2, 416, 417, 421, 458, 459, 460, 485, 488, 489, 534, 594, 605, 609, 739, 742, 744, 745, 782, 783, 918, 919, 922, 925, 940, 952, 990, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 1005, 1009, 1017, 1018, 1022; cl. 3, 1234, 1235, 1240, 1244, 1253, 1283, 1302, 1313, 1314, 1318, 1322, 1377, 1384; cl. 4, 1445, 1469, 1495, 1499, 1521, 1522, 1526, 1529, 1530, 1540, 1545, 1546, 1549, 1552; cl. 5, 1752, 1793, 1794, 1807, 1812, 1814, 1818, 1820, 1824, 1829, 1830

Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm. cl. 5, 815

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1347, 1350; 2R. 1712, 1715, 1718

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 631; add. cl. 814

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 802

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 151, 152, 182, 186, 187, 188, 189, 196, 201, 210, 211, 212, 213, 217, 221

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1079, 1088, 1090, 1126

Post Office Telegraph Services, 1170, 1174

COWPER, Earl

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 22

COX, Mr. J. R., Clare, E.

Disturnpiked Roads—Annual Receipts and Contributions, 508

Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, 3R. 491, 492, 647

Supply, Report, Motion for Adjournment, 404

CRANBROOK, Viscount (Lord President of the Council)

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. 637

Registration of Dogs in the Metropolis, 2R. 236

CRAWFORD, Mr. D., Lanark, N.E.

Coal Mines—Colliery Accident at Motherwell, 1352

CRAWFORD, Mr. W., Durham, Mid
Rivers Pollution Act—River Wear, 610

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews,
Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland) [Bill 217]

a. Committee [Eighth Night]—R.P. May 17, 259
Committee [Ninth Night]—R.P. May 18, 415
Committee [Tenth Night]—R.P. May 19, 540
Committee [Eleventh Night]—R.P. May 20, 731
Committee [Twelfth Night]—R.P. May 23, 907
Committee [Thirteenth Night]—R.P. June 7, 1233

Committee [Fourteenth Night]—R.P. June 8, 1353

Committee [Fifteenth Night]—R.P. June 9, 1442

Moved, "That this House will, To-morrow, again resolve itself into the said Committee," 1553

Amendt. to leave out "To-morrow," insert
"on Monday next" (Mr. T. M. Healy); Question proposed, "That 'To-morrow' &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to Order for Committee read; Moved, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill"

June 10, 1674

Amendt. to leave out "upon Monday next," insert "To-morrow" (Mr. T. M. Healy) Question proposed, "That 'upon Monday next' &c.;" after short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith)
Question put; A. 202, N. 73; M. 129;
(D. L. 221) [2.10 A.M.]

Question put, "That this House, &c.;" A. 203,
N. 72; M. 131 (D. L. 222) [2.25 A.M.]

Committee [Sixteenth Night]—R.P. June 13, 1745

[See title — Parliament — Business of the House]

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses]

Moved, "That this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any allowances that may be made, and Expenses that may be incurred, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland, and for other purposes relating thereto" (Queen's Recommendation signified) (Mr. Jackson) June 9, 1560; after short debate, Question put; A. 111, N. 48;
M. 63 (D. L. 213)

Order for Committee read; Moved, "That
Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"
June 18, 1889; after short debate, Question put and agreed to; Matter considered in Committee

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any allowances that may be made, and Expenses that may be incurred,

[cont.]

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses] —cont.

under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), 1841; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Bill [H.L.] (The Marquess of Lothian)

l. Read 2^d, after short debate May 17, 238 (No. 90)
Committee*; Report May 20

Read 3^d * May 23

c. Read 1st * (The Lord Advocates) June 13
[Bill 287]

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment (No. 3) Bill

Mr. Angus Sutherland, Dr. McDonald, Mr.
Haldane, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Lyell,
Colonel Duncan, Mr. James Stuart, Mr.
Chance)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 7

[Bill 219]

Cross, Viscount (Secretary of State for India)

Asia (Central)—Affairs of Afghanistan, 1678

India—Land Acquisition Act—Expropriation
of Zemindars at Arni Ghat, Mussoorie, 11

CROSSLEY, Mr. E., York, W.R., Sowerby
British Guiana—Ecclesiastical Affairs, 861

CROSSMAN, Major General Sir W., Port- smouth

Scotland—Tweed Acts, 506

War Office—Compensation to certain Senior Majors, 704

Currency, The

French and Italian Copper Coins, Question,
Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) June 13, 1721

The Silver Coinage, Questions, Mr. E. Harcastle, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 23, 873

The New Coinage, Question, Mr. W. Beckett;
Answer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer
(Mr. Goschen) June 10, 1589

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson)

c. Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 16, 68

c. Read 2^d, after debate June 6, 1184 [Bill 241]

Customs Consolidation Acts (1876) Amend- ment Bill

(Lord Brabourne)

l. Royal Assent May 23

[50 Vict. c. 7]

DAVENPORT, Mr. H. T., Staffordshire, Leek
Paris Exhibition, 1889, 884

DEASY, Mr. J., Mayo, W.
Inland Revenue Department—Collection at Liverpool, Colchester, and Cork, 58

DE COBAIN, Mr. E. S. W., Belfast, E.
Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 659
Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2) Comm. cl. 1, 633; add. cl.
812

Deeds of Arrangement Registration Bill (Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Howard Vincent,
Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Coddington, Mr.
Lawson, Sir Albert Rollit)
c. Committee—r.f. May 20, 815 [Bill 231]
Committee; Report June 7, 1340

Defences of the Empire — see title Imperial Defences

DE LISLE, Mr. E. J. L. M. P., Leicestershire, Mid
Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
Telegraph Services, 1182

DE VESCI, Viscount
Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 17, 46; cl. 20,
Amendt. 1684; cl. 22, Amendt. 1700

DE WORMS, Baron H. (Secretary to the Board of Trade), Liverpool, East
Toxteth

"Board of Trade Journal"—Contract for Advertisements, 879

Corn Sales, 2R. 1204

Court of Bankruptcy—Mr. E. M. Langworthy
—Private Examination, 511

Immigration of Foreigners, 520

Ireland—Commissioners of Irish Lights—
Lighthouse Keepers and their Families, 888, 889

Tramways—Line between Schull and
Skibbereen, 53

Lighthouses and Lightships—Lighthouse Illu-minants—Trinity House Report, 1726

Telegraphic Communication—Lord Craw-ford's Committee—Tory Island, 710

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave,
1348, 1351, 1352

Merchant Shipping Acts—Loss of Life at Sea —Report of the Royal Commission, 724
Loss of the SS. "Carmona," 871

Railway and Canal Traffic—Carriage of Town
Refuse, 1726

Railways—Inspectors' Reports upon Accidents, 506

Railway Rates, 68

DILLON, Mr. J., Mayo, E.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 285, 373; cl. 2, 438, 467, 552, 584,
593, 772, 922, 935, 969, 1003, 1009; Motion
for reporting Progress, 1013, 1015, 1019,
1025; cl. 3, 1270, 1303, 1318, 1326, 1357;
cl. 4, 1504, 1531, 1543, 1545, 1548, 1554;
cl. 5, 1747, 1748, 1793; Amendt. 1794, 1797,
1805, 1807, 1818, 1826, 1830, 1832
Currency—Silver Coinage, 875

Egypt—Soudan—Arabs of Suakin, 1219

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 701

Ireland—Questions

Evictions—Co. Mayo, 1228;—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare, 1731, 1732;—
Alleged Misconduct of the Constabulary,
1439, 1741, 1742

Irish Land Commission—Glebe Land Purchasers, 1418, 1419

Law and Justice—Court of Bankruptcy—
Imprisonment of Father Keller, 722, 903,
904, 905

National Education—Classification of Teachers, 1218

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission—Report, 1219

Post Office—Telegraph Line to Charlestown, 1223

Public Meetings—Proclamation of the Dungannon Meeting, 522, 523;—Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster,
256, 257, 258

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster
Abbey)—Tickets of Admission to the Platform outside Parliament Square, 1744

Parliament—Adjournment of the House, 1027
Business of the House—Unsatisfactory
State of, 1068

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 151, 152, 159, 163, 169, 188; Amendt.
192, 194, 195, 196, 207, 208, 209, 211, 212, 213

Disturnpiked Roads

Annual Receipts and Contributions, Questions,
Mr. Webster, Mr. Cox; Answers, The First
Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)
May 19, 507

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Middlesex,
Uxbridge

Theatres—Protection of Life from Fire—
Burning of the Opéra Comique, Paris, 1076

DODDS, Mr. J., Stockton

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 396, 397

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 728

Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland
3R. 493

Dog Owners Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Mount-Temple)

l. 2R. negatived, after short debate June 10, 1862 (No. 91)

Dogs, Rabies in

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the subject of rabies in dogs, and the laws applicable thereto" (The Lord President) May 17, 246; Motion agreed to

DOUGLAS, Mr. A. AKERS- (Secretary to the Treasury), Kent, St. Augustine's Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 991, 992
 Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey), 906
 Parliament—Remuneration of Witnesses attending Parliamentary Committees, 1224

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Harbour Loans—Memorandum of the Board of Trade, 1420

Duke of Connaught's Leave Bill

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Sir John Gorst)

c. Committee; Report; read 3^o May 20, 788

[Bill 228]

l. Read 1^a; read 2^a; Committee negatived; read 3^a May 21

Royal Assent May 28 [50 Vict. c. 10]

DUNCAN, Colonel F., Finsbury, Holborn

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 68, 84

DUNRAVEN, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 21, 1695

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Kent, Dartford

Charity Commissioners—Judd Foundation, Tonbridge, 507

Education Department—Questions

Bradford School Board, 508

Drawing in Elementary Schools, 1228

Exeter Training College—Disturbances, 876

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Holiday in Elementary Schools, 56

Royal Commission on the Education Acts, 713

Vacant Building Land in Victoria Street, Westminster, 865

East India Stock Conversion Bill

(Sir John Gorst, Mr. Jackson)

c. Read 2^o May 16 [Bill 263]

Committee; Report May 17, 411

Bill re-committed; Committee; Report May 19, 623 [Bill 267]

Considered; read 3^o May 20, 789

l. Read 1^a; read 2^a; Committee negatived; read 3^a May 21

Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. 11]

Education Department (England and Wales)

Bradford School Board, Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 19, 508

Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Holiday in Elementary Schools, Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 16, 55

Education Acts, The Royal Commission on the, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 20, 713

Elementary Schools, Drawing in, Question, Mr. Conway; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) June 7, 1237

Exeter Training College, The Recent Disturbances at, Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 23, 876

Vacant Building Land in Victoria Street, Westminster, Question, Mr. Bartley; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) May 23, 865

EDWARDS-MOSS, Mr. T. C. Lancashire, S.W., Widnes

Merchant Shipping Acts—Loss of the SS. "Carmona," 879

EGYPT (Questions)

Finance, &c.—An "Unacknowledged Floating Debt," Question, Mr. Baden-Powell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 17, 251

The Soudan—The Arabs of Suakin, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 7, 1219

The Campaign of 1885—The Khedive's Bronze Star, Question, Colonel Bridgeman; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 9, 1427

The Negotiations—Evacuation by the British, Question, Mr. W. Redmond; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 16, 63

Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's Mission, Question, Mr. W. Redmond; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 19, 509; Observations, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury), The Earl of Carnarvon May 20, 633

The Rumoured Anglo-Turkish Convention

Question, The Earl of Rosebery; Answer, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) May 23, 820; Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 899;—The Papers, Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7,

[cont.]

Egypt—The Anglo-Turkish Convention—cont.

1232; Observations, Question, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury); Questions, The Earl of Kimberley; Answers, The Marquess of Salisbury June 10, 1864

Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Christchurch) Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord President)

1. Read 2^a * June 10 (No. 92)

Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord President)

1. Read 2^a * June 10 (No. 94)

Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Middleton St. George) Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord President)

1. Read 2^a * June 10 (No. 93)

ELGIN, Earl of Literature, Science, and Art—National Portrait Gallery, 645

ELLENBOROUGH, Lord

Tithe Rent-Charge, Report, cl. 2, 1572

ELLIS, Mr. J. E., Nottingham, Rushcliffe

Coal Mines, &c. Regulation, Comm. 226
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1540, 1541

Ireland—Questions

Evictions—Statistics, 1720

Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Act, Section 8 —Fine on an Hotel-Keeper for Exhibiting a Political Banner, 495

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—
Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1421, 1422

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1647

Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1846

Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885—Returns, 894

Employers' Liability Act (1880) Amendment Bill (Mr. William M'Donald, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Chance, Mr. Clancy) [Bill 38]

c. 2R. deferred, after short debate June 8, 1414

Employers' Liability Act—Renewal and Amendment

Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 7, 1220

ERNE, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 31; cl. 17, Amendt. 46; cl. 21, Amendt. 1696; cl. 22, Amendt. 1699

ESMONDE, Sir T. H. G., Dublin Co., S.
Magistracy (England and Wales)—Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire, 724

ESSELMONT, Mr. P., Aberdeenshire, E.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 353, 357

Parliament—Sittings and Adjournment of the House—Whitsuntide Recess, 64

Scotland—Questions

Action of the Crofter Commission, 1038

Church of Scotland—Church Building in Pitsligo, Aberdeenshire, 901

Fisheries—Fishermen's Cottages on the East Coast, 880

EWART, Mr. W., Belfast, N.

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 652
Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 630; cl. 5, 810; add. cl. 813; Consid. add. cl. 1555, 1556, 1560

EYRE, Colonel H., Lincolnshire, Gainsborough

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Volunteer Corps—Assistant Instructors in Signalling, 1587

New Regulations as to Shooting, 879

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 113

FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W.
Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 72

FERGUSON, Mr. R. C. Munro, Leith, &c.

Immigration of Foreigners, 520

India—Pisheen Valley Railroad, 1225

Scotland, Secretary for, 1070

FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Manchester, N.E.

Africa (Central)—Transit Tariff through Portuguese Territory, 1587

Army (India)—Indian Artillery—The 9-Pounder Muzzle-Loading Gun, 856

Asia (Central)—Advance of Russian Railways, 1734

Trade Communication with Thibet—Convention with China, 1725

Canada and the United States—The Anglo-American Fisheries Disputes, 854;—A New Commission, 1417

Egypt—Questions

Anglo-Turkish Convention, 899

Finance, &c.—An "Unacknowledged Floating Debt," 251

Negotiations—Evacuation by the British, 62;—Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's Mission, 510

Soudan—Arabs of Suakin, 1219

France—Paris Exhibition, 1889, 59, 519, 885, 1428

Free Church of Scotland—Mission Station at Constantinople, 512

Immigration of Destitute Foreigners, 514

Madagascar—Capture of Natives by the French and Transport to Reunion, 878

North Borneo—Operations against the Natives, 872

FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J.—cont.

North Sea Fisheries Convention, 1882—East Coast Drift Net Fisheries, 1424
United States—Emigrants to Tennessee, 503
Emigration of Highland Crofters, 1434

FIELD, Admiral E., Sussex, Eastbourne
Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 1209, 1210, 1214

Fiji — Public Flogging of a Wesleyan Methodist

Question, Sir Robert Fowler; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 17, 246

Finance, &c.

Reduction of the National Debt, 1886-7, Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 248

The National Debt, Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 253

FINCH-HATTON, Hon. M. E. G., Lincolnshire, Spalding

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 631
Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 229
Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 158

FINLAY, Mr. R. B., Inverness, &c.

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 82

FINUCANE, Mr. J., Limerick, E.

Ireland—Questions
Evictions—Powers of Sheriff, 520
Post Office—Carriage of Mails to Kilmallock, 889
Royal Irish Constabulary—Convictions for Assault, 875

First Offenders Bill

(Mr. Howard Vincent, Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Hoare, Mr. Addison, Mr. Hastings, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Molloy) [Bill 189]

c. Committee* (on re-comm.); Report May 20, 803

Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered" June 7, 1334; Question put, and agreed to

After short debate, Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d;" Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr Radcliffe Cooke); Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

FITZGERALD, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. 13; cl. 1, Amendt. 15, 24, 27, 29; cl. 3, Amendt. 31; cl. 5, Amendt. 34; cl. 16, 44; cl. 20, 49, 244; Amendt. 1679, 1680, 1682, 1684, 1685, 1687; cl. 21, 1698; cl. 22, 1700; cl. 27, 1704; cl. 29, Amendt. 1705

FITZWYGRAM, General Sir F. W., Hants, Farnham

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 107, 119

FLYNN, Mr. J. C., Cork, N.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 335; cl. 2, 442, 998
Ireland—Irish Land Commissioners—Sitting at Clonmel, 714

FOLEY, Mr. P. J., Galway, Connemara

Ireland—Dispensaries—Oughterard Board of Guardians, 1586

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—Secretary of State
(see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—Under Secretary of State
(see FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J.)

Forestry

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether by the Establishment of a Forest School, or otherwise, our woodlands could be rendered more remunerative May 18

Select Committee nominated May 20; List of the Committee, 818

FORSTER, Sir C., Walsall

Public Petitions—Petition from Bradford—Alleged Fictitious Signatures, 723

FORWOOD, Mr. A. B. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Lancashire, Ormskirk

Admiralty—Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Rupert" at Hull, 1581

FOSTER, Sir B. W., Derby, Ilkeston

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 230

FOWLER, Right Hon. H. H., Wolverhampton, E.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 767, 1010, 1014; Motion for reporting Progress, 1019, 1023, 1024, 1298, 1299; cl. 4, 1455, 1456; cl. 5, Amendt. 1745, 1748, 1791

Ireland—Law and Justice—Imprisonment of John Ryan, an Evicted Tenant, 1723

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 728

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 797
Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 181, 182

FOWLER, Sir R. N., London

Fiji—Public Flogging of a Wesleyan Methodist, 246

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 526

France and the New Hebrides—The Papers Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The
First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H.
Smith) June 7, 1232; Observations, Question, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury);
Questions, The Earl of Kimberley; Answers,
The Marquess of Salisbury June 10, 1564

FRASER, General C. C., Lambeth, N.
Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 95

FULTON, Mr. J. F., West Ham, N.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 4, 1465, 1477

Gas and Water Provisional Orders Bill
(Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Jackson)
c. Read 2^o May 17 [Bill 248]

Gas Provisional Orders Bill
(Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Jackson)
c. Read 2^o May 17 [Bill 249]

GEDGE, Mr. S., Stockport
Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 1214

GENT-DAVIS, Mr. R., Lambeth, Kennington
Metropolitan Police—Duties of the Police
Serving in this House, 883

GIBSON, Mr. J. G. (Solicitor General for Ireland), Liverpool, Walton
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 3, 1276

GILHOOLY, Mr. J., Cork, W.
Ireland—Questions
Board of Public Works—Loo Rock, 712
Piers and Harbours—Pier at Cape Clear
Island, 711
Poor Law—Election of Guardians, Bantry
Union, 497
Tramways—Line between Schull and
Skibbereen, 52

GILL, Mr. H. J., Limerick
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 337

GILL, Mr. T. P., Louth, S.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 936, 950
Immigration of Destitute Foreigners, 514
Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
Telegraph Services, 1171, 1182

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., Edinburgh, Mid Lothian
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 292, 295, 304, 305; cl. 5, 1748
Ireland—Agrarian Crime, 898

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.
Jubilee Service in St. Margaret's Church, Res.
258, 907
Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1601, 1617

GOLDSMID, Sir J., St. Pancras, S.
Charity Commissioners—Judd Foundation,
Tunbridge, 506
Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 677, 692, 697
Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. 1717
Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland,
3R. 649
South Pacific—New Hebrides—Island of Tanna, 247

GOLDSWORTHY, Major-General W. T.,
Hammersmith
Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 93,
134

GORST, Sir J. E. (Under Secretary of State for India), Chatham
Burmah—Licensing and Regulation of Immorality, 726, 882, 1028
Upper—Ruby Mines, 1029, 1073, 1074, 1580
Duke of Connaught's Leave, Comm. 788
East India Stock Conversion, Comm. 411;
cl. 2, 412, 413; Consid. 624; add. cl. 625
India—Questions
Admission of Natives and Europeans to the Public Service, 716
Bengal—Manufacture of Spirits, 715
Pisheen Valley Railroad, 1225
Public Service Commission—Uncovenanted
Civil Service, 1583
Sanitation, 1738
Special Allowances to Two Engineer Officers, 1582
Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster
Abbey)—British-Indian Volunteers, 1592 GOSCHEN, Rt. Hon. G. J. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), St. George's, Hanover Square

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 4, 1527
Currency—Questions
French and Italian Copper Coins, 1721
New Coinage, 1589
Silver Coinage, 873, 875
Customs and Excise—Adulteration of Beer, 1221
Methods of Testing Spirits in Bottles, 713
Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 1196, 1199
Finance, &c.—Reduction of the National Debt,
1886-7, 248, 253
Inland Revenue—Questions
Board of Inland Revenue—Reduction of the Staffs of the Indoor and Outdoor Departments, 1738
Income Tax—Charge on the Wives of Civil and Military Officers in India; and others
Abroad, 513;—Income Tax on Profits
Earned by Foreigners, 253
Pensions in the Secretary's Department, 866

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.—cont.

Ireland—Fishery Piers and Harbours—Additional Accommodation in the West of Ireland, 1590, 1591

Public Works—Government Subvention of £50,000, 900 ;—Arterial Drainage—Drainage of the Barrow, &c. 1071, 1428, 1427

Post Office and Telegraph Services—Net Revenue, 249

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1632

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 149

Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1106, 1119

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

Canada and the United States—The Anglo-American Fisheries Disputes, 854 ;—A New Commission, 1417

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey), 1075 ;—Accommodation for Members of this House, 1436

GRAHAM, Mr. R. C., Lanark, N.W.

Admiralty—Police Fine on a Naval Lieutenant, 69

GRANVILLE, Earl

Irish Land Law, Comm. 245

Great Eastern Railway (re-committed) Bill (by Order)

c. Considered May 20, 675

GREY, Sir E., Northumberland, Berwick
Scotland—Tweed Acts, 505

GROTRIAN, Mr. F. B., Hull, E.

Loss of Life at Sea—Report of the Royal Commission, 723

Grouse Disease, The

Question, Mr. E. Robertson ; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) May 20, 719

GROVE, Sir T. F., Wilts, Wilton

Tithes—Distraint for Non-Payment, Shinford, Berks, 60

HALSBURY, Lord (Lord Chancellor)

Dog Owners, 2R. 1563

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 21, 1698

Land Transfer, Comm. 233

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 3, 845

HAMBRO, Colonel J. C. T., Dorset, S.

War Office—Chesil Beach (Portland)—Removal of Wrecks, 1225

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.
(First Lord of the Admiralty),
Middlesex, Ealing

Admiralty—Questions

Conversion of the Royal Marine Artillery into Marine Infantry, 254

Departmental Committee on the Clerical Establishments, 900

Dockyards—Gratuities to Discharged Workmen, 714

Permanent Financial Control, 855

Police Fine on a Naval Lieutenant, 59

Sheers at Pembroke Dockyard, 885

Special Naval Pension to Widow of Staff Commander W. M. Savage, 873

Supply of Welsh Coal to Her Majesty's Ships at Queensferry, 725, 726

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, 61

Naval Review, 899

North Borneo—Operations against the Natives—H.M.S. "Zephyr," 881

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Liverpool, West Derby

Dominion of Canada—Canadian Pacific Railway, 730

Import Duties on Iron, 521

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 695, 697, 698, 699

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 727

HAMILTON, Lord E., Tyrone, N.

Lighthouses and Lightships—Telegraphic Communication—Lord Crawford's Committee—Tory Island, 710

HAMILTON, Colonel C. E., Southwark, Rotherhithe

Army—Cadets of the Royal Military Academy at Aldershot, 1722

HAMLEY, General Sir E. B., Birkenhead

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 134

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., Preston

Africa (South)—Sir Charles Warren's Bechuanaland Expedition, 1734

Asia (Central)—Advance of Russian Railways, 1734

Education Department—Royal Commission on the Education Acts, 713

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691

Royal Commission on War and Admiralty Offices—The Evidence, 250

Superannuation and Retired Allowances—Pension to a Custom House Officer—Fraudulent Drawing, 517, 519

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1099

[cont.]

HANBURY, Mr. R. W.—cont.

- War Office—Questions
 Army Contracts, 1733
 Contract for Sword Bayonets, 1223
 Ordnance Department—Colonel Maitland, Superintendent of Gun Factory, Wool-wich, 709
 War Office (Ordnance Department)—Defective
 Weapons—Questions
 Responsible Officials, 896
 Sword Bayonets of the City of London Artillery Volunteers, 1226
 Tests, 515, 517, 1075

Harbour Loans—Memorandum of Board of Trade, 1886

Questions, Mr. R. W. Duff; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)
 June 9, 1420

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V.,
*Derby

- Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 266; Amendt. 207, 274, 281, 302, 303,
 348; cl. 2, 579, 580, 588, 604, 770; cl. 3,
 1234, 1238, 1247, 1314; cl. 4, 1527, 1537,
 1538, 1551, 1552
 Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 1184, 1199
 Finance, &c.—Reduction of the National Debt,
 1886-7, 248
 Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment
 (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1616, 1617, 1629
 Post Office and Telegraph Services—Net
 Revenue, 249
 Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
 Telegraph Services, 1172, 1174

HARDCASTLE, Mr. E., Salford, N.

Currency—Silver Coinage, 873

HARDINGE, Viscount

Literature, Science, and Art—The National
 Portrait Gallery, 644

HARRINGTON, Mr. E., Kerry, W.

- Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 322, 323, 395; cl. 2, 545, 601, 743,
 952, 960, 990; cl. 3, 1369; cl. 5, 1809
 Ireland—Poor Relief Inquiry Commission,
 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1423
 Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 171
 Report, 409

HARRINGTON, Mr. T. C., Dublin, Harbour

- Civil Service Writers—The Treasury Minute, 498
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 345; cl. 5, 1823, 1824
 Ireland—Post Office (Dublin)—Female Telegraph Staff, 252, 253
 Public Meetings—Suppression of Public
 Meetings in Ulster, 257
 Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 182, 186, 187, 188, 189, 208, 209,
 212, 214, 217, 220, 224

HARROWBY, Earl of

Asia (Central)—Afghanistan—Anglo-Russian
 Delimitation Commission, 634
 Police Force Enfranchisement, 2R. 3

HAVELOCK-ALLAN, Lt.-General Sir H.
*M.. Durham, S.E.

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 103,
 105
 War Office (Ordnance Department)—Defective
 Weapons—Tests, 517

HAYDEN, Mr. L. P., Leitrim, S.

Ireland—Chief Land Commissioners at Longford—Re-hearing of Appeal, 1584

HEALY, Mr. M., Cork

- Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 267, 359, 382, 386, 392; cl. 2, 421,
 422; Amendt. 423, 445, 450, 540, 541, 551,
 564, 592, 606, 733, 739, 747, 749, 787, 915,
 918, 919, 922, 944, 954, 955, 963, 966, 977,
 993; cl. 3, 1247, 1260, 1266, 1274, 1275,
 1279, 1285, 1308, 1319, 1359, 1389, 1391,
 1394, 1399, 1404, 1406, 1411, 1412, 1414;
cl. 4, Amendt. 1442, 1444, 1477, 1478, 1482,
 1510, 1515, 1516, 1529, 1532, 1541, 1554;
cl. 5, 1746, 1759, 1762, 1781, 1788, 1803,
 1809, 1812, 1819, 1822, 1825
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses], Res. 1561; Comm. 1844
 Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm.
cl. 2, Amendt. 815; cl. 14, Amendt. 1841
 East India Stock Conversion, Consid. add. cl.
 627
 Ireland—Law and Justice—Court of Queen's Bench—Change of Venue, 1225, 1226;—
 Miscarriage of Summonses, 63
 Sea and Coast Fisheries—Trawling in Donegal Bay, 888
 Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure
 on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland)
 Bill), Res. 1650
 Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 142, 208, 212, 222
 Report, 408, 612

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Longford, N.

- Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 652,
 662, 663, 665, 667, 673, 675
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, Amendt. 260, 261, 263, 284, 354,
 356, 368, 375, 377, 379, 380, 387, 388,
 389, 391, 393, 396, 397, 399, 402; cl. 2,
 418, 424; Amendt. 425, 429, 430, 490,
 541; Motion for reporting Progress, 542,
 548, 550, 608, 609, 610, 743, 744; Amendt.
 746, 747, 748, 753, 782, 783, 909, 918, 922,
 925, 926, 946, 947, 958; Motion for reporting Progress, 979, 984, 987, 989, 990,
 991, 994, 995, 1000, 1003, 1004; Amendt.
 1005, 1006, 1012, 1016, 1017, 1018, 1022,
 1024; cl. 3, 1234, 1235, 1237, 1238, 1244,
 1258; Amendt. 1263, 1266, 1275, 1276,
 1277, 1280, 1281, 1284, 1287, 1305, 1314,
 1316, 1323, 1333, 1353, 1355, 1394, 1409,
 1410, 1411; cl. 4, 1446, 1459, 1460, 1463,
 1464, 1469, 1472; Amendt. 1479, 1484,
 1486, 1515, 1516, 1518, 1521, 1522, 1526,

HEALY, Mr. T. M.—cont.

1527, 1530, 1531, 1539, 1542, 1546, 1550, 1552, 1553, 1554, 1674; cl. 5, 1807, 1814, 1815, 1818; Amendt. 1820, 1825, 1830, 1833

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses], Res. 1560, 1561; Comm. 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842, 1813, 1846

Duke of Connaught's Leave, Comm. 788; 3R. 789

East India Stock Conversion, Comm. 412; cl. 2, 413; Consid. 624; 3R. 790

First Offenders, Consid. 1834

Ireland—Questions

Executive — The Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, 720, 722

Fishery Piers and Harbours—Additional Accommodation in the West of Ireland, 1591

Labourers' Act—Carrickmacross Union—Guardians, 884;—Granard Guardians, 863

Public Meetings — Proclamation of the Dungannon Meeting, 524

Public Works—Government Subvention of £50,000 — Arterial Drainage (Barrow Valley, &c. Drainage), 1425, 1427

Royal Irish Constabulary—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign — Circular of the Inspector General, 1431, 1432

Sea and Coast Fisheries—Trawling in Donegal Bay, 887

Ireland—Law and Justice—Questions

High Court of Justice in Ireland—Court of Appeal—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 901, 902, 1055, 1058, 1060, 1061;—Transfer of Clerks, 870

"Kevill v. King-Barman," 862, 863

Quarter and Land Sessions at Granard, 864

Jubilee Service in St. Margaret's Church, Res. 258, 259

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey), 906;—Seats Outside, 1593

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 728, 730

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1346, 1350

Market Tolls, Nomination of Select Committee, 1232

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 628, 631, 633; cl. 5, 810; add. cl. 811; Consid. add. cl. 1556

Municipal Regulation (Constabulary, &c.) (Belfast), Motion for Leave, 1026

Parliament—Questions

Adjournment of the House, 414, 1027, 1677

New Rules of Procedure, 1886—The Closure, 905

Sittings and Adjournment of the House—Whitsun Holidays, 903

Parliament — Business of the House — Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, Notice of Instruction, 1441, 1442; Res. 1625, 1658, 1662

Supply, Report, 406, 407; Motion for Adjournment, 410, 613, 617, 618, 620

Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment, Comm. 1025

HEALY, Mr. T. M.—cont.

United States—Emigration of Pauper Families from Ireland, 1218

Wales—Anti-Tithe League, 895

HEATON, Mr. J. H., Canterbury

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 135

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Packet Service, 1161

Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1079, 1084, 1088, 1090, 1094, 1101, 1120, 1153, 1154

Post Office Telegraph Services, 1165, 1174

War Office—Ordnance Committee—Appointment and Constitution, 722

HENEAGE, Right Hon. E., Great Grimsby

Army and Navy Estimates Committee—Composition, 1742

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 800

HENNIKER, Lord

Ilyde Park Corner (New Streets), Comm. 821

Literature, Science, and Art—The National Portrait Gallery, 645

Parliament—Palace of Westminster—Central Hall—Position of the Statue of the late

Earl of Iddesleigh, 1578

HERMON-HODGE, Mr. R. T., Lancashire, Accrington

War Office—Review at Aldershot—Allowance to the Yeomanry Cavalry, 256

HERSCHELL, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 16, 24; cl. 16, 43; cl. 17, 46; cl. 20, 1679, 1688; cl. 21, 1690, 1691, 1694; cl. 25, Amendt. 1701

Tithe Rent-Charge, Report, cl. 4, 1575

HILL, Colonel E. S., Bristol, S.

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 133

HOARE, Mr. S., Norwich

Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874—The Rev. J. Bell Cox, 892

HOLLAND, Right Hon. Sir H. T. (Secretary of State for the Colonies), Hampstead

Africa (South)—Zululand, 67, 68, 254, 501, 502, 503, 509

British Guiana—Ecclesiastical Affairs, 862

Ceylon—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Legislative Council—

Proposed Reform of Constitution, 1073

Dock Accommodation at Colombo, 1421

Fiji—Public Flogging of a Wesleyan Methodist, 247

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure (1832)—

Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 529

South Pacific—New Hebrides—Island of Tanna, 247

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 154

Trinidad—The Pitch Lake, 1217

HOLMES, Right Hon. H. (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland). Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 259, 260, 263, 263, 264, 266, 267, 361, 363, 380, 389, 392, 396, 397, 400; cl. 2, 416, 417, 423, 429, 430, 431, 446, 447, 481, 550, 570; Amendt. 581, 594, 600, 733, 734, 746, 749, 761, 764, 784, 914, 943, 946, 956, 963, 973, 974, 998, 1006; cl. 3, 1238, 1241, 1247, 1263, 1273, 1281, 1284, 1287, 1291, 1292, 1298, 1316, 1321, 1390, 1393, 1396, 1403, 1406, 1409, 1410, 1413; cl. 4, 1444, 1446, 1450, 1456, 1469, 1478, 1480, 1502, 1515, 1516, 1517, 1518, 1529, 1530; cl. 5, 1751, 1753, 1776, 1781, 1787, 1791, 1793, 1797, 1798, 1807, 1808; Amendt. 1811, 1812, 1818, 1820, 1822, 1825, 1828, 1830, 1831, 1833, 1835

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses], Res. 1560; Comm. 1840, 1843, 1845

Ireland—Questions

Charitable Donations and Bequests—Eaton Bequest, 710

Evictions—Powers of Sheriff, 520

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1423

Public Meetings—Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster, 257

Ireland—Law and Justice—Questions

Court of Bankruptcy—Imprisonment of Father Keller, 722, 904

Court of Queen's Bench—Change of Venue, 1226

High Court of Justice—Court of Appeal—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 902, 1058, 1080

Imprisonment of Michael Spillane, 707, 708

"Kevill v. King-Harman," 863

The Brothers Howard, Imprisoned for Contempt of Court, 706, 707

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 208, 209, 211, 223, 224

HOME DEPARTMENT—Secretary of State (see MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H.)

HOME DEPARTMENT—Under Secretary of State (see WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. STUART-)

HOOPER, Mr. J., Cork, S.E.

Ireland—Evictions—Violent Conduct of an "Emergency Man" at Monkstown, Co. Cork, 495, 496, 877, 1417, 1418

Fishery Piers and Harbours—Additional Accommodation in the West of Ireland, 1590

HOULDSWORTH, Mr. W. H., Manchester, N.W.

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1346, 1347, 1350; 2R. 1709, 1714, 1760

HOWELL, Mr. G., Bethnal Green, N.E.

Over Darwen Corporation, Consid. 493; Amendt. 494

HOYLE, Mr. I., Lancashire, S.E., Heywood

Poor Law—Parochial Relief, 1886—Statistics, 1719

HOZIER, Mr. J. H. C., Lanarkshire, S.

Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment, Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1203; add. cl. Amendt. 1204

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., London

Wales—Anti-Tithe League, 895

HUGHES - HALLETT, Colonel F. C., Rochester

Admiralty—Conversion of the Royal Marine Artillery into Marine Infantry, 254

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 77

War Office (Ordnance Department)—Captain Horton, Inspector of Saddlery at Woolwich, 60

Skilled and Ordinary Workmen at Enfield, 62

HUNTER, Mr. W. A., Aburdeen, N.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 765, 949

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Royal Procession—Post Offices along the Route, 1740

Hyde Park Corner (New Streets) Bill (The Lord Henniker)

1. Committee May 23, 820 (No. 79)

Moved, "To disagree to the Amendments proposed by the Select Committee" (The Lord Henniker); Motion agreed to; Amendments negatived; Bill reported

Read 3^d June 9

ILLINGWORTH, Mr. A., Bradford, W.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 925

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. add. cl. 812

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 793

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 206, 219, 220, 222

Immigration of Destitute Foreigners

Questions, Mr. J. G. Talbot, Mr. T. P. Gill; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 19, 514; Question, Mr. Munro-Ferguson; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 19, 520

Imperial Defences—King George's Sound—The Colonial Conference

Question, Mr. Baden-Powell; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 9, 1435

INCHQUIN, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. 12; cl. 4, 32; cl. 5, 35; cl. 6, Amendt. ib.; cl. 20, 1692

Incumbents of Benefices Loans Extension Act (1886) Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. 8]

Incumbents' Resignation Act (1871) Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos)

l. Presented; read 1st May 17 (No. 104)

INDIA—Secretary of State (see CROSS, Viscount)INDIA—Under Secretary of State (see GORST, Sir J. E.)*INDIA (Questions)

Bengal—Manufacture of Spirits, Question, Mr. S. Smith; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) May 20, 715

Pisheen Valley Railroad, The, Question, Mr. Munro-Ferguson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 7, 1225

Public Service, Admission of Natives and Europeans to the, Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) May 20, 715

Public Service Commission, The—The Uncovenanted Civil Service, Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 10, 1582

Sanitation, Question, Mr. Kenyon; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 13, 1738

India—The Land Acquisition Act—Expropriation of Zemindars at Arni Ghat, Mussoorie

Moved, for a "Copy of Sir Alfred Lyall's Resolution on the judgment of the Chief Justice" (The Lord Stanley of Alderley) May 16, 5; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Intermediate Education (Wales) (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Mundella, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Richard, Sir Hussey Vivian, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Stuart Rendel, Mr. William Abraham)

c. Ordered; read 1st June 7 [Bill 285]

IRELAND (Questions)

Charitable Donations and Bequests—The Eaton Bequest, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 20, 710

IRELAND—cont.

Dispensaries—Oughterard Board of Guardians, Question, Mr. Foley; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 10, 1586

Emigration from Ireland, Question, Mr. W. A. Macdonald; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 513

Refusal of the Authorities at New York to allow Emigrants to Land, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 24, 1030

Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Act, Section 8—Fine on an Hotel Keeper for Exhibiting a Political Banner, Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 495

Roads and Bridges—Derry Bridge Commissioners, Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 54

The Executive (Ireland)—The Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 20, 720

The Executive and Mr. Patrick Egan, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 24, 1030

Tramways—Line between Schull and Skibbereen, Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 16, 52

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS

The Return, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 55

Guardians of the Carrickmacross Union, Questions, Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 883

Granard Guardians, Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 864

LAND (IRELAND)

Land Act (Ireland)—Appointment of Sub-Commissioners, Question, Mr. Lea, Mr. Mayne; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 497

Fair Rents—Case of T. R. Whitney, Questions, Dr. Kenny; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 504

Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885—Returns, Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 894

[cont.]

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION

Glebe Land Purchasers, Questions, Mr. Dillon ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 9, 1418

The Chief Land Commissioners at Longford—Re-hearing of Appeal, Question, Mr. Hayden ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 10, 1584

Irish Land Commissioners—Sitting at Clonmel, Question, Mr. Flynn ; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 20, 714

Land Commission Court—John Smith, of Currembla, Co. Sligo, Questions, Mr. P. McDonald ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 867

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)

Interference of the Police at Dungannon, Questions, Mr. M. J. Kenny, Mr. M. Cartan, Mr. Waddy ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 885

Nationalist Meetings in Ulster, Questions, Mr. M. Cartan, Mr. Chance ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 889

Proclaimed Meetings

Proclamation of the Dungannon Union, Questions, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Storey, Mr. T. M. Healy ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 19, 522

Protestant Home Rule Association—Kilkeel, Questions, Mr. M. Cartan ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 7, 1221

Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster, Questions, Mr. Dillon, Mr. T. O. Harrington ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman), The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 17, 256 ; Question, Mr. Blanc ; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ; Question, Mr. Sexton No reply] May 20, 718

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)

Loo Rock, Question, Mr. Gilhooly ; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 20, 712

The Government Subvention of £50,000, Question, Mr. T. W. Russell ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 23, 890 ; — Arterial Drainage (The Barrow Valley and the Bann), Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) June 8, 1071 ; Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. P. McDonald ; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, (Mr. Goschen) June 9, 1425

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS

Lighthouse Keepers and their Families, Questions, Colonel Nolan ; Answers, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 23, 888

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)

Board of—The Vacant Seat, Question, Mr. T. W. Russell ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 496

Annadown (Co. Down) National School, Question, Mr. Ker ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 51

Aughlogan (Co. Tyrone) National School—The "Workmistress," Question, Mr. M. J. Kenny ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 51

Carrickawilkin (Co. Armagh) National School, Question, Mr. P. O'Brien ; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 20, 711

Milltown (Co. Tyrone) National School, Question, Mr. M. J. Kenny ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 52

Classification of Teachers, Question, Mr. Dillon ; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 7, 1218

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)

Additional Accommodation in the West of Ireland, Questions, Mr. Hooper, Mr. T. M. Healy ; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) June 10, 1590

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)

Arklow Harbour Works, Questions, Mr. W. J. Corbet ; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 20, 718

The Pier at Cape Clear Island, Question, Mr. Gilhooly ; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ; Question, Dr. Tanner [No reply] May 20, 711

SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND)

Trawling in Donegal Bay, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Chance, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Maurice Healy ; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 887

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)

Dundrum Criminal Asylum—The Resident Medical Officer, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 499

Monaghan District Asylum, Question, Mr. P. O'Brien ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 53

Richmond District Asylum, Question, Dr. Kenny ; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 882

[con-]

IRELAND—cont.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)

Election of Guardians, Bantry Union, Questions, Mr. Gilhooly; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 497
Joseph Watt, Relieving Officer of the Belfast Union, Question, Mr. Leahy; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 56
Poor Relief (Ireland) Inquiry Commission, 1887—The Report, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 7, 1219;—Compounding Rating of Occupiers, Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman), The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) June 9, 1421

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)

Contracts—Mail between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 23, 864
Carriage of Mails to Kilmallock, Question, Mr. Finucane; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 23, 889
Conveyance of Mails in the North of Ireland, Question, Mr. Mac Neill; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1739

Telegraph Department

The Telegraph Office, Dublin, Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 16, 64;—The Female Telegraph Staff, Questions, Mr. T. C. Harrington; Answers, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 17, 262
Telegraph Line to Charlestown, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 7, 1223

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)

Barbovilla Prisoners, The, Observations, Mr. Tuitt; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 24, 1048
Court of Queen's Bench—Change of Venue, Questions, Mr. Maurice Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) June 7, 1225
High Court of Justice—The Court of Appeal—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 23, 901; Observations, Mr. T. M. Healy; Reply, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 24, 1055
Transfer of Clerks, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 23, 869
Miscarriage of Summonses, Question, Mr. Maurice Healy; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 16, 62
Quarter and Land Sessions at Granard, Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 864

IRELAND—Law and Justice—cont.

Case of Joseph Comerford—Belfast Police Court, Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 858
Francis Cook, Drumsna, Questions, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 860
The Brothers Howard, Imprisoned for Contempt of Court, Questions, Mr. Murphy, Dr. Kenny; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 20, 706
The Imprisonment of Father Keller, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes); Question, Mr. Chance [No reply] May 20, 722; Questions, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 23, 908
"Kevill v. King-Harman," Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 23, 862
Imprisonment of John Ryan, an Evicted Tenant, Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1723
Imprisonment of Michael Spillane, Questions, Mr. Murphy, Dr. Kenny, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 20, 707

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)

Denis Lynch, an "Emergency Man," Questions, Mr. Hooper; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 877

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY

Alleged Misconduct of two Constables, Co. Limerick, Question, Dr. Tanner, Dr. Kenny; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 890
Convictions for Assault, Question, Mr. Finucane; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 23, 875
Police Barracks at Meenacaddy, County Donegal—The Magistracy (Ireland)—Shercock Petty Sessions, Questions, Mr. O'Hanlon; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1729
Promotion of Sergeant Magee (Belfast), Question, Mr. H. Campbell; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 10, 1592

PRISONS (IRELAND)

Assault on Warder M'Connell in Mountjoy Prison, Question, Mr. Maurice Healy; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 57

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)

Agrarian Crime (Ireland), Question, Mr. W. E. Gladstone; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) May 23, 898

IRELAND—Crime and Outrage—cont.

The Return for April and May, Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 9, 1439

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)

Alleged Outrage by a Member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, Questions, Mr. Conybears; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 10, 1501

Monaghan Union—Notice to Guardians, Questions, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 16, 54; May 23, 858

Powers of Sheriff, Question, Mr. Finucane; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) May 10, 520

Statistics, Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1720

Violent Conduct of an "Emergency Man" at Monkstown, Co. Cork, Questions, Mr. Hooper; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) May 19, 495; June 9, 1417

Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare

Question, Mr. Conybears; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 9, 1423; Questions, Mr. Conybears, Mr. Dillon, Mr. W. Redmond; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1731

Alleged Misconduct of the Constabulary, Questions, Mr. Conybears, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 9, 1438

Captain E. W. D. Croker, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1735

Alleged Violence to an Old Woman, Questions, Mr. Conybears, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. Dillon, Mr. M. J. Kenny; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1740

Evictions on Lord Kenmare's Estate, Killarney, Questions, Mr. W. A. Macdonald, Mr. Conybears; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman) June 13, 1735

Evictions in Co. Mayo, Questions, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 7, 1228

Irish Land Law Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Privy Seal)

- I. Committee May 16, 12 (No. 58)
- Committee May 17, 243
- Report * May 20 (No. 106)
- Committee (on re-comm.) June 13, 1679

ISAACS, Mr. L. H., Newington, Walworth

Post Office—Auxiliary Letter Carriers—Case of Henry Goodchild, 505
Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 801

ISAACSON, Mr. F. Wootton, Tower Hamlets, Stepney
Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. 1716

Islands of the Southern Pacific—see title Southern Pacific

JACKSON, Mr. W. L. (Secretary to the Treasury), Leeds, N.

Civil Service—Civil Service Writers—The Treasury Minute, 499, 711

Lower Division—Examinations in Dublin, 876

Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm. cl. 8, 817

Harbour Loans—Memorandum of Board of Trade, 1886, 1420

Inland Revenue Department—Collections at Liverpool, Colchester, and Cork, 58

Ireland—Questions

Board of Public Works—Loo Rock, 712

Illigh Court of Justice—Transfer of Clerks, 870

Piers and Harbours—Arklow Harbour Works, 719;—Pier at Cape Clear Island, 712

Merchant Shipping—Hours of Unloading, 519

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 632

Public Offices—Lower Division Clerks in the Treasury Office, 1568, 1569

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 800, 801

Superannuation and Retired Allowances—Pension to a Custom House Officer—Fraudulent Drawing, 518, 519

Supply, Report, 403

Revenue Departments—Post Office Telegraph Services, Motion for reporting Progress, 1183

JAMES, Right Hon. Sir H., Bury, Lancashire

Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. 1718

JAMES, Hon. W. H., Gateshead

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 162

JERSEY, Earl of

Hyde Park Corner (New Streets), Comm. 822

JOHNSTON, Mr. W., Belfast, S.

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendments, 655, 656

Ireland—Executive—Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, 721

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 620

Jubilee Services in St. Margaret's Church and Westminster Abbey—see titles Parliament;—Queen, The

KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Right Hon. Sir U. J., Lancashire, Clitheroe

Agricultural Department—Scarlatina—Dr. Klein's Milk Theory, 1720
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1012, 1021

KELLY, Mr. J. Richards, Camberwell, N.
East India Stock Conversion, Consid. add. cl. 627

KENNY, Dr. J. E., Cork, S.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 358; Amendt. 377, 379, 395; cl. 2, 454, 941, 957; cl. 5, 1834

Ireland—Questions

Land Act—Fair Rents—Case of T. R. Whitney, 504

Law and Justice—Brothers Howard, Imprisoned for Contempt of Court, 707;—Imprisonment of Michael Spillane, 707

Lunatic Asylums—Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, 882, 883

Royal Irish Constabulary—Alleged Misconduct of Two Constables, Co. Limerick, 891

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 159, 199, 201, 218
Report, 408

KENNY, Mr. M. J., Tyrone, Mid

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 654
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 326, 355, 375; cl. 2, 489, 598; Amendt. 995, 997, 998; cl. 5, 1817

Ireland—Questions

Board of National Education—Aughnagoran National School, Co. Tyrone—The Workmistress, 51;—Milltown National School, Co. Tyrone, 52

Evictions—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare—Alleged Violence to an Old Woman, 1741

Public Meetings—Interference of the Police at Dungannon, 885, 886

Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, 3R. 498

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 180, 189, 191

KENYON, Hon. G. T., Denbigh, &c.

India—Sanitation, 1738

KER, Mr. B. W., Down, E.

Ireland—Board of National Education—Annadown National School, Co. Down, 51

KILMOREY, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. 15; cl. 20, Amendt. 1688; cl. 21, Amendt. 1689, 1696

KIMBER, Mr. H., Wandsworth

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 796, 802

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Egypt—Anglo-Turkish Convention—The Papers, 1568

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 20, 28; cl. 21, 1693

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. 637

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 2, 839; cl. 3, 845; Report, cl. 2, 1573

KING, Mr. H. S., Hull, Central

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 731

India—Admission of Natives and Europeans to the Public Service, 715, 1582

Special Allowance to Engineer Officers, 1592

Inland Revenue—Income Tax—Charge on the Wives of Civil and Military Officers in India; and others Abroad, 513

KING-HARMAN, Right Hon. Colonel E. R. (Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland), Kent, Isle of Thanet

Ireland—Questions

Asylums—Monaghan District Lunatic Asylum, 54

Dispensaries—Oughterard Board of Guardians, 1586

Emigration from Ireland, 512;—Refusal of the Authorities at New York to allow Emigrants to Land, 1030

Executive and Mr. Patrick Egan, 1030

Intoxicating Liquors Act—Sec. 8—Fine on an Hotel-Keeper for Exhibiting a Political Banner, 459

Lunatic Asylums—Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum—The Resident Medical Officer, 499;—Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, 882, 883

Poor Law—Election of Guardians, Bantry Union, 497;—Joseph Watt, Relieving Officer of the Belfast Union, 56

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1422, 1423

Prisons—Assault on Warder M'Connell in Mountjoy Prison, 57

Public Meetings—Interference of the Police at Dungannon, 886, 887;—Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster, 256, 257, 890

Roads and Bridges—Derry Bridge Commissioners, 54

Sea and Coast Fisheries—Trawling in Donegal Bay, 887, 888

Ireland—Evictions—Questions

Lord Kenmare's Estate, Killarney, 1736, 1737

Monaghan Union—Notice to Guardians, 55, 868

Statistics, 1720

Violent Conduct of an "Emergency Man" at Monkstown, Co. Cork, 496, 877, 1418

Ireland—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare—Questions

1424, 1731, 1732

Alleged Violence to an old Woman, 1741, 1742

Captain E. W. D. Croker, 1735

KING-HARMAN, Right Hon. Colonel E. R.—cont.

Ireland—Irish Land Commission—Questions
Appointment of Sub-Commissioners, 498
Chief Land Commissioners at Longford—
Re-hearing of Appeal, 1584
Fair Rents—Case of T. R. Whitney, 504, 505
Glebe Land Purchasers, 1419
Land Commission Court—John Smith, of Currembra, Co. Sligo, 868

Ireland—Labourers' Act—Questions
Granard Guardians, 864
Guardians of the Carrickmacross Union,
884

Quarter and Land Sessions at Granard, 864
The Return, 55

Ireland—Law and Justice—Questions
Francis Cook, Drumsna, 860
John Ryan, an Evicted Tenant, Imprisonment of, 1723
Joseph Comerford, Case of—Belfast Police
Court, 859

Ireland—National Education, Board of—Questions
Annadown National School, Co. Down, 51
Aughlogan National School, Co. Tyrone—
The Workmistress, 52
Milltown National School, Co. Tyrone, 52
Vacant Seat, 496

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Questions
Alleged Misconduct of Two Constables, Co.
Limerick, 890, 891
Convictions for Assault, 875
Evictions—Alleged Outrage by a Member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, 1501
Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of — Circular of the Inspecter General, 1430, 1431
Police Barracks at Meenacaddy, County
Donegal — Magistracy—Sherecock Petty Sessions, 1730
Promotion of Sergeant Magee (Belfast),
1592

Municipal Regulation (Constabulary, &c.)
(Belfast), Motion for Leave, 1026, 1027

Open Spaces (Dublin), 2R. 232

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 173, 185, 186, 188, 195, 196

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton

Africa (South)—Zululand, 68

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 988, 992; cl. 3, 1234; cl. 4, 1519

Duke of Connaught's Leave, Comm. cl. 1, 788, 789

France—Paris Exhibition, 1889, 59, 1428

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 692

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, 61

Metropolitan Police Force—Return of Constables Dismissed and Reduced, 500, 501

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure (1882)
—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)— Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 525, 526

Parliament—Sittings and Adjournment of the House—Whitsun Holidays, 902

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 799

[cont.]

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H.—cont.

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, Amendt. 139, 141
Post Office Services, Post Office Savings
Banks, &c. 1125, 1126
War Office—Regimental Bandmen at Political Meetings, 501

LAMINGTON, Lord

Colonial Service (Pensions), 2R. 642
Literature, Science, and Art—The National Portrait Gallery, 643

Land Transfer Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Committee; Report; Bill re-committed May 17,
233 (No. 105)

Law Agents (Scotland) Act (1873) Amendment Bill (Mr. J. B. Balfour, Sir

Lyon Playfair, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Haldane,
Mr. Edmund Robertson)

c. Ordered; read 1^o June 7 [Bill 284]

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)
(Questions)

Court of Bankruptcy—Private Examination—
Mr. E. M. Langworthy, Question, Dr.
Cameron; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)
May 19, 511

High Court of Justice—Appeals in the House of Lords, Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) May 24, 1028

Quarter Sessions and Assizes, Question, Mr.
Shirley; Answer, The Attorney General
(Sir Richard Webster) May 16, 50

THE MAGISTRACY

Borough of Hanley, Question, Mr. Woodall; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley)
May 19, 503

Lords Lieutenant of Counties, Question, Mr.
J. Roberts; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)
June 9, 1427

Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire, Questions, Mr. D. Sullivan, Mr. Osborne Morgan;
Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury
(Mr. W. H. Smith) May 18, 66; Question,
Sir Thomas Esmonde; Answer, The Under
Secretary of State for the Home Department
(Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 20, 724; Question, Mr. Samuel Smith; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department
(Mr. Matthews) May 24, 1027; Observations, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. Osborne Morgan May 24, 1045

LAWRENCE, Sir J. J. Trevor, Surrey,
Reigate

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm
cl. 2, 1009

LAWSON, Sir W., Cumberland, Cocker-mouth

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1234, 1362
 Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society—Colonel King-Harman, M.P. 251
 Parliament—Business of the House—Unsatisfactory State of Public Business, 1065
 Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1622

LAWSON, Mr. H. L. W., St. Pancras, W.

Parks (Metropolis)—Constitution Hill, 855
 Inclosures in Regent's Park, 1224
 Parliament—Remuneration of Witnesses attending Parliamentary Committees, 1224
 Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 801
 War Office—First Army Corps—Horses of the Cavalry Regiments, 859

LEA, Mr. T., Londonderry, S.

Ireland—Land Act—Appointment of Sub-Commissioners, 497, 498

LEAHY, Mr. J., Kildare, S.

Ireland—Poor Law—Joseph Watt, Relieving Officer of the Belfast Union, 56

LEFEVRE, Right Hon. G. J. Shaw, Bradford, Central

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 473, 595, 780, 963, 974, 979; cl. 5, Amendt. 1769, 1773
 Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 796
 Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Telegraph Services, 1170, 1176, 1180
 Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1095, 1102, 1109, 1110, 1133, 1140, 1164

LEIGHTON, Mr. S., Shropshire, Oswestry

Education Department—Celebration of the Jubilee of Her Majesty's Reign—Holiday in Elementary Schools, 55
 Parliament—Business of the House, 1216
 Public Business—Oaths Bill, 66

LEITRIM, Earl of Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 17; cl. 27, Amendt. 1701, 1704, 1705

LETHBRIDGE, Sir R., Kensington, N.

Ceylon—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Legislative Council—Proposed Reform of Constitution, 1073
 Dock Accommodation at Colombo, 1420
 Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 794

Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society—Colonel King-Harman, M.P.

Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 17, 251

Lieutenancy Clerks Allowances Bill

(Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Mr. Northcote)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 23 [Bill 274]

Lighthouse Illuminants—The Trinity House Report

Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) June 13, 1726

Lighthouses and Lightships—Telegraphic Communication—Lord Crawford's Committee—Tory Island

Question, Lord Ernest Hamilton; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 20, 710

Literature, Science, and Art—The National Portrait Gallery

Observations, Lord Lamington; Reply, Lord Henniker; short debate thereon May 20, 643

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—President (see RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T.)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballyshannon, &c.) Bill

(Colonel King-Harman)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 23 [Bill 272]

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (Killiney and Ballybrack) Bill

(Colonel King-Harman, Mr. Balfour)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 24 [Bill 275]

Local Government Provisional Orders (Gas) Bill

(Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)

c. Report 2^o; read 3^o June 9 [Bill 259]

Read 3^o June 10

l. Read 1^o (Earl Brownlow) June 13 (No. 119)

Local Government Provisional Orders Bill

(Lord Balfour)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. xlix]

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)

c. Read 2^o May 17 [Bill 261]

Report 2^o June 9

Read 3^o June 10

l. Read 1^o (Earl Brownlow) June 13 (No. 120)

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 18 [Bill 268]

Read 2^o June 7

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4) Bill

(Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 20 [Bill 269]

Read 2^o June 7

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 5) Bill (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 7 [Bill 280]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 6) Bill (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 7 [Bill 281]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 7) Bill (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 7 [Bill 282]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 8) Bill (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 8 [Bill 286]

Local Government Provisional Order (Highways) Bill (Lord Balfour)
l. Read 2^a * May 17 (No. 87)
Committee *; Report May 20
Read 3^a * May 23

Local Government Provisional Orders
(Poor Law) Bill (Lord Balfour)
l. Read 2^a * May 17 (No. 88)
Committee *; Report May 20
Read 3^a * May 23

Local Government Provisional Orders
(Poor Law) (No. 2) Bill
(Lord Balfour)
l. Read 2^a * May 17 (No. 89)
Committee *; Report May 20
Read 3^a * May 23

Local Government Provisional Orders
(Poor Law) (No. 3) Bill
(Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie)
c. Read 2^o * May 17 [Bill 260]
Report * June 9
Read 3^o * June 10
l. Read 1^a * (E. Brownlow) June 13 (No. 118)

LONDON, Bishop of
Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 2, 840; cl. 7,
Amendt. 846; cl. 8, ib.; Report, cl. 9,
Amendt. 1875

London Corporation (Charges of Malversation)
Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First
Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)
May 23, 893

LORD ADVOCATE, The (see MACDONALD, Right Hon. J. H. A.)

LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND—Chief Secretary to the (see BALFOUR, Right
Hon. A. J.)

LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND—Parliamentary Under Secretary to the (see KING-HARMAN, Right Hon.
Colonel E. R.)

Loss of Life at Sea—Report of the Royal Commission
Question, Mr. Grotian; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worme) May 20, 723

LOTHIAN, Marquess of (Secretary for Scotland)
Crofters' Holdings (Scotland), 2R. 238, 213
Lunacy Districts (Scotland), 2R. 634, 635
Scotland—Millhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow)—The Botanic Gardens and
the University, 641

LOWTHER, Hon. W., Westmoreland, Appleby
Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Seats Outside on Public Ground, 1593, 1744

Lunacy Districts (Scotland) Bill [H.L.]
(The Marquess of Lothian)
l. Read 2^a May 20, 634 (No. 82)

MCARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester
Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1849

MCARTHUR, Mr. W. A., Cornwall, St.
Austell
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 3, Amendt. 1252, 1253, 1255

MACARTNEY, Mr. W. G. E., Antrim, S.
Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 632, 633

MCCARTAN, Mr. M., Down, S.
Ireland—Law and Justice—Case of Joseph
Comerford—Belfast Police Court, 858
Post Office—Telegraph Office, Dublin, 64
Ireland—Public Meetings—Questions
Interference of the Police at Dugannon, 886
Nationalist Meetings in Ulster, 889
Proclaimed Meetings—Protestant Home
Rule Association, Kilkeel, 1221, 1222

M'CARTHY, Mr. Justin, Londonderry
Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 674
Ireland—Roads and Bridges—Derry Bridge
Commissioners, 54

MACDONALD, Right Hon. J. H. A. (Lord Advocate), Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities
Scotland—Questions
Crofters' Holdings Act, 1886—Loans for Fishing Harbours, 1584
Deer Forests—Garbat Ben Wyvis, 1433

MACDONALD, Right Hon. J. H. A.—cont.

Education Act, 1878—Certificates of Births, 1722

Fishery Board—The Report, 1743
Law and Justice—Angus MacLauchlan, 1722

Literature, Science, and Art—The Votes, 256

Pollution of Rivers—Discharge of Sewage, &c. into the River Clyde, 1579

Secretary for Scotland, 1071

Tweed Acts, 506

Tweed Fisheries—Alleged Trespasses, 708
University of Glasgow—Professor of Scots Law, 1226

Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment, Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1203; add. cl. ib.

McDONALD, Mr. P., Sligo, N.

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 703

Ireland—Land Commission Court—John Smith, of Currembla, Co. Sligo, 867, 868

Public Works—Government Subvention of £50,000—Arterial Drainage (Barrow Valley, &c. Drainage), 1427

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 210, 211, 213

McDONALD, Dr. R., Ross and Cromarty

Scotland—Questions

Action of the Crofters' Commission, 1044

Deer Forests—Garbat Ben Wyvis, 1433

Post Office—Northern Mails, 1732

United States—Emigration of Highland Crofters, 1434

MACDONALD, Mr. W. A., Queen's Co., Ossory

Ireland, Emigration from, 512, 513

Evictions on Lord Kenmare's Estate, Killyarnney, 1735, 1737

McGAREL-HOGG, Sir J. M. (Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works), Middlessex, Hornsey

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 792

MACKINTOSH, Mr. C. FRASER-, Inverness-shire

Scotland—Education Act, 1878—Certificates of Births, 1722

Law and Justice—Angus MacLauchlan, 1722

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1141

MACNAGHTEN, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 20, 36

MAC NEILL, Mr. J. G. S., Donegal, S.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1249; Amendt. 1288, 1292; cl. 4, Amendt. 1445, 1446, 1533; cl. 5, 1746

Ireland—Post Office—Conveyance of Mails in the North of Ireland, 1739

Madagascar—Capture of Natives by the French and transport to Réunion

Question, Mr. Atkinson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 877

MALLOCK, Mr. R., Devon, Torquay

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 127

Manchester Ship Canal Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Manchester Ship Canal Company to raise a portion of their capital by means of preference shares, and that Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. Jacob Bright, Sir James Fergusson, Sir Henry Roscoe, the Honourable Alan de Tatton Egerton, Mr. Addison, and Mr. Elliott Lees do prepare and bring it in" (Mr. Houldsworth) June 8, 1346; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to Moved, "That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the Bill be now read 1^o" (Mr. Houldsworth); Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 1^o

Moved, "That Standing Orders 62, 201, 223, and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Houldsworth); after short debate, Debate adjourned

Debate resumed June 13, 1706; Amendt. after "Standing Orders," add "204 and 235 be suspended, and that the Bill be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills" (Mr. Selater-Booth); Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn; Amendt. made, by leaving out 204 and 223; Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to

Ordered, That Standing Orders 62 and 235 be suspended; Bill read 2^o

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Leicestershire, E.

Agricultural Department—Scarlatina—Dr. Klein's Milk Theory, 1721

Market Tolls, The Select Committee on—Nomination of the Committee

Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7, 1232

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 839

Marriage Laws—The Rector of Much Woolton, Liverpool

Question, Mr. E. R. Russell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 23, 860

MARUM, Mr. E. P. M., Kilkenny, N.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 783, 786, 787, 909

MASON, Mr. S., Lanark, Mid

Admiralty—Supply of Welsh Coal to Her Majesty's Ships at Queensferry, 725, 726
 Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 903; Amendt. 1205
 Coal Mines—Colliery Accident in Lanarkshire, 1436
 Udston Colliery Accident, 1077
 Finance, &c.—The National Debt, 253
 Inland Revenue—Income Tax on Profits earned by Foreigners, 253
 Parliament—Business of the House—Coal Mines, &c. Regulation, 1437, 1438, 1593

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Birmingham, E.

Coal Mines—Questions
 Colliery Accident at Motherwell, 1352
 Colliery Accident in Lanarkshire, 1436
 Udston Colliery Accident, 1077, 1078, 1440
 Employers' Liability Act—Renewal and Amendment, 1220
 Employers' Liability Act (1880) Amendment, 2R. 1415
 Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—London School Children in Hyde Park, 1429;—Metropolitan Police, 1737
 Magistracy (England and Wales)—Lords Lieutenant of Counties, 1428
 Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire, 1027
 Metropolitan Police—Questions
 New Station on the Thames Embankment, 1582
 Sergeant Murphy, 1229, 1724
 Superintendents' Divisional Reports for 1886, 1590
 Metropolitan Police Courts—Hammersmith and Wandsworth District, 1728

MAXWELL, Sir H. E. (A Lord of the Treasury), Wigton
 "Board of Trade Journal"—Advertisements, 1728

MAYNE, Admiral R. C., Pembroke and Haverfordwest

Admiralty—Sheers at Pembroke Dockyard, 865
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1017

MAYNE, Mr. T., Tipperary, Mid

Ireland—Land Act—Appointment of Sub-Commissioners, 498

Merchant Shipping

Hours of Unloading, Question, Mr. Atkinson; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 19, 519
 Loss of the S.S. "Carmona," Question, Mr. Edwards-Moss; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 23, 870
 Wreck Commissioners' Courts, Hull—Nautical Assessors, Question, Mr. Atkinson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 17, 252

Merchant Shipping—cont.

Loss of Life at Sea—Report of the Royal Commission, Question, Mr. Grotrian; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 20, 723

Metropolis

Metropolitan District—Deaths from Starvation and Privation, Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) May 19, 514
 The Parks—Constitution Hill, Questions, Mr. Lawson; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) May 23, 855
 Enclosures in Regent's Park, Question, Mr. Lawson; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) June 7, 1224
 [See title Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens]

Metropolis (Cable Street, Shadwell) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Secretary Matthews)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 6 [Bill 277]

Metropolis Management (Battersea and Westminster) Bill (Earl Fortescue)

l. Read 1^o * May 18 (No. 101)

Metropolis (Shelton Street, St. Giles) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Secretary Matthews)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 6 [Bill 278]

Metropolitan Police

Duties of the Police Serving in the House of Commons, Questions, Mr. O'Hanlon; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 20, 717; May 23, 880; Question, Mr. Gent-Davis; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 23, 883;—Extra Duty of the "A" Division, Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 23, 868

New Station on the Thames Embankment, Question, Mr. W. L. Bright; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 10, 1582

Police Courts—The Hammersmith and Wandsworth Districts, Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 13, 1728

Return of Constables Dismissed and Reduced, Questions, Mr. Labouchere; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 19, 500
 Sergeant Murphy, Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 7, 1229; Question, Captain Price; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 13, 1724

Superintendents' Divisional Reports for 1886, Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 10, 1589

Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill (Earl Beauchamp)L. Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. xxxi]Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland Bill (by Order)c. 3R. deferred, after short debate May 19, 491
Read 3^o, after short debate May 20, 647MIDDLETON, ViscountAfrica (South)—Affairs of Swaziland, 552
Irish Land Law, Comm. 13MILLTOWN, Earl ofIrish Land Law, Comm. 13; cl. 1, 20;
cl. 5, Amendt. 33, 35; cl. 16, Amendt. 42;
cl. 20, 49; cl. 22, Amendt. 1698
Police Force Enfranchisement, 2R. 4MOLLOY, Mr. B. C., King's Co., BirrArmy Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c., Amendt. 124, 132Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 331; cl. 2, 453, 752, 927; cl. 3, 1263,
1268, 1316, 1396, 1403; cl. 4, 1473, 1477;
Amendt. 1487, 1490; cl. 5, 1752; Amendt.
1807First Offenders, Consid. add. cl. 804Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure
on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland)
Bill), Res. 1637Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c.
1127

Post Office Telegraph Services, 1165, 1170

MONK-BRETTON, LordTithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 3, 845MONTAGU, Mr. S., Tower Hamlets, White-chapel"Board of Trade Journal"—Contract for Advertisements, 879, 1727Currency—French and Italian Copper Coins, 1721

Submarine Telegraph Company, 1727

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 145MONTEAGLE of BRANDON, LordIrish Land Law, Comm. cl. 11, Amendt. 39, 41; cl. 16, Amendt. 42; cl. 20, Amendt. 48MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne, Denbighshire, E.Africa (South)—Annexations in Zululand, 502, 535Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 3, 1368; cl. 4, 1467Ireland—Law and Justice—Barbavilla Prisoners, 1050Law and Justice—Flintshire Magistracy, 67, 1047MORGAN, Mr. O. V., BatterseaCivil Service Writers—Treasury Minute, 711 Metropolitan Police Courts—Hammersmith and Wandsworth District, 1728
Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1850
Post Office—Railway and Telegraph Clerks—
Compensation, 871
Railway and Canal Traffic—Carriage of Town
Refuse, 1726MORLEY, Right Hon. J., Newcastle-upon-TyneAfrica (South)—Annexations in Zululand, 509
Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendt. 673
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 445, 470, 786, 953, 987; cl. 3, 1310,
1361; cl. 5, 1749, 1767, 1771Egypt—Anglo-Turkish Convention—France and the New Hebrides—The Papers, 1231Ireland—Crime and Outrage—Return for April and May, 1439Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1351

Parliament—Business of the House, 523

Sittings and Adjournment of the House—
Whitsuntide Recess, 65Parliament—Business of the House—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill—Notice of Instruction, 1441MOUNT-TEMPLE, Lord

Dog Owners, 2R. 1662

Parliament—Palace of Westminster—Central Hall—Position of the Statue of the late Earl of Idlesleigh, 1577Registration of Dogs in the Metropolis, 2R.
234MOWBRAY, Right Hon. Sir J. R., Oxford University

Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. 1715

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J., Sheffield, BrightsideDeeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm.
cl. 11, 1340

War Office—Contracts, 1733

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland)
Amendment (No. 2) Bill (Sir James Corry, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Johnston)c. Committee—r.f. May 19, 627 [Bill 176]Committee; Report May 20, 805; Moved,
"That the Bill be taken into Consideration, as amended, on Monday, 6th June" (Sir James Corry), 814; Amendt. to leave out
"6th June," add "next" (Mr. Sexton);
Question proposed, "That '6th June, &c.:'" after short debate, Question put, and negatived; Question, "That 'next' be there added," put, and agreed to; Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to Consideration, as amended, deferred May 23,
1026Considered; read 3^o June 9, 1554L. Read 1^o * (E. Erne) June 10 (No. 116)

Municipal Regulation (Constabulary &c.) (Belfast) Bill

c. Motion for Leave (Colonel King - Harman)
May 23, 1926; after short debate, Motion postponed

MURPHY, Mr. W. M., Dublin, St. Patrick's
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 399

Ireland—Law and Justice—Imprisonment of Michael Spillane, 707
The Brothers Howard, Imprisoned for Contempt of Court, 706
Open Spaces (Dublin), 2*R.* 232
Supply, Report, 405

National Debt and Local Loans Bill

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Mr. Jackson)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 18 [Bill 266]
Read 2^o June 6

NAVY (Questions)

Conversion of the Royal Marine Artillery into Marine Infantry, Question, Colonel Hughes-
Hallett; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 17,
254

Departmental Committee on the Clerical Establishments, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Con- nor; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 23,
900

Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Rupert" at Hull, Question, Mr. C. H. Wilson; Answer,
The Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. For- wood) June 10, 1581

Permanent Financial Control, Question, Sir
William Plowden; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)
May 23, 855

Police Fine on a Naval Lieutenant, Question,
Mr. Cunningham Graham; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 16, 59

Special Naval Pension to Widow of Staff
Commander W. M. Savage, Question, Mr.
Norris; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 23, 872

Supply of Welsh Coal to Her Majesty's Ships at Queensferry, Questions, Mr. Mason; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty
(Lord George Hamilton) May 20, 725

The Dockyards

Gratuities to Discharged Workmen, Question,
Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary, S.); Answer,
The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord
George Hamilton) May 20, 713

Sheers at Pembroke Dockyard, Question, Admiral Mayne; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)
May 23, 885

NEWNES, Mr. G., Cambridge, E., New- market

Parish Allotments Committees, 2*R.* 229

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway, N.

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 116,
118

Commissioners of Irish Lights—Lighthouse
Keepers and their Families, 888

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 367; cl. 2, 447, 458, 489, 590, 932;
cl. 3, 1282, 1283; cl. 4, 1507

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, 632

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure
on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland)
Bill), Res. 1641

Places of Worship (Sites), 2*R.* 1848

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c.
1154, 1158

Vaccination—Action of the Compulsory Law of Vaccination, 1054

NORRIS, Mr. E. S., Tower Hamlets, Lime-
house

Admiralty—Special Naval Pension to Widow of Staff Commander W. M. Savage, 872

North American Fisheries—Canada and the United States—The Fishery Disputes—A New Commission

Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 854; Questions,
Mr. Gourley; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 9, 1417

[See titles Canada—United States]

North Borneo—Operations against the Natives at Darvel Bay—H.M.S.
"Zephyr"

Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs
(Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 871; Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamil- ton) May 23, 881

NORTHBROOK, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 21, 1693

Scotland—Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow)—The Botanic Gardens and
the University, 639

NORTHCOTE, Hon. H. S. (Surveyor General of Ordnance), Exeter

Africa (South)—Sir Charles Warren's Bechuanaland Expedition, 1734

Army—Cadets of the Royal Military Academy at Aldershot, 1723

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 75
War Office—Questions

Contracts, 1733

Corporation Road round the Citadel Fort,
Plymouth, 725

Insanitary Condition of Dover Barracks
(Fort Burgoyne), 250, 1729

Regimental Transport at Aldershot—
General Service Waggon, 700

Report of the Ordnance Inquiry Commission, 1735

[cont.]

NORTHCOLE, Hon. H. S.—cont.

Skilled and Ordinary Workmen at Enfield, 63

War Office—Ordnance Department—Questions

Captain Horton, Inspector of Saddlery at Woolwich, 60

Colonel Maitland, Superintendent of Gun Factory, Woolwich, 709

Experimental Wire Guns, 1724

43-Ton Gun, 1432

North Sea Fisheries Convention, 1882—
The East Coast Drift Net Fisheries

Question, Sir Edward Birkbeck : Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 9, 1424

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. F. X., Mayo, S.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1003 ; cl. 4, 1526

O'BRIEN, Mr. P., Monaghan, N.

Ireland—Questions

Asylums—Monaghan District Lunatic Asylum, 53

Evictions—Monaghan Union—Notice to Guardians, 54, 858

Labourers' Acts—Guardians of the Carrickmacross Union, 883, 884

National Education—Carrickawilkin (Co. Armagh) National School, 711

Post Office (London)—Position of Porters, 1725

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Donegal, E.

Civil Service Writers—Sub-Commission of Inquiry, 1588

Coal Mines—Udston Colliery Accident, 1077, 1078, 1430, 1440

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 548, 593, 929 ; Amendt. 953, 954 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 1240, 1242, 1269, 1272, 1273, 1387 ; cl. 4, 1521, 1527, 1528, 1529 ; cl. 5, 1779

Employers' Liability Act (1880) Amendment, 2R. 1414, 1415

Inland Revenue—Pensions in the Secretary's Department, 865

Ireland—Questions

Departmental Committee on the Clerical Establishments, 900

Emigration from Ireland, 513

Eviction—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare—Captain E. W. D. Croker, 1735

Executive—Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, 721

High Court of Justice—Transfer of Clerks, 869, 870

Law and Justice—Imprisonment of Michael Spillane, 708

Post Office Contracts—Mail between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction, 864

Public Works—Government Subvention of £50,000—Drainage of the Barrow, &c. 1071, 1425

Sea and Coast Fisheries—Trawling in Donegal Bay, 887

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Letting of Seats on Public Ground, 1586

O'CONNOR, Mr. A.—cont.

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 729

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1619, 1615

Public Offices—Lower Division Clerks in the Treasury Office, 1538

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1110, 1135, 1137

O'CONNOR, Mr. J., Tipperary, S.

Admiralty—Docks—Gratuities to Discharged Workmen, 713

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 340 ; cl. 2, 928, 961 ; cl. 3, 1250 ; cl. 4, 1444 ; cl. 5, 1760, 1778

Ireland—Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1423

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1666, 1670

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1123

Vaccination Act—Action of the Compulsory Law of Vaccination, 1055

O'CONNOR, Mr. T. P., Liverpool, Scotland

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 310, 311, 313, 377, 378, 379 ; cl. 2, 433, 445, 458, 472, 488, 489, 981, 992, 993, 1008, 1015 ; cl. 3, 1363, 1389 ; cl. 5, 1773, 1774, 1775, 1779

Ireland—Emigration—Refusal of the Authorities at New York to allow Emigrants to Land, 1030

Executive and Mr. Patrick Egan, 1030

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2.), Consid. add. cl. 1556

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1617, 1634

Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1849

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 202, 204

O'DOHERTY, Mr. J. E., Donegal, N.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 365, 390 ; Amendt. 400, 401 ; cl. 2, 431 ; Amendt. 443, 544, 575, 605, 735, 744, 745, 747, 785 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 1235, 1240, 1255, 1265, 1267, 1273, 1279, 1331, 1332, 1372, 1395, 1401, 1402, 1405, 1406 ; cl. 4, 1445, 1517 ; cl. 5, Amendt. 1749, 1768, 1777, 1781

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 699

O'HANLON, Mr. T., Cavan, E.

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Police Barracks at Meenacaddy, Co. Donegal—Magistracy—Shercock Petty Sessions, 1729, 1730, 1731

Metropolitan Police—Duty at the House of Commons, 717, 880

Supply—Report, 410

O'HEA, Mr. P., Donegal, W.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 397 ; cl. 2, 422, 951

O'KELLY, Mr. J., Roocommon, N.

Ireland—Law and Justice—Francis Cook, Drumsna, 860

ONSLow, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Africa (South)—Affairs of Swaziland, 852

Open Spaces (Dublin) Bill

(Mr. William Redmond, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Dwyer Gray, Mr. Timothy Harrington)

c. Read 2^o May 16, 1887 [Bill 80]

Ordnance Department—see Army

ORDNANCE—Surveyor General (see NORTHCOTE, Hon. H. S.)

Over Darwen Corporation Bill (by Order)

c. Considered, after short debate May 19, 1887

Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Provisional Order Bill (Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Jackson)

c. Ordered; read 1^o June 7 [Bill 379]

Paris Exhibition, 1889

Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 16, 59; Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 19, 519; Question, Mr. H. T. Davenport; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 23, 884; Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 9, 1428

Parish Allotments Committees Bill

(Mr. Cobb, Mr. Channing, Mr. Fuller, Mr. James Ellis, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Thomas Ellis)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 16, 227; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke); after short debate, Question put; A. 143, N. 85; M. 58 (D. L. 144) [Bill 170]

Parliament

LORDS—

Business of the House

Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered To-morrow in order to its being dispensed with for the remainder of that day's Sitting May 20

Standing Order considered, and dispensed with May 21

VOL. CCCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

PARLIAMENT—LORDS—cont.

Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92. and 93. be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess May 23

Sittings and Adjournment of the House—The Whitsuntide Recess, Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, The Prime Minister (The Marquess of Salisbury) May 20, 646

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of arranging the distribution of tickets of admission to be given to Peers on the occasion of the Jubilee Thanksgiving Service to be held in Westminster Abbey on 21st June" (The Lord Chamberlain) May 16, 50; Motion agreed to Select Committee nominated May 17; List of the Committee, 246

[See title Queen, The]

COMMONS—

Jubilee Service in St. Margaret's Church

Moved, "That, in Celebration of the Fiftieth Year of Her Majesty's Reign, this House will attend at the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, on Sunday next, the 22nd of May" (Mr. William Henry Smith) May 17, 258; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

This being the day on which the House had Resolved, in Celebration of the Fiftieth Year of Her Majesty's Reign, to attend Divine Service at the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, Mr. Speaker and the Members assembled in the House, and proceeded thence to the Church, when a Sermon was preached before the House by the Lord Bishop of Ripon May 22

Moved, "That the Thanks of this House be given to the Right Reverend William Boyd Carpenter, D.D., Lord Bishop of Ripon, for the Sermon preached by him on Sunday before this House, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and that he be desired to print the same; and that Mr. William Henry Smith and Mr. Secretary Matthews do acquaint him therewith" (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 907; Motion agreed to

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to consider what means shall be adopted for the attendance of this House at the Jubilee Thanksgiving Service in Westminster Abbey on the 21st day of June; and that Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Childers, Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Viscount Lewisham, Mr. Mar-

PARLIAMENT — COMMONS — Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—cont.

forbanks, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Sir Frederick Mappin, and Mr. Craig Sellar be Members of the said Committee; Five to be the quorum" (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 1908; after short debate, Motion agreed to [See title Queen, The]

Private Bills

Ordered, That Standing Orders 39 and 129 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to Monday 6th June (The Chairman of Ways and Means) May 24

Public Petitions—Petition from Bradford—Alleged Fictitious Signatures, Question, Mr. Byron Reed; Answer, The Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions (Sir Charles Forster) May 20, 723

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

The Whitsuntide Recess, Questions, Mr. Eslemon, Mr. John Morley; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 16, 64; Questions, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 902

Committees (Ascension Day)

Ordered, That Committees shall not sit Tomorrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House (Mr. William Henry Smith) May 18

Adjournment of the House

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Jackson) May 17, 413; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 1027; Question put, and agreed to

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 10, 1677; Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put; A. 203, N. 71; M. 132 (D. L. 223) [2.40 A.M.]

Question put, "That this House do now adjourn;" A. 203, N. 71; M. 132 (D. L. 224) [2.55 A.M.]

The Whitsun Recess, Moved, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday the 6th day of June next" (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 24, 1031; Question put, and agreed to

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE AND PUBLIC BUSINESS

Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 19, 522;—The Oaths Bill, Questions, Mr. Stanley Leighton, Mr. Brad-laugh; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 16, 66;—Legislation of the Session, Questions, Mr. E. Robertson; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 20, 726; Questions, Mr. E. Robertson, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Burt; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7, 1230;—Unsatisfactory State of Public Business, Observations, Mr. E. Robertson; short debate thereon May 24, 1061; Notice of Motion, Mr. Stanley Leighton June 7, 1216;—Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Bill, Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 9, 1437; Questions, Mr. Mason, Mr. F. S. Powell, Mr. Burt; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 10, 1593;—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, Notice of Instruction, Mr. W. H. Smith; short debate thereon June 9, 1440

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—Business of the House and Public Business—cont.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER

The Central Hall—Position of the Statue of the late Earl of Idlesleigh, Question, Observations, Lord Mount-Temple; Reply, Lord Henniker June 10, 1577

Remuneration of Witnesses attending Parliamentary Committees, Question, Mr. Lawson; Answer, The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas) June 7, 1224
The British Parliament and the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 593

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill)

Moved, "That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the Whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as hereinafter provided. After the Clauses are disposed of he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House

"From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion, That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith

"If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee" (Mr. William Henry Smith) June 10, 1694
Amendt. to leave out from first word "That," add "inasmuch as the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill is designed to deprive the Irish people permanently of their Constitutional rights, this House declines to sanction the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, to deprive the Chair, during the discussions in Committee on the said Bill, of the power which, since the opening of these discussions, the Chair has felt called upon repeatedly to exercise, in opposition to Her Majesty's Government, for the protection of freedom of debate in this House, and the maintenance of the rights of minorities" (Mr. Parnell); after short debate, Question proposed, "That 'at Ten o'clock p.m.' &c.;" after further debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put; A. 284, N. 167; M. 117 (D. L. 214)

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill)—cont.

Question put, "That 'at Ten o'clock p.m.' &c.;" A. 301, N. 181; M. 120 (D. L. 216)

Amendt. to leave out "17th," insert "24th" (Mr. Chance); Question proposed, "That '17th,' &c.;" after short debate, Question put; A. 268, N. 113; M. 155 (D. L. 216)

Amendt. in line 3, leave out "shall," insert "may, if he thinks fit, having regard to the Rule of Closure of the 18th March, 1887" (Mr. William Redmond); Question proposed, "That 'shall,' &c.;" after short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put; A. 258, N. 91; M. 167 (D. L. 217) [1.10 A.M.]

Question put, "That 'shall,' &c.;" A. 255, N. 94; M. 161 (D. L. 218) [1.25 A.M.]

Moved, "That the Main Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put; A. 250, N. 91; M. 159 (D. L. 219) [1.40 A.M.]

Main Question put; A. 245, N. 93; M. 152 [1.55 A.M.]

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1671

Ordered, That, at Ten o'clock p.m. on Friday the 17th day of June, if the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill be not previously reported from the Committee of the Whole House, the Chairman shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed and successively put forthwith the Questions, That any Clause then under consideration, and each remaining Clause in the Bill, stand part of the Bill, unless Progress be moved as hereinafter provided. After the Clauses are disposed of he shall forthwith report the Bill, as amended, to the House

From and after the passing of this Order, no Motion That the Chairman do leave the Chair, or do report Progress, shall be allowed unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith

If Progress be reported on the 17th June, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee

Parliament—The New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Matter, Annexations in Zululand

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Labouchere) May 10, 1882; after short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put; A. 278, N. 156; M. 122

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 536

Question put, "That this House do now adjourn;" A. 142, N. 280; M. 138 (D. L. 158)

Parliament—The New Rules of Procedure (1887)

Rule 1 (Closure of Debate), Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, Mr. Speaker, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 1906

Rule 2 (Sittings of the House), Question, Mr. Provand; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 1897

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF LORDS

Sat First

May 20—The Lord Meredyth, after the death of his father

May 23—The Lord Kinnaird, after the death of his father

June 10—The Lord Hindlip, after the death of his father

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Member Sworn

May 23 — William Alexander MoArthur, esquire, County of Cornwall, Mid or St. Austell Division

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Cork

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1239

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1598; Amendt. 1608, 1616, 1617, 1618

PAULTON, Mr. J. M., Durham, Bishop Auckland

United States—Emigrants to Tennessee, 502

PEASE, Sir J. W., Durham, Barnard Castle

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 201

PEEL, Right Hon. A. W. (see SPEAKER, The)

PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green, S.W.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1368

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 701

Metropolitan Police—Superintendents' Divisional Reports for 1886, 1889

PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H.—cont.

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens—Kew Gardens—Partial Closing on Whit Monday, 1229

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. Amendt. 1155

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1833; cl. 5, 1747

Vaccination Act—Action of the Compulsory Law of Vaccination, 1051, 1052

Convictions by the Leicester County Bench, 724;—Assault on the Police, 891

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders Bill

(Baron Henry De Worms,

Mr. Jackson)

c. Read 3^o * May 16 [Bill 222]

l. Read 1^o * (J. Stanley of Preston) May 17

Read 2^o * June 10 (No. 103)

Committee *; Report June 13

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill

(Baron Henry De

Worms, Mr. Jackson)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 6 [Bill 276]

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill

(Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Borlase, Mr. Burt, Mr. M^r Arthur, Mr. Henry Wilson) [Bill 5]

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" June 13, 1847; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. J. G. Tulbot); after short debate, Question put; A. 160, N. 130; M. 30 [2.30 A.M.]

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1851

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Sir Lyon, Leeds, S.

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1642

PLOWDEN, Sir W. C., Wolverhampton, W.

Admiralty—Permanent Financial Control, 855
Army (India)—Indian Artillery—The 9-Pounder Muzzle-Loading Gun, 856

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R. (First Commissioner of Works), Dublin University

Disturnpiked Roads—Annual Receipts and Contributions, 507, 508

Greenwich Park, 1419, 1420

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Letting of Seats on Public Ground, 1885, 1586, 1593, 1744

Metropolis—Royal Parks—Constitution Hill, 855

Enclosures in Regent's Park, 1224

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis) 2R. 790, 793

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R.—cont.

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens—Kew Gardens—Partial Closure on Whit Monday, 1229

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 140, 143, 152

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885 Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Bishop of Bangor)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 20, 636 (No. 96)

Amendt. to leave out ("now,") add ("this day six months") (The Earl of Powis); after short debate, on Question, That ("now,") &c.; resolved in the negative; Bill read 2^o Committee * May 23

Police Force Enfranchisement Bill

(The Earl of Harrowby)

l. Read 2^o, after short debate May 16, 3 (No. 77) Committee *; Report May 17

Read 3^o * May 20

Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. 9]

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)

(Questions)

Metropolis—Strand Board of Guardians—Case of Elisabeth Smith, Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) May 23, 856

Parochial Relief, 1886—Statistics, Question, Mr. Hoyle; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) June 13, 1719

Salaries of Poor Law Officers, Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) May 16, 63

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)

(Questions)

An Insurance Department, Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1733

Auxiliary Letter Carriers—Case of Henry Goodchild, Question, Mr. Isaacs; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 19, 505

London—Position of Porters, Question, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1725

Post Office and Telegraph Services—No Revenue, Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 249

Private and Official Post-Cards, Question, Mr. Rankin; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 16, 58

TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT

Railway and Telegraph Clerks—Compensation, Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) May 23, 871

The Submarine Telegraph Company, Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1727

Post Office—East India and China Mail Contract

Questions, Mr. Provand, Dr. Clark; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7, 1232

Moved, "That the Contract dated the 18th day of March 1887, for the conveyance of the East India and China Mails, be approved" (Mr. Jackson) June 7, 1334; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Dr. Clark); Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Wigan

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 1521

First Offenders, Comm. add. cl. 805

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 5, 810; add. cl. 813

Over Darwen Corporation, Consid. 494

Parliament—Public Business—Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Bill, 1594

POWER, Mr. P. J., Waterford, E.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 393; cl. 3, 1383, 1334; cl. 4, 1506; cl. 5, 1783

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 156

POWER, Mr. R., Waterford

War Office—Report of the Ordnance Inquiry Commission, 1735

POWIS, Earl of

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. Amendt. 636

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport

Army and Navy Estimates Committee—The Composition, 1742

Metropolitan Police—Sergeant Murphy, 1724

PRIME MINISTER (see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

Prisons (England and Wales)—Contract for Mat-Making

Observations, Mr. Quilter May 24, 1036

PROVAND, Mr. A. D., Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.

Parliament—New Rules of Procedure—Rule 2 (Sittings of the House), 897

Post Office—East India and China Mail Contract, 1232, 1233

Public Offices, The

Lower Division Clerks in the Treasury Office, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) June 10, 1588

Royal Commission on War and Admiralty Offices—The Evidence, Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, Sir Matthew White Ridley May 17, 250

Public Parks and Works (Metropolis) Bill (Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Jackson)

c. Read 2^d, and committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection May 20, 790 [Bill 136]

Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874—The Rev. J. Bell Cox

Questions, Mr. Hoare, Mr. Channing; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 892

PULESTON, Mr. J. H., Devonport

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—Seats Outside on Public Ground, 1592

Quarries Bill

(The Lord Sudeley)

l. Read 2^d, after short debate May 16, 1 (No. 83)

QUEEN, THE — Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign

Questions, Lord Claud Hamilton, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Dodds, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Sir Henry Tylor, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Rathbone, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), Mr. Speaker May 20, 727

H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, Questions, Sir John Swinburne, Mr. Labouchere; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 16, 61

Fireworks in the London Parks, Question, Mr. James Stuart; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 17, 255

The Royal Titles, Questions, Mr. Howard Vincent, Mr. Baden-Powell; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 19, 521

The Naval Review, Question, Sir William Crossman; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) May 23, 899

Royal Irish Constabulary — Circular of the Inspector General, Questions, Mr. Conynbare; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) June 7, 1216; Questions, Mr. Conynbare, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King - Harman) June 9, 1429

London School Children in Hyde Park, Question, Sir Richard Temple; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 9, 1420

Post Office—The Officials, Question, Mr. Atkinson; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 9, 1434

Increase of Pension to Old Soldiers, Question, Mr. H. S. Wright; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) June 10, 1537

The Metropolitan Police, Questions, Mr. Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Broadhurst; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) June 13, 1737

[cont.]

QUEEN, THE—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—cont.

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)

Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 6, 1075

Accident to a Workman, Question, Mr. Conyngham; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7, 1231

Accommodation for Servants of this House, Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 7, 1232

Accommodation for Members of this House, Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 9, 1436

The Seats on Public Ground, Questions, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) June 10, 1585; Question, Mr. Paleston; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket); Questions, Mr. W. Lowther, Mr. T. M. Healy [No reply] June 10, 1592

Tickets of Admission to the Platform outside Parliament Square, Questions, Mr. W. Lowther, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 13, 1744

The British-Indian Volunteers, Question, Sir Richard Temple; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) June 10, 1592

The Royal Procession—Post Offices along the Route, Question, Mr. Hunter; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1740

[See under Parliament—Lords—Commons]

QUILTER, Mr. W. C., Suffolk, S.

Excise—Adulteration of Beer, 1221
Prisons (England and Wales)—Contracts for Mat Making, 1036

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C. (Postmaster General), Cambridge University

Post Office—Questions

An Insurance Department, 1734

Auxiliary Letter Carriers—Case of Henry Goodchild, 505

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey) Royal Procession—Post Offices along the Route, 1740

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—The Officials, 1434

London—Position of Porters, 1725

Private and Official Post-Cards, 53

Railway and Telegraph Clerks—Compensation, 871

Post Office (Ireland)—Questions

Carriage of Mails to Kilmallock, 889

Conveyance of Mails in the North of Ireland, 1739

Dublin—Female Telegraph Staff, 253

Miscarriage of Summonses, 62

Post Office Contracts—Mail between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction, 865

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C.—cont.

Telegraph Line to Charlestown, 1223

Telegraph Office, Dublin, 64

Post Office (Sootland)—The Northern Mails, 1732

Submarine Telegraph Company, 1727

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Packet Service, 1161

Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1089, 1090, 1091, 1093, 1094, 1096, 1128, 1129, 1133, 1135, 1137, 1158, 1159, 1160, 1161

Post Office Telegraph Services, 1166, 1175, 1176

Railway and Canal Traffic Bill

Question, Mr. Heneage; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 16, 68

Carriage of Town Refuse, Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) June 13, 1726

Railway and Canal Traffic Bill [H.L.]

(Baron Henry De Worms)

c. Read 1st May 16

[Bill 265]

Railways—Inspectors' Reports upon Accidents

Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) May 19, 506

RANKIN, Mr. J., Herefordshire, Leominster

Corn Sales, 2R. 1204

Post Office—Private and Official Post-Cards, 58

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 694

War Office (Ordnance Department)—Colonel Maitland, Superintendent of Gun Factory, Woolwich, 709
43-ton Gun, 1432

RATHBONE, Mr. W., Carnarvonshire, Arfon

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 730

REDMOND, Mr. W. H. K., Fermanagh, N.

Africa (South)—Zululand, 67, 508, 509

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. d. 2, 455, 596, 604, 1017; cl. 4, 1619, 1621; cl. 5, 1755

Egypt—Negotiations—Evacuation by the British, 62;—Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's Mission, 509, 510

Ireland—Evictions—Evictions at Bodyke, Co. Clare, 1732

Parliament—Business of the House (Procedure on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Res. 1640; Amendt. 1663

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 204

REED, Mr. H. B., Bradford, E.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 1017
Places of Public Worship (Sites), 2R. 1851
Public Petitions—Petition from Bradford—
Alleged Fictitious Signatures, 723

Registration of Dogs in the Metropolis
Bill [U.L.] (The Lord Mount-Temple)
I. Read 2^a, after short debate May 17, 234
(No. 73)

REID, Mr. R. T., Dumfries, &c.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 419, 568; Amendt. 594, 766

RIDLEY, Sir M. W., *Lancashire, N., Blackpool
Royal Commission on War and Admiralty
Offices—The Evidence, 250

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T. (President of the Local Government Board),
*Tower Hamlets, St. George's
Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 675
Grouse Disease, 719
Metropolitan District—Deaths from Starvation and Privation, 515
Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 229
Poor Law (England and Wales)—Salaries of Poor Law Officers, 63
Metropolis—Strand Board of Guardians—
Case of Elizabeth Smith, 857
Poor Law—Parochial Relief, 1886—Statistics,
1719
Rivers Pollution Act—River Wear, 510
Vaccination Act—Action of the Compulsory
Law of Vaccination, 1052

Rivers Pollution Act—The River Wear
Question, Mr. W. Crawford; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board
(Mr. Ritchie) May 19, 510

ROBERTS, Mr. J., Flint, &c.
Magistracy (England and Wales) — Lords
Lieutenant of Counties, 1427

ROBERTSON, Dr. W. Tindal, Brighton
War Office—Army Medical Department—
Surgeon Major Sandford Moore, 1432
Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Extra Queen's Cadetships, 1433

ROBERTSON, Mr. E., Dundee
Church of England—Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, 65
Grouse Disease, 719
Paris Exhibition, 1889, 519
Parliament—Business of the House (Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill), Notice of
Instruction, 1441
Parliament—Public Business, 726, 727;—
Legislation of the Session, 1230;—Unsatisfactory State of, 1081
Royal Grants—Select Committee, 1503

ROBERTSON, Mr. J. P. B. (Solicitor General for Scotland), *Bute
Scotland—Questions
Action of the Crofter Commission, 1039,
1040, 1041
Church of Scotland—Church Building in Pitsligo, Aberdeenshire, 901
Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886—
Eviction of Alexander Taylor, Co. Elgin, 878
Fisheries—Fishermen's Cottages on the East Coast, 880
Truck Acts—Violation of their Provisions, 57
Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment,
2R. 227

ROLLIT, Sir A. K., Islington, S.
Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm.
*cl. 2, 815; cl. 8, 816, 817; cl. 11, 1341;
cl. 15, Amendt. 1342*

ROSEBERRY, Earl of
Asia (Central)—Affairs of Afghanistan, 1678
Egypt—Rumoured Anglo-Turkish Convention, 820

ROSSE, Earl of
Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 27, 1703

ROWLANDS, Mr. J., Finsbury, E.
Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 795
Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office
Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c.
1159, 1160

Royal Grants—The Select Committee
Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The
First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H.
Smith) June 10, 1593

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens
Greenwich Park, Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh;
Answers, The First Commissioner of Works
(Mr. Plunket) June 9, 1419
Kew Gardens—Partial Closure on Whit Monday, Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer,
The First Commissioner of Works (Mr.
Plunket) June 7, 1229
[See title Metropolis]

RUSSELL, Sir C., Hackney, S.
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
*cl. 2, 549; Amendt. 553; cl. 3, 1243, 1293;
cl. 4, 1445; Amendt. 1447*

RUSSELL, Mr. E. R., Glasgow, Bridgeton
Marriage Laws—The Rector of Much Woolton,
Liverpool, 800

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W., Tyrone, S.
Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 665
Ireland—National Board of Education—The
Vacant Seat, 496
Public Works—Government Subvention of £50,000, 899
Lighthouse Illuminants—Trinity House Report, 1720, 1727
Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 5, 809, 810

St. ASAPH, Bishop of

Pluralities Act Amendment Act (1885) Amendment, 2R. 636

SALISBURY, Marquess of (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Asia (Central)—Afghanistan—Anglo-Russian Delimitation Commission, 634

Egypt—Questions

Anglo-Turkish Convention, 820 ;—The Papers, 1565, 1568

Duration of the English Occupation—Mission of Sir H. Drummond Wolff, 633

Rumoured Anglo-Turkish Convention, 120

Irish Land Law, Comm. 11 ; cl. 1, 20, 24, 27, 28, 30 ; cl. 17, 46, 47 ; cl. 20, 49, 245, 1681 ; cl. 21, 1691

Parliament—Sittings and Adjournment of the House—Whitsuntide Recess, 646

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. 836 ; cl. 1, Amendt. 839 ; cl. 2, Amendt. 839, 841 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 841, 842 ; Amendt. ib. 843, 844, 845 ; cl. 7, 846 ; cl. 10, Amendt. 849 ; cl. 11, Amendt. 850 ; Report, cl. 2, 1573 ; cl. 4, Amendt. 1574 ; cl. 6, Amendt. 1575 ; add. cl. 1576

Saving Life at Sea

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on Saving Life at Sea that they have power to inquire and report as to the fittings and appliances on board British Merchant Ships, with a view to the safety of life (Baron Henry De Worms) May 16

SOLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G., Hants, Basingstoke

Manchester Ship Canal, 2R. Amendt. 1706, 1708, 1714, 1716

SCOTLAND—Secretary for, &c. (see LOTHIAN, Marquess of)SCOTLAND (Questions)

Agricultural Labourers, Observations, Dr. Clark, Mr. Anderson May 24, 1031

Church of Scotland—Church Building in Pitligo, Aberdeenshire, Questions, Mr. Esslemont ; Answers, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) May 23, 901

Free Church of Scotland—Mission Station at Constantinople, Question, Mr. Buchanan ; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 19, 512

Crofter Commission, Action of the, Observations, Mr. Wallace ; Reply, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) ; short debate thereon May 24, 1037

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886—Eviction of Alexander Taylor, Co. Elgin, Question, Mr. Anderson ; Answer, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) May 23, 878

Loans for Fishing Harbours, Question, Dr. Clark ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 10, 1584

SCOTLAND—cont.

Deer Forests—Garbat Ben Wyvis, Question, Dr. R. Macdonald ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 9, 1433

Education (Scotland) Act, 1878—Certificates of Births, Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 13, 1722

Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow) Bill—The Botanic Gardens and the University, Observations, Question, The Earl of Stair ; Reply, The Secretary for Scotland (The Marquess of Lothian) ; short debate thereon May 20, 637

Literature, Science, and Art—The Votes—Question, Mr. Buchanan ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) May 17, 255

Pollution of Rivers—Discharge of Sewage, &c. into the River Clyde, Question, Mr. Bradlaugh ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 10, 1579

Secretary for Scotland—Legislation, Question, Mr. Munro-Ferguson ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 6, 1070

The Tweed Acts, Questions, Sir Edward Grey, Sir William Crossman ; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) May 19, 506

University of Glasgow—Appointment to the Professorship of Scots Law, Question, Mr. Caldwell ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 7, 1226

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)

Crofters and Cottars Fishing Boats—Loans, Question, Dr. Clark ; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 897

The Report, Question, Mr. Anderson ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 13, 1742

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)

Fishermen's Cottages on the East Coast, Question, Mr. Esslemont ; Answer, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) May 23, 880

Tweed Fisheries—Alleged Trespasses, Question, Mr. A. L. Brown ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) May 20, 708

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)

Angus MacLauchlan, Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh ; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) June 13, 1732

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)

The Northern Mails, Question, Dr. R. Macdonald ; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) June 13, 1732

SELBORNE, Earl of

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 17, 21

Police Force Enfranchisement, 2R. 3, 5

Tithe Rent-Charge, Comm. cl. 2, 840 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 841, 843, 844 ; cl. 7, Amendt. 846 ; add. cl. 849

SEXTON, Mr. T., Belfast, W.

Belfast Main Drainage, Lords Amendts. 651, 653, 655, 656, 664, 665, 670

Ireland—Public Meetings—Proclaimed Meetings in Ulster, 718

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Comm. cl. 1, Motion for reporting Progress 627, 805; cl. 2, Amendt. 806; cl. 3, Amendt. 807, 808; cl. 5, ib.; add. cl. 811; Amendt. 814; Consid. 1026; add. cl. 1554, 1556, 1559; 3R. ib.

Municipal Regulation (Constabulary, &c.) (Belfast), Motion for Leave, 1026

SHIRLEY, Mr. W. S., Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster

Law and Justice (England and Wales)—Quarter Sessions and Assizes, 50

SIMON, Sir J., Dewsbury

Asia (Central)—Trade Communications with Thibet—Convention with China, 1725

SINCLAIR, Mr. W. P., Falkirk, &c.

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1347; 2R. 1715, 1716, 1719

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Telegraph Services, 1183

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H. (First Lord of the Treasury), Strand, Westminster

Africa (South)—Zululand, 68

Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 903, 1205, 1212, 1213, 1214, 1742

British Parliament and the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, 894

Burmah (Upper)—Ruby Mines, 1074

Coal Mines, &c. Regulation, Comm. 226

Church of England—Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, 65

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 377, 387; cl. 2, 421, 458, 485, 610, 611; Motion for reporting Progress, ib., 786, 787; 907, 918, 919, 922, 981, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991; Amendt. 992, 995, 1008, 1009, 1011, 1012, 1014, 1017, 1019, 1024; cl. 3, 1310, 1313; cl. 4, 1522, 1526, 1527, 1528, 1539, 1551, 1552, 1553, 1675, 1677; cl. 5, 1748

Customs and Inland Revenue, 68

Dominion of Canada—Canadian Pacific Railway, 730

Increased Import Duties on Iron, 522, 1743
Duke of Connaught's Leave, Comm. cl. 1, 789; 3R. ib.

Egypt—Anglo-Turkish Convention—France and the New Hebrides—The Papers, 1232

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 700

Ireland—Public Meetings—Suppression of Public Meetings in Ulster, 267

Purchase of Land Act (1885)—Returns, 894
Jubilee Service in St. Margaret's Church, Res. 258, 906

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey), 906, 1076

Accident to a Workman, 1231

Accommodation for Members of this House, 1436

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.—cont.

Accommodation for Servants of this House, 1232

Tickets of Admission to the Platform outside Parliament Square, 1745

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 727, 728, 730;—The Royal Titles, 521

London Corporation (Charges of Malversation), 893

Magistracy (England and Wales)—Flintshire Magistrates, 67

Market Tolls, Nomination of Select Committee, 1232

Parish Allotments Committees, 2R. 228

Parliament—Questions

Business of the House, 522, 726, 727, 1437, 1438, 1594

New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 536

New Rules of Procedure (1886)—Rule 1 (Closure of Debate), 906

Public Business—Legislation of the Session, 1230, 1231;—Oaths Bill, 66;—Unsatisfactory State of, 1070

Sittings and Adjournment of the House, 897, 1027, 1031, 1678;—Whitsuntide Recess, 64, 65, 902, 903

Parliament—Business of the House—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, Notice of Instruction, 1440, 1441, 1442; Res. 1594 1599, 1606, 1619, 1620, 1651, 1656, 1662 1665, 1670, 1671

Post Office—East India and China Mail Contract, 1233

Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874—The Rev. J. Bell Cox, 892

Royal Grants—Select Committee, 1593

Scotland—Fishery Board—Crofters' and Cottars' Fishing Boats—Loans, 898

Supply—Civil Service and Revenue Departments, 178, 179, 180, 221

Report, 404, 405, 410, 613, 623

Theatres—Protection of Life from Fire—Burning of the Opéra Comique, Paris, 1076

Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment, Comm. 1025

Wales—Anti-Tithe League, 895

Intermediate Education—Government Assistance, 896

War Office (Ordnance Department)—Issue of Defective Weapons—The Responsible Officials, 896

SMITH, Mr. S., Flintshire

India (Bengal)—Manufacture of Spirits, 715

Ireland—Law and Justice—Barbavilla Prisoners, 1050

Magistracy (England and Wales)—Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire, 1027, 1045

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill

(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell)

1. Order for Committee discharged, after short debate June 9, 1416 (No. 43)

[cont.]

SOLICITOR GENERAL (see CLARKE, Sir E. G.)

SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (see GIBSON, Mr. J. G.)

SOLICITOR GENERAL for SCOTLAND (see ROBERTSON, Mr. J. P. B.)

Southern Pacific, Islands of the—The New Hebrides—The Island of Tanna Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) May 17, 247

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington

Agricultural Labourers (Scotland), 1035
Army and Navy Estimates, Nomination of Select Committee, 1210, 1214
Belfast Main Drainage, Lords' Amendts. 652
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 490, 1877
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) [Expenses], Comm. 1841

East India Stock Conversion, Consid. 627; 3R. 789

Egypt—Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's Mission—Reported Evacuation, 510

Employers' Liability Act (1880) Amendment, 2R. 1415

First Offenders, Consid. 1334, 1335

Great Eastern Railway, Consid. 692

Ireland—Questions

Emigration, 513

High Court of Justice—Court of Appeal—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 1058

Poor Relief Inquiry Commission, 1887—Compound Rating of Occupiers, 1422, 1423

Public Meetings—Proclamation of the Dungannon Meeting, 523, 524

Royal Irish Constabulary—Celebration of the Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign—Circular of the Inspector General, 1431, 1432;—Police Barrack at Meenacaddy, Co. Donegal—Magistracy—Shercock Petty Sessions, 1730

Jubilee Service in St. Margaret's Church, Res. 259

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 728, 729, 730

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave, 1846, 1850; 2R. 1708

Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, 3R. 492, 650

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment (No. 2), Consid. add. cl. 1556, 1559

Over Darwon Corporation, Consid. 493

Parliament—Questions

Adjournment, 414, 1027

New Rules of Procedure (1882)—Rule 2 (Adjournment of the House)—Annexations in Zululand, Motion for Adjournment, 525, 536

New Rules of Procedure (1886)—Rule 1 (Closure of Debate), 905

SPEAKER, The—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House—Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, Notice of Instruction, 1442; Res. 1599, 1616, 1617, 1618, 1619, 1639, 1662, 1663, 1670
Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1849
Public Parks and Works (Metropolis), 2R. 802
Scotland—Tweed Fisheries—Alleged Trespasses, 709
Supply—Report, 404, 406, 407, 612, 617, 618
Vaccination Act—Action of the Compulsory Law of Vaccination, 1052
Wales—Anti-Tithe League, 895

SPENCER, Earl

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 29; cl. 3, Amendt. 32; cl. 11, 40; cl. 17, 44, 47; cl. 20, 1680

STAIR, Earl of

Scotland—Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow)—The Botanic Gardens and the University, 637

STANHOPE, Right Hon. E. (Secretary of State for War), Lincolnshire, Horncastle

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Questions

Irish Militia, 905

Volunteers—Assistant Instructors in Signalling, 1587;—New Regulations as to Shooting, 879;—Retired Sergeants of Volunteers, 61

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 82, 84, 99, 100, 105, 118, 122, 123, 131

Egypt—Soudan Campaign, 1895—The Khedive's Bronze Star, 1427

Imperial Defences—King George's Sound—The Colonial Conference, 1435

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Fireworks in the London Parks, 255

Increase of Pension to Old Soldiers, 1598

War Office—Questions

Army Contracts—Contract for Sword Bayonets, 1223

Army Medical Department—Army Medical Officers, 500;—Sergeant Major Sandford Moore, 1433

Chesil Beach (Portland)—Removal of Wrecks, 1225

First Army Corps—Horses of the Cavalry Regiments, 859

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Extra Queen's Cadetships, 1433

Regimental Bandmen at Political Meetings, 501

Review at Aldershot—Allowance to the Yeomany Cavalry, 256

Royal Engineers—Transference of Lieutenant Gordon, of the Royal Marine Artillery, 1072, 1429

War Office (Ordnance Department)—Questions

Defective Weapons—The Tests, 516, 517;—Correction of Answer, 1075;—Sword Bayonets of the City of London Artillery Volunteers, 1227

Ordnance Committee—Appointment and Constitution, 723

Report of the Commission, 524

STANHOPE, Hon. P. J., Wednesbury
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 1018

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord
India—Land Acquisition Act—Expropriation
of Zemindars at Arni Ghat, Mussoorie, 5, 12
Quarries, 2R. 2

STOREY, Mr. S., Sunderland
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, Amendt. 371, 376
Ireland—Public Meetings—Proclamation of the Dungannon Meeting, 523, 524

STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord
Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis),
Comm. 1416

STUART, Mr. J., Shoreditch, Hoxton
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 967, 968
Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Fireworks in the London Parks, 255

SUDELEY, Lord
Quarries, 2R. 1

SULLIVAN, Right Hon. T. D. (Lord Mayor of Dublin), *Dublin, College
Green
Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 5, 1782
Supply, Report, 622

SULLIVAN, Mr. D., Westmeath, S.
Magistracy (England and Wales)—Flintshire
Magistrates, 66

Superannuation and Retired Allowances—
Pension to a Custom House Officer—Fraudulent Drawing
Questions, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Caleb Wright;
Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury
(Mr. Jackson); Question, Mr. Bradlaugh
[No reply] May 19, 517

Supply—Army and Navy Estimates—
The Committee

Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The First
Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)
May 23, 903

Moved, "That the Select Committee do consist of Nineteen Members" (Mr. W. H.
Smith) June 6, 1204

Amendt. to leave out "Nineteen," insert
"Twenty-five" (Mr. Mason); Question proposed,
"That 'Nineteen,' &c.;" after short debate, Question put; A. 120, N. 31; M. 89
(D. L. 187)

Main Question put, and agreed to; Members nominated

Question proposed, "That Mr. Jennings be a Member of the Committee;" after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; other Members nominated

Supply—Army and Navy Estimates—The Committee—cont.

Question proposed, "That Mr. Picton be a Member of the Committee;" Question put,
and agreed to

Question, "That Colonel Nolan and Mr. Sexton be Members of the Committee," put, and agreed to Question proposed, "That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records;

Five to be the quorum;" after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

The Composition, Question, Mr. Henegage;
Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury
(Mr. W. H. Smith) June 13, 1742

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee May 16, 68—ARMY
ESTIMATES, Vote 10; CIVIL SERVICES,
£3,830,300, on Account

Resolutions reported May 17, 403

First Resolution read 2°

Moved, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution;" Moved,
"That the Debate be now adjourned" (Dr.
Clark); after short debate, Motion withdrawn;
Question put, and agreed to

Second Resolution read 2°

Moved, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution;" Moved,
"That the Debate be now adjourned" (Dr.
Clark); after short debate, Question put;
A. 58, N. 105; M. 47 (D. L. 149)

Original Question again proposed, 404; Moved,
"That this House do now adjourn" (Mr.
Cox); after short debate, Question put;
A. 55; N. 103; M. 48 (D. L. 150)

Original Question again proposed, 410; Moved,
"That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr.
T. M. Healy); after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

Debate resumed May 19, 611; after short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question put;
A. 246, N. 95; M. 161 (D. L. 164)

Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution;"
A. 245, N. 79; M. 166 (D. L. 165)

Considered in Committee June 6, 1079 —
REVENUE DEPARTMENTS — POST OFFICE,
Votes 3 and 4

Resolutions reported June 7

Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland)
Bill (The Lord Privy Seal)

1. Royal Assent May 23 [50 Vict. c. 6]

SWETENHAM, Mr. E., Carnarvon, &c.

Vaccination Act—Action of the Compulsory
Law of Vaccination, 1053

SWINBURNE, Sir J., Staffordshire, Lichfield

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, 61

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Education Department — Bradford School Board, 508

Immigration of Destitute Foreigners, 514

TALBOT, Mr. J. G.—cont.

Metropolitan District—Deaths from Starvation and Privation, 514
Places of Worship (Sites), 2R. 1847

TANNER, Dr. O. K., Cork Co., Mid

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 1009, 1017, 1018; cl. 3, 1386

East India Stock Conversion, Comm. Motion for reporting Progress, 411, 412

Ireland—Piers and Harbours—Pier at Cape Clear Island, 712

Royal Irish Constabulary—Alleged Misconduct of two Constables, Co. Limerick, 890

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 728, 730

Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, 206

Report, 404

Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1141, 1160, 1161

TAPLING, Mr. T. K., Leicestershire, Harborough

Supply—Revenue Departments—Post Office Services, Post Office Savings Banks, &c. 1128

TEMPLE, Sir R., Worcester, Evesham

Africa (South)—Zululand, 254

Jubilee Thanksgiving Service (Westminster Abbey)—British-Indian Volunteers, 1592

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—London School Children in Hyde Park, 1429

Theatres—Protection of Life from Fire—

Burning of the Opéra Comique, Paris

Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 6, 1076

THRING, Lord

Irish Land Law, Comm. cl. 1, 17; cl. 16, 43

Tithe Rent-Charge Bill

(The Marquess of Salisbury)

Committee, after debate May 23, 823 (No. 54)
Report June 10, 1668 (No. 110)

Tithes—Distraint for Non-Payment, Shinford, Berks

Question, Sir Thomas Grove; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 16, 60

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston

Coal Mines—Udston Colliery Accident, 1073
East India Stock Conversion, Considered. add. cl. 626

TOTTENHAM, Mr. A. L., Winchester

Army Estimates—Provisions, Forage, &c. 119, 123

Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 1)

Bill (Baron Henry De Worms,

Mr. Jackson)

c. Read 2^o May 18

[Bill 257]

Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2)

Bill (Baron Henry De Worms)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 23

[Bill 271]

Read 2^o June 8

TREASURY—First Lord (see SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.)

TREASURY, A Lord of (see MAXWELL, Sir H. E.)

TREASURY—Secretary to (see DOUGLAS, Mr. A. AKERS-)

TREASURY—Secretary to (see JACKSON, Mr. W. L.)

Trinidad—The Pitch Lake

Question, Mr. Baden-Powell; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) June 7, 1217

Truck Acts, The—Violation of their Provisions

Question, Mr. Barbour; Answer, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) May 16, 57

Truro Bishopric and Chapter Acts Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Stuart-Wortley)

c. Committee; Report; read 3^o May 20

[Bill 205]

Trusts (Scotland Act (1867) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland)

c. Read 2^o May 16, 227

[Bill 225]

Committee deferred, after short debate May 23, 1025

Committee; Report June 6, 1203

Considered; read 3^o June 9

l. Read 1^o (Marquess of Lothian) June 10

(No. 117)

TUITE, Mr. J., Westmeath, N.

Civil Service—Lower Division—Examinations in Dublin, 875, 876

Ireland—Law and Justice—Barbavilla Prisoners, 1048

TWEEDDALE, Marquess of

Scotland—Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow)—The Botanic Gardens and the University, 640

TYLER, Sir H. W., Great Yarmouth
 Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of, in London, 729
 Poor Law (Metropolis)—Strand Board of Guardians—Case of Elizabeth Smith, 856
 War Office—Ordnance Department—Experimental Wire Guns, 1724
 Royal Engineers—Transference of Lieutenant Gordon of the Royal Marine Artillery, 1071, 1072, 1428

United States

Emigration of Highland Crofters, Question, Dr. R. Macdonald; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) June 9, 1434
Emigration of Pauper Families from Ireland, Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Bal-four) June 7, 1218
Emigrants to Tennessee, Question, Mr. Panton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) May 19, 502
 [See titles Canada—North American Fisheries]

Vaccination

Action of the Compulsory Law of Vaccination, Observations, Mr. Picton; Reply, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie); short debate thereon May 24, 1051
Assault on the Police at Leicester, Question, Mr. Picton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 23, 891
Convictions by the Leicester County Bench, Question, Mr. Picton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) May 20, 724

VINCENT, Mr. O. E. H., Sheffield, Central
 First Offenders, Comm. add. cl. 803, 804; Consid. 1331, 1335
 Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—The Royal Titles, 520
 War Office—Army Abroad and in India—Audit of Accounts, 704

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Lincolnshire, Brigg
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 596, 763, 764
 Poor Law (England and Wales)—Salaries of Poor Law Officers, 63
 Public Meetings (Ireland)—Interference of the Police at Dungannon, 886

Wales

Anti-Tithe League, Questions, Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, Mr. Speaker, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 895
Intermediate Education—Government Assistance, Question, Mr. Cornwallis West; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) May 23, 895

WALLACE, Mr. R., Edinburgh, E.
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1377; cl. 5, 1753
 Scotland—Action of the Crofter Commission, 1037

War Department—see Army

WAR DEPARTMENT—Secretary of State
 (see STANHOPE, Right Hon. E.)

WAR DEPARTMENT—Financial Secretary
 (see BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F.)

WARMINGTON, Mr. C. M., Monmouth, W.
 Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1778

Water Provisional Orders Bill
 (Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Jackson)
 c. Report: June 9 [Bill 250]
 Considered: June 10

WATT, Mr. H., Glasgow, Camlachie
 Post Office—An Insurance Department, 1733
 War Office—Contracts, 1732

WAYS AND MEANS

Excise—Adulteration of Beer, Questions, Mr. Bonsor, Mr. Quilter; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) June 7, 1220
Methods of Testing Spirits in Bottles, Question, Mr. Young; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 20, 713

Inland Revenue

Board of Inland Revenue—Reduction of the Staffs of the Indoor and Outdoor Departments, Question, Mr. Macdonald Cameron; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) June 13, 1738
Income Tax on Profits Gained by Foreigners, Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 253
The Income Tax—Charge on the Wives of Civil and Military Officers in India; and others Abroad, Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 19, 513

Inland Revenue Department

Collections at Liverpool, Colchester, and Cork, Question, Mr. Deasy; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) May 16, 58
Pensions in the Secretary's Department, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 23, 865

Finance, &c.

Reduction of the National Debt, 1886-7, Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 248
The National Debt, Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) May 17, 253

WEBSTER, Sir R. E. (Attorney General),
Isle of Wight

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 1, 297, 302, 305, 333, 359, 378, 381, 399,
401; cl. 2, 500, 743, 745, 752, 1008, 1021;
cl. 3, 1275, 1300, 1407; cl. 4, 1488, 1540;
cl. 5, 1764, 1771, 1773, 1774; Amendt.
1775

Deeds of Arrangement Registration, Comm.
cl. 11, Amendt. 1340; cl. 15, Amendt. 1342;
cl. 16, Amendt. ib.; cl. 17, Amendt. 1343;
Postponed cl. 4, Amendt. ib.; add. cl. ib., 1344; Schedule, Amendt. ib.

East India Stock Conversion, Comm. cl. 2, 413

First Offenders, 3R. 1338

Law and Justice (England and Wales)—High Court of Justice—Appeals in the House of Lords, 1028

Quarter Sessions and Assizes, 51

WEBSTER, Mr. R. G., St. Pancras, E.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 1008

Disturnpiked Roads — Annual Receipts and Contributions, 507

WEMYSS, Earl of

Lunacy Districts (Scotland), 2R. 635

WEST, Colonel W. C., Denbigh, W.

Wales—Intermediate Education—Government
Assistance, 895

WHITLEY, Mr. E., Liverpool, Everton

Manchester Ship Canal, Motion for Leave,
1346, 1349; 2R. 1715

WILL, Mr. J. S., Montrose, &c.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 571

WILLIAMS, Mr. A. J., Glamorgan, S.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 777

WILSON, Mr. C. H., Hull, W.

Admiralty — Explosion on Board H.M.S.
"Rupert" at Hull, 1581

WOODALL, Mr. W., Hanley

Magistracy (England and Wales)—Borough of Hanley, 503

WORKS—First Commissioner (see PLUN-KET, Right Hon. D. R.)

WORKS, METROPOLITAN BOARD OF — Chairman (see M'GABRIEL-HOGG, Sir
J. M.)

WORTLEY, Mr. O. B. STUART—(Under
Secretary of State for the Home Department), Sheffield, Hallam

Ireland—Law and Justice—Barbavilla Prisoners, 1049, 1050

Licensed Victuallers Protection Society —
Colonel King-Harman, M.P. 252

Magistracy (England and Wales)—Borough of Hanley, 503

Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire,
724

Marriage Laws — Rector of Much Woolton,
Liverpool, 861

Metropolitan Police Force—Questions

Duty at the House of Commons, 717, 880, 883

Extra Duty of the "A" Division, 809

Return of Constables Dismissed and Reduced, 500, 501

Tithes—Distraint for Non-Payment, Shinford,
Berks, 60

Vaccination Act—Convictions by the Leicester
County Bench, 724; — Assault on the Police, 891

Wreck Commissioners Courts, Hull—Nautical
Assessors, 252

WRIGHT, Mr. C., Lancashire, S.W., Leigh

Superannuation and Retired Allowances —
Pension to a Custom House Officer—Fraudulent Drawing, 518

WRIGHT, Mr. H. S., Nottingham, S.

Jubilee Year of Her Majesty's Reign, Celebration of—Increase of Pension to Old Soldiers, 1587

YOUNG, Mr. C. E. B., Christchurch

Customs and Excise — Method of Testing
Spirits in Bottles, 713

END OF VOLUME CCOXV., AND SIXTH VOLUME
OF SESSION 1887.